He grabs the end of it, and pulls, noticing that it breaks off at that point while Momo makes an uncomfortable grunting sound. He swings it at her regardless, and she dodges to lob a tiny wooden doll that explodes when he hits it.

It's a flashbang.

He swallows the instinctive panic that rises when he can't see anything but white, he can't hear anything but the ringing in his ear. That was good, that was a good move. He has to calm himself down, dodging back to keep the distance when he feels her approach, but he can't do anything else.

He's noticed that the smoke has cleared when he regains a bit of his vision, still blurry. The ringing in his ears has died down to a whine. She's nearly backed him into the wall, spinning into a kick with something long and white in her hand.

He dodges the kick, but she notices that he goes low to avoid it, and swings that white thing against his chest and arms. It feels like putty, and it sticks to the wall. Sticking him to it.

He can't help but ask, even if he knows it's unlikely. "C4."

She looks hilariously horrified. "No! It's a similar plastique, but more elastic and durable, but it..." The growl from her stomach is loud, and it seems to be accompanied by a bit of pain judging by the way she curls her arms around it. "It's a bit more complex, so it...took a bit more effort to create."

That's particularly unfortunate, because it needs a specialized compound to break it down. And Momo can't make it now that she's drained.

He has to trust that Ashi is capable of very carefully melting it with her acid. He tries not to show any concern, but the other students gathered around have no qualms against it. Scotch Tape in particular is helping a lot. "So, Shinsou. Any last words before Ashido inevitably spazzes out? Because after she does, we'll have like 5 seconds to remember them before Aizawa-sensei kills absolutely all of us. Brutally. Painfully. With no legal repercussions. He definitely has a license to kill--"

"My last words," Shinsou says, a bit grateful that the mask is gone now that his hands are tied up. "Are fuck you. I'm mute."

There are some very interesting fumes coming from the combination of acid and plastique. Some very bright colored smoke and just a little bit of green fire before Izuku stomps it out.

Acid is out.

Stress Bake says he's running back to the dorm to get something for Momo to eat, but there's only 10 minutes left in that two hour timeframe. If Aizawa isn't aware that they left the dorm, and he doubts that he is, then he will be soon. And Sucrose Boy will probably earn a bit of a reward to point him in the right direction.

He'd...rather not be found like this.

They're running through their other options. Momo says that the plastique isn't likely to bend enough for them to pull him off of the wall. Todo ignores that and offers to create an ice barrier behind his back to pull him free, and the Mask has to remind him that it's more likely to crush 27's ribs than free him.

Blasty volunteers Izuku to smash in the wall, but luckily that plan is quickly vetoed by the rest of the group. Some worry that 27 might get a bit smashed himself, others are concerned that Cementoss won't be happy to repair the damage.

Izuku snaps his fingers after he figures out a new plan. "Wait! It's only covering Shinsou's shirt, so maybe if we cut it at the seams, he can slip out of it!"

They do have the knife, but this is not his shirt. A few other students must have noticed that, because they stare at Piston before he grants permission to destroy it.

Izuku unsheathes the knife, and though it gets a bit more difficult to avoid cutting him when he gets closer to his armpit, where his arm is trapped into a tighter angle, he does manage it. With both seams cut, 27 starts sliding down against the wall, nearly getting trapped by his head even when he turns it to the side, but luckily the collar of the shirt is wide enough and the plastique has just enough give.

When he stands up, he's reminded why he doesn't like showing his scars.

He knows it's not pretty. It's a history of fights and punishments and losses recorded in his skin. He can't even remember half of the boring slash wounds, but the more interesting quirks he's faced have left their mark. Like the dip under his collarbone from the underling who could vomit bullets from a pistol-like object in her throat. Or the guy with a tiger quirk who nearly tore out his right hip.

Chisaki could have repaired the damages so it wouldn't scar. But he didn't.

There's more scar than skin at this point, and the worst of it is on his chest. He probably should have died from half of them. He did die from a few.

But he only stayed that way until Chisaki took off his gloves.

"Ask," 27 says, even if he could sign. He doesn't want to wait for a translation, doesn't want to look at Genesis either. He feels the mask shut as soon as he says it, he feels it in his jaw stronger than ever. He wants her to ask so he can leave, so he can go to the changing room and put on his shirt. So he can hide. He knows he's hiding, he knows it's cowardly. He wants it too much to call it that.

"I don't...." Creation trails off, she doesn't even know what she wants to ask. There's too many stories on display to pick from. Maybe she'll ask which one hurt the most, and it's hard to say. Definitely a Bug scar, but it's hard to pick one of those. The longest one when he was sold, when he was sure he was going to die. The first one, that bitter escape attempt foiled. The second, another escape that he barely thought about, he saw the client and only thought of Honzo, and ran. A test failed.

The ones on his stomach.

“Your quirk,” Blasty says, too quiet but still angry. Even angrier because it’s quiet. He doesn’t even feel like laughing. “Shitty Hair said you could have killed people-”

“I didn’t-” Crimson Rodeo starts, but cuts himself off with a wince.

Oh. That’s what it was.

They had been acting different. More wary. It wasn’t just fear that he was going to hurt them, that his owner might have instructed him to prior to their arrival. It wasn’t just a punishment.

They were afraid of him. Afraid of his quirk.

Even Blasty.

“Did you and Eri enjoy Shichi-Go-Sa-”

‘ Quirkless. Never going to use it, ’ 27 signs, and he doesn’t care that Creature Conversation’s eyes go wide at that. ‘ Never killed anyone. Never will. Promised 50. ’

He nods at Manufacturer before he leaves, and doesn’t care if he’s translated.

He’s grateful that they don’t follow him, not when this swelling and childish irritation overwhelms him. He pulls on the hoodie with quick and jerky tugs before he lashes out and strikes a locker with the heel of his fist. He doesn’t even know why .

He’s a criminal. Of course they would think that. It’s better that they do, that they know to expect the worst. He wanted to prove to them that every fight needs to be taken seriously, that it could always be a loss that they don’t walk away from. They need to stop acting like children if they’re going to be heroes, because heroes face people like him.

But even Blasty.

He scoffs, the irritation hot in his veins runs cold. He doesn’t care. It’s better if they don’t.

He doesn’t need distractions.

*

Aizawa can’t help but roll his eyes, tucked into a corner of the rafters at Gym Gamma while he observes the training going on below. He mentioned the exposed pin as a concern, but did Bakugo listen? Did Ashido listen when he pointed out the lack of protective gear everywhere , and especially on her hands?

He sighs when he sees another update request from Hizashi. His husband seems to have high hopes for Shinsou’s friend-making abilities, sure that his students and ward will be able to get along swimmingly in the course of a movie marathon or some other normal adolescent activity.

But Shinsou doesn’t seem to like normal adolescent activities. He has not only an interest, but a drive for finding ways to get injured, which is why Aizawa had to slip out of a window on the 6th floor of the 1-A dorms and follow his charges to Gym Gamma, not at all surprised that the first thing Shinsou wanted to do was fight his students.

And beat them.

Aizawa won't say that he's displeased by this exercise. His students seem more receptive to Shinsou's criticisms than his own, and watching the matches allows him to not only see how his students react to an opponent like Shinsou, but how Shinsou fights as well.

He knows that none of them are fighting to their full ability. His students are wary of the knife, and wary of injuring the ward holding it. And the ward is handicapping himself quite a bit. He knows Shinsou is avoiding cutting them to even the shallowest degree, and pretending he doesn't know their quirks puts him at a larger disadvantage than most villains in a fight. That's the drawback of the entertainment industry's involvement with pro-heroes, a hero's quirk is synonymous with their name.

It's more than a little worrying that Shinsou calls himself a villain. It's hard to say if it was a shortened sign, intended the way that Koda translated it. But if more of his students were fluent in JSL, then this exercise might have been all for nothing.

Shinsou isn't making it any easier for them to believe that he's not a villain or murderer, when his first idea to take advantage of the free reign he has over Class 1-A is to start swinging a knife at them.

When Shinsou pins Iida, Aizawa snaps a picture of it to send to Hizashi.

Shou: Image attached

Shou: It's going great so far.

Zashi: I...have concerns

Zashi: Y ARE THEY FIGHTING???? AND HAS SHINSOU HAD THE TALK???? Shou what if he hasnt had the talk r we allowed to do that????

Shou: The fighting is Shinsou's idea. And I'm going to say no, we're not.

Zashi: babe that pose is a lil.... Im calling kayama, she can do it 4 us

Shou: Shinsou has been through enough. He doesn't need the slideshow. Or the puppet show. We're not doing this.

He's worried when he doesn't get a reply.

Jirou also worries him. While he's pleased to be proven right by how easily Shinsou spotted the aux extenders running from her shoulders to her speakers, her quirk wasn't as easy to dodge as the previous students'. While Shinsou did seem to get a bit injured, he shook it off, and as the fights went on, Aizawa felt the rising urge to cancel his student's quirk and end this training session before Shinsou was seriously hurt.

The Problem Child in particular had him worried, but when Shinsou is no worse for wear in defeat, he breathes a bit easier. Until the questions roll in.

And he finds an answer that he hasn't even been given himself. 'Escape.'

Furokage Mizuki had been older than Shinsou. She had lived on the right side of the law for 19 years before the Nomu Organization. She saw a child who had practically been raised in the darkness, and tried to get him out. And she didn't live to see it.

He's not surprised to see Shinsou leave, and finds himself tempted to follow. To make sure nothing would come from the vulnerability that answering that question had brought to him, that topic still too raw.

But his students have had their question answered, in a roundabout way.

"See?" Ashido says, turning to glare at Bakugo. "Aizawa-sensei was right, Shinsou didn't kill her. Even if he had to go to Villain School, he wasn't happy there. He didn't want to be there!"

"Shitsei isn't saying anything else," Bakugo grumbles, and Aizawa finds himself raising an eyebrow. He hasn't heard that little nickname before. "We still don't know-"

"It doesn't matter, Kacchan," Midoriya interrupts, standing firm against his peer. "Shinsou is a good person. I really don't think that he did anything bad, and if he did, I don't think it was his choice. Don't tell me you don't see it too."

"He's pushing us to succeed," Iida says, adjusting his glasses. "This training exercise is for our own benefit, and we should take it seriously. His criticisms seem to be well-founded, and useful for our careers as future heroes."

With that, the laps begin, and when Shinsou returns, the matches resume. Aizawa worries that Sero will see him, but luckily he seems to go into a panic at the sight of the knife, and the possibility that it will be used on him.

Asking if Shoji would be in a debilitating amount of pain if he were stabbed in the webbing between his arms is not a good question to ask, but Aizawa is past the point of being surprised that it was.

Todoroki is not a good match up. Even if he doubts that Todoroki will use his quirk to its full ability, he doesn't have to in order to hurt Shinsou. But when he sees that Shinsou not only dodges the ice that tries to trap him, but also climbs the barriers meant to keep the fight to Todoroki's advantage, he starts hoping that the fight doesn't turn out the way it should.

And it doesn't. He has no idea how Shinsou could have pinpointed that, something that took Aizawa weeks to notice, in the course of 15 minutes. But he's impressed.

And he finds himself wondering how much this rivalry with Todoroki's cat is something that Shinsou means and how much of it is purposefully antagonizing Todoroki.

Tokoyami shouldn't have been so distracted in the fight, and he's beginning to wonder where that distraction came from. Whether he was one of the students who believed that Shinsou was a murderer, but didn't admit to it outright.

The fight with Uraraka is a good one. He can see Uraraka putting what she learned from her internship to good use, and he can see that Shinsou is enjoying it. He still seems confident in his ability when measured against hers, and that's proven when he takes her down in a loose pin, in a split second.

Aizawa feels like covering his face with his scarf when he recognizes that look in Shinsou's eyes, when he realizes what inspired it. The pads on Uraraka's fingers where her quirk activated did have a...similarity. He shouldn't be surprised that it would bring out that side of Shinsou.

It's not exactly a good one to show.

Yaoyorozu seems to be inspired to take the training exercise seriously. She starts off strong, so strongly that he doesn't see what happens until he sees that tell-tale flash. That's a bit too serious.

But the smoke dissipates enough that he can keep an eye on Shinsou, and intervene if necessary. Shinsou was still able to retreat from Yaoyorozu, likely moving from instinct, but he seemed to recover enough to try to dodge her first attack. The second surprises even Aizawa.

Aizawa can't help but smirk at Shinsou wry assumption, though he becomes increasingly concerned as time goes on. His students have found themselves once again in a situation in which they need to alert an adult, and yet again, they won't. That might be due to how few seem to take Sero's assumption as anything other than fact, and that surprises him. He might be purposefully strict, but there isn't a single hero that has a license to kill children.

He nearly climbs down to intervene when he starts to see the tell-tale signs of a chemical reaction, but luckily it isn't necessary. But the intervention may have stopped the fall out.

He can see that his students weren't prepared to see the scars. He wasn't either, but he knows well enough to hide that reaction. He expected that if anything could be offered as evidence that Shinsou was an unwilling participant in his own history, this would be it, but he's surprised to see that Bakugo's clenched fists aren't solely from the sight of the scars.

He sees that split second of shock on Shinsou's face before his expression hardens, when he pieces out the reason for this exercise that Aizawa didn't want him to find out. The tension guarding his vulnerability was already present, but it doubles, it almost looks like Shinsou is shaking in anger as he signs.

' Quirkless. Never going to use it. Never killed anyone. Never will. Promised 50. '

And with that, Shinsou retreats. Aizawa finds himself a bit shocked at that revelation, that Shinsou believed he was quirkless, that he was rejecting his quirk that thoroughly. That Furokage Mizuki had to instill that lesson in Shinsou, when she had died when he was 9. She was concerned that Shinsou would need those words at that young age, or even younger.

Ashido tries to backhand Bakugo in the face before he catches her hand. "Why would you tell him that-"

" HOW THE FUCK WAS I SUPPOSED TO- "

Aizawa rappels down with the capture scarf to break the two students apart before it could truly come to blows. "That's enough."

He sees the shock on his students' faces, that not a single one of them recognized that he had been watching them. It was pointless to allow them to believe that he trusted Shinsou that much, to allow him unsupervised access to the students while he was armed. Even if he did trust Shinsou, he knew his students were never at risk.

Shinsou was the one he was worried would get hurt from this. And he was proven right. "25 laps and 200 pushups. 30 laps and 300 for those of you who suspected Shinsou was a murderer and did nothing about it. Iida will supervise."

Iida might finish 30 laps faster than the others, but he wanted all of them to stay away from the dorm for the time being. He had enough to worry about with Shinsou.

He hears the slam from outside the changing room, but forces himself to wait outside. To keep any well-intended but ultimately ill-equipped students from trying their hand at reassuring Shinsou. To give him the well-deserved opportunity to gather himself.

To find himself feeling ill-equipped to deal with this too.

This was poor planning on his part, and he doesn't feel like he can handle the fall-out. Shinsou barely seems to trust him, and certainly wouldn't with this. Not with this fresh and isolating betrayal, on top of barely hidden grief.

Aizawa nearly texts Hizashi before he hears the door opening, and leans against the wall to create the impression that he knows nothing about the situation. That he has no concerns about it, but is open to Shinsou revealing his own worries.

Shinsou looks a little surprised, but his expression is back to being guarded. No more eager smiles or flashes of irritation that his students saw. It's not promising, especially when he finds himself wondering how often he's taken that neutral mask as calm. How often he's been fooled by it, and blind to a well of pain beneath the surface.

"Did you like being in charge of those idiots?" Aizawa asks. The question doesn't betray what he knows, but it's an invitation.

He's not surprised to see that Shinsou doesn't take it, even if he is surprised to see a flicker of a smirk with that shrug. ' Fine. Pointed out some things. Hope it helps. '

Aizawa realized that Shinsou's idea wasn't entirely his own. He mentioned it once , and hasn't approached Shinsou about his students after that, but Shinsou decided to hold an impromptu training exercise to help him train his students. He certainly never intended for Shinsou to be involved like that, only to observe and offer those observations. To talk to him about a shared interest, in something that Shinsou was confident in. To see that confidence for himself.

But Shinsou fought nearly every single one of his students, had incurred minor injuries because of that, to help him. The revelation of his students' distrust was not just a result of his poor planning, but because Shinsou felt the need to help him.

"Tell me about it," Aizawa says, unable to say what he really means. Unable to say that Shinsou shouldn't have. That Shinsou shouldn't see himself as a tool for Aizawa to use, that he should be wounded to measure his students' abilities. That he shouldn't throw himself into another pit fight after Chisaki had thrown him into too many.

Aizawa doesn't say any of that, because he knows that Shinsou wants to feel like his efforts weren't in vain, and that Aizawa appreciates them. That he's proud of him.

And despite himself, despite how much he wants to separate Shinsou from his past and from the training that was drilled into him from a young age, from those fights that Shinsou never should have fought. He is.

Shinsou took down the majority of Class 1-A, and he's proud of that.

A Spoonful of Sugar

Chapter Summary

Class 1-A tries to apologize, and Shinsou and Aizawa try to talk. Shinsou tries to make breakfast the day of his scheduled interview at the police station, but ends up upstaged.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: Phantom body sensations related to torture observed but not described, mild anxiety attack

Previously on Wards of UA: After 'training' Class 1-A, Shinsou found out that most of the class and in particular Bakugo thought that he had killed 50. Shinsou's hand doesn't shake as often, but often does when he recalls something that occurred at the 8 Precepts of Death, and Aizawa knows that Shinsou was forced to fight in thousands of matches with the 8 Precepts members. Ojiro and Hagakure were left with Principal Nezu to decide what to do with them, after Hagakure sneaked into Aizawa and Yamada's dorm to spy on Shinsou and unintentionally made him convinced that 127 was there to kill him. Ojiro was included because he was the only other member of Class 1-A who was aware Hagakure was planning to do that. Tokoyami did not previously admit that he also suspected that Shinsou had killed someone when Aizawa first asked Class 1-A who did. Shinsou signed that he was quirkless before he left the training session with Class 1-A. Aizawa assigned his entire class to do 200 pushups and 20 laps, and assigned another 100 and 10 respectively to those that suspected Shinsou was a murderer. Shinsou used his quirk to steal books for himself and Eri at the 8 Precepts, and Aizawa was supposed to investigate the theft two months before the raid took place. Aizawa had previously asked Shinsou what Boss' name was, along with where The Miasma compound was located, and more recently asked about Memory who had poisoned a drug dealer connected with 50's little brother. Shinsou knows Mind Slice as 'Kenma' through a conversation he overheard while living at the police station. Shinsou has a collection of recipes from Mrs. Midoriya that he wants to cook to see if he can imitate a 'mother's cooking' for Eri. Eri lost her first tooth and now whistles when she tries to say words with an 'S' sound. Shinsou and Eri got pet fish at Shichi-Go-San, but while Shinsou named his fish 'Fishio' when asked, he wanted to name it 'Ten' after a member of The Miasma. Eri usually picks out Shinsou's clothes. Eri can say 'Chisaki' if she says 'Fuck Chisaki.'

Aizawa almost didn't take the class rosters, but he finds himself glad that he did. "Don't tell my students about this, but I want to know how you think they'll do on their Heroics Midterm."

Shinsou pulls himself a little closer where he's sitting on the cot, interested to know what the papers have written on them. His eyes are locked on them, until he glances to the door with a pull of a frown. ' Won't. Don't have phone. '

Aizawa nods, wondering if he would be tempted to use it if he did. Even if Class 1-A had been convinced that Shinsou wasn't a threat, they had probably succeeded in driving Shinsou away from them. If he had considered any of them friends before, knowing that they suspected him of murder and considered his quirk well suited for it, he wouldn't try to connect to them again.

Despite how well that benefits the investigation, Aizawa feels unsettled to know that. Isolation, no matter how beneficial or nearly necessary in this instance, was a difficult thing to wish on someone like Shinsou.

"The Heroics Exam will be a team-based exercise with Class A facing Class B, usually comprised of teams of four decided at random," Aizawa explains, pushing his chair backwards so that both he and Shinsou can look at the two rosters in his hand. "With Class A having only 19 students rather than 20, one of my students will have to fight two matches, which will also be decided at random. In the past, a promising member of Class C might have made an appearance, but that hasn't happened for more than a decade. And I certainly didn't see anyone worth inviting this year."

Not a single member of Class 1-C even finished the foot race for the Sports Festival. Once they saw the minefield, they stopped and waited with the management students for the time to run out. As a former member of General Studies who had used the Sports Festival to force his way into Class 2-A, he was disappointed. Even more so than the years that he watched a handful of Class C hero hopefuls break into the second round before they gave up or were defeated.

"Kan focuses on team building exercises more than I do, since most Class B graduates find themselves in sidekick positions longer after graduation. It's usually a toss up whether skill or cooperation decides the victory, but depending on which students work together on a team, I'm hopeful that my class will win," Aizawa says, though 'hopeful' doesn't convey how desperately he wants to win this year.

To the victor go the spoils, and the spoils are to make the loser a slave for a day. Aizawa wouldn't say he's truly taken advantage of that. He's made Kan do all of the paperwork that accumulates from both of his jobs, and on one occasion made him clean up a few investigative leads on his docket.

Kan, on the other hand, was a bitter, disgusting little man who took far too much joy in making Aizawa clean his apartment, bring him snacks and drinks, and then go out for a night of karaoke with Ectoplasm. He's grateful that he's a lightweight when it comes to alcohol, and after a few drinks that Hizashi slips him, he hardly remembers anything of that night. Even though there's plenty of evidence that Hizashi and Nemuri threaten him with.

He has a sneaking suspicion that Kan's goals are different this year. It might be paranoia, but it might not be. Just the way that Kan's grin pulled a little tighter around his fangs, revealing more of them when he asked if Eri liked getting horseback rides from her designated hero. The way he looked at her at the birthday party, the way his eyes follow her on the few occasions they're in the same vicinity. Eri is not part of this little pact that formed on an ill-placed bet, and he won't let her be involved in it.

Shinsou's eyes narrow before he leans backwards to reach into his bookbag, taking out a notebook and pen. He looks up at the rosters several times, before he shows Aizawa a list of teams from both classes where their quirks would best compliment each other. Aizawa notices that Shinsou has already taken into account that quirks related to detection, or other support-oriented roles, need to be balanced by a strong and in the best case scenario mobile offensive quirk user. He also notices that his handwriting becomes steadier with some names and not others.

He takes note of those names, and wonders if he could find out which members of the 8 Precepts had their quirks. If he could make sure that they face justice for using their quirks to fight a child in a pit fight.

“Monoma will be a difficult opponent,” Aizawa muses, nearly wincing as he looks at which team from Class A he would be facing in Shinsou’s scenario. “Whether he copies his teammates’ quirks to keep Class A at a disadvantage, since they haven’t faced most of them, or copies Class A’s to negate those students’ abilities... Having multiple quirks at play from a single opponent effectively makes him a cohesive team on his own.”

Shinsou raises an eyebrow in a flash, before he signs. ‘ Multiple. ’

Aizawa nods, looking back at the roster. Only the bare description of their quirks was next to their picture, not the limitations. “Monoma can copy three quirks at once, though there is a time limit for how long he has them. Kan has been working with him to increase his stamina as much as he has to increase his familiarity with different quirks, and strategies to use them.”

Shinsou nods, staring back at his matches. Even if Monoma only copied Midoriya and Kirishima’s quirks, he could rocket around the exam site as an indestructible and unstoppable bullet.

“When I was selecting my class at the beginning of the year, I nearly moved Monoma to my roster,” Aizawa says, though his reasons not to have not only remained unchanged, but have become more and more evident. “I try to select students who not only have the most potential as heroes, which means not only a powerful and useful quirk, but a selfless drive to help others, and talent for cooperative missions. Monoma didn’t strike me as a student who had the last two.”

Before he decides, he tallies how many times a student will say a certain word during their interview portion of the entrance exam before he measures it against their scores, and reads the notes from examination supervisors. He watched Monoma’s interview, but found himself doubting his sincerity every time his tone lightened when he mentioned a heroic ideal that had put him close to the cut. Whether Monoma truly believed in helping others and making a positive difference was beside the point, if he was uncomfortable enough with those ideals not to speak them plainly, he was in no position to uphold them.

Shinsou nods, and draws up another set of the worst case team matches. Aoyama is the student selected in two matches, and the lines are not only drawn so that the teams are unbalanced with their quirks’ specialty, but with students who don’t seem to spend much time together. Their cooperation would be difficult to create.

Aizawa finds himself checking his phone again, to see if Ojiko and Hagakure’s fates have been decided yet. Their positions would be difficult to compensate for, and Kan has already complained enough that his class roster should be an even 20, just to make things simpler. Having 17 students instead of 19, and the change coming a day before the exam, would likely incense Kan more.

He doubts that even Principal Nezu would expel them. More than their obvious potential, there’s a deeper level of sadism to keep them enrolled at UA, and subject to more of Principal Nezu’s machinations, for longer.

Between checking his phone and glancing at the monitors, Aizawa tries to draw out more of Shinsou’s observations and opinions about his students. But Shinsou seems distracted and signs shorter responses as the conversation goes on, and Aizawa begins to doubt whether this was a good conversation to have. If Shinsou’s guard wasn’t ready to be lowered, he might be getting less enthused about the conversation because it was a reminder of what happened prior.

He catches Shinsou glaring at the monitors and looks back to see Bakugo raising his phone to a camera he shouldn't have found, and shouldn't have been able to reach as it was mounted on the ceiling in the common room. The brief sight of Uraraka looking up at the camera from the ground explained how he managed that.

If Uraraka was helping Bakugo pass along this message to Shinsou, that could only mean that all of his students were intent to communicate with Shinsou. And Shinsou not having his phone would not stop them at this point.

Aizawa pulls his hair into a loose ponytail, considering his options. The first is to hang a sign on the Safe Room door threatening to expel any student who knocked on it to talk to Shinsou. It was the simplest solution, though it did seem immature. He could also text Iida to carry across that same sentiment, but when he catches a glimpse of Iida standing next to Uraraka with the same pensive expression, he realizes that it might also be ignored.

He finds himself wondering if he could have Shinsou escape out of the same window on the 6th floor that he used to follow his students to Gym Gamma, before he notices the procession on the stairwell. His students were predictable if not insufferable in their determination.

Shinsou doesn't seem to be aware of it, frowning at his notepad before Aizawa speaks. "My students are likely coming to apologize. Would you like me to turn them away before they get here?"

Shinsou always takes too long to answer questions, especially when Aizawa asks them. Aizawa keeps a watch on his students out of the corner of his eye while he waits, finding himself more and more inclined to head them off whether Shinsou answers or not. But he's surprised to see that small shake of his head, before he closes the notebook and sighs. Though Shinsou seems just as enthused as Aizawa is, he's also just as aware that his students won't be easily stopped.

The knock comes soon after, and both of them answer it.

"WE'RE SORRY," Iida, Bakugo, Kirishima, Sero, Jirou, Aoyama, Sato, Shoji, and Tokoyami declare in unison before they bow, and Aizawa wonders idly if they rehearsed. If Shinsou's impassive face is any indication, he's not impressed with the show.

Iida rises first. "Shinsou, we should have brought our concerns regarding your behavior to you directly, rather than letting those concerns fester into an unbecoming suspicion. We may have been wrong to have them in the first place, to doubt the kind of person that you are, that you have shown yourself to be. It doesn't matter what actions you have taken or what quirk you have."

Bakugo hisses behind his teeth, casting a glare at Iida before he levels a less threatening one at Shinsou. "You have a quirk, dumbass. You're not fucking quirkless, even if you can't use it 'cause of the mute shit."

"Look, it's..." Kirishima hesitates, rubbing the back of his head while he looks away. "Your quirk really isn't that bad. You shouldn't give up on getting it back, you know? That's like giving up on a whole part of you."

Shinsou's hand rests on the door, as though he's tempted to close it. He's certainly not willing to address the students, though Aizawa is surprised that this display hasn't managed to make a single crack in that blank expression.

"You stand before us as one cloaked in mystery, though some of us know you better than others," Tokoyami says, hands folded behind his back. "But what we have seen from you is ill-suited to our assumptions, and for that, we deeply apologize."

Shinsou is still unmoved, and with a glance in Aizawa's direction, Aizawa turns to his students. "Climb all six flights of stairs 10 times to remind yourselves that this floor, and this door, are only meant to be accessed in cases of emergencies."

He sees a pained wince cross even Iida's face before Aizawa reaches over Shinsou's head to close the door.

When Shinsou sits back down to turn back to his notepad, Aizawa spares a glance to his students bickering on the stairwell before he speaks. "Do you consider yourself to be quirkless now?"

He sees a flash of a grimace before Shinsou runs a hand over the back of his neck. ' I dislike. I would rather. I would like to be. '

He's surprised that Shinsou answers honestly. Even if Aizawa has suspected it long enough, knows that Shinsou's mutism might be a mixture of trauma but also rejection of his quirk, Shinsou has never admitted it so plainly. "Eri has the same feelings towards hers."

He's surprised that Shinsou seems shocked at that. His eyes widen with it, and that expression for once doesn't fade back into indifference.

"She asked me if it was possible for me to take her quirk away permanently. It's understandable that she would want that, with the pain that it has caused her," Aizawa says, watching shock draw into a grimace, into what he knows is blame. "She calls your quirk 'The Safe Place.'"

Surprise crosses Shinsou's features again, before he grimaces. ' Not safe. Could have hurt her. Could hurt anyone. '

"I doubt it," Aizawa says, folding his hands in his lap. "I doubt that your quirk could cause Mental Quirk Abuse Syndrome, that you would ever use it with the intent to harm someone. I've only ever seen you use it to help others. To protect Eri, to control her quirk. To get the workbooks necessary for Eri's education."

Shinsou's eyes widen in terror at that, as though he thought Aizawa didn't know about the bookstore theft. Aizawa tucks his chin into the capture scarf, unwilling to reveal how he knew. That he was supposed to investigate it long before the raid took place.

"I doubt that you've ever used your quirk for a criminal act out of your own free will. Even if your quirk is powerful, even if it would be easy to be used for criminal intentions, you are the farthest thing from a criminal that I've ever met," Aizawa says, and he means it.

It doesn't matter if Shinsou had kidnapped people, if he had done worse. Shinsou has likely never done anything out of his own free will, has only been forced to survive in circumstances far beyond his own ethics.

What he's seen from Shinsou only proves that he is worthy of having that powerful quirk. Even if it has brought him pain, if his circumstances were different, Aizawa doesn't doubt that he would never have taken advantage of it the way that most people would expect.

Shinsou's quirk could be used in nearly every criminal act that could be imagined, but he knows that Shinsou would have never used it that way. There is a surprising kindness inside Shinsou that is almost painful to know exists, to know that it exists despite the abundance of reasons why it shouldn't. That Shinsou has hardly known kindness from others, has never seen it demonstrated for him, yet had it in himself regardless.

Shinsou stares at the notepad in his lap, before he takes the pen in hand again. Aizawa doesn't know if he has something to say that would take too long to sign, or use too many words that would have to be fingerspelled. But he's surprised to see that it's neither when Shinsou hands the notebook to him.

'Poisoner - Memory. I only know Boss' name as Boss.'

Aizawa nods. He's not sure if the change in subject is a way for Shinsou to avoid the conversation, if anything that he's said has had an impact. But with the interview tomorrow, he can't afford to turn away this opportunity to gather this information, especially when it was offered so freely. "Can you tell me anything else about them? Their quirks, if not their names."

Shinsou nods, taking the notepad back, writing another quick note. He hesitates, pen hovering over the paper, before his lips tighten into a grimace, and he hands the notepad back. 'Memory - sees history of objects if she touches them.'

Aizawa turns around to face the monitors, pulling up the portal to the police database to see if he can identify this 'Memory' with the details of her quirk. He hopes with Shinsou willing to disclose it, that he can also identify which result for that search would be 'Memory.'

Identifying one of the members of the Nomu Organization. That was almost better than a lead into how they operated. If they could find living family members, connections that they had on the outside, if they could capture that live operative when they visited them. They may be able to infiltrate the organization.

It could convince The Commission that they were making progress on their own. That the organization that had injured Endeavor was going to be taken down without their 'help.' Shinsou didn't need to suffer, and whatever they had planned for him would only put the investigation into jeopardy.

There are 134 results for a black haired woman younger than 50 years old, with a quirk that can view the history of an object with an area of effect being 0 meters. Aizawa switches places with Shinsou so that he can scroll through the results, looking at the pictures from each woman's identification card. Aizawa finds it hard to keep an eye on the live feeds from the dorm. Even when he sees Ashido and Kaminari pulling a mattress to the stairwell to try mattress surfing again, he doesn't intervene like he should.

He watches Shinsou scroll past the results at a glacial pace, his anticipation rising the further down he scrolls. There has to be a record. Even if it's possible that Memory is another undocumented foreigner, even if it's likely, he can't help but hope that a record still exists. A trail. A reason to offer The Commission.

Shinsou reaches the bottom of the page, staring longer than he should before he shakes his head. 'Not lying. Not fighting.'

Aizawa feels the urge to put his hand on Shinsou's shoulder, to quiet that anxiety that causes his eyes to widen and hands to shake, but he ignores it. "I know. She may not have a record if she wasn't born here, or if she's not a documented immigrant. It's fine."

Shinsou bites his lip, looking back at the monitor warily. 'Removed. I-N-F-O-R-M-A-N-T. Japanese.'

If Shinsou was right, then this conspiracy digs even deeper than police stations and hospitals. It could infect at even the highest levels. Removing all the records associated with a Japanese resident wasn't something that a police officer had the power to do.

Shinsou looks back at the notepad lying beside Aizawa, as though he wants to try again. He wants to offer another piece of information, another lead. Aizawa hands it to him with the pen, hopeful that it could be simple. It was as easy as just writing down the organization's name.

Shiori has cracked cases on far less. Glitzy could make a phone directory out of every name that she's overheard, or listened to a criminal brag about belonging to. Names are simple to track down, it's easy to know where their influence is by where that name is spoken the most.

Shinsou has made the effort this far, but Aizawa can tell that this piece is more difficult. He watches one line drawn, shakily, before Shinsou covers his mouth and bends forward, his other hand fisted in his shirt in front of the scars on his stomach.

Aizawa takes the notepad back, turns the chair for Shinsou to face him before he gets lost in the memory of something more brutal than Aizawa wants to imagine. "Shinsou, it's fine. It's enough."

It's not. 'M.E.' wasn't worth anything, and 'Memory' was worth even less.

But Shinsou was worth more.

*

Aizawa wants him to sleep. He can't.

There's another meeting at the police station tomorrow, and his owner didn't even tell him about it until now. His owner doesn't know who he'll see, but 27 knows it won't be Chisaki. It might be 'Kenma.'

He can't write Bug's name. He can't tell his owner anything about her. He can't give him The Miasma's name, it's the only anchor he has. It's all that he's worth.

Aizawa knows that he knows it. But he doesn't ask. 27 doesn't know what that means, what Aizawa means by that silence or what he means by what he says.

The farthest thing from a criminal... He knew that he was. He knew exactly what 27 had done. Everything he did at The Miasma, everything he did at the 8 Precepts. He used his quirk to fight, to steal, to kidnap people. It was easy with his quirk, and that's why he's a criminal. It's why he was sold. Shark Dude was right, his quirk was part of who he was, and it was the worst part.

He doesn't understand why his owner wasn't angry about that. Aizawa is a hero, it's his job to hate criminals, to bring them to face their crimes. The way he talked about his shoplifting, about what he did in the vague way that he said it, wasn't entirely neutral, but it wasn't angry.

It was almost like it was sad. Pitying.

Aizawa asked if he'd rather go back to Yamada and Eri, if it was difficult to sleep here. 27 shook his head, it wouldn't help. He can't sleep, or else he'll dream. He'll dream of his mother, of 50, and he can't afford to think of the dead.

He tries to answer the questions on his tests, the ones that were in the office that Yamada finally handed over. He knows some of the history questions already, he knows a lot more of the science ones thanks to 10's medical textbooks. Even if he skips around, he manages to answer some that are on the back pages of that test.

Questions and answers and tests. There's too many of them here, at UA. He's been tested, and he will be tested again. He's failed, and he'll probably fail again.

But he's never punished for it.

*

Hizashi isn't happy that Aizawa chooses to wait at the dorm until Class 1-A leaves for their English Midterm, but it's easier to avoid his students and keep them separated from Shinsou by doing that. When Aizawa interrupts the exam to collect Eri, Shinsou remains in the hallway, just as determined to avoid seeing Class 1-A.

But it isn't until they're back at the dorm that Eri explains exactly how incensed Hizashi was. "Zawa, what are you making for breakfast?"

Aizawa looked up from grading his essays, reminded that Shinsou hadn't eaten yet either. He hadn't even thought to check the refrigerator for leftovers. "I'll see what Hizashi left us to work with."

He left a sticky note that read 'Oops! Your cook was just soooo busy worrying about HIS WARD that he forgot to make breakfast! And it looks like you're out of cereal :p'.

Aizawa glowers at the note, finding that streak of spitefulness never more ill-placed. They had children to take care of, that shouldn't be involved in this. They shouldn't go hungry, and even if Shinsou didn't seem to mind the taste from his jelly pouches, he knew that Eri would refuse to eat one.

Aizawa scours the cupboards in vain, picking at a can of oatmeal before he shoves it back. Eri didn't always like oatmeal, and he knew Shinsou didn't. He wasn't going to attempt to make something that they wouldn't eat, and he wasn't cruel enough to force them to eat something that they didn't like.

He...might have burned oatmeal a few times too.

Aizawa has long accepted that he's not a good cook. Frankly, he's cursed. Hizashi doesn't want to believe that, but he's been offered enough evidence to prove it. Hizashi sat there and watched Aizawa fail to make one of the simplest dishes known to man - scrambled eggs. Despite being careful when he cracked the eggs, he still found fragments of shells, and despite stirring constantly, there were parts that were burned and parts that were still runny.

And Hizashi didn't tell him he was supposed to season it until after he took a bite.

Aizawa has many skills, and it's rational that there would be things he's not meant to be good at to offset that. It might be irrational to some, especially Hizashi, but he's perfectly fine with being unable to cook if that means he can excel in more important areas. Hizashi says that if he wasn't a good cook, then Aizawa would live off of jelly pouches alone like it's a bad thing. He would be perfectly fine with that, and probably be more efficient at his jobs if he slimmed down the time he ate from minutes to seconds.

But that leaves him wholly unequipped to feed the two children he's responsible for.

It also makes it all the more humiliating when Shinsou hands him a recipe for tamago. ' I want to try. If okay. '

Humiliating. "That's fine."

Shinsou still looks up at him from time to time as he sets out the ingredients, as though he's asking for permission to use them. Or if he's waiting for Aizawa to offer to help, to explain why he's simply standing in a corner of the kitchen and watching.

He can't help. Anything he touches turns to ash when it comes to cooking. But he can't just sit on the couch and wait for his ward to cook something for himself and Eri.

He realizes that he's probably making Shinsou more nervous when Shinsou nearly knocks over the bowl of egg yolk, and looks back to Eri watching TV just to avert his stare. He could go back to his grading, and probably should given the deadline and the massive stack of essays looming over him.

But Shinsou has never cooked on his own. He's helped Hizashi enough times to be a little more familiar with it, but he might need help.

Not that Aizawa would be able to help him.

It's frustrating.

"Why tamago?" Aizawa asks. He's not usually a conversational person, and not one to ask pointless questions, but he feels like he needs a reason to hover, and a conversation provides that.

Shinsou looks between the recipe and the mixing bowl, as though he's wondering if he made a mistake in picking that recipe, before he gives a small shrug. 'Looked easy. Sweet. E-R-I might like.'

Aizawa finds the corner of his mouth tilting up at the thought of that. It was something so simple, so small. Despite what he knows about Shinsou's attachment to Eri, the darkness in which it was formed, that small gesture was so innocently familial.

Less like a child trying to raise a child without the tools to do so, but more like an older brother making a simple recipe that he knew a little sister would like. Aizawa knew that it would take a long time for their bond to truly wane to something simple like that, something more acceptable than 'Mom' and child. But given that they could be separated and suffer no ill effects from it, that Eri only took Shinsou's hand and didn't demand to be carried back to the dorm, it seemed to be waning.

Eri never consistently referred to Shinsou as 'Mom' either. It was much like how often she called Aizawa or Hizashi 'Dad.' Worrying enough when it happened, but it didn't seem to happen often.

After mixing up the eggs with soy sauce and sugar, Shinsou sets out and oils a pan, slowly adding the mixture. The confidence he had at first is beginning to wane as he picks at the edges, waiting for the rest to cook enough to start folding. It tears in the middle, and Shinsou pulls a face at it before adding a bit more of the mixture to repair it.

Aizawa noticed that he didn't pull out the rectangular pan that Hizashi uses, but figured that it wouldn't make much of a difference. It seems to make it more difficult to roll the omelette. Shinsou frowns, picking at the omelette gently on either side, but it doesn't roll up symmetrically. There's a bulge in the middle already.

When Aizawa sees the tremor work back into Shinsou's hand, he nearly offers to help, and should have helped in the first place. It was irrational, he could at least roll it for Shinsou. Surely that wouldn't invoke the curse.

For once, he's glad to hear the sound of the door bursting open with that irritating smirk that he can hear with his back turned to it. "Shouta, are you not feeding your wards properly? I could hear two growling stomachs from next door!"

“Nemmie!” Eri cries, and Aizawa turns to look over his shoulder at Midnight with her arms laden with take out bags. Bags that Eri is already interested in, beaming when she recognizes the waffle shop that Hizashi took her to once. She didn’t stop talking about those waffles for days afterwards.

Midnight’s grin falls when she notices what Shinsou was doing. “ Shouta. ”

She didn’t have to say it. Her narrowed eyes said it all, and promised that she would say it, loudly. But not in front of his wards. She sets the bags on the table, pulling out several containers of variety styles of waffles and toppings, before she sets out a few plates for Eri to pick from to set. Shinsou keeps working on the second set to roll, the tremor gone, but his enthusiasm seems to have died with it.

“Shinsou,” Nemuri says, leaning against the counter with a hand on her hip. “You are a sweet young man who doesn’t deserve to live with this feral excuse of a caretaker. Wouldn’t you rather live with me instead?”

Apparently, she would say it. To his ward.

Shinsou takes a long time to answer questions. Aizawa has to keep reminding himself of that, with every glance he gives to the tamago. Shinsou just takes his time to answer, it doesn’t mean he’s considering saying yes.

Shinsou glances at Aizawa with a hand curled around the back of his neck, before he signs. ‘ She has cat. ’

Humiliating.

Nemuri might not know JSL, but she seems to know what ‘ cat ’ means. She gives Aizawa a Cheshire grin before slowly wrapping her arm around Shinsou’s shoulders, and that’s just another humiliation in itself. Shinsou barely seems to flinch, a far cry from any touch that Aizawa tries to initiate.

Aizawa would like nothing more than to pull out his sleeping bag just to hide from all of his inadequacies being so painfully shown to him, but instead he just watches and simmers in it. Until he sees Shinsou pull away, signing. ‘ Joke. I like here. ’

“It was a logical ruse!” Eri declares, her tooth still whistling on the ‘ruse.’ He turns to see her arms held above her head, triumphant in some con pulled over him. “Yama told Nemmie to bring waffles and for me to act hungry to trick you Zawa! Did I trick you?”

He would rather Hizashi have waited a few years before he started involving Eri into his cruel pranks, but he finds himself impressed that she actually managed to pull it off, smiling at her. “I had no idea.”

He turns back to glower at Nemuri for her part in this, only to see her helping Shinsou finish the tamago. She seems to have taken over the rolling, but praises him for his efforts so far, since someone should have told him that there’s a pan better suited for it.

He ignores that jab in favor of helping Eri pick out utensils and put back the plates that she doesn’t want to use. It makes him feel useful.

Tamago and waffles aren’t exactly a winning combination, and despite Nemuri’s efforts, there’s still a bulge in the middle. But when Aizawa notices that Eri pulls a slight frown at her slice of sweetened egg, he fears for the worst. He just hopes she doesn’t say anything about it.

She does. “Yama’s roll-y eggs are different.”

There’s a grimace that Shinsou doesn’t quite hide, though it’s clear to see that he’s trying to. “I used a different recipe. And I haven’t made them before. Sorry.”

Shinsou stares at the half served roll like he wants to throw it away, and Aizawa reaches out to take a slice. Only for his chopsticks to click against Nemuri’s, clearly intending to do the same.

And there’s something in her narrowed eyes as her chopsticks click against his that he perceives as a challenge. ‘ It’s fine. It’s bad. ’ He’s not going to lose to Nemuri.

She tries to pull a dirty play, to yank the unsliced tamago roll off the plate after pulling away from where he had her chopsticks pinned, and while that might have worked for her when they were in high school, he’s had plenty of time to train. He snatches more than half of it while it’s still in the air, and pulls it to his plate victoriously. Not that he’ll show his victory as smugly as she would.

When he takes a bite, he can see what Eri meant. It’s not as sweet as it should be, and the soy sauce flavor is overpowering. There might have been a mistake with which measuring spoon to use, a mistake that even Hizashi has made during some of his more demanding work weeks. But he’s not going to show any indication of it, nor will Nemuri.

“It’s so fluffy!” Nemuri praises, holding a hand to her mouth as she chews. “It really melts in your mouth!” It really doesn’t, and he’s sure that Shinsou knows that.

“It’s very good,” Aizawa says, a less detailed lie that Shinsou might not detect. “Hizashi will be happy to know that you took to cooking so well. He’ll also be jealous that he won’t be able to have any.”

There’s a flicker of relief at those words, and just the barest hint of a smile. But it’s enough for Aizawa to feel victorious, in a way that barely seems to involve Nemuri at all.

*

27 notices that Eri is staring. Not quite at their fish, even though it is entertaining to watch them dart around and gulp the little bits of fish food. She looks at him with her head just slightly cocked to the side, like there’s something that she wants to say but she’s not sure if she should.

It was easier when he could just ask her what’s wrong. “You’re thinking.” He doesn’t want to say something’s wrong, and doesn’t want to say everything’s fine. She’s definitely worried about something.

Eri nods. “Twenny, what makes you feel better when you’re scared?”

27 feels guilt pooling in his gut. He wasn’t here last night, and she must have had a nightmare. He drew himself away selfishly this week, and fruitlessly trying to give Aizawa information last night. He wasn’t there for her, and she was scared. “You can tell me, or Aizawa or Yamada. Or anyone. They’ll make you feel better about the thing you’re scared about, because they can protect you from it if it’s real. Or tell you why it’s not.”

Eri furrows her eyebrows in a half pout. “M’ not scared, Twenny. I was talking about you!” She leans her arms on the kotatsu when she hops to vent her frustration, insulted that he took her words the wrong way.

He doesn’t know how he slipped, how he showed that to her, but now that she’s upset about it, it will only make it harder to convince her it’s not there. “I’m not scared, Eri. I’m fine. I’m watching the fish eat.”

Ten tries to eat a piece that Fishie steals once he notices Ten’s interest, and 27 doesn’t know how to fix that. If Fishie eats all of Ten’s food, Ten might starve, but if he puts more food in for Ten to eat, Fishie might eat too much and die. “Twenny, it’s okay that you’re scared. You’re supposed to tell someone when you’re scared.”

He doesn’t know which one should live. It’s unfair that it can’t be both, but he can’t look away from it now. He can’t ignore it. “I’m really not scared, Eri. You’re being silly.”

There’s two now, but there can only be one. He can’t have both, he might have none. His owner and Aizawa. 27 and Shinsou Hitoshi. One has to die, one has to die today, he can’t have both, they won’t let him. He doesn’t even know how they’ll do it, it’ll be a surprise and that’s the worst part. He can’t predict it. “Twenny, you’re lyin-”

“Eri, I’m fine,” 27 says, breathing out when he realizes his tone is getting too sharp. He breathes in, his chest feels too tight but he needs it to widen. He needs to pull in enough air. “I don’t know what you’re worried about, but I’m fine, oka....”

Deeper breath. He needs to breathe deeper. He just needs to get enough air. He just needs to put it out of his mind, he’s here. He has a few hours. He needs to keep them. He just needs to work his mind around pretending, pretending he has more. That it isn’t happening. That he’s here.

He’s here, feeding the fish with Eri. His owner and Witching Hour are talking outside. It’s fine. It’s fine, he has fish now. He has a pet. He’s normal. It didn’t even happen, he doesn’t have to leave, he’s Shinsou Hitoshi as long as he doesn’t look down at his scarred hands.

“Twenny,” Eri whines, and he flinches with that, almost loses himself. He feels like something is shaking loose, like his entire mask is shattering. If she wants him to break so badly, he feels like he has to, just because she asks.

But she doesn’t. She walks around the kotatsu and curls herself into his lap. She’s heavier, Yamada says she’s grown 2 centimeters since she came to live with them, but she must have gained more weight than that. Weight that she needed, from food he couldn’t provide.

She’s distracted by the fish again, looking at them while she plays with the string from his hoodie. She didn’t pick it out for him, and he wonders if she’s upset about that. “Twenny, it’s okay if you’re sad. Or if you’re scared. Bad things don’t happen here.”

They don’t. But he’s leaving here. She doesn’t need to know that, doesn’t need to worry that it’s Chisaki. He pulls his arms around her before he checks the door, listens for the sounds of the conversation to make sure that it’s still going on. “Chisaki’s dead.”

Eri looks up at him, afraid. Afraid that he’s lying, that he might have even summoned the mobster just by saying his name without the word ‘Fuck’ in front of it. But he nods, and the fear melts away into curiosity. “Did the Tooth Fairy do it?”

He almost laughs, before he remembers that she might as well have. The Tooth Fairy was as likely to be caught as 127. “No. He just died, because he was a bad person. Now he’s gone, and he can’t hurt anyone anymore.”

Eri rests her head on his chest, still looking up at him. “So don’t be scared of him anymore, Twenny. I won’t be scared either. We’re safe!”

He smiles back at her, back at her excitement. She’s safe. Chisaki’s dead, and that makes her safe.

He's not. Chisaki's dead, and that makes him even less safe.

He wants Chisaki's death to be a relief, to feel like revenge, but it doesn't. If anything, he finds himself appreciating what Chisaki did. That he took 27's blood so that The Miasma couldn't pull him back so easily. That he loosened the mask and let him speak, that he brought him to Eri. That all of that brought him here.

He wanted to be the one to kill Chisaki. He remembers the feeling of hives under his fist, and he wished that he could have made them burst. That he really could have made Chisaki bleed.

If Chisaki was alive, he would know what to expect, and he doesn't. He doesn't know what will happen at this interrogation, but he knows that it won't be simple like it was before, with the police officers. His owner seems to know that too.

He's scared.

Poison

Chapter Summary

After Endeavor was attacked by a Nomu, another interrogation for Shinsou is called for. The Commission's plans for that interview have been kept secret, leaving both Aizawa and Shinsou on edge.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: Implied Suicide Attempt (There's another reason offered, and the POV of the person doing it isn't given), Sensory Flashback, Unintentional self-harm by scratching (self-harm not being the purpose of the scratching), Sexual humor (Given that Wards has been almost PG in some aspects, just thought I'd give warning before we crash a fetish ball), Ableist comment bordering on eugenicist that's immediately argued against

Previously on Wards of UA: Midterms are broken up into days during which a teacher in charge of a course supervises the exams throughout the day, and Friday's Midterm is English. Shinsou is not allowed to go off campus without a police escort, and Sansa has been that escort. Aizawa knows that Shinsou feels guilty for using his quirk to steal books from the bookstore for Eri. At the Chisaki interview, two representatives from The Commission of Wardship Affairs were present. Aizawa and Yamada were kept outside of the interrogation room at the Chisaki interview. Shinsou tends to trade questions, answering one if he has one that he wants to ask, and set this up as a formal 'Question Game' with Aizawa. Aizawa asked why Shinsou wanted to make Tamago in the last chapter, as an attempt at casual conversation. After Shinsou tried to burn off Nemoto's tattoo, Aizawa signed 'Good' when Shinsou approved of the cat drawing covering up the tattoo. Shinsou was conditioned to answer to '27' as his name when he first arrived to The Miasma, being locked in a dark room for weeks on end until he behaved according to Bug's instructions. When Shinsou was absorbed into Chisaki, he was only aware when Chisaki tried to use his quirk, which Shinsou referred to as 'stealing his voice.' After USJ, Aizawa has to wait for a recovery time to elapse before he can use his quirk again. Aizawa believes that he only needs the name of the Nomu Organization to use his informant network to find them. At the beginning of Shinsou's wardship, he would only eat or drink something if Eri handed it to him. Shinsou is still legally dead, and thus wouldn't be able to get a passport. Yamada mentioned getting a forged one for him the night before the Chisaki interview. Shinsou made a name sign for Aizawa on his birthday, and Yamada complained that he shouldn't have to wait for his birthday to get one. When Shinsou's quirk was developing, his head would itch when he wanted to use it. Ectoplasm said that he would talk to Yamada and Aizawa after Mirio left class to be with Shinsou the day of the Chisaki interview, about how much Aizawa and Yamada rely on Mirio to help watch over Shinsou. Shinsou avoids asking questions to Eri after slipping and controlling her unintentionally once. 1-A still hasn't been able to talk to Shinsou after the training exercise where he found out they suspected he was a murderer. Eri lost her first tooth and has a slight lisp as a result. Mirio called Yamada 'Dad' to help inspire Eri to do it, after she admitted that she thought of Yamada and Aizawa as her fathers. Mirio asked for his father to not visit him in the hospital after the raid, and hasn't told him that he lost his quirk as a result of it.

Yamada had Midterms. He can't be here. He couldn't drive 27 and his owner to the police station either, which meant that the cat officer drove them instead. His owner was oddly insistent about sitting in the backseat, behind the cage where criminals sit, and the cat officer makes plenty of jokes about that. Apparently, his owner has a habit of sleeping in dumpsters and that could be cause for trespassing if he's not careful.

The cat officer makes plenty of jokes at his owner's expense, and 27 can't find a single one of them funny.

The same woman in the suit met them in the hallway before the interrogation room. It's still the same room, the same one that 27 lived in for a month. He can see through the window that it's empty, and it wasn't before. Last time, that man in the suit was sitting in there already, but the room is empty for 27 alone to sit inside. Before someone else comes in.

She opens the door, and Aizawa follows 27 inside. 27 ignores that, ignores that his owner might have lied to him. That he might be the interrogator, and he might have lied about it all along, just to catch him off guard. 27 sits in a chair he's sure is the same one he sat in for days on end, what felt like years, and folds his hands in his lap, staring at the table he's sure hasn't changed.

Aizawa pulls the chair from the other side of the table and sits beside him.

"Eraserhead-"

"It's protocol for a hero to accompany their designated ward as long as it doesn't compromise the ward's security," Aizawa says, his tone nearly neutral, but beneath it is something that is very not. "Unless there's a risk, I'm going to be following those protocols."

Very not. The woman bristles, crossing her arms. "You're not his designated hero. I can ask you nicely to leave, or I can remove you."

Aizawa looks up before he leans forward, folding his hands on the table. " Try. "

She doesn't, rolling her eyes before she storms out, door slamming after her. 27 tries to keep his grin on the side of his face that Aizawa can't see, unable to turn away to truly hide it. It's nice.

It doesn't feel like he's fighting alone.

It starts to feel like he wants to. They're both waiting, and as tedious as it was to wait alone, there was something more irritating about waiting beside someone else who was waiting.

27 watches the clock, remembering that the police officers would sometimes change the time when he wasn't looking. When he was sleeping despite how hard he tried not to, when he was out of his own head. They tried to make him think that he was unaware for longer, that he was more vulnerable than he was. They didn't need to do that.

Aizawa leans back, seems to melt as he slumps further, as time goes on. He's probably bored. Or irritated. Irritated that he's bored, that it's taking so long. 27 watches the clock, making sure that it keeps ticking. That days won't pass by and they won't know about it.

By the time an hour passes, his owner looks like he's nearly asleep. 27 wonders what happens if he does, if they'll move him so carefully that he doesn't wake up. If that's what they're waiting for.

27 stretches out his leg so that it looks like he just kicked the table accidentally. His owner's eyes open, glancing at him, and 27 waits so that the kick just seems like coincidence. That he didn't really need his attention, but now that he has it, the thought occurs to him naturally. ' Question game. '

He doesn't mind if his owner is the interrogator anymore. It might be better if he is. "You can ask questions. It doesn't have to be a game."

27 shrugs, looking away. He doesn't really have many questions that he wants to ask, he's just trying to keep both of them occupied. Alert. Ready. ' Why not T-A-M-A-G-O. '

Aizawa pulls himself up straighter, even though he's still slouched a bit. At least he's not practically laying down. ' No reason. Curious. '

Aizawa doesn't sign like Yamada does. There's an eerie kind of fluidity in the way his hands move. He's sure that it has something to do with his scarf weapon, that he uses certain muscles more than others, maybe there's a certain way of throwing it that he does often. When Eri says that 27's hands look pretty when he talks with them, he's pretty sure she means that they look like his.

His owner waits, leaning a bit further back before he signs again. ' Saw part of training with students. Not in trouble. Why use knife? '

He's not in trouble, his owner said it himself, but 27 still feels like he might be. He could have injured the students if he wasn't careful, but he was. He stole the knife from his owner, so his owner must know that he was being careful. His owner didn't intervene, so he must have seen it.

He might not be in trouble.

' Emotional R-U-S-E. '

He wondered if his owner would find that funny, or flattering, if he would see that it wasn't really mocking. He's not sure which exactly it is, but he sees a flash of a wide grin before Aizawa turns his head to the side, tucking his chin deeper into the scarf. ' Good. '

27 used to think that was a training word. It still feels like it, but in a different way. It isn't fear that drives him to a response, because there isn't a response that was ever expected. It feels oddly nice, though. Powerful in the same way.

Aizawa turns back with narrowed eyes when the door opens, and an older woman wearing a more casual button-up walks inside. "I'm sorry about delay, you like a drink?" She has an odd accent, her words almost slurred by how softly they're spoken.

"Ma'am, we haven't heard from-" The first woman in the suit tries to come in, but the older woman holds up her hand to stop her. She's higher ranked.

"Coffee, black and a Mocha from the shop down the street," Aizawa says, the same way he talks to his students when they've only slightly irritated him. It's not a tone that should be ignored, and he wonders if the higher ranked woman will answer to it.

The higher ranked woman looks to the younger one and tilts her head sharply. The younger one clenches her fists and storms off with a rapid stuccatto from her heels. The older woman doesn't address it, simply closing the door before she walks forward, pulling the lone chair against the wall to the table. She's on the other side, but angled so that she's closer to his owner, her posture loose with her arms resting on the table when she sits. "Sorry about her. Missing brother, not professional! But understandable."

Aizawa clenches his jaw at that, crossing his arms. 27 doesn't know enough to know whether that woman should be concerned, if The Miasma would be interested in her brother's quirk. He doesn't know if he would tell her even if he knew.

The woman smiles at 27, so saccharine that he wishes it were fake. "Nice to meet you, I am Jun. Will ask a few questions, very boring. Wait for coffee first, very boring in here."

Very boring. When 27 doesn't try to answer, she looks at Aizawa and notices that he won't either. That smile doesn't seem to really fade like it should, and she nods to herself.

After a few minutes of silence, she gets to leave, saying that she'll be right back. Aizawa glances at the clock before he pulls out his phone, the corner of his mouth pulling down. "If they waste our time any longer, Hizashi will be here demanding to know why. Loudly."

27 would like that. As nice as the glares and silences were from his owner, he imagines Yamada could make these people regret calling for 27 to come here even more. Maybe they'd stop trying to interrogate 27 here at all.

That's a nice dream, but it's absolutely ridiculous.

It's his turn, but 27 doesn't have any safe questions to ask. Why his owner is sitting here with him, why he hid the face masks. How he found 50. Why he didn't tell him Chisaki was dead.

What a 'Nomu' is.

The Number One hero was attacked by one, and somehow that's related to The Miasma. Or at least, his owner thinks it is. If it's not, that'll end even worse for 27 than if Chisaki found out he overpaid for 27 by over 27 million yen.

He hopes that's just what they call Numbers. Maybe The Miasma stopped using Numbers, maybe they started calling them 'Nomus.' Maybe someone got caught and tried to tell them about Numbers, but got pulled back by Boss in the middle of the word. He's never been pulled back while he was talking, but he imagines that pull would distort the words spoken.

Maybe he's just trying to lie to himself.

The woman comes back in with the two coffees. Aizawa takes a drink from his, and 27 waits to make sure he drinks the right one. They're not labeled.

And then he waits, because he can't convince himself to drink it.

He took a sip from the first Mocha, before they got to the police station. It was nice, it was sweet but only barely so. It was everything he liked about those Mocha cookies, but warmer. But once he stepped into this room, he couldn't drink any more of it, couldn't drink it after he left either, even though Yamada kept it for him.

It's not poisoned, he knows that. He knows.

But he talked about Memory. He gave away her name, and she might know that. The informants were everywhere, his owner might have told someone and let her know. She could have used the expensive poison, just for him, just to make his skin peel away from him in a way that would make him wish for Bug.

His owner takes the lid off of the Mocha and takes a drink of it, before he puts the lid back on and leans back. ‘ How long? ’

27 looks back at Jun, who’s still rustling through the stack of papers she brought in a folder, making them messier while she does. He looks back at his owner before he looks at the clock. ‘ 10 minutes. ’

His owner nods, and 27 finds himself looking at the clock again. He tries not to, he doesn’t want Aizawa to think that he’s waiting for him to die. That he’s anticipating it, excited about it. He’s not.

He should have just drank the coffee. If it was poisoned, it would be 27 that died. Now his owner might be poisoned, and it’s his fault. It’s murder. He murdered him. He murdered Aizawa and Eri is never going to forgive him for that, Yamada will never forgive him, Yamada will probably kill him.

Aizawa pushes the coffee towards him with the back of his fingers, and 27 looks back at the clock. 10 minutes passed while he was staring at it, and he didn’t even notice. Forgot how to read the numbers written there.

He looks at Aizawa, making sure that he’s fine. Not flushed or sweaty, not deathly pale. He’s fine.

27 takes a sip. He’s fine.

It tastes sweeter this time.

Jun finds the paper she was looking for, and smiles before she begins. She asks the same questions that the police officers did, the same words that have probably worn themselves over the paint in this room. What’s the name of the organization, how big is it, where is it, who runs it, what do they do there, are there people there that aren’t willingly there, doesn’t he want to help them get out too? Doesn’t he know that they’re hurting people?

The Miasma hurts criminals. Someone did something stupid to try to take down the Number One hero, and Bug has long since finished them off for that. There’s a huge insurance fee for any client that runs a risk of running into a hero, and they always send a Number who’s on their last legs for the job. A Number that wouldn’t be missed, their value already plummeting. Replaceable.

27 looks at his owner with every question, and his owner looks like he’s ignoring the questions too. Almost like he’s falling asleep. It makes it easier to ignore the questions, to take Jun’s words and her accent to be more like music on the radio. He doesn’t look at her smile, or how it twists into pleading sometimes. He drinks his coffee and bites back the urge to tell her that he’s mute.

He drinks it quickly, as though he needs to have a reason not to answer her instead of the one he already has. The grounds at the bottom are weird, it’s even sweeter, and it’s weirder because it’s somehow slimy.

He wants to spit it out, but he can’t, so he just swallows and tries not to show it. Maybe that’s how Mochas are, maybe there’s something at the bottom that’s weird. Maybe the chocolate at the bottom changes somehow.

It’s been 40 minutes and his owner still doesn’t look poisoned. If anything, he looks even more bored.

He catches Jun looking at him, and she's not smiling anymore. Her eyes seem sharper, more dangerous than he ever thought they could. "What is your name?"

"27."

He can see out of the corner of his eye that his owner sits up straight, that he expected that as much as 27 did. He can't move.

He can't move.

The mask fell off of his face, he doesn't know why, but it's not there, it's holding his entire body shut, he can't move. "Why '27'?"

"It's my name. I have to answer to it. If B..." He chokes on her name, at least. At least. He doesn't feel them in the scars but he feels one in his throat, he feels like the mask is keeping him from breathing. Then, it releases, and he doesn't want it to. "B-b-bad. D-d-d. I-i-it's my n-name. It's mine. I a-answer to it."

He can't move. They took his body but left his voice, playing with it. Making him use it. Making him answer. Stealing his voice.

The hold over him releases and he bends forward, barely catching the sight of the woman's surprise. He holds himself with his arms, tries to stop shaking now that he can, tries to shut his mouth even if he can't breathe, but he can't.

Dark. Dark. They'll make him talk about the Dark.

He feels too small just thinking about it, too cold already, too cold and small to even flinch at the sight of his owner standing next to him, his hair standing on end and eyes glowing red. His quirk activated, and trained on that woman. "Stop this. Now."

Jun just folds her hands on top of the papers, all of the questions that she'll force 27 to answer. That saccharine smile melted, much smaller and more honest now. Colder. "You will blink, Eraserhead."

27 can already see the red lines creeping over white, his owner's eyes more bloodshot. Strained. "I'll erase your quirk before you finish the question."

The younger woman opens the door, holding it open with her arm stretched out. "You're impeding the investigation." The door is held open for his owner to leave through it. She wants him to.

He still doesn't blink.

"Mind Slice will be here on Tuesday, 11 AM sharp."

He blinks.

27 can't move anymore, the hold of the quirk wrapping him up tightly. Severing any control he had over his body, leaving only his mask open. They shattered the mask while it was still attached, he can't get it back. He can't even look up at his owner, only knows he hasn't sat down and hasn't left because he hasn't heard him do either.

He sits down.

His eyes must hurt. They must hurt so bad that 27's hurt too. They sting.

“What is the name of the group that brought you to The 8 Precepts of Death?”

They sting a lot. “The Miasma.”

*

Aizawa clenches his fists against his thighs, tight enough to feel them shaking. 27. It's my name.

It wasn't. The kid had gotten out, he's gotten out, his name was Shinsou Hitoshi.

He's never heard anyone sound as afraid as Shinsou did when his voice broke, when even the quirk couldn't compel him to speak. B-bad. This group, this Miasma, had done something to Shinsou to make him reject his name. To fear it, even if he hid that fear well enough.

He's going to find them. He's going to make them pay.

He's going to make The Commission pay as soon as he gets the opportunity. As soon as Shinsou is out of their line of fire. Mind Slice would kill Shinsou, and even if he wants to stop this, aches to cancel this woman's quirk and throw her and the Commission rep into a wall, he can't.

He can't let them kill Shinsou.

“Is The Miasma working with the League of Villains?” Jun asks, her accent still present, her unfamiliarity with Japanese more apparent by how slowly she reads the question. The Commission might have paid for her flight, paid for all the accommodations a foreigner would need just to interrogate Shinsou like this. Just to force him to answer.

“I don't know.” Shinsou's tone is even, unnaturally even, the same way it was when he said his name was ‘27.’ Robotically. Soullessly.

“Who does The Miasma work for?”

“Anyone with money. With jobs. Criminals,” Shinsou answers, still unmoving. Still hunched in on himself, his hands fisted tight in the sleeves of his hoodie. Apparent fear frozen in place, while his voice is still forced out.

“Who works for The Miasma?” There's a long silence, a slight tremor that builds in Shinsou's shoulders before Jun clicks her teeth, looking back at the page. “What are the members' names?”

“Te...n. 127. 98. 88. 58. 56. 148-”

“What are their real names?”

“I-I don't k-know,” Shinsou answers, the trembling returning. Aizawa clenches one fist tighter, enough to feel the bite of his fingernails in his palm, and rests the other on Shinsou's arm. Even if he can't pull away, even if he doubts this hollow gesture is any comfort, he feels Shinsou stop trembling.

“How are they picked?” The rep demands, her tone sharp and riddled with that unsaid panic. She repeats herself slowly with a glare aimed at Jun. “How. Do they pick. Their Members.”

Jun repeats the question, obediently. The theatrics over the coffee order were exactly that, an act. Something to make Jun appear less threatening than she was.

“Memory finds them. Volunteers. Debtors. Orphans,” Shinsou answers, his mouth opening around another word before it closes, before he speaks again. “Unwanted. With useful quirks. If they make it.”

“Make it through what?” The rep asks, her voice now strained with worry. Jun sighs, complaining in a language that Aizawa can’t place, answered sharply by the rep in that same language. Her brother had a useful quirk, and was cast out of society in some way that Shinsou listed.

Shinsou wasn’t a volunteer. Wasn’t a debtor. Wasn’t an orphan.

“How are the members made?” Jun asks, flexing her fingers again. Aizawa can’t tell if it’s a part of her quirk or a personal tic, but watching them move only inspires him to want to break them.

He feels Shinsou shaking, nearly cancels her quirk then, and he wishes that he did. “ Dark, ” Shinsou nearly whimpers, his voice too small. Too young. “Dark, darkdarkdark answer. 27. Go back won’t-”

His eyes burn, he’s been able to ignore the sting for this long, been able to ignore the pain and unable to show it. His recovery time hasn’t elapsed yet, it’s a wonder he was even able to activate his quirk again. His vision blurs slightly, but he knows he can last longer, he’s not going to blink again, he’s not going to let them-

Jun’s eyes widen in horror, Aizawa looks down to see Shinsou with his tongue between his teeth, and he knows what he’s trying to do.

He won’t let him.

He doesn’t even blink, not until his hand is pressed over Shinsou’s mouth, forcing his tongue back inside and forcing that desperate act not to happen. He’s not surprised that Shinsou still bites down, that he bites down hard, and the wince is what closes his eyes.

Naomasa comes in, one question too late, and the representative has spun into hysterics. “He’s impeding the investigation, remove him-”

“You have a name,” Aizawa growls, barely keeps from shouting. Shinsou is still biting down, still shaking but when Aizawa sees his eyes water, he looks away, glaring down the representative. “That’s enough. ”

“We have the mother,” Naomasa adds, and that’s what makes Shinsou still. His jaw loosens but Aizawa doesn’t pull his hand away. Doesn’t trust it. “Interpol has her in custody. We’re working on the extradition now.”

The representative takes a shaky breath, staring at Shinsou coldly. “We have him now-”

“No,” Jun says, shaking her head before she waves her hands in front of her. “No, no. No more.”

Naomasa meets his eyes, his own widened in concern. In pity, but he doesn’t look at Shinsou. “The protocol-”

“What about this is protocol?” Aizawa snaps. He’s not going to let Naomasa do that, to give Shinsou another mask to hold his tongue in place. There wasn’t a single place that they could take him to, it wasn’t transit. It was pointless.

Naomasa persuades the representative to leave, to sign off on the documents needed for the extradition. Jun follows quickly, not another glance in Shinsou’s direction.

Aizawa only spares a glance at his hand, twin indents that broke skin, not deep enough to bleed.

He'd rather it be his hand than Shinsou.

He sits, he makes himself smaller, less threatening. Shinsou stares blankly ahead, not lost. Not entirely here either. He imagines that he doesn't want to be. "Shinsou, it's alright."

"S-S-stop," Shinsou says, his voice breaking into a whisper. The shaking starts in his hands and moves upwards, shivering despite his arms wrapped around himself. "S-s-s."

His voice fades, that stare into nothing breaks in a shaking gasp. Shinsou tightens his arms around himself, curling deeper into himself with it. Everything about him is tense, trying to hold himself together, to make himself smaller. Aizawa sees the tears start to fall and can't help but reach out, his hand on Shinsou's shoulder despite the flinch. "It's over. It's not going to happen again. Ever."

He has a name. He's going to make sure of it.

*

Aizawa waits until Hizashi comes into the interrogation room. Shinsou can't be left alone, and Aizawa made sure that Hizashi was aware of that before entering. That he prepared himself beforehand, that nothing would be a surprise.

"Let's get you home, Shinsou," Hizashi says, struggling to smile, his tone barely lightened. He knew that it would be impossible to shrug it off, knew that Hizashi likely didn't think to steady himself before coming in, too insistent on being there as a presence for Shinsou now rather than a better one later.

Shinsou still doesn't move but for his trembling, and Aizawa lifts his hand to stand, walking out without another look in his husband's direction. Unwilling to know what look would answer him.

He was supposed to protect Shinsou in Hizashi's place.

He meets Naomasa's eyes only to get his attention before walking to the detective's office. He doesn't care to know if he's immediately followed, and doesn't speak until they're in the second office. There's nothing that he wants to say to Naomasa that doesn't concern the investigation. "Records for the name."

Naomasa shakes his head, sighing. "Nothing. It's too deep." The police had nothing, but Aizawa would make sure to get something. It's what he does. "Sansa is on his way to see Glitzy. I'm going to see Listo, then the Hotos. Shiori works best with you, or Sansa."

"Me," Aizawa answers. Shiori refuses to work with Naomasa because he 'smells analog,' and while she will work with Sansa, it takes too long. They both get distracted. "They have Shinsou Ui in custody."

Naomasa nods, frown deepening. "Her passport was caught as a forgery when she tried to board a cruise ship bound for Thailand. They questioned her about her son's disappearance. She's sticking to the kidnapping story."

She won't be able to keep it. Aizawa will make sure of that. "Did they cut us both out?"

Naomasa's nostrils flare, a clench in his jaw before he turns to look at Aizawa. "They put a villain and a victim together in a room in my precinct. What power do you think I have, Eraserhead? I've lost every favor I've ever been owed, I don't have any more friends to call, and they still...."

Naomasa looks away, hand splayed on his desk before it becomes a fist.

“We have four days before Kenma gets here. We need enough for a counter operation before they call him off.”

Aizawa won't let that happen. “The representative’s name. Her brother’s name, whatever you have on that-”

“Nothing,” Naomasa says, throwing his hands up. He already knows, and has already tried. “We don’t receive their names, I don’t even know where to begin in Missing Persons. This is still Endeavor we’re talking about-”

“She doesn’t give a shit about Endeavor and I don’t either,” Aizawa cuts off. He absolutely means that, has meant it since Endeavor became a pro hero and has only found that feeling deepen since the beginning of this school year. There are quirk accidents and there are burns, and Todoroki has one of them. He’s always known that. “I doubt even the Hero Commission is putting the pressure on like this.”

Hawkes is younger, more marketable, especially with the scar that won’t be erased. The stain on Endeavor’s career. Hawkes is more stable because he’s young, because he’s farther from the wrinkles and aging that were cause for concern even before All Might retired. He’s a new future. He’s a better investment.

And Naomasa’s silence is all the more telling of that.

“They need to stop the production of Nomus,” Naomasa says, a simple statement. Detached from what that means for Shinsou, and while Aizawa was able to do that at one point, he can’t anymore. “They’re considered a hostage situation of the worst kind-”

“They’re dead,” Aizawa grates out, staring at the detective but in the back of his mind all he sees is dead eyes, exposed brain matter, drool leaking from its beak. “Don’t tell me what a Nomu is.”

“Most of them are,” Naomasa answers, again, too detached. Aizawa envies that now. “The one that fought Endeavor spoke. It planned.”

It was alive.

And that hardly means anything to Aizawa. He shoves away the disgust, the pity, the pitch black feeling in his gut that forms when he wonders if he would have killed it too, when faced with that. It was the cruelest hostage situation, to kill a victim to save others. To weigh a life against another when it was a hero’s duty to save them all.

He has another hostage that’s closer to him, just like the representative does.

That’s why he needs to see Shiori.

*

Yamada’s car has a fantastic heating system. It never takes long to get to the hottest setting, and the seats all have heating as well. He’s often wondered if he could cook things in the oven that it makes.

He’s got everything on full blast, because Shinsou is still shivering. He doesn’t know if that makes a single fucking bit of difference.

Shinsou wasn’t talking, at all, and Yamada expected that. He tries to talk for him, tries to ramble, but the stories and words keep dying on his tongue. There’s not a single fucking thing he can say or do to make this right, and he's absolutely desperate to get home just so he can pretend he can keep Shinsou safe.

They made him talk. They used a damn quirk to force him to talk. He can't find it in himself to blame Shouta, he doesn't have the time or energy to do it when his mind is whirring around intangible ideas to help Shinsou, still pulling nothing. But if Yamada was in that room, he would have used his quirk too. And he would have stopped it, consequences be damned.

Shinsou shivers more when they step out of the car, arms still crossed over his chest, and he can hear his teeth chattering behind his lips. He pulls the kid's hood up to protect him from a little of the biting wind, and ignores the flinch. He knows it will be a while, but he has to do it, to keep Shinsou a little warmer for the walk back to the dorm.

Eri doesn't like the weighted blanket, it's a little too heavy for her and Yamada thinks she likes getting spoiled by borrowing something of Shouta's, but Yamada pulls it out of the closet and nearly sprints back to Shinsou where he's sitting at the kitchen counter. He drapes it over Shinsou's shoulders and those shaking hands take the edge of the blanket to pull it around himself.

The kid hasn't said that he's cold, and Yamada hasn't asked, knowing the kid has had enough questions to answer. He just knows that chills and certain flavors of shock are treated the same way.

Yamada's mind is still whirring, still coming up empty when he starts making some tea. He picks a citrus blend that's almost too sweet for him, and makes sure to add honey to it. The sweet flavor, the powerful citrus smell, tiny little comforts can't do enough right now.

Yamada can't do enough. He can't talk to the kid, he can't make the kid talk right now, the kid tried to bite off his own tongue. He needs to be in a hospital, and they can't fucking do that.

If Yamada's hands shake when he stirs the honey into the tea, he makes sure that they don't when he hands it to Shinsou. "Here we go! Jeez, it's so cold outside. Still no snow, but it shouldn't be too long. It's too bad we won't get snowed in like we used to, we'd have to get a blizzard to roll in for classes to get cancelled. Even then, I'm pretty sure Principal Nezu has an army of robots for that too."

He's talking about the damn weather. Because there's absolutely nothing that he can say to Shinsou right now that will make this right. Shinsou just stares at the tea, still just shivers, his hands still clenching around the edge of that blanket like it's the only thing that's keeping him here. And it might be.

Yamada holds his mug too tightly when he takes a drink, just in case his hands want to shake. In fear for Shinsou, in anger. He can't even begin to think like that, not until he has Shinsou a little closer to an even keel. Until he gets somewhere. "It would be nice to just stay in, though. Drink some hot chocolate, curl up under the kotatsu and just laze around all day. Drinking something warm really fights off the cold, makes you feel warm from the inside out."

Shinsou's mouth twists into a grimace, still staring at the tea before he shakes his head. Before he lays his head on the counter, still shaking, his fingers twisting and clawing at the blanket before they clench again.

That woman was the one to bring in the coffee. She recovered the use of her quirk quicker than she should have. As though her quirk wasn't just from her voice, the quirk factor wasn't just in her body.

There are villains who can only use their quirks after someone ingests their bodily fluids. Spit, usually. Or blood.

Yamada runs his hands through his hair, the gel breaks and splinters but his hair won't lay flat until he washes it out. He doesn't even care about that, doesn't care how ridiculous he looks, he doesn't know what to do.

He's not sure if even Eri could convince Shinsou to eat and drink anymore.

Nemuri said she'd watch Eri for another hour, but Yamada knows if he asks that she'll watch her until her dorm shift for 2-A. That gives him 3 hours and that's not nearly enough time. There's no amount of time that ever would make this right.

"Shinsou, I'm sorry," Yamada says. He can't not say it, he can't help but feel it far more than he says. Shinsou was his ward, and he was his designated hero. He should have left 3-A to their own devices on the Midterm and damned the consequences, argued with Principal Nezu more beforehand. Maybe he shouldn't have trusted Shouta with this. "It's over. It won't happen again. I won't let it happen, and Shou won't either. He's going to close the investigation, and you won't have to go back there anymore. You're just going to stay here, with us, and I'm going to keep you safe."

Shinsou shakes his head, still hiding his face. Yamada knows that's as dangerous as leaving him the knife, not being able to see his mouth. But forcing Shinsou to reveal more than he wants to of himself seems worse.

"I am. I didn't, but I am," Yamada says, before he pulls out his phone, anger shaking him. "Shouta's getting a forged passport for you. They can try to hunt us down, but I don't care. We're going to America, and Disneyworld, and I'm not letting them -"

"I..." Shinsou speaks in a choked gasp, flinches afterwards. His fingers twist in the blanket again before he pulls one hand away, under the counter. He hears a sniff, and despite any attempt to hide that he was crying, it's still clear on his face when he sits up. It's even clearer that he can't even make his face fully blank, that he just looks hollow and exhausted, his eyes still too red. ' It's fine. '

His chest aches because he knows Shinsou wants him to believe that. That his ward is the farthest away from fine that he could possibly get, and he still wants him to think that 'it's fine.'

Shinsou hides, and he hides well, but he can't hide that from Yamada. Yamada never should have let him, never should have taken Shinsou's favorite sign, 'It's fine,' to mean that it ever was .

It's not fine. "It's not fine, but it will be. We'll make it fine, okay?" Yamada promises, and he's still sending that text message to Shouta to make sure of it. "Still feeling a little cold?"

Shinsou nods, pulling the blanket closer again. He shouldn't be, he should be sweltering with the jacket and that weighted blanket, but even though they're talking he's still shaking a little. Just a little bit less.

"Well, let's tuck under the kotatsu and pretend there's a blizzard outside. Jeez, you can really see my blonde showing. We have this whole table with heaters underneath, perfectly made for warming you up and I make you sit at the kitchen counter," Yamada rambles.

He takes his tea, but not Shinsou's. He walks close, but doesn't lay a hand on Shinsou to guide him. To reassure him. He really can't.

Shinsou wraps the blanket fully around him, tucking it under the kotatsu and over his legs when he sits. He really shouldn't feel that cold, and that's worrying, but they have no idea what that woman's quirk has really done to him. It might be a side effect. "So, I haven't gotten to see you all day! Makes me hate Midterms even more, if I'm honest. I try not to take it so personally, but every time I see one of those herolets scratching their heads over a question I know I covered well enough, it kinda stings. I don't know if I'm angry at them for not getting it, or myself for not covering it in a way so that they get it."

He knows that Shinsou isn't ready to talk about it. That he likes distractions to put some distance and time between things. Yamada can do that.

"Kaminari is one of those that are really frustrating. I mean, he gets so much and I've tried to work with him a lot to make up the rest, but it's like hitting a brick wall. I've bought fidget spinners - and let me tell you, that was not a good week for me when the rest of Class 1-A got in on that. I try to work with him on his study guides, on how he studies, but he goes and just tells me he doesn't. He tells me, his teacher, that he doesn't study at all. And I know it's a bald-faced lie, but still! I'm trying to help him and he's not letting me," Yamada sighs, running his hands through his hair again, trying to tug it down but there's enough of a hold still at the base of his hairstyle that it just looks like a long yellow balloon that hasn't been inflated enough. "I don't get why. I'm not as scary as Shou, and I really don't think I'm scary at all! I'm plenty approachable, if I don't say so myself!"

' Can help, ' Shinsou signs, still staring at the top of the kotatsu, not even glancing at the fish or Yamada. ' Taught Sparky A-S-L alphabet. Can help. Can teach. '

Yamada smiles at that, that little reminder that Shinsou was just a bit more advanced than Class 1-A on English in some areas. That little reminder of the way Shinsou couldn't entirely hide how proud he was when he got something right on the chalkboard, how eager he was to learn more from Yamada. "That might be fun! Could get you set up as a little tutor for the herolets, my own little TA! Between you and those meme videos, we'll have Kaminari up to aces in no time!"

Shinsou looks up at him, finally, his eyes still a little too wide but they're focused. He nods, lips pulled a little tighter just like Eri when she wants something so badly that she's worried that she won't get it. ' Can help. Can stay. Stay to help. '

Yamada knows he doesn't hide it well, the worry that rises with that. That Shinsou feels like he needs a job here, a purpose other than staying safe. Or that the end of the investigation worries him as much as it does Yamada. "You're going to stay here, Shinsou. You don't have to do anything to earn that. It's my job to keep you safe, and the only job you have is staying safe. That's all there is to it, kiddo."

Shinsou shakes his head, eyes going a little wider. Confirming Yamada's worst worries. ' Can help. After investigation. Can stay. Can. ' Shinsou's eyebrows twist and furrow, close to pleading and close to tears, and Yamada can't bear to see either.

"You're staying," Yamada says, the words sounding even weaker the more he hears them repeat inside his head. He's never said it out loud, never dared to, because right now it's so big that it's enormous.

This is what Shouta was talking about.

They've known Shinsou for weeks, and those weeks haven't been pleasant. For every grin he's pulled out there's pain behind it, there's always been pain underneath it that he can't suss out, that Shinsou won't open up about. What Shinsou wants and what Shinsou needs can be two different things, and Yamada can't say he can be both.

The certification course said that wardships were transitional. Heroes guide wards to the end of a painful chapter in their lives. And the story goes on without them. It's a little easier sometimes because of that, because there isn't a reminder of the investigation for the wards.

But Yamada can't bear the thought of that. Eri without Shinsou, Yamada without Shinsou. That bedroom emptied out, the stash box packed up. Eri's 7 year old Shichi-Go-San portrait without Shinsou beside her.

What Yamada wants and what Shinsou needs might be different right now. But he can close the difference. He has to.

"Shinsou," Yamada says, folding his hands in front of him on the kotatsu table. Shinsou is still looking away, still trying to hold back the tears, and Yamada just wishes that the kid would let him see it. To let him help. "I know you're not okay right now. We don't have to talk about it, but I want to help."

Shinsou shakes his head, fingers twisting, his mouth in a grimace, but it breaks in a gasp. He covers his mouth with his hand and ducks his head, but the tears still fall, the shivering stops but his shoulders shaking more for it.

Yamada can't sit on the other side of the kotatsu after that.

He moves slowly, as slow as he can manage, and still manages not to throw his arms around the kid despite how desperately he wants to. He just sits next to him, close enough, hand gentle as it can be on Shinsou's shoulder. He's not sure if he even wants Shinsou to feel it, to startle with it, but Shinsou startles him completely.

He curls in towards Yamada, head knocking against his shoulder, and that's all it takes. Yamada pulls him in and holds him, feels every wracking sob against his chest more than the warm plush of the blanket.

He busies himself with running his hands over Shinsou's covered arm, trying not to squeeze too tight, trying not to cry himself but a warmth blooms in his chest, keeping him from it. Shinsou needs him to hold it together, and he can do that. He can do that.

"It's okay, it's okay," Yamada mutters, voice still feeling tight. He knows it's not, he knows it's not. "It's okay, kiddo. You're here. You're safe. It's all over."

Shinsou shakes his head, another watery gasp spilling out of him before he twists, pulling his legs closer. Even when the kid cries, he's too quiet, still holding himself together with white knuckles even if some things still spill out. Even if it's too much for him to really do it.

Yamada holds the rest. He holds Shinsou through it, muttering over and over that he's safe, that it's okay. He's going to keep Shinsou safe, he's never going back to that police station again, and he doesn't care how he keeps that promise. But it's not okay, it's not even slightly okay, this is the farthest fucking thing from okay because Shinsou wasn't even this rattled after Chisaki and Yamada knows why.

Yamada had hated his quirk, had been so utterly terrified of its power that he refused to speak, he refused to risk it. If someone had forced him to talk during that time, if someone crawled under his skin and made him talk like a goddamn puppet, that would have been enough to shake him. But it's so much more for Shinsou, this wound is unfathomably deep, and he can't just let it fester. He can't let Shinsou try to hide it.

And he can't make him talk about it either.

' Dark, ' Shinsou sign whispers, hard to see with how tightly he's curled himself into Yamada, but Yamada won't pull away to see it any better. ' Cold. Still there. '

Yamada pulls at the weighted blanket, pulling it tighter around Shinsou while keeping his hands free, before he starts rubbing at his arm and back with a purpose. He knows the kid can't possibly be cold, between the heat turned on, the kotatsu on full blast, that heavy blanket and the hoodies that he always wears. But he's going to shake off whatever memory that Shinsou's caught in, whatever is lingering from the station even in his living room. "You're here, alright? You're here, at UA, with me. Bakugo teach you how to ground yourself by picking things out of the room?"

He gets a nod, small and shaking, and Yamada lowers his arm so that Shinsou can see the room better. To see that it's lit, that it's warm. That he's here.

"Let's see, 5 things we can see. We can see two little fishes, Fishio and Fishie. A TV, and I'm not sure which of those is Eri's favorite right now. She could probably watch those fish for hours. It's pretty soothing. We've got a beaten up old couch behind us that Shou is just wrong about keeping. He picked it up off the street when he was single, and who knows what it's been through. And..." Yamada trails off, glancing around. He's picked three things to remind Shinsou of Eri, one for Shouta. Things to remind him that he's here at UA, and that he's the farthest away from that dark and cold place that scares him so badly. "And you can see this."

Yamada pulls his hands away, needing them to sign. He watches Shinsou watching him, but still finds himself glancing away as soon as he's done, running a hand through the hair on the back of his head while he curls the other around Shinsou's shoulders.

"Found a sign name for you," Yamada says, unable to admit that he's been holding onto it for almost two weeks. It's not a big deal, not nearly as big as what he's promised to do - to smuggle Shinsou out of the country and flee from the law if The Commission tries to hurt him again, and not as big as what he wants to do, what he's promised, the details of it still too much to think about. Adoption, he can barely even imagine the word, the paperwork he's vaguely familiar with seems oversized when he pictures it.

Sign names are almost casual on the surface, but if they're done right, they're not. Two signs, two gestures and two meanings coming together to spell out everything that a person is, exactly how the name maker sees them. And it's hard to sum up what Shinsou means to him.

' Shin Amaze, ' Amazing Mind. It seemed almost too casual at first, just summing up how smart Shinsou was. That he absorbed every bit of information he could, hungry for more. That he comes up with knock off hero name signs that more than once made Yamada cackle, as long as it wasn't his own. Shinsou was smart, but that wasn't all that he was.

He was amazing. There was something inside him that refused to give up despite everything that he had gone through, a fire that wouldn't even flicker even if the rest seemed to turn to ash. Shinsou came away with scars but he endured, he came out on the other side, and Yamada would make sure that the other side turned out better the farther they got away from it.

And he knew that Shinsou would amaze him even more, if given the smallest chance.

Shinsou sits up, still sniffing, though he's wiping away his tears. He takes in a deep breath and fixes Yamada with open eyes, and Yamada can almost see that fire inside them. The blanket falls off his shoulders as he signs. ‘ Sunshine Da. ’

Yamada finds himself smiling too wide, his chest too warm and full while his mind is spinning over too many meanings, too many thoughts. “It’s not even close to my birthday, ya know?”

‘Hizashi’ meant ‘Sunshine,’ and while Shouta’s name sign for him was ‘Yama Sun,’ a mountain of sunshine referring to either his positive personality or his Present Mic hairstyle depending on when he asked, ‘Sunshine Da’ could mean so much more than that. More than a ‘field of sunshine.’

Shinsou probably knows enough English to know that the way ‘Da’ is pronounced can be a way of saying ‘Dad.’ And knowing how carefully Shinsou selects his name signs, he didn’t doubt that he would tie in a bit of English in that meaning. That Shinsou would make sure to tie in everything about their relationship, condensed and only hinted to in those two little gestures.

And Shinsou didn’t hesitate to sign it, signed it fluidly. He’s had this name for a while.

Yamada can’t stop himself from pulling Shinsou in for a hug, even if he moves slow, even if he keeps his arms around the blanket and hopes it’s not too much. He doesn’t even feel a flinch, and he breathes so much easier after that.

He can do this. He can be ‘Sunshine Da.’

*

Yamada won’t leave him alone, and he knows why. It’s fine, he won’t try it. He won’t have to.

27 goes to the bathroom to blow his nose, rinse away some of the stinging in his eyes. He still feels tired, too tired, and he can’t be. He can’t take too long either, but he lets the water keep running in the sink so that Yamada thinks he’s just taking his time to wash his face.

He pulls both hands into his hair and starts scratching, trying in vain to drive the itching away. He wants to tear it away from his scalp, but his head just keeps itching . It’s pins and needles and tiny insects crawling around, their tiny legs pressing the feeling even deeper.

He almost growls in frustration when he turns off the faucet, turning it back on when he sees blood under some of his fingernails. He did tear it away, he feels the sting of it now, and that tiny bit of pain starts to make the itching fade away.

He knows what it means, and that’s all the better for it.

He needs his quirk back now.

*

Aizawa climbs the fire escape of a decrepit apartment complex, something ill-fitting for this side of town. It’s not the ‘bad’ side of Mustafu, and not the good one either, but one of those little neighborhoods in the middle. There’s a trendy restaurant two blocks away and a thrift store that should be a historical landmark across the street. The thrift shop looks more run down as though the owner is aware of that and doesn’t want to make any changes because of it.

Shiori says it has low rent and high speed internet, and the fact that most delivery runners will actually make it to her door without getting stopped by a villain is just a bonus. But Aizawa knows it’s low profile, but not so deep that the people Shiori works against will be living next to her.

Like Shiori, it’s grey.

He doesn't bother to knock on her window, throwing the bags in first as an apology to the swearing he can already hear. "Fuck, I don't do walk-ins, Eraser! Scared the shit out of me 'til I saw those boney hands."

Aizawa pulls himself inside, taking in the hovel of a bed and various food debris, littered with electronics and parts and electronics that just look like parts. Despite the numerous take out boxes and wrappers that he's sure have bits of food left to culture, all he can smell is the cheapest cigarettes on the market.

Shiori is still sitting at her desk, 10 computer monitors scattered on top or mounted haphazardly on the wall, her legs resting on the desk between more electronics with her keyboard between her knees. Despite no evidence of it, he's decently sure she's wearing shorts or underwear underneath the bright green hoodie. This time.

Her legs are as hairy as his, and her long black hair lost its usual frizz in the sheen that's all oil. Despite how much he hates cheap cigarette smoke, he's sure that both this apartment and Shiori smell worse. The bags under her eyes and the two cigarettes tucked into the side of her mouth hint that her other job is demanding a great deal of time and attention, but the cigarettes nearly fall out of her mouth as she eyes what might be her payment. "Holy shit, you went grocery shopping."

That's because Shiori never makes it simple to pay her off. Everyone else wants cash and convincing, quick and simple, but Shiori is never simple. He sets out all three boxes of jelly pouches, enough to feed her for a few months, and two cartons of her favorite cigarettes. Barely more than 3500 yen, but Shiori is also never cheap.

But she's good, she never fails when she wants to help, and when she sighs and runs a hand through her hair, he knows that she will. "I wasn't looking forward to burning my eyes with kiddie porn tonight, but if you're asking nicely-"

"I need help with two things, and that's neither of them," Aizawa says, and doesn't dare hope that it will be that easy. "I have a woman whose brother is missing. I don't have either of their names or any information about them, but I know where she would be found on a street camera."

Shiori groans, her head falling over the chair as she whines. "Eraser, that's so much work. It's almost impossible."

But he knows it's not impossible.

She huffs, letting one cigarette fall out of her mouth to scatter ash and burn her hoodie before she plucks it up and tosses it into one of the many energy drinks on her desk. "I'm outsourcing it, so don't expect anything soon-"

"I need it soon," Aizawa says, "Tonight."

He earns a glare, but the central computer minimizes its programs through the command of her quirk, a new box popping up to fill with text before it closes. "Expedited. My agent for that is better at it than me, so you better hope I don't have to take over. Because I hate watching street cameras, scrolling through social media, seeing all those people ."

He's heard. He's heard that a lot.

He's worried that he's used up everything he brought for this trade, but he's willing to do whatever Shiori asks. He knows she won't fail him, and she seems to be in a more generous mood than he expected.

“The Miasma,” Aizawa says, and he sees a very promising scowl. “Anything you have-”

“Dark,” Shiori growls. “Darker than black, and I don’t do that shit, Eraser.”

She says that, and she’s said it before. But she’s also done it when he needed her to.

And she knows it, and already knows that he needs her to, rolling her eyes. “Analog-”

“If they were analog, you wouldn’t know they were darker than black,” Aizawa reminds. Shiori lives online, in some of the darkest corners of the internet, and with the spread of technology into nearly every facet of society, that makes her invaluable. He knows that The Miasma isn’t offline, that it’s not analog, because Shiori knows it.

Shiori glares, plucking the cigarette out of her mouth to take a drink from one of the many open on her desk. He hasn’t been keeping track, but he hopes it isn’t the one that she used as an ashtray. He’s seen her make that mistake, and not react to it at all. “They’re analog. But I know the name.”

She knows more than the name, and he knows it. “I need everything that you have-”

“I don’t want to hand it over,” Shiori says, and he’s concerned by how hollow that sounds. Shiori is always angry, always grumbling through every effort that she makes and swearing because she has to make it. She’s helped him with things that are darker than black, but The Miasma seems darker than that.

But whatever she has, he needs it. “This is important,” Aizawa says, and he doesn’t want to say more than that, but he forces himself to. “This is the most important request that I’ve ever come to you with. Please.”

He bows, and he hates it. He knows she hates it more, and that’s why he does it.

Shiori tries to demand too much, tries to goad and tries to threaten, and despite what she does or where she lives, or how she lives, she’s gray. She’s a criminal with good intentions, even if he has to force them out of her. But it’s all the more telling that a plea like that is what makes her cave every time.

He gets that sigh, the one he was waiting for, before he rises. “I figured. With all the goodies, I knew it was either kids or cats, and I should just be thankful I’m not searching for cat rapists.” He knows not to trust that her goodwill extends that far, and he isn’t surprised to see her eyes cut to him with that same grave expression. “Dick pic.”

That’s her price. Not a usual one, but.

It’s happened. He neither knows nor wants to know why.

He starts walking to her bathroom, despite how it’s wholly irrational and only makes him want to take a shower afterwards for a more logical reason, before she stops him.

“Seduce me one. I’ve got enough angles of yours anyway,” Shiori says cryptically, as she tends to be at this point in the negotiations. He doesn’t know why she needs multiple angles of it, and he doesn’t want to find out. He’s reasonably sure this is somewhere between humiliation and a power trip, with a bit of her issues with social interaction in the mix. It’s irrational, but it’s never seemed sexual.

Hizashi is aware of it, and seems too amused to do anything but approve. That’s why he needs payback.

Shou: Send me a picture of your dick. Shiori needs it.

“I need a passport too-” Aizawa starts, before he notices his messages with Hizashi mirrored on Shiori’s central monitor.

“I said seduce , you can’t just-” Shiori cuts off in a scream when he wraps the monitor up with his capture scarf, ready to break it against the wall. She folds herself before she jumps to her feet, trying to threaten him with what looks like a long computer chip with wires dangling off the ends. “If you fuck up my hardware I will fuck your mouth through your asshole , Eraserhead!”

“Delete. Whatever you did to my phone. Or I will bring you in for it,” Aizawa threatens, and tries to mean it. Despite how powerful an asset Shiori is, he has information on that phone that she can’t have. Texts from Naomasa relevant to the investigation, pictures of Shinsou and Eri. There’s ways of tracing the location where those pictures were taken that Shiori knows, and despite her being gray, he’s not willing to risk it.

Shiori hisses between her teeth before she sits back down. “I’ve told you not to connect to unsecured networks, it’s your own damn fault.” He watches a dialog box fill with indecipherable words and symbols before he feels his phone vibrate in his hand. It’s only then that he pulls back the capture scarf.

But he wants to throw it back when he sees what appears on Shiori’s screen.

“ Oh , I guess asshole to mouth fucking is what works for you,” Shiori says with a chuckle, pointing at the picture that Hizashi sent. “Got some interesting hardware there.”

He glares, and another dialog box opens up. This time, he watches his phone to see more text scrolling over it before a program that he didn’t notice deletes itself. “The passport-”

“Outsourced, but covered,” Shiori says, kicking a leg back on top of her desk, knocking over two drinks and one dribbles out soda that will only become sticky residue. And she’s not wearing underwear. “Who’s it for?”

“An 18 year old male with purple eyes, purple hair, 177 centimeters tall. I’ll send you the picture, but you can make up the rest,” Aizawa says, ignoring the smirk that he earns. It’s a criminal act, done for a good purpose. It’s gray. “The Miasma.”

Shiori sighs, her head rolling back. “Analog.” Her eyes remain closed, but her lips close around the cigarette, pulling in a breath just to blow the smoke out of her nose before she speaks again. “Have you ever heard of Yelp?”

Aizawa fights not to roll his eyes. “How old do you think I am?” He might not be the most technologically inclined person, but he knows the basics. He knows Yelp, and even Toshinori knows Yelp.

Shiori hums, rather than answering. “Have you ever wondered how those little rent-a-goan operations happen? Maybe you hire a guy as a look out just to find out he’s near sighted, where exactly can you bitch and who can you bitch to? Not the cops, of course.”

He thought it was word of mouth, but that’s analog. “There’s a villain Yelp?”

Shiori doesn’t nod, but she repeats a phrase he’s heard a few times, a promising one. “Pick a number.”

“All of them,” Aizawa says, and he doesn’t care what he has to do for that. “This is important-”

“This is my goddamn life,” Shiori growls back, glaring at him. “I’ve seen those pages go dark, and I’m not going to 404 my servers for you, Eraserhead. It’s darker than black and I shouldn’t have let you get this far.”

He knows. He knows it’s unfair to weigh a life against a life. And knowing that he probably could make her go farther, if he pushes enough, makes it all the more heavy.

But Shiori sighs, staring at the central monitor like it will silence her itself, grave but focused. “Pick two numbers.”

“Memory-” Shiori cuts him off with an imitation of a buzzer from a game show, and he frowns at that. Memory seemed to be the most useful. “127.”

He hears the printer in the corner start whirring to life, each page spitting out promising, but knowing 127’s career involves murder taints that. People died as a result of those pages. “And?”

“27,” Aizawa says, even if he shouldn’t. In terms of the investigation, it’s the most useless number to ask for because supposedly, everything he would want to know about the person it represents is within his reach. But he asks because he hopes that Shiori will cut him off, that the printer will stay silent.

The printer whirs to life again.

*

Shinsou was close enough to an even keel by the time Nemuri asked if she should take Eri to her dorm shift, and when Eri walked through the door, it seemed like the storm had finally settled. Shinsou still had the blanket wrapped loosely around himself, even if the shivering was gone, but the heaviness of his eyelids seemed to suggest that he might want to use the blanket to take a nap. Especially with the perfect little cuddle buddy reunited with her ‘Twenny.’

Yamada has learned to divorce that nickname from ‘27,’ and he thinks that Shinsou has too. Shouta told him enough to know that the interview was successful, that Shinsou might be a little more vulnerable to anything that reminded him of that dark place. Shinsou told him a little bit of that too.

Shinsou opened up, just a little. Even if it seemed like he was trying to defend himself, trying to reason that he didn’t want to keep talking and that he wasn’t trying to bite off his tongue for any other reason. Shinsou did talk about it.

He said that the place he was before the 8 Precepts was cold. That he was in a dark room until he answered to his ‘name.’ That he felt every inch of that under that woman’s quirk, and couldn’t shake it off easily. That he didn’t want to feel that way, didn’t want to be under that quirk, ever again.

He wouldn’t. Yamada listened and felt every sting of betrayal at that, faced every bit of pain that Shinsou shared. He still knows that’s not all of it, and despite Shinsou’s loose reasoning, he’s still not going to be left alone for a while.

But while Eri recounts her time with Nemuri, cuddled close to a Shinsou that seems to be getting closer and closer to sleep, he steps into his bedroom again, but this time to return one of the 17 phone calls his hero manager has left him.

“Yo, Minooru, whatever you want, it’s not happening!” Yamada promises, tone jovial for now, but he knows his hero manager well enough to know that he will be tested. One of these days, he’s going to have a little ‘quirk slip’ with a casualty count, and his radio station manager will have to manage the fall out with the fear of god in his eyes.

“ Present Mic, you work like a goddamn part timer and that’s not what your contract says! This wardship business doesn’t cover that, you lazy pile of- ”

“Rip it up, little man,” Yamada growls, and means every syllable of it. He has three jobs and he can handle dropping to two, thank you very much. And if not, there are plenty of agencies willing to work with a part time hero who has two kids, especially when that hero is number 98 on the Hero Rankings.

And he’s been over this with his hero manager, he knows it, and that’s why he earns a scream that blows static through the phone’s speaker. “ Listen! There’s a planned weapons deal that’s going to go bust, two other agencies planned it but they need a heavier offense hero! I don’t give a shit what you plan to do, but I’m sending in your sidekick to respond! ”

“Byte isn’t offense!” Yamada argues, before he realizes what his manager means, narrowing his eyes at the closed door when he wants nothing more than to be in his manager’s office to better convince him not to. “You dirty little-”

“ If I didn’t have to pull teeth to convince you to save lives, it wouldn’t come to this, Mic.” And his manager isn’t allowed to call him ‘Mic,’ and they’ve gone over this. They’re not friends, they’re not colleagues, and even at the best of times they barely tolerate each other but those glory days are over now. “ You want to rip up your contract? Stop pretending to be a hero? That’s fine with me, come on over and we can seal the deal! But my office is closed, so you’re going to that raid. Unless you want your sidekick flying solo. ”

That dirty, putrid, vile little man hangs up like the coward that he is, and Yamada seethes. His thumbs work fast, trying to get in touch with Shouta and trying to convince his sidekick to risk her job instead of her life. But he gets a chilling reminder in that conversation.

Bytey: This arms deal is big, Mikey. There’s a lot of guns going into the wrong hands. We need you here for it.

Shinsou needs him, and so does the mission. A hero doesn’t weigh a life against a life, but they do. They have to.

He calls Shouta three times before he walks out the door to check on his ward. Shinsou is still just drowning despite Eri’s best efforts, curled up against his side while she watches the fish swim. Shouta still isn’t picking up, likely chasing after a lead from Shiori with dogged determination, leaving both his dorm shift for 1-A and both wards to Yamada.

He texts Ectoplasm and gets a response that he knew he was going to get. Ectoplasm gets a little abused thanks to his cloning quirk, and Yamada and Shouta have abused him quite a bit even before Midterms week. He’s done, it’s his day off, and no one is going to convince him to face Class 1-A tonight. Toshinori is covering his 3-A dorm shift to accommodate that, and that leaves Yamada with no other options from the staff list.

Ectoplasm’s suggestion was probably just a reminder of that dressing down that frankly, was deserved, but Yamada’s desperate enough to take it as inspiration.

It feels worse, knowing why Mirio agrees. Knowing that he’s excused from his Heroics exam tomorrow, and knowing that all those good luck texts that he sent throughout the week probably ring a little hollow given how much they depend on the kid.

But he tries to take Mirio's text to heart, to believe it.

Mirio: Don't feel bad! Duty calls for a hero! And I kind of wanted to take my mind off of tomorrow, ya know?

Mirio very rarely admits things like that, but it's becoming a little more frequent. A little more promising. It still feels like Yamada isn't doing enough. For any of his kids.

But duty calls.

"Hey guys, we've got a new plan for tonight! Mirio's gonna be watching over Class 1-A, and he's going to be taking you guys with him!" Yamada says, painting on a smile. It feels hollow until Eri's cheer brings a flicker of a smile on Shinsou's face.

"Yay! Sleepover with Mirio!" Eri says, looking back and beaming as she makes that smile spread a little further, Shinsou's arm holding her close.

"Mirio can't sleep, but it's still going to be fun, right?" Shinsou asks, and Yamada finds himself shocked that he does.

Eri nods, then answers with a "Yup!" like she catches that. Like she knows how important it is that Shinsou asked, that Shinsou risked that.

And Shinsou smiles a little softer, a piece that was out of shape that Yamada hasn't even considered seemingly falling closer into place. And he feels a little better about having three jobs when he has three of the most amazing kids to make it all worthwhile.

*

Shiori's 'agent' works fast, and frankly works miracles. Aizawa had barely read a quarter of 127's reviews, sitting on the police station's rooftop while he waited for either Sansa or Naomasa to return, when he got Shiori's text.

They found his name, his picture, his quirk, his address, his frequently visited locations in the last two months, and his phone number. Saito Hideo, the resemblance to his younger sister clear in their same brown eyes and hair though he looks 10 years older. His quirk is a paralysis quirk, activated by touch which could make him a dangerous weapon in Miasma's hands.

But Aizawa doubts that this Miasma operates out of BDSM bars or hotels, which is where Mr. Saito has been spending most of his time. Given that Mr. Saito is 'missing,' he doesn't bother to check his address, and instead makes his way to the nearest bus station to spend an hour and a half on public transit to Shibuya, standing outside of one of the gaudiest and most neon gay clubs he's ever seen.

It takes 30 minutes to find that Mr. Saito isn't there, and 10 more to reason with Shiori that he's not going to 'seduce' her a dick pic from one of the patrons. She gives in after he sends her a picture of himself sipping an overpriced drink with a phallic novelty straw, and tells him that he is in the right place. But he's probably not on the right floor.

Aizawa already needed a very thorough shower after all the things he's done so far, especially with that straw, but he feels like he needs two when he follows a man through an unmarked door and down the stairs.

He's crashed a handful of fetish balls in his career, so the people dangling from the ceiling in cages, from rope bindings, and from hooks aren't shocking. But there is a man kneeling on a table with two apples inside him, and only one in his mouth.

It's creative to say the least.

Aizawa very clearly isn't dressed for the occasion, and though he's flashed the capture scarf's abilities on a few undercover operations into places like these, he doesn't feel the need to. He finds Saito Hideo easily enough, bound to a chair and completely restrained in a latex bodysuit that resembles a sleeping bag but for the more form-fitting elements of it. And the ball gag, of course.

Aizawa walks over and unbuckles the restraints across his chest and thighs, ignoring two other men who try to ask what he's doing and why. He takes advantage of the bodysuit to heft the man over his shoulder, reminding himself that this is necessary. Repeatedly. The sounds that the man is making, which might be protests behind the ball gag, make it worse.

It makes for a very interesting train ride to Tokyo, but a few selfies with Mr. Saito sitting next to him secures Ms. Saito's phone number.

*

Saito Hikaru probably thought that Aizawa would be intimidated by the security cameras at The Commission of Wardship Affairs' headquarters recording a wealth of evidence as to how out of line his actions are. But given the implications behind her brother going 'missing,' he's sure that she will be deleting any footage of Aizawa carrying the man still whimpering behind the ball gag.

Aizawa knows that the man likely needs to be freed from the latex bodysuit before it starts to endanger his health, but he knows for a fact that he's naked otherwise. He's leaving that task to his sister with no small amount of spite.

He already feels particularly vengeful when he deposits the man in an office chair, watching both siblings' eyes go wide. But Ms. Saito's fists shake in anger that's entirely misplaced. "How dare you-"

Aizawa knows there are better ways of removing a ball gag than ripping it out by one strap, but Aizawa doesn't care about any of them. Out of all the dicks that he's had to deal with today, the memory of little Mr. Saito pressed against his back makes him his least favorite.

"You sent this prick after me?!" Mr. Saito screams hoarsely, before he swallows the built up spit. "I told you, we're done, I'm going to live my own life and I don't give a fuck who you are or what you're doing! Just leave me alone!"

"Mr. Saito was enjoying a very eventful night with some choice friends, but he wasn't an unwilling participant in any criminal organizations," Aizawa says, pleased to see Ms. Saito's anger, an ill-fitting shield as it was, falling back away into utter embarrassment.

"How did you find him?" Ms. Saito asks weakly, still unable to look at her brother. "The police found nothing, he wasn't at his apartment or his job-"

"You stole me from my master over this?! I quit, I told you that! I'm not working for-"

"I found him," Aizawa interrupts, more than bored with the thought of hearing any more of this melodrama play out. "Now, you're going to cancel that appointment with Mind Slice and cancel every single interview that comes up afterwards. You're going to leave him alone, you're going to leave the investigation alone, and you're going to approve the quirk specialist that Naomasa requested weeks ago."

Mr. Saito nods at 'him,' but Aizawa doesn't mean him and Ms. Saito knows it. She doesn't want to do any of those things, clearly, and the cold glare growing colder makes him pull out a trump card.

"It would be very unfortunate if I had to mention names when I'm asked why I was riding two major train lines in my hero costume with a man in fetish gear sitting beside me," Aizawa threatens, pulling on a thread that both Saitos left hanging loose.

Ms. Saito has an agenda that doesn't involve her older brother being publically gay or in a hardcore BDSM relationship, and he couldn't care less whether it's political or personal. He doesn't give a damn about a single aspect of this twisted sibling relationship, but he will use it to secure Shinsou's safety.

Ms. Saito's glare warms, her nostrils flaring before she seethes. She walks to her desk, still not looking at her brother, and pulls a piece of paper from a seafoam green folio and slaps it on her desk. Aizawa fumes at the sight of it, the capture scarf rising and he doesn't feel the need to force it to settle, glaring at Ms. Saito hard enough to nearly activate his quirk.

"Kenma is hard to acquire," Ms. Saito says, crossing her arms and looking in the opposite direction from both Aizawa and her brother. "Don't think that he won't be approved when a civilian becomes a casualty."

"You threatened to kill a ward-"

"I didn't," Ms. Saito says sharply, insulted before she finds something to laugh about. "The risk of a coma is a risk, not a given. I'm not sure why I need to argue about the quality of life in this situation either. It's not like the kid is ever going to-"

He pulls the capture scarf tight around her arms and chest, dragging her forward to face his glower. In the back of his mind, numbness reminds him that he's assaulting a government official, but in the forefront all he sees is red. "He will. No thanks to you."

She purses her lips with too wide eyes, but he's not going to give her the chance to act like she can threaten him now.

"No more interviews. A quirk specialist. Now." Aizawa releases her, waiting and testing, and doesn't pull the scarf back to his shoulders until she huffs and pulls out a piece of paper from the same folder.

"It needs the signature of every member on The Commission, and don't think they all have skeletons in the closet," she mutters in a way she thinks is threatening, but he takes as inspiration. "I can't do anything about the interviews and you know that."

He knows. But he's going to make sure that she doesn't request them. "Jun's quirk."

She shoots a glare like she wants to argue that it wasn't part of the deal, but he knows well enough that deals made under the table like this aren't meant to be fair, they can't be enforced. "Truth Serum. We weren't sure if it would work, but it did. After someone ingests her spit, they become paralyzed and compelled to answer her questions truthfully. It works better when the target trusts her."

He knew before she said it. That the coffee was tampered with, that despite trying to prove to Shinsou that it wasn't poisoned, it was. He grinds his teeth before he asks. "What are the side effects?"

Ms. Saito leans against her desk, folding her arms. "A mildly sore throat if it's used for too long.

It's as minimally invasive as it gets with interrogation quirks."

"Chills? Feeling cold and shivering despite being warm?" Aizawa asks, all the more incensed to see her chuckle.

"Sounds like the kid is getting sick. It's flu season, you can't pin that on us." He can't, and the face masks still hidden in the office become all the more guilt-inspiring because of that.

He starts walking away as though he'll leave that simply, listening to Ms. Saito sigh and start muttering about how embarrassing this situation is for her. That's when he turns around and makes it all the more embarrassing for her, smirking about how perfect the picture comes out. Ms. Saito leaning over to start unzipping the latex bodysuit, her expression soft and caring despite the history he's sure of. It makes it all the easier to paint it in a different light.

She's not at all soft or caring when she notices, eyes flashing in anger.

"No more interviews," Aizawa reminds, placing his phone with its hefty insurance policy in his pocket. "I'm going to close the investigation without your help."

He's only read six pages of the reviews and has three leads, three named criminal organizations who dealt with Miasma, who contracted a killer from them. He, Naomasa, and Sansa will have their hands busy contacting all of them, all the names he knows and the ones he knows will be mentioned deeper in.

He still hasn't read Shinsou's reviews, and he's not sure if he wants to. If he can stomach the words from the criminals that used him, knowing that he was 12 years old at the oldest when those reviews were written. He doesn't want to know if Shinsou was good at those jobs or not.

He hopes that he doesn't have to, because he's good at his own job, and likely won't need anymore leads to pursue for months. Months where Shinsou can be divorced from the investigation, and kept safe at UA.

*

Shinsou is dead tired, and Mirio knew that immediately. Yamada told him enough, that it was a really rough day in the worst possible way, and Mirio knows the hero protocols to manage that. He knows that it should be easy, even with the dorm shift that promises to be an exciting one, because Shinsou should fall asleep within minutes once they get to the room.

Shinsou still jolts when Present Mic starts yelling loud enough that everyone in Class 1-A can hear him, whether they're in the common room or not. "LISTEN UP HEROES! MIRIO IS IN CHARGE AND MIDNIGHT WILL PUT YOU ALL DOWN FOR A LITTLE NAP IF YOU MAKE ANY TROUBLE FOR HIM, AND THEN I WILL BE VERY DISAPPOINTED IN YOU BEFORE ERASERHEAD EXPELS YOU ALL!" The students in the common room either cover their ears, stuff their heads into the couch cushions, or both. "GOOD LUCK ON YOUR EXAM TOMORROW!"

Yamada thanks him for what has to be the 30th time before he ruffles his hair then Eri's, and claps a hand on Shinsou's shoulder.

"You guys be good too, I'll be back before you can say 's'mores.' With some smores! That's always a great sleepover snack!" Mirio doesn't doubt that Yamada means it, that he will be bringing back some smores after the mission, but he's sure that Shinsou will still be asleep by then.

As soon as Yamada is out the door, Midoriya tries to make that harder for him. "Sempai, is it okay if we talk to Shinsou for a-”

Shinsou turns and starts walking towards the stairwell, and Mirio gave a wincing shrug. “Not the best time for that, sorry. You guys should really catch some shut eye though, that Heroics Exam is a killer!”

“Good luck!” Eri cheers, but as soon as they turn to the stairwell, she gets distracted by the promise of smores. It’s one of the many things on a list that keep shrinking, of things that she’s never eaten before. “Twenny, have you ever eaten smores?”

Shinsou is probably a little more used to that cute little tooth whistle, but Mirio finds himself hoping that Eri’s fascination with that treat stays around for a while because of it. “No. I’ve never eaten anything like the stuff we get to eat here. It’s nice.”

Mirio’s going to start making a list for Shinsou. “It is, isn’t it? Lunch Rush can make anything, so there’s a lot of stuff at UA that’s hard to find in other schools. Between him and Yamada, I’m sure you’ll be an educated foodie in no time!”

“Yamada,” Shinsou repeats, and Mirio almost misses a step when he hears it. Shinsou has only said a few words to Mirio, other than that time when he was too mixed up on Aizawa-sensei’s death coffee to stop talking. Every time that Shinsou has talked to him, it’s either rushed or nervous, or just heartbreakingly quiet and shaking.

That word was steady, was slow, and it almost sounded a little angry in a way that Mirio can’t quite place. “Oh, yeah. Yamada said it was okay, I’ve just been talking to him a lot. I still call him sensei in class though! I wouldn’t want anyone to get the wrong idea-”

“Mirio is Yama’s son, ‘cause Mirio called him ‘Dad,’ and that made Yama really happy,” Eri says, and Mirio feels his cheeks burning just from the memory of that. It’s a little bit worse because Eri doesn’t call Yamada ‘Dad’ very often, making it feel like that all of that was a little pointless.

But Yamada is a really great guy, in ways that Mirio never really noticed when he was just his student. He’s funny and he can be loud, but Mirio never really noticed how attentive he could be or how caring. And even if he imagined that he’d be more comfortable calling him ‘Present Mic’ after dropping the ‘sensei’ when he graduated, ‘Present Mic’ doesn’t really fit.

It’s not really ‘Dad,’ and Mirio feels guilty just thinking like that, thinking about a couple text messages that he hasn’t responded to and more phone calls that weren’t honest. But it’s definitely not ‘Present Mic’ either. It’s closer, and it honestly might be a little closer than ‘Yamada.’

He doesn’t know what Shinsou thinks of that, and it’s probably not a good time to ask. As soon as they get to the surveillance room, Shinsou lays down on the cot and practically melts into it. Mirio feels bad for having to keep all those computer screens on to make sure Class 1-A doesn’t make too much trouble, but he turns off the light after turning on the bathroom light just in case Eri doesn’t feel like sleeping yet.

And she doesn’t, even if she looks a little tempted with those glances in Shinsou’s direction. “Mirio, can I watch Sailor Moon?”

And Mirio hopes he doesn’t get too distracted from his job watching over Class 1-A to accommodate her. “Of course! In the name of the moon, we’ll pull up Hulu!”

He tries to keep it down for Shinsou’s sake, but he and Eri have a habit of singing along to the intro. Luckily, it doesn’t seem to bother him, and that’s good.

Shinsou definitely needs some rest, and Mirio's sure that even a tiny thing like a good night's sleep will help put an end to that awful day he's had.

Talk

Chapter Summary

27 lost the piece of information that kept him safe, that gave him an anchor at UA. They knew The Miasma's name.

He knows what they're going to do next.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: 50 mention, Character accepting death

Previously on Wards of UA: When Shinsou was fused with Chisaki during the raid, he felt that Chisaki was "stealing his voice," and felt similarly when he was compelled to talk during the interrogation. Yamada was called to a mission to stop an arms deal. Shinsou is on Suicide Watch after trying to bite his tongue during the interrogation. Shinsou has not used his phone since he found out that it was worth more than his mother sold him for. Midoriya compared Shinsou to Link from Legend of Zelda, because Link saves a princess (Eri) and is fanonically considered mute. The participants in the raid on the 8 Precepts knew that Shinsou's quirk activated after a vocal response, and Mirio told Midoriya more about it after the day they watched Kawaii Kawaii Pussycats together. Midoriya and Yaoyorozu were the only two students that beat Shinsou in a training exercise. When Yamada made tea for Shinsou after the interrogation, he put honey in though he doesn't usually, and Shinsou refused to drink it. When the group chat for 1-A was first created, all the students listed their quirks along with their disadvantages and other information. Yamada and Shinsou traded name signs after hugging, and Yamada promised that Shinsou was staying at UA after the investigation. Shinsou promised 50 that he would never kill anyone. Eri told Aizawa that Shinsou's mother 'gave him away,' and Yamada accidentally told Shinsou that, leading Shinsou to believe that they thought he was worthless. Midnight was not considered as a designated hero for Shinsou because he has resistance to sedatives. Shiori hacked Aizawa's phone previously, and removed that trojan program when he visited her. Todoroki (maybe?) thinks that Shinsou's quirk allows him to transform into a cat, and thus should be treated like a feral cat. Hagakure and Ojiro were nearly expelled for breaking into Aizawa's dorm and being aware of it respectively. Shinsou has observed that 'volunteers' to criminal organizations are treated better than he is, as he's always been sold to the organization. Shinsou went to school with Ashido before he was sold, and knows he used his quirk on her, which caused him to worry that she had Mental Quirk Abuse Syndrome.

Mirio knew that Shinsou probably had nightmares. He knew that they might even be worse than Eri's, because despite the awful things that her young imagination can whip up, Shinsou probably lived through enough nightmares to not need that imagination.

He's never heard Shinsou have one, but tonight he's up to three. And they're only getting worse.

The first time, Shinsou just jolted up, startling Mirio and Eri both. Eri seemed worried enough, and Mirio didn't want to make it worse by making a fuss. He offered to bring some warm milk up from the dorm kitchen, but Shinsou just shook his head, and Eri gave up on Sailor Moon to lay down with him, promising that it would be okay.

The second time, he sprung up and backed himself against the wall, breathing too hard until Mirio breathed with him. Mirio asked if he wanted to talk about it, and Eri told him that it would help, almost begging him to, but Shinsou shook his head. By the time he did lay down to fall asleep, he seemed more irritated than scared, and Mirio hoped that maybe he would get too tired to have any more nightmares.

The third time was louder, Shinsou woke up with a strangled yell and his hand curled around his mouth, turning away from Eri to face the wall. She woke up from that, worry working into her voice even through the haze of her own sleepiness, and Shinsou slapped his hand against the wall before he flinched. "It's fine," Shinsou said, over and over again. 'It's fine,' and 'I'm sorry,' whispered over and over even when Mirio offered to get that warm milk, even when he did go downstairs to make it. When he tried to hand it to Shinsou, promising that it would help, he just got another shake of his head and his own 'I'm sorry.'

He still tried to talk to Shinsou, tried to help him relax. Despite how hard it seems for Shinsou to stay asleep, he still definitely needed it. Somewhere in the middle of a story about Mirio and Tamaki staying up all weekend to beat a video game, Shinsou's heavy eyelids fell closed again, and Mirio hoped that this time they'd stay that way.

"Stop stealing -" Shinsou shouted, jolting up just to put both hands over his mouth, just to fold in and start shaking before Mirio even looked to check on Eri. She was quickly waking up, quickly working herself into tears while she clung onto Shinsou's arm.

"Twenny, it's okay! Don't be sad and don't be scared 'cause we're safe, and it's a bad d-dream just a b-bad dream!" Eri said, shaking her fists clenched in Shinsou's sleeves, her voice getting more choked up. "D-don't be scare-ed Twenny-y!"

Shinsou started shaking his head, eyes still too wide. "It's fine, I'm sorry, I'm sorry, I'm sorry." Mirio grabbed the mug of milk again, this time determined to convince Shinsou to drink it. Four nightmares in a row wasn't normal, there was definitely something wrong, and Mirio knew that even that tried and tested method of fighting them off might not work.

Class 1-A luckily seemed to take Yamada's warning to heart, most of them tucking in at a reasonable hour and the others didn't make any trouble. But now it's 3 AM and Yamada still isn't back from the mission, that text that Mirio sent still not answered. Aizawa-sensei hasn't answered either, and while Midnight-sensei offered to help, Mirio really didn't think that using her quirk on Shinsou would help things.

Mirio really thought it would be easier than this, that he was an expert on 'Eri Troubles' and catching on pretty quick for 'Shinsou Troubles.' But this was really getting out of his hands, especially with 'Shinsou Troubles' stirring up some 'Eri Troubles,' which was only making the 'Shinsou Troubles' worse.

So when Mirio heard a knock on the door, he really figured that he didn't need anymore troubles to deal with. "Hey Midoriya, it's kind of not a good time--"

“I know, I should be asleep but I really can’t because I think I broke my bed?” Midoriya answers, still wide eyed and flustered, seeming a little unsure about something he really shouldn’t be. “I think it was a quirk slip, I was having a dream and then I woke up and my bed was broken. I just didn’t know if I should tell you or wait to tell Aizawa-sensei or-”

“Yeah, no, I’ll let him know! Thanks for telling me, but...” Mirio trails off, glancing behind him to see that not even Midoriya’s voice was enough to inspire Eri to pull away from Shinsou. Not that he really imagined it would be, but Eri could be a little clingy to Midoriya on some occasions. “I don’t really think there’s a spare bed laying around, but maybe you could sleep on the couch? It’s not the best, though.”

“It’s fine, I feel okay and I usually only get five hours of sleep anyway!” Midoriya says, a bit too cheerfully at that. While Mirio has had some lean nights, he’s never tried to make five hours ‘usual’ for him, and he’s a little worried about his underclassman because of that.

“You definitely need to sleep way more than that, but I guess that’s...good?” Mirio says, at least reassured that it wouldn’t affect Midoriya’s Heroics Midterm later today. But then his mind caught on an idea that he really wasn’t sure about.

It was kind of like that game with a fox, a chicken, and a bag of rice, trying to get all three across a river. Midoriya was the other side, another possible option, but he really didn’t know which ward should go with him. Shinsou and Eri definitely needed to be separated for a little bit, just to keep from spiraling deeper into their own worries with each other as inspiration, but Mirio couldn’t keep them separated in the same room.

Eri needed to sleep, and Shinsou’s nightmares were keeping her from that. She also probably needed a little TLC to come down from that, and while Midoriya was fun to be around and definitely spoiled her, he tended to spoil her in an exciting way. And he’s seen a grumpy Eri who hasn’t slept enough, and he doesn’t really want to cause it.

Shinsou needed to sleep, needed to relax to do that, and really couldn’t be left alone after what Yamada told him happened. Shinsou didn’t seem to want to talk to Midoriya earlier, but maybe Midoriya’s cheerfulness could wear him down a bit, to a point that he could forget about whatever was bothering him. Shinsou seemed exhausted enough to not really care whether the couch was comfortable or not, and Mirio was pretty sure that once his mind got out of the dark place it was in for long enough, he could probably sleep for days no matter what he was laying on.

But there was a chance that Shinsou wouldn’t sleep if he went with Midoriya. There’s a chance that Midoriya wouldn’t know not to let Shinsou be alone, that with this horrible day still not over and the frustration building from lack of sleep, Shinsou might do something desperate if he’s given the opportunity.

But there was a way for Mirio to always keep an eye on him. “Are you going to be hanging out in the common room or your room, since sleeping’s kind of out for now?”

Midoriya looked a little confused at first, then scratched his head. “Oh, I don’t know, I’m fine with either really. I should probably hold off on my morning run until a little later, and I’ve already cleaned up everything as best as I could in my room-”

Mirio raised a finger to tell him to hold that thought before he closed the door, unable to fight that desperate grin while he still just hoped this plan would work out. “Hey, Shinsou, do you want to hang out with Midoriya for a little bit? Just to get your mind off of things-”

Shinsou nodded, surprisingly, seeming as desperate to get to sleep as Mirio was to help him stay asleep. Mirio turned back to talk to Midoriya, who still seemed confused by the closed door.

“Do you want to hang out with Shinsou for a bit? Just, you know, hang out and have fun, keep things chill, you know?” Mirio says, and hopes that Midoriya catches what he means.

Midoriya’s smile, not quite as excited as it was when he first mentioned Shinsou’s name, told him that he did and he wasn’t too disappointed in that. “Yeah, that’s fine! We can play some video games in the common room so you can still keep an eye on things.”

And that was absolutely music to Mirio’s ears. Just enough relief to his singed nerves to make him forget that he doesn’t like all-nighters, and that out of all the all-nighters he’s pulled, this one will still be the worst. But it might get a little bit better. “Thank you, Midoriya!”

Shinsou had gotten Eri closer to calm, even if her worries were still pretty clear, but she relaxed a little bit more at the hand resting on her head and the smile Shinsou tried to give her. “It’s fine. Yamada will be back soon, and he’ll bring you some smores. It’ll be nice....” Shinsou trails off, that weak smile wavering even more for a moment. “I’m sorry.”

“It’s okay, Twenny!” Eri says, holding onto Shinsou’s hand with both of hers, trying to paint on her own fake smile for his sake. “Yama’s gonna be back soon, and we’ll get smores, okay?”

“Okay,” Shinsou agrees, raising his hand again before he pulls away. “I’m sorry.”

Mirio has heard Shinsou say ‘sorry’ a lot, especially tonight, but he could swear that Shinsou was trying to say something else with that last one.

*

Midoriya really isn’t good with not saying what he wants to say, especially with how bad he wants to say it. There’s a lot that he wants to talk about with Shinsou, there’s a lot of things that he’s worried about and Shinsou not being on any of the chats all week has made it a lot worse.

But everything that he wants to say is not really ‘keeping it chill,’ and he knows that Togata had a reason to ask for that. Even if Midoriya doesn’t know it himself, he can see that Shinsou probably doesn’t need to talk about anything that Midoriya wants to ask him about. Shinsou just looks really, really tired.

“This is one of my favorite Legend of Zelda games,” Midoriya says, loading up Breath of the Wild on the common room’s console. He and Sero are the only ones who have a fully completed save file including all 3 DLCs, and Kacchan has a bad habit of loading up someone else’s file just to eat all their food and leave them in a mob infested area to keep it that way. “The animation is so cool, and the mechanics are really interesting! Link has a Sheikah slate that can unlock new abilities from shrines, and some of them are kind of like quirks, like freezing water or being able to control metal with magnetic forces. The shrines are a little easier than the usual dungeons, but....”

Shinsou doesn’t really seem to be listening, just staring at the TV, and Midoriya remembers that he rambles a bit too much sometimes.

“Sometimes, I just like to play it and use the glider to fly around. It’s kind of relaxing, to just kind of float through the air and pick wherever you want to land. The music is really nice too, it’s really quiet when you’re gliding but the closer you get to the ground, it picks up. Kind of like you’re coming back to earth after getting above it all, for a while,” Midoriya says, teleporting to one of the highest mountain peaks to demonstrate it.

He explains all the buttons to push to make Link jump and pull out his glider, and Shinsou does turn to watch him do that. Then Midoriya sails off, sailing towards the Kokiri Forest even though it's impossible to reach it, even at the highest peak. He spent too long trying to when he got frustrated with the forest maze.

When he lands close enough to an outpost to hear the flutes and drums, he teleports back to the shrine at the peak and hands the controller to Shinsou to try it out. Shinsou remembers the controls to start gliding, but after sailing just a little bit, he drops the glider and Link falls to the ground with only three hearts to spare on his health bar. "Oh, sorry, you have to hold the button for-"

Shinsou teleports back to the shrine and starts again, this time circling back to the mountain's face before he lets the glider go, and Link ragdolls to his doom. Shinsou selects to restart at the death screen and starts sailing off again.

Midoriya doesn't say anything, because Kacchan does the same thing whenever he starts a new game. It seems really morbid, but knowing every possible way to kill your video game character is useful. It's just a little too meanspirited for Midoriya to ever try it.

Shinsou notices the green stamina bar start to go down after he tries to drown Link in the river nearby, and figures out how to kill Link by running it out. He ignores the Lizalfos that were attacking him on the riverbank during the drowning experiment, but on the next restart he stands right in front of one while it chips away at the maximum hearts until Link dies again.

He starts gliding again, but Midoriya knows he's probably testing if there are other ways to kill Link, and he gets lucky to find a wandering Guardian's attention. The next time, he lands too close to a town and finds nothing, but when he notices the townspeople he starts attacking them to test if they're hostile, only earning that animated flinch and scolding. "Um, the bombs also do damage if you stand too close-"

"When are you going to do it?" Shinsou asks, still staring at the screen.

"Huh-"

*

27 nearly sagged in relief after he pulled the string, running a hand through his hair. His quirk was still weak, the string not as strong as it should be. But not as weak as that frayed thing that he controlled Eri's quirk eruption with either.

He closes his eyes for a moment to block out the light, a dull and fading throbbing in his head, but pretends to keep playing the video game. He knows that the cameras in the common room wouldn't detect Midoriya's whitened eyes and his blank expression might be overlooked. He had to move fast, but he had to test it. "Scratch the back of your head with your right hand."

He obeyed, easy as saying it. As easy as saying it used to be.

He had been trying to force Midoriya's hand, trying to work the words past the mask at the same time. He felt the irritation building and swelling, red until it turned as black as that death screen. Just the sound of Midoriya's voice, the fact that he could just say things so easily, as easily as he could use his quirk was the push that he needed.

And Midoriya was stupid enough to answer. He was in the raid. He talked to Mirio about his quirk. He knew and he was blessed enough to be able to survive this long despite being that stupid.

"Stop. Put your hand down on the couch," 27 orders, and it feels right. The mask might not be gone, but it's open, and it's better that way. He still has the mask, but he can also use his quirk. It almost feels too easy to talk now.

27 rolls his neck, finding himself in the same habit of loosening his jaw and pulling it side to side, despite the real mask being gone for months. It's so easy, and it's so right, and they're all just so stupid.

"You're really the worst one they could have picked for this," 27 mutters, though he's not sure which one they should have picked. His owner said that he watched part of the training, and probably picked Midoriya because of that. Because Midoriya beat him. "Momo must have been too busy. She could make it cleaner, but I guess you heroes don't know about cleanup."

He fights a laugh, but still winds up with a smile.

"That's right, I've heard it's irritating when I talk without a command. Some of the underlings said it feels like they're vibrating in their minds. Trying so hard to be useful," 27 spares a glance at Midoriya, trying to see if there's any flicker of that, any weakness in the string, and there's not. Just that blank expression, still nauseating to look at. "Don't worry, you will be. You'll probably be better than Momo anyway."

27 stands up, and orders Midoriya to do it too. To follow him, as he starts walking towards the front door, and his nerves start singing because he knows it won't be this easy. But he has a useful tool, the perfect little puppet to throw away.

He's leaving, and Midoriya is going to make sure that happens.

The plan nearly fails when the stairwell door opens up forcefully, nearly clipping Midoriya's arm to wake him from the brainwash, but it doesn't. Out of the corner of his eye, he sees who opened the door, but he already knew it by the way that it opened. "Oi, corpse-face, where the fuck are you going?"

"Where do you think?" 27 asks, hoping. Two would be good, two would be better than good, and Blasty is too loud and stupid to resist it.

There's a pause, probably seconds but he feels every inch of it crashing over him, telling him to bolt for the door and hope that Midoriya doesn't get singed. "The fuck did you do to Dek-"

He pulls, he pulls he pulls and it fucking snaps.

27 presses his hands hard to his temples, grinding his teeth and willing the pain away, willing it to become just dull enough to ignore before he ignores it anyway. He turns to see Blasty blinking slowly, Midoriya still too close to his line of fire, still stopped because there's no motion to follow, and 27 pulls again, this time on a command he's already placed.

He runs and rips open the door, hears footsteps behind and he knows there's too many. The sun hasn't risen yet but it will, the sky gray and the air cold enough to bite in his throat even if it's relief on his face and head. When Mirio starts shouting he spins on his heel, he doesn't need that kind of attention, and Midoriya obeys the implicit order that 'following' means staying behind him.

Bug always told him that it was risky to leave things vague, to not be specific, but there are times that it works. "Hey kid, you need to go back inside-"

"The fuck I will! What the fuck are you doing to Deku, you shit faced bastard?!" Blasty fumes, hands curled at his sides threateningly. Two heroes so far, too much attention because of that, but 27 has failed to escape enough times to know that two isn't too much. Especially now, now that he has to.

Mirio tries to pretend he doesn't know, like he's just smiling like that to calm 27 down like he cares. Like he's worried. Yamada told him to do it, probably. His owner told Yamada who it would be and Yamada told Mirio to make it happen. Mirio might be the fall guy if they need one, but they probably don't. "Hey, Shinsou, I don't really know what's going on but you're not in trouble, alright?"

That's a lie so ridiculous that he can't even laugh at it. "Activate Full Cowl at 5%." It's just so useful that they name their attacks like that.

He sees the weak glow at that, Blasty lunging before Mirio stops him with a hand on his chest, his face pulling in fear at last. He knows he failed now, he knows that 27 knows. If they want to do it, they'll have to earn it fairly. "Shinsou, I know you're probably really scared, but--"

"Scared," 27 repeats, and then he finds it in him to laugh. "I'm leaving. You failed, picking Midoriya of all people. The milk was probably poisoned too, Yamada should have told you it wouldn't work."

Mirio looks confused at that, and he's convincing at least. "Shinsou, I didn't poison it! Why would you think that I--"

"10%," 27 orders, and sees the glow grow just a little brighter. "He can't handle more than 20% at Full Cowl. He'll probably explode at 100."

27 doesn't need to explain himself, not with fear crossing even Blasty's eyes. "What the fuck are you on, Shitsou? You're acting like a fucking--"

"Villain?" 27 asks, even if the reminder that it didn't work the first time is still sharp behind his eyes, he'll bait Blasty for another chance. "A criminal? A murderer?"

Blasty hisses, and that's not enough of a response, even if he tests it. Mirio's isn't either. "You're not any of those things, Shinsou. You're just feeling a little mixed up about some stuff right now, and we'll probably laugh about it later, but I really need you to trust me right now and let Midoriya go. You're safe, even if it doesn't really feel like it, but I promise you that you're safe."

27 narrows his eyes. They all said that, as though that was enough. 'You're safe, you're safe, you're safe,' all of them. They knew it, they probably had time to plan it. His owner was just so sure that it would work, that they would get the name and get rid of him that quickly. As though he'd make it easy for them.

He almost did. Even if Yamada couldn't have been more insultingly obvious, stirring the poison in so noisily, he almost took it anyway. Just to feel warm, and wasn't that just clever of them? To put him back in the Dark, to make him feel cold and feel small and want that poison bad enough to drink it. To think that he'd be warm with 50 after that.

He pretended to be. He soaked up every lie so greedily, knowing that it was all lies. He was just that pathetic. He just liked being lied to that much, and Yamada was so good at lying. Despite that name sign he prepared beforehand, despite every smile and story afterwards, he wasn't perfect at it. You're staying, he couldn't manage that much. He couldn't promise it because he already knew he wouldn't. That he wasn't supposed to last the night.

But he wonders. He's wondered too often, and no matter how this turns out, he wants to know.

"Tell me how much I'm worth," 27 demands, crossing his arms. Yamada made him hand over the knife and he took it back when he wasn't looking, but they don't know about that. It's better to keep secrets, and it's better to keep them from knowing that he's cold.

Mirio paints on a smile, so fake. "You're worth a lot, Shinsou. You're everything to Eri-"

"How much he paid," 27 corrects, a more muted form of the irritation that made him break Chisaki's nose boiling up. If Mirio were any closer, he'd make sure he wouldn't speak Eri's name. The idiot tries to play dumb, eyebrows furrowing so convincingly. So fake, so fake it's insulting. "Tell me how much Aizawa paid for me."

Even when he says it, he's too stupid not to hope. It might be a lot. It might be hard to throw him away if he proves himself, if he proves he can still be useful. He can use his quirk, he can be useful again.

He knows he's lying to himself. But he hopes.

Mirio just stares, looking stricken. Did he think he wouldn't figure it out? Did he think that he'd believe that it's different? "Shinsou...."

It's not different. The food is better, his bed is softer, he has things but they're always taunts. The laptop, the phone, his books - all of them reminders of how little he was worth to his mother. He wasn't worth as much as any of them, and his owner wanted him to know that. Even Chisaki couldn't make a play that good.

"All this time, you never believed you were rescued," Mirio mutters so softly, almost like 27 isn't meant to hear it. That's a good act, Mirio is convincing. "Even when you were next to Aizawa-sensei, you really thought that he-"

"20%," 27 commands. He's tired of this. "You're not close enough to know, then. It's fine. I'm leaving . "

Blasty charges, and Mirio tries to tackle him, and that's all the better. The two of them trapped between conflicting orders, no further instructions to guide them or clear the path for them. It's perfect.

"Deactivate your-" 27 turns to get the distance he needs, commanding Midoriya as he goes, but a wall surges forth and blows him off his feet. He instinctively raises his forearms against it, tiny pinpricks of debris on his face, before he lands on his back in the lush grass.

He pulls himself up, the knife in his hand before he even considers it, and looks at Midoriya panting and heaving with clear green eyes. His first two fingers are discolored, pointing at the crater left in the sidewalk while they twitch.

27 knows this won't end well. Three heroes alerted now, but more will be coming. No puppets to pull, no hope for escape.

But he's getting out of here.

He feels more like he's pulling his body after him as he runs, and he runs dead straight between two of the other dorms nearby. He knows he's not taking the way that he planned, he doesn't need to hear that near-electric sound of Midoriya's quirk and the sound of house slippers slapping on brick to remind him. He knows it's hopeless.

Near hopeless, he pulls himself over a low wall and keeps sprinting, nearly hearing Bug's voice when he checks to make sure he's been breathing properly for this kind of exercise. He needs enough distance, he just needs a chance, he needs to not hesitate when it comes.

He holds the knife tighter and clenches his teeth when he knows he won't do it. Eri likes this hero, even if 50 would understand.

He makes it to an academic building, at least somewhat safer, before he sees an electric green streak soar faster than he could, Midoriya kicking off the wall in front of him to head him off and embarrassingly enough 27 nearly slips on the grass, but catches himself. "Shinsou!"

If he's calling for more heroes to help capture him, he should have done it sooner.

"Shinsou, I can't let you leave," Midoriya says, hands up in placation though he winces when he tries to move his two damaged fingers. "Shinsou, are you really going to leave Eri like this?"

27 narrows his eyes, caught between screaming at this hero to keep Eri's name out of his mouth, or throwing the knife to ensure it, but when his mouth drops open the words and his breath catch in his throat.

Quirkless. Again.

He only has the knife, and that's not enough. Midoriya caught him and he has him, and he can finish the job here with no witnesses. Clean. Simple. Eri won't know a thing about it. They'll tell her that he ran away, because he made it so easy for them.

Maybe that's what he wanted. Maybe he already knew it was hopeless. Both the heroes and The Miasma were going to hunt him down and kill him. Maybe it'll be easier knowing that Eri wouldn't know.

He waits, he doesn't know whether to go loose or stiffen. Which will hurt less. Midoriya will beat him to death, and that's not a fun way to go, but it's not the worst. At least it's not the worst.

Midoriya looks like this is his first job like this. Like he doesn't know what to do either, eyes too wide, regret for taking the job and pity because he hasn't trained himself not to think like that. "You can't talk anymore?"

He can't, and it's the perfect time to strike. Not that it really would have mattered if Midoriya tried to before. His quirk is just his voice, he's quirkless without his voice and he's quirkless everywhere else even when he does have his voice. All Midoriya had to do was not answer, but he did. He gave 27 a chance but it doesn't matter anymore.

Midoriya cups his chin with his hand, tapping the side of his face for a few minutes. He's taking way too long, it's insulting enough that it's him, it's insulting that he had to point out that he was mute again, but wasting his time by making him wait is even worse.

He wanted more time, desperately enough to try to escape. To leave Eri. Now he just wants it to run out. He's tired, his head hurts, and he's tired. He just wants it to be over. It's supposed to be peaceful after that.

"Shinsou, I'm sorry," Midoriya says, taking a stance and activating Full Cowl. It's nice, it's nice that he says that. He doesn't have to. "You can talk if you use your quirk, or if you're fighting someone, and I really need to talk to you. I can't let you hide those painful feelings anymore."

27 doesn't know what he means to say, but he knows it isn't what he says. Midoriya isn't making any sense, and 27 doesn't care to try to make sense of it.

He settles in for another fight he'll lose, and holds the knife but only thinks of 50. He doesn't know what will happen, but he wants her to be there. After the nothingness, he hopes that she's there.

Midoriya is fast, but not as fast in pajamas and house slippers as he is in his hero costume. He kicks and throws punches, 27 deflects and guards and doesn't even know why. There's no point, he should just give up, make it a little bit easier.

But 27 doesn't know how to make things easy.

He sees an opening, Midoriya jumping away but jumping back too slowly, that kick so ill-timed, and 27 takes it on instinct. He pulls the knife forward to swing for it, catching the loose shirt but hardly any skin, if any. Midoriya just steps back and swings a fist forward again, teeth clenched too tight.

"I'll kill you," 27 warns but he makes it sound like a threat, he's getting tired of fighting and is just ready to lose. "You're not good with knives." No protection, no hardening, just speed. Just dodging, and that's another endurance game full of chance.

"You won't," Midoriya bites out in a gasp, not pacing himself well and he should be better trained than that. "You promised 50."

27 narrows his eyes, they must have been planning on that. They'd even use her to kill him. "You don't know a damn thing about her!"

Midoriya jumps back at another swing of the knife towards his stomach, which is good, because it hurts worse when the cut is that wide across too much skin. He pushes off the ground to try to kick 27's head, but it's so off that 27 just leans a little bit away to avoid it. "I don't, but I know she's a good person! She's a good person, like you! You don't really want to do this and I know it!"

Then he could just stop it and make it easier. "Because Eri told you? Because you think that she knows me, that anyone knows anything about me?" Midoriya is getting smarter, because he doesn't answer. "You have no idea what I've done, and what I can do. You have no goddamn ..."

It's not the usual mask, it's just anger. He bites down on his words but still carries them in a charge that Midoriya has to spin away from, but he still chases after that, only half numb to it now. Half afraid that Midoriya won't dodge the next one, but that red rage still shakes around the knife.

"You're just that blessed, aren't you? Your quirk, your family, everything you have. You have no goddamn idea what it's like," 27 sees the glow flicker and acts before he thinks about it, drawing a line of blood across Midoriya's arm that both terrifies and angers him. "What do you even see?"

Midoriya backs far enough away to slide to a stop, trying to charge past his left to avoid the knife, and earns a fist to his side for not using his quirk fast enough. He still makes it past and skids again, 27 turning to keep his eyes on him, not letting him have the opening of his turned back

"Why are you doing this?! What the hell do you see?!" 27 doesn't know what answer he's looking for, mind stumbling faster and his words falling out like water. It feels like falling out of his head but he feels it too much all the same, feels the hard press of the handle against the hand that's gripping it too tight. He sees red, he feels red, it's so hot now that he wishes that the air were colder. "Why can't I stay?"

He's not pacing himself well, those words coming out too choked. He feels dizzy, he feels too much, he feels not enough when the anger starts to recede. "You can stay, Shinsou, we're trying to convince you to stay! You're safe here-"

“I’m not,” 27 says, feels almost nothing when he laughs. Midoriya jumps back in a panic, hands up and surrendering, and it’s ridiculous. “I’m not blessed, I’ve never been blessed. Never been good enough, even for them, not for any of them.” The hand on the knife is too loose now, and he just leans forward and lets it drop with his arms. He’s tired, he’s tired of fighting and there’s never been any point to it. “What do you see?”

He’s not even blessed to know the answer. Midoriya just stares at him, hands dropping to his sides.

“What do you see that she didn’t?” 27 asks, and he just wants to know. The throbbing in his head makes holding a string impossible, his mind impossibly fuzzy. But he clings to the sight of her eyes in that rear view mirror, but he knows better than to wonder what she saw. He knows exactly how much she saw looking back at her. “1,125 gold fish, a phone, that’s all she saw. That’s all I was worth to my mother.”

It was nice, thinking that he was worth more to Chisaki. Even if it didn’t feel like it. It was nice to think that he was worth more to his owner, but he knows that’s not the case. They thought he was given away for free.

He knew it when the police officer said they had his mother, that they knew. They knew he killed her by quirked her too much, they mentioned her as a code to say they had enough. That he was worthless now. Disposable. And he knew it.

He spent too much time dreaming, but it was worth it. “Shinsou...”

“Just do it,” 27 says, barely a whisper now. The heat and pain is just too much right now, leaking out of the corners of his eyes. “It was nice here. I wish I could stay.”

He knows Midoriya won’t do it. He’s too kind. So he helps.

He charges forward, takes the knife from the ground, knife pulled back to swing forward, to force Midoriya’s hand and get it over with. No more counting, no more worrying, he won’t even think about Chisaki stealing his voice when there’s no voice left to steal. When there’s nothing left of him that isn’t with 50.

But a hand grabs his wrist from behind before an elbow covers his mouth and nose, pulling him firm against a chest that’s burning hot. He watches Midoriya slump forward and fall as the sweet smell fills his lungs. “Sorry, kiddo. I heard that you needed a stronger dose.”

Witching Hour. He pulls at the arm wrapped around his head but doesn’t dig in his nails. He didn’t expect her, but it’s so kind.

It’s like 127 said, it’s just falling asleep.

*

Aizawa stares at the map before he rubs his eyes, willing all the other cities and criminal organizations that he’s already marked down to fall out of his head to make room for the others he’s trying to place. He knows where Pack Alpha operates, but he can’t remember it now, three cups of station brew coffee isn’t nearly enough for this.

The map doesn’t seem to be helpful either. Sansa started adding the dates from when the reviews were created, to see if Miasma might have moved their base at certain times, but it’s proving to be pointless. There’s no timeline that points to a central location at any point, there’s no pattern to this at all.

Miasma operates all across Japan, 127 contracted on one side of the country one day and the other side a few days later. The only pattern seems to be that it was harder to contract him starting two years ago, and his rates went up according to the reviews. Perhaps that was when Miasma's focus shifted elsewhere. Shifted to working with the League of Villains to supply Nomus.

That theory endangers Shinsou's safety too much for Aizawa to allow himself to believe it, and he places Pack Alpha's labeled pin back on the table to find another name, to try to find one that he knows and can remember in this state. He's exhausted, but he needs something. He can't leave this unfinished.

"Eraserhead," Naomasa calls, hand covering his cellphone raised next to his ear. "Present Mic has been trying to get in touch with you." Naomasa hands him his own cell phone, and Aizawa spends a moment wondering how Hizashi even got the detective's personal number, and why he wouldn't just call his, before he answers.

"Oh, THERE'S my little partner, my husband that I love so much! Did you lose your phone, sweetheart? Did you forget that when I call, I'm probably not just calling to talk your ear off, I'm calling because OUR KIDS NEED YOU," Hizashi's tone is too manic, can't pick between irritation and sweetness, and Aizawa worries because he also sounds a bit drunk.

"I haven't received a single call," Aizawa answers, looking down at his phone to confirm it. He hasn't received a call or a single text message from anyone other than Shiori since meeting with her. And now that he thinks about it, that's strange. Hizashi would have texted him when they reached the dorm, would have checked in on him intermittently when his mission to investigate Miasma was so vague.

He tries to call Hizashi and doesn't even get his voice mail or a busy signal, as soon as he hits the button the app closes itself in an error. Shiori. "Oh, that's great. Don't worry, you're SO gonna get it when I get home, but I need you to get there first. Oh, and you have a whole Heroics exam in case you forgot, along with two wards that you need to take care of."

Aizawa looks up as though he could see his husband if he did. "Why aren't you at the dorm? Hizashi, where are you?"

"In a hospital, have you ever heard of those? It's pretty neat, you can get real medical treatment in a sterile environment-"

"Why are you in a hospital?" Aizawa asks, unable to truly keep the panic from his tone. He considers it but knows that Shinsou wouldn't, no matter how desperate. He wouldn't attack Hizashi of all people.

"I had a mission, and you'd know that if you PICKED UP YOUR PHONE. It's fine, just got a little shot-"

"Which hospital?" Aizawa demands, already walking towards the door and completely forgetting that this isn't his phone until Naomasa starts to follow him.

"Babe, I'm fine and Shinsou is so not," Hizashi reminds softly, and Aizawa can't find himself agreeing easily to what his husband is telling him in those words. "I need you to go home, I'll be there in a couple hours anyway, right as rain. You know, 'cause I'm trying out this neat thing called 'medical treatment from an actual doctor,' and not a home suture kit. Mirio called me a few times but he hasn't picked up, and that's not like him, so I really REALLY need you to go home, babe. Please."

Aizawa refuses to let his imagination wander, holding the phone too tight despite that. "I'm on my way."

"Great! Let me know what's going on because I am SO not okay with not knowing right now, Shou," Hizashi says with a panicked laugh. "I love you."

"I love you," Aizawa answers, hanging up and throwing the phone back to Naomasa before he runs out of the station, using his capture scarf after a few blocks to take his usual route back to UA despite the ache in his limbs that reminds him that he hasn't slept at all for a few days.

He's lucky that route takes him past the Class 1-A dorms, where Nemuri shouts and waves him down, Mirio holding Eri in his arms beside her. And far more frightening than Nemuri's scowl is the fact that Shinsou isn't with them.

"Great! You remembered that you have an exam, and, you know, two wards to take care of-"

"Where is Shinsou?" Aizawa demands, too sharp for Eri's presence, but he can't settle the panic rising to the surface. Shinsou wasn't here, he was in a delicate state, Hizashi had been shot.

"Oh, he's inside," Nemuri says, pointing at the front door of the 1-A dorm, and Aizawa runs over to open it only to find it locked. Or sealed, now that he looks closer to see that the metal bubbles and warps to bind the door to the frame. "Right, and your class is rebelling."

Aizawa looks over his shoulder at Nemuri, who's incensed enough to not even be smug about that. She just folds her arms behind her head, stretching before she groans.

"Well, my work here is done, I still have my own class to manage. Goodbye my sweet little angel Eri!"

"Bye Nemmie!" Eri returns, waving before she wraps her arm back around Mirio's neck. And Mirio looks all the more anxious, despite how ill-fitting that is for him and despite how hard Aizawa is trying not to glare at him. He also looks slightly singed, from the blackened tips of his hair and a shoulder of a shirt burnt away to reveal skin.

"Uh, it was kind of an eventful night. I tried to text you and Yama-"

"My phone was hacked, he was sh.... Busy," Aizawa says, barely catching himself for Eri's sake. Mirio catches it all the same, that anxiety peaking as he began scratching his head.

"Oh, yeah. Shinsou... tried to run away, and got in a fight with Midoriya I think, but Midnight-sensei caught both of them, and then we got everyone inside but we both left at the wrong time and..." Mirio trailed off, glancing at the door before he looked at a few windows. Aizawa followed his stare to see a long black bar on the inside of each window that would lock the latch in place, making it impossible to open. "Sorry, they were behaving really well so I didn't think to-"

"It's fine, they're my idiots," Aizawa answers, but he's absolutely sure that they won't be his as soon as he retrieves Shinsou. "I'm sorry, but can you watch over Eri for-"

"Sure! Just Eri, just my favorite buddy who probably needs to get some sleep anyway, right Eri?" Mirio says, looking all the more shellshocked by the events of last night when he turns to look at the innocent 5 year old who at least had no part in that.

Eri does look a bit tired, her head resting on Mirio's chest with half-lidded eyes, but she tries to perk up when she looks at Aizawa. "Zawa, don't be mad at Twenny. He's just grumpy and scared."

Aizawa imagined that neither of those words truly encompassed what state Shinsou was in, to attempt to run away from UA in the dead of the night. But he wouldn't be mad at any reason that he found for it, knowing that there were few of them that weren't his fault. "I'm not mad at Shinsou. Don't worry."

Her worries assuaged, Eri yawned and leaned a bit more on Mirio, likely to fall asleep before they returned to the staff dorm. And if the under eye circles that Mirio wore were any indication, he looked like he would like to do the same. "Sorry about the dorm shift, but we'll see you after the exam! Good luck!"

Aizawa turned back to the dorm to pull himself onto the rooftop, a latched service door hidden for this exact purpose or one similar. And he doubted that there would be an exam to worry about.

*

Voices. The babble of them becoming clearer as he woke, but 27 made sure to give no indication that he had. He kept his breathing steady, refused to move and listened until he could pick out the words.

"...s still a really bad idea, I really think we should-" A loud ripping sound cut that female voice off, and 27 felt an odd pressure on his ankles before he felt something wrap around them, but there was something in the way. A blanket.

27 brushed his elbow against the soft material that was wrapped around him, listening to the voices argue. They wanted to call his owner to deal with something, but others thought that was a mistake. That their plan was the best course of action, and it would be fine.

He risks alerting them, but tries to make it seem like his arm had just gone loose and fallen off the couch, outside of the bounds of the blanket, but the blanket didn't give. There was a band of pressure around his upper and lower arm that restrained him.

It was a mistake, but 27 opened his eyes and tried to sit up, only able to manage halfway before the tape binding the blanket around him like a reinforced cocoon stopped him. He looked around to find a gathering of Class 1-A in the common room, Tapey tugging another band of tape from his elbow though there were few places that needed it.

What the fuck were they trying to do to him?

Ashi leaned her elbows over the back of the couch, grinning at him. "Hey sleepyhea-"

"Let me out," 27 demanded, narrowing his eyes and ignoring the rasp in his voice. "Let me out or I'll kill you."

Half-Bastard shook his head, crossing his arms from where he stood at the end of the couch. "The 'purrito' isn't a punishment, but it's necessary as long as you remain aggressive."

"Speaking of," Adhesive Dispenser says, throwing a glance at Midoriya where he was sitting on another couch, his wounds being dressed by Floaty and Amphibian Fibber. "Can we just take a minute to appreciate that Midoriya got in a knife fight, was told that he was going to get stabbed, and then was just like 'What are you gonna do, stab me?' And got stabbed. Lightly, but stabbed."

"I'm pretty sure it was an accident-" Midoriya starts.

"It wasn't, let me out, " 27 demands. They're not here, they're not supposed to be here after he dies so he's not dead, he's still alive but that's worse. "Let me out and let me leave, or I will kill you, kill all of you, kill everyone you care about-”

An explosion in front of his face cuts him off, and 27 turns to glare at Blasty, who only glares back, but too stern. Not entirely angry, and he hates it. “Stop putting it on, shit-face. We’re beating the shit out of your fucked up brain’s cognitive distortion bullshit, so fucking deal with it.”

Hell no. And at least Martial Monkey agrees. “We really should just leave this to Aizawa-sensei. There’s no way that he’s not going to expel us over this.”

27 bites back a laugh. “Exactly. Listen to Tail Boy, you’re acting out of line. He told Midoriya to do it, but he failed, just leave it to him. Probably Momo. Use C4 this time, it’s quicker-”

He gets another explosion close to his face, and the heat of it reminds him how cold he is. They should have used a thicker blanket, even if this one feels thick. “Listen, Shitsou. You’re not gonna die, Shitsei didn’t fucking buy you or some shit, who knows what the fuck you were muttering about goldfish-”

“Brainwashing,” 27 says, even if he should have kept it hidden, should have offered the deal before he offered the reward. “My quirk is brainwashing. I can control people by asking them questions. Now you know, there’s no mystery, let me out -”

He tries to pull off the couch but two hands hold his shoulders in place. Tapey starts taping him to the couch to make that unnecessary. “Shinbro, it’s okay. Just relax man-”

“You’re all going to die,” 27 bites out in a panic, his owner is going to kill them and he knows it. They’re acting so out of line that they’re disposable. “You’re all going to die, he’s going to kill you, let me out!”

Icyhot Bastard walks over to put a hand on his forehead, and 27 tilts his chin to see if he can bite it, but Chili frowns. “He’s overheating. The ‘purrito’ shouldn’t be used this-”

“Aizawa-sensei is here,” the Masked One calls as he exits the stairwell, the webbing on his arms still decorated with ears and just the tip of one half-arm holds a mouth. “He’s on the fourth floor.”

“Tooru, we really should leave,” Extended Vertebrae whines, seeming worried. He should be, they all should be. “We really can’t afford to get mixed up in this when we’re already on thin ice.”

The clothes standing next to him bounce in a hop. “No way! We’ve got to prove it to Shinsou that he’s safe, right?”

“We might be risking expulsion, and our futures as heroes,” Provost Piston says, and he seems to pale more at the thought of that than all the other students gathered. “But we wouldn’t be heroes if we can’t reassure the people closest to us that they’re safe.”

‘Safe.’ He might be part of the plan. This might all still be part of his owner’s plan. A backup. But it’s just too ridiculous.

Sparky grins at him. “So, you know that Heroics Exam-”

“Never heard of it,” 27 deadpans, wishing that Polar Temperatures would get his icy hand off of his face. He’s so damn cold, it’s not even torture, it’s just rude.

Zappy looks like he’ll explain it before Beat Dropper cuts him off. “We locked up all the entrances and told Midnight-sensei we’re not going to it, and that we’re holding you hostage. Aizawa-sensei would probably want to kill us over that, right?”

For far less than that. His owner was already worried that they wouldn't do well, but if they intended to not do it at all? He'd kill them all the slower. "He wouldn't. You're volunteers, you're not like me. You're just acting stupid."

The hands still resting on his shoulders start patting them. "Don't worry, Shinbro! Aizawa-sensei's pretty used to us doing something stupid." 27 looks up at Kirimson Shark's toothy grin, and wonders how long it will last before the realization of death sets in to rattle him. "Alright! Operation Prove Shinsou Wrong is a go! Let's get ready, guys!"

They retreat from him to start moving to the stairwell, Floaty and Amphibian Fibber convincing Midoriya to stay put, and Ashido chiming in that she's staying too. When Momo passes, he tries to reach out for her only to remember he's restrained, grinding his teeth before he works the words past a closing mask. "Momo, don't do this. At least not you. Don't you care about Eri?"

Momo whips her head around to answer him, but Beat Dropper covers her mouth. Damn them.

Sticky starts pulling off another piece of tape before Blasty slaps his arm. "It's fine, just don't let him get a cheap shot like that, Deku. You too, dumbass acid wash."

"It's fine!" Ashi cheers, patting his covered chest with a smile that said she was either overlooking the fact that he was bound, or delighted in it. "Shinny, me, and Midoriya, the fluffy hair squad is on the case!"

There is no case, they're just going to get themselves killed, and he just hopes that he doesn't have to watch Ashi die.

*

Everyone has a breaking point. Aizawa can very clearly see his.

He cleared the first two floors and found them deserted, but on the next one he found Kirishima and Tokoyami trying to stop him with arms held out to do so. He asked what they were doing as a curtesy, but with the answer merely being 'rebellling,' he didn't offer it to any of the other students.

They are lucky that they don't try to use their quirks against him, merely arms outstretched to impede his way. He clears his path all the same, but if given the right provocation, he would be far less gentle with the capture scarf.

He's going to expel them. All of them. Kan will win, and he'll deal with that later, and his method of dealing with it will be to duct tape him to a chair and leave him in a closet for someone else to find. The deal is off because he's not going to deal with any of it.

Todoroki makes half a wall of ice before Aizawa cancels his quirk, and despite himself, he can't help but grin.

They don't need to worry about that exam anymore.

*

27 could jerk away from Ashi combing her fingers through his hair, he has the ability to move his neck if nothing else. But he doesn't. Even if it's distracting him.

He purposefully glances at Midoriya before turning his head to face the couch, eyes lowered. "Sorry. Is your hand okay?"

Out of the corner of his eye, he sees Midoriya give him two thumbs up with his fingers bound together, and a grin. Asshole.

Bug tried to teach him better. To have a conversation to hide when his quirk could be used. He didn't practice much with it and wasn't very good before he was sold, and didn't think to really try it with the underlings at the 8 Precepts either. It's difficult to do in a fight, but it's also difficult to do it without one. It just seems pointless. "You probably wouldn't have talked to me if you knew my quirk in the first place."

"I would! I mean, Togata-sempai told me anyway, but I'm not just not talking to you because of your quirk! I just... kind of know what you're trying to do, Shinsou," Midoriya says nervously, and that's insulting. Even if 27 was being stupidly obvious, he didn't have to point it out. "Is your quirk always like that, though? It was kind of weird."

"It isn't. It's weak." It's fine that they know that. They already know to avoid it. "You broke out of it."

"Yeah, it was...really weird. Kind of like this dream I had," Midoriya says, staring at his hand.

Ashi hums, folding her hands on his forehead before she frowns. "Shinny, are you feeling okay?"

"It's rude that you get to ask questions," 27 grumbles, making her frown deepen. He sighs. "I'm fine."

"Want me to bring you some water? I think we still have those cute little bendy straws--"

"I know it's poisoned, you can't make me drink it," 27 says, rolling his eyes. They've tried that so much, it's like they don't know any better way to do it. They try to argue again, but he just ignores them. They're right, his voice is hoarse because his throat is a bit sore, but the only relief that he'll find for that is his eventual death.

Unless he gets out of here.

"Shinny," Ashi says sharply, her black eyes cutting to him even sharper. "If anyone was trying to kill you, I'd kill them first. You are safe, in a soft little purrito, and when Aizawa-sensei gets here and doesn't kill us, you're just gonna have to believe it!"

27 lets his lips twist at that, turning away and trying to make his eyes water. It's not working as well as he wants it to, so he just turns further away. "Ashi, I really don't want you to do this. I don't want you to get hurt."

He gets another pat on his chest, and she's probably grinning even if he can only hear it in her voice. "I'm gonna be fine, Shinny. Yeah, Aizawa-sensei's gonna be pissed, but I can deal with that! He's really not that scary after the first 15 times you get in trouble."

"I'm scared," 27 says, even if that sounds even more pathetic to his ears. "Can I just...I want to hold your hand. If that's okay."

She only gets the tape pulled off by a few centimeters before Midoriya stops her, and 27 glares at him. "Asshole."

Ashi sighs in frustration, tugging at her hair with both hands. "Shinny! You're gonna be fine, okay?! Jeez, that's so mean!"

"That's mean," 27 repeats, almost laughing. "I could have killed you. I don't even remember how many times I quirked you. If I wasn't sold it could have been you too. I could have killed you."

Ashi looks confused, even if he already explained it. "Shinny, you wouldn't have killed me. Your quirk's not like that--"

"I killed my mother," 27 says, and he hates that he says it. That he has to listen to those words instead of just letting them sit in his skull. "She killed herself because I used my quirk on her too much. I drove her insane. She tried to get away but she couldn't get away from it. From what I did."

"But you used your quirk on Eri too," Midoriya says, and he hates that he speaks her name so familiarly. That he even speaks it. "If you're talking about Mental Quirk Abuse, then Eri would be the most susceptible to it, since she's a child, but she doesn't have any of the symptoms. Your quirk probably can't cause--"

"That's why she sold me," 27 says, unwilling to listen to them try to explain away what he knows. They don't know anything. "I drove her insane, and it's my own fault. It's my fault that everything happened - The Miasma, Chisaki, all of it. I should have just kept my mouth shut--"

"Shinny." Ashido grips the back of the couch too tightly, staring straight ahead with a blank expression that looks tepid beneath the surface. "Your mom was crazy already, none of that was your fault, and I'm really..." She swallows, wiping at the corner of her eye. "I'm really sorry that it did. And I'm really happy that I get to talk to you."

He's stealing that from her. He's stolen almost all of her smiles, leeches away at her happiness. And it's all for a lie. "I don't remember you." He's not Shinny.

"I don't remember either!" Ashi says, that cheerful grin returned even if her eyes are both closed. "I remember your quirk when I really think about it, but I really didn't remember a thing until I texted my mom! But I know that we were best friends...." Her eyes fall open, wiping at a few stray tears that fall. "And I want to be friends again, because I know we were friends for a reason."

"And I want to be friends with you too!" Midoriya chimes in, and he should be more embarrassed than he looks to say something like that. "Pretty much everyone in 1-A wants to be friends with you, Shinsou. And I know I can kind of be annoying sometimes when I talk about quirks, and if you don't like playing video games--"

The door to the stairwell bursts open and the white scarf looped itself around Midoriya's chest before it pulled him over the couch, another end of it ensnaring Ashi as well to pull them both into a heap at his owner's feet. He looked furious. "What. Have you done. To Shinsou."

Binding him up like this clearly wasn't part of his owner's plan. They were really going to pay for it. "Hey, Sensei! You're probably really really mad right now, right?" Ashi asks, and despite what she said about not fearing him, that bubbly tone warbles a bit too much for him to believe it right now. "Like, the rebellion thing and kidnapping Shinsou--"

"And taping him to a couch," his owner adds, hair still levitating with his eyes still alight with a red glow. He was right, that can be frightening. "I don't believe 'mad' is what I am right now."

Midoriya twists himself from underneath Ashido's legs to lay on his back, laughing nervously. "So, this is probably the angriest that you'll ever get at us, right?"

"That's correct," his owner says, his hair falling around his shoulders as he crouches to let his words truly sink in. "I'll never be any angrier or more disappointed with you, or any class following you. You will not only be expelled, but charged with kidnapping and anything else that I can find, your provisional licenses will be rejected and I will make it my personal mission to ensure that none of you ever touch a professional one.”

Both of the hero students seemed to pale at that, but Midoriya regained himself first. “But you’re not going to kill us, right?”

His owner seems to be considering that question. Whether he should tell them so that they can anticipate it, sweltering under that certainty, or to simply do it now. “Why are you trying to make me kill you? Death does not excuse you from your exam.”

“Um, well,” Midoriya seems just as confused as 27, but he finally finds his footing to respond. “Shinsou kind of thought that you bought him and that you were going to kill him, and that everyone was going to kill him but we didn’t really know that yet, and Kacchan said it was a cognitive distortion and if we proved him wrong then he wouldn’t think that way, and so we decided to-”

His owner pulls the scarf off of his neck, dropping it to the floor. Judging by Ashi’s fruitless struggles, they seemed to be still bound by it anyway.

He doesn’t look at 27 when he starts pulling off the tape securing him to the couch. 27 doesn’t know if he wants him to. “Maybe it was kind of a bad idea, and maybe we took it a little too far. Shinsou just seemed really convinced and really scared, and we really couldn’t-”

An explosion louder than any that he’s heard from Blasty sent a quake through the building, but his owner seemed to barely notice it. All Might walked through the hallway from the front door, followed by Boss Mouse-Bear riding a robot that seemed to be opened at the top just for him to ride it. And one of its arms appeared to be smoking. “Ah, Eraserhead! Perhaps you can shed some light as to what your students were doing with this little ‘rebellion.’ Sadly, it already seems to be put down.”

His owner didn’t answer his boss either, and after pulling the last strip of tape free, he tucked a hand under the one wrapped around 27’s chest and lifted him off the couch. And just carried him like that.

27 doesn’t know what’s going to happen to him, but he really wished that it didn’t involve this.

“Toshinori, take over. Midoriya can explain,” his owner said, his tone an odd mix of exhaustion and something else, something 27 couldn’t place. Maybe he didn’t want to kill 27, maybe he had a reason not to anymore.

“Hey, Aizawa-sensei,” Ashido calls, ignoring that his owner doesn’t want to speak to even his Boss, so he’s not likely to answer her. “Where’s Shinsou’s mom at, because I really want to talk to her.”

His owner’s steps falter, almost imperceptibly, but he doesn’t answer. It would be pointless to, 27 already told Ashido that she was dead.

27 couldn’t speak, couldn’t fight even if he wanted to. He knew it would be useless to try to fight his owner anyway, but being bound like this and carried without a single glance from his owner as he walked across campus only seemed to compound that.

27 didn’t know what was going to happen, but he knew he had no choice and no way to fight whatever did.

*

Aizawa carried Shinsou through the door and placed him on the couch before he went to Eri's room to check on her and Mirio. Both were asleep, both sprawled chaotically on top of Eri's plush pink comforter, and Aizawa placed the throw blankets from the foot of her bed over them.

He tried to text Hizashi that both wards were safe, but the message wouldn't send. Shiori still hadn't told him how to fix his phone, so he resorted to sending an email to Hizashi instead. Hopefully, Hizashi would check that rather than come home more incensed that Aizawa hadn't tried to reach out at all.

Aizawa takes a moment to just breathe, refusing to let his eyes fall closed for too long. He was tired, bone dead tired, and he couldn't afford to be. Not with the exam in an hour, not with Hizashi wounded and shot, not with Shinsou.

Not with anything about Shinsou. Shinsou attempting to run away, Shinsou possibly being sick, Shinsou inspiring his students to 'rebel' and tape him into a cocoon for some reason.

Shinsou being convinced that Aizawa was going to kill him.

Of all the reasons that Aizawa had to prove he was ill-suited to his job as a caretaker for Shinsou, he never expected that he would fail to the point of making Shinsou think that. It was obvious that Shinsou wasn't comfortable around him, but to think that he not only bought him but was going to kill him.

Aizawa has no idea how long he's thought this way. But if nothing else, he needs to convince him otherwise.

Aizawa spares one last glance at Eri sleeping so peacefully, reminded of what he thought before Hizashi took Shinsou in as a ward. He always knew that Shinsou would be more difficult to help, more difficult to gain his trust. He had lived in another world for far longer, a crueler world. He wouldn't know what to expect here, because it was different.

It was useless to only tell him it was, without proving it.

Aizawa goes to the bathroom to dig out the thermometer from the medicine cabinet, Ms. Saito already warned him that Shinsou might be sick. He would have to verify it himself, but he hoped not. The kid had enough to deal with.

He goes to the office to grab Shinsou's file, and makes sure that it has the page that he needs before he takes a pair of fabric shears from Hizashi's desk. He takes another breath, knowing that he's just hesitating, before he walks out to talk to Shinsou.

He might have already taken advantage of the restraints that the taped up blanket gives him, but he uses it once more to take Shinsou's temperature. Shinsou seems to be ignoring Aizawa so far, his eyes focused on the back of the couch and expression completely blank, but when Aizawa presses the end of the device to his forehead he flinches before he looks up at it.

"You might have a fever," Aizawa explains, even if it's not much of one. Shinsou's temperature tended to fluctuate to extremes, and if he did have a fever, it was mild. He placed the thermometer on the kotatsu and took the shears, starting at the tape binding Shinsou's ankles just so that he wouldn't think the shears had any other purpose.

Just so Shinsou wouldn't think he was going to kill him with fabric shears.

He seems to have read Shinsou right. With each severed piece of tape, Shinsou's expression becomes just a bit more pinched in worry, eyes unerringly focused on the shears. When Aizawa cuts the last piece, he stands up to put the shears in the kitchen, an irrational action with a rational reason, and notices that Shinsou doesn't move even if he's freed.

He doesn't look afraid, and that's what concerns Aizawa. Shinsou might have always thought that his life was in danger here, and Aizawa never knew it. Never saw a single sign of it.

"We need to talk," Aizawa says, sitting on the floor between the kotatsu and the couch. Shinsou doesn't sit up, not until Aizawa hands him the page from the file that he was looking for.

"Midoriya said that you were under the impression that you were trafficked to us. This is part of the paperwork that Hizashi signed before you were placed in his care."

Shinsou's eyes roam over the paper several times, likely re-reading it just as many. Despite how verbose The Commission's paperwork could be, this page was simple enough. The details of a monthly stipend that was paid by The Commission for Shinsou's care. It wasn't much, not enough to pay for more than his food and not at all enough to incentivize a hero to take in a ward just for the money. But it was evidence that wouldn't fit with Shinsou's perception that Aizawa or Hizashi had paid to 'own' him.

"Naomasa may not have explained it clearly before you came to UA," Aizawa says, intending to ask Naomasa exactly what he said the next time he saw the detective. "Because you are a minor who is endangered by a criminal organization under investigation, you were designated as a ward. Because your quirk may not affect Hizashi due to his hearing loss, and because Eri is my ward, you were placed here at UA, under Hizashi's care. But everyone that you have met at UA has taken the same responsibility that Hizashi has, to keep you safe from anyone that would threaten you."

Shinsou seemed confused by the mention of Hizashi's hearing loss, but seemed to realize it after a moment. They weren't sure if it would affect Hizashi when he was wearing hearing aids, but between Aizawa's quirk and the possibility of it, it was enough to approve the wardship placement. Shinsou being mute and unlikely to use his quirk also helped.

"I'm not going to kill you. It's my duty to protect you, as a hero and as a caretaker approved by The Commission," Aizawa finds it hard to look at Shinsou, to see if he believes any of that. Shinsou isn't reading the page anymore, his eyes focused on one corner of it, his expression so guarded that it's impossible to read. "Why did you think I would kill you?"

He earns a frown, but Shinsou's hands raise to answer him. 'You have name. M-I-A-S-M-A.'

The name that Shinsou didn't volunteer, that Aizawa refused to ask for despite it being the most useful and simple lead he could gather from Shinsou. Because he'd learned well enough not to push when information was so timidly given. When it was better to receive it rather than pressure Shinsou for it.

A name that meant so much more to Shinsou than he realized. That was forced out of him all the same.

"Now that I do, I can find them. I can stop them from trying to find you," Aizawa says, wavering before he admits it. "The investigation won't be closed until we've captured every dangerous member of that organization. But you won't be questioned about it again. I have enough leads to guarantee it."

Shinsou didn't look relieved at that, his eyebrows pinching together in clear worry. 'Not useless. Not useless. Can-'

“That doesn’t make you useless, Shinsou,” Aizawa says, finding it difficult to keep himself calm after seeing that. Knowing why Shinsou thought that way. “Your wardship isn’t a typical one. You shouldn’t have been so involved in the investigation in the first place. But even if you never told me anything about that organization, nothing would have changed. You would still be protected here.”

Shinsou frowns, eyes going wider for a moment. Shocked, and perhaps regretting that he had offered any information at all. Even if he would have been forced to give it all the same. He runs a hand through his hair, looking away for a moment, before he signs again. ‘ My mother. ’

Aizawa hesitates, wondering what Shinsou had told Ashido about her, why the woman was so concerning to Shinsou now. “Your mother is being extradited to Japan. She was able to get in contact with the organization, and may have been involved in it. Are you concerned that you’ll be placed in her care again?”

Shinsou turned to look at him with pure shock, his mouth slightly opened as he stared. ‘ Not. Dead. ’

“No, she’s not,” Aizawa answers, unable to find a reason why Shinsou would think that. Aizawa still had a bite mark in his palm to prove that Shinsou heard Naomasa say she was in Interpol’s custody, Shinsou only releasing him after that was said. “She’s in Interpol’s custody. Why did you think she was dead?”

‘ Missing. Killed self. My quirk, ’ Shinsou answers, and Aizawa feels horrified to know what he means.

“She was only missing. She’s alive, and we have no evidence that your quirk could cause that. Especially when you were that young,” Aizawa answers, folding his hands.

Shinsou had been convinced that he had been bought, that he was going to be killed if he wasn’t ‘useful’ to the investigation, and that he had caused his mother to kill herself. And Aizawa never knew any of this.

“We’re going to play the Question Game,” Aizawa says, because he doesn’t want any more surprises like this. “Do you believe what I’ve said so far?”

Shinsou hesitates, glancing at the paper still in his lap before he looks at Aizawa’s shoulder, then nods. ‘ I do. ’ He runs a hand through his hair again, an odd new tic, before he frowns and signs. ‘ C-H-I-S-A-K-I dead. ’

Aizawa considers not answering truthfully, but he doesn’t know how Shinsou came to suspect it in the first place. And he might believe that he was safe, now that he seemed to believe that it was Aizawa and Hizashi’s duty to keep him that way. “Yes. He’s dead.” Aizawa finds himself missing the familiar reassurance of the capture scarf that he left at the 1-A dorm. “How do you feel about that?”

Shinsou frowns, staring towards the kitchen before he shrugs. ‘ I don’t know. You didn’t tell me. ’

It would be easier if Shinsou asked him questions more clearly, even during this ‘Question Game.’ “I didn’t, because I didn’t want you to worry that you would be targeted. And I thought it would be better to avoid the topic of Chisaki for some time.” Aizawa sees a slight narrowing of Shinsou’s eyes, clearly displeased by that but unwilling to show it just as much as he’s unwilling to look at him. “Are you angry about that?”

Shinsou seems angrier at the question, his jaw clenching for a moment. ‘ C-H-I-S-A-K-I. Face masks. 50. Hiding. I don’t know why. ’

He wasn’t hiding things very well if Shinsou found them out. And Shinsou was able to hide the fact that he knew far too well. “I didn’t want you to worry about Chisaki. I was intending to tell you that we found 50 after I met with her family. And the face masks,” Aizawa hesitates, before he forces himself to say it. “I didn’t want them to be a reminder of something painful. Would it be?”

Shinsou looks down, folding his hands before he answers. ‘ Maybe. I want them. Won’t wear in front of E-R-I. ’

Aizawa swallows guiltily, proven right but the victory was hollow all the same. “They’re different. They might be different enough to try. If you want to.”

Shinsou finally glances at him, just for a moment, before he stares at the paper again. ‘ I don’t have questions. ’

“That’s fine,” Aizawa says, brushing his hair behind his ear before he asks his last one. “Is there anything else that you’re worried about, or anything that’s bothering you?”

Shinsou’s hesitation seems all the more telling that there is, but he’s surprised by the simple answer he offers. ‘ You’re angry. ’

“I’m not,” Aizawa answers. “If I was angry at you, I would tell you. I’m just very tired, and irritated at my class. And I would like Hizashi to be here. But I’m not angry at you.”

Shinsou nods, folding his hands tightly, fingers squeezing together before he asks again. ‘ Not angry. ’

“I’m not,” Aizawa repeats. He’ll repeat it as many times as it’s necessary.

But Shinsou seems to believe it, finally looking at him fully. Their eyes meet before Shinsou glances away, but he looks back again, before he sighs and runs both hands through his hair. ‘ I don’t know. Different. I don’t know. ’

Shinsou was clearly frustrated, but there was something in his pinched expression that wasn’t solely that. An undercurrent of fear, of being overwhelmed.

Shinsou didn’t remember what a caretaker looked like, if he ever had one. If Shinsou Ui ever was one. He remembered being owned by Chisaki, being controlled and raised by Miasma. He knew what to expect in those circumstances, but not here. Not when it was different.

It was likely easier to accept that it wasn’t different at all, rather than feel so lost in his new circumstances. “You can always ask questions here, if you’re worried that something is wrong. If you’re worried about doing something wrong. I want you to do that.”

Shinsou looks at him again, expression smoothing back into blankness, before he shakes his head. ‘ No. I won’t. ’ Aizawa almost begins to convince him otherwise, before he catches the slight wideness of Shinsou’s eyes. His refusal wasn’t out of fear. It was a test. A developmental milestone that he likely missed.

He’d rather not deal with a teenager discovering the word ‘No,’ but it was necessary. “I would rather that you did, but I won’t force you to,” Aizawa says, spotting an almost imperceptible sigh of relief from Shinsou before he pulls himself to his feet, legs aching after being folded for so long. “I’m going to make some coffee so that I can deal with the exam. Would you like some?”

He turns away to hide a smirk when he sees another ‘No.’

Tested

Chapter Summary

27 isn't owned, and he wonders what that means for him. Aizawa hasn't slept in a few days, which puts him in the perfect mood to oversee the Joint Training Exam while debating whether to expel his class for their antics.

Chapter Notes

SPOILER WARNING: If you don't know the Big Thing concerning One for All that happens in the Joint Training Exam Arc and you do care about avoiding spoilers, try to read that before reading this chapter. I would say that you could avoid reading a certain part, but unfortunately, the spoilers will come into play later on in Wards.

Trigger Warning: Blood (not terribly graphic)

Previously on Wards of UA: Aizawa left his capture scarf at the 1-A dorm after restraining Ashido and Midoriya. Aizawa's phone has been unable to call or text anyone but Shiori after Shiori removed the Trojan program. Mirio took out the SIM card of his Sir Nighteye agency phone before giving it to Shinsou, and Yamada and Aizawa have yet to buy one. Shinsou gave Aizawa the sign name 'Zawa Hero,' but felt that 'Zawa Coffee' fit better, and 'Zawa' can mean 'muttering.' Monoma, AKA Threatening Quirk Thief, gave Shinsou an 'offering' before Midterms that was a pain relief kit. Shinsou took the gift as threatening, while Monoma assumed that Shinsou had been missing class due to chronic pain because Shinsou's quirk felt painful to him. Shinsou had chemical pneumonia towards the end of his time at the 8 Precepts. Todoroki (possibly) thinks that Shinsou can transform into a cat, and thus has cat-like characteristics and should be treated like a cat. Todoroki came to this conclusion because Aizawa had a book about living with feral cats, which he used to try to connect with Shinsou better at Midnight and Ms. Joke's suggestion. Aizawa and Kan have a tradition where the teacher whose class loses the Joint Training Exam has to serve the victor for a day, and Aizawa suspects that Kan wants to leverage his victory to spend time with Eri. Shinsou was tricked into the influence of an interrogation quirk by drinking a mocha coffee. Shinsou was shot by a quirk that imitated a gun.

Aizawa was irritating.

He was a liar, he was weird, his face was just so unnerving because it never had a single fucking tell. 27 had to ask if he was angry because it was impossible to know it otherwise, and that was so unbearably insulting.

Aizawa had even fooled him into thinking that he had power over 27, and he didn't. Yamada did, and while Yamada was a liar for making 27 think that, Yamada wasn't an owner.

And neither was Aizawa. 27 didn't have an owner to answer to anymore.

He wasn't sold, he was rented somehow. But the money was going the wrong way. Yamada was paid what amounted to a 'fill out the ranks' job every month to take care of him. Maybe Yamada was being rented. Maybe 27 had power over Yamada through that. Somehow.

No. He knew he didn't.

It was irritating.

27 watches Aizawa fill a mug with coffee before the coffee starts pouring into the coffee pot, then put an ice cube in the mug before he starts chugging it. He's never seen Aizawa do that, and he's never seen the dark circles under his eyes look so dark, or his scruffy beard look that long. There's also a red spot next to his iris that's different from the other red lines, possibly from straining his quirk somehow. After he drains the coffee mug, he starts applying his eyedrops, three in each eye.

It's more irritating because he doesn't have the scarf. It still makes him look smaller, and weirder. This entire situation is weird.

27 wasn't going to be killed. He wasn't going to be involved in the investigation. He was probably going to have to break into the office again, periodically, to know what they found out or how close they're getting to The Miasma. He can't afford not to know, and while Aizawa fared well against Focus Imperceptible, 127 would be far different. If it wasn't someone else.

He wasn't going to be questioned. They had enough information. He's never been asked to take care of Eri, had little opportunity to do so. They weren't going to give him a job.

He had no idea what to do. He didn't want to leave, even if it was irritating. He didn't know if he still wanted to stop the investigation, but he probably had no way to do so at this point. He could do his tests, he could learn things here, he could train the hero students but he wasn't sure if Aizawa was going to keep them after what he said at the dorm. It would be incredibly boring if he didn't.

27 had no job, no owner, and that should make him feel like he doesn't have a purpose, but it doesn't. It just feels odd. Confusing.

Aizawa is confusing. "Can I use your phone to call Hizashi?" He's holding his phone. In his hand.

27 could say no, and he wouldn't get in trouble. He wouldn't be punished. He's never even tried to tell someone no, sure that the punishment for it would be unimaginable. He can't even imagine saying it to Bug, to shake his head at her. He can't even imagine how angry she would be at that.

27 goes to his room to get the phone, and it feels the same as it used to. His mother sold him for 112,000 yen, and Mirio bought this phone for 113,000. And then Mirio gave it to him, like 113,000 yen was nothing. Like it was inconvenient to have if it didn't have a use, and he wanted to get rid of it.

27 doesn't feel like he's like the phone, and it's odd. He's useless, but he's not going to be disposed of. It's weird.

Aizawa takes the phone but braces his elbows on the kitchen counter so that 27 could see what he's doing with it. He gets a message about the missing SIM card when he types in a string of numbers, before he closes that application to pull up LNE. He ignores the messages popping up at the top and types a short message in the chat he has with Yamada before he puts the phone back on the counter, and pours himself another cup of coffee, this time with no ice cube. "My students are as unsure whether they're expelled as I am."

Weird. He's supposed to be the one who would know first, and he already made that decision. He told Midoriya and Ashi that they were going to be expelled, charged for kidnapping, and never going to get a professional license. And 27 would rather that he didn't.

Aizawa sighs, leaning against the counter and letting his head fall back against a cabinet. "It would be annoying to deal with actually expelling them. Principal Nezu would probably want me to either co-teach with Kan or pull together a class from Class C, and I'm not sure which is worse. Probably Kan."

Muttering while drinking coffee. 27 really didn't give him the right sign name.

Aizawa opens his eyes to look at him, but barely opens them. "Did they help?"

They taped him to a couch. They ran their hands all over him while he couldn't fight them. Blasty set off two explosions in his face, and they all did something stupid and unnecessary 'for' him when he repeatedly told them not to. ' Yes. They helped. I like them. '

Aizawa closes his eyes and runs a hand down his face. "They should be expelled. They should be very expelled. The summer camp was bad enough, but it wasn't outright rebellion resulting in property damage."

27 wonders if Aizawa expects him to know what happened at summer camp, or if he just doesn't want to explain what the students did to irritate him then. He'll probably have to ask one of them, probably Blasty. If they did something stupid, he was definitely involved.

Aizawa sighs. "They have a very awful tendency to not ask for help when they need it. They're acting like eggs instead of hatchlings." Eggs actually didn't act like anything. They were just eggs. "At the very least, I need to break them out of that."

Aizawa was going to crack some eggs then. Even if Yamada said he couldn't, since he was so bad at cooking.

Aizawa looks at the hallway before he turns to pour the rest of the coffee into a thermos. "We'll need to leave soon to be at the exam site on time. Are you sure you don't want coffee?"

27 has to wait until he turns back around to answer. ' I don't. ' His throat is sore, but he can ignore it as long as he doesn't talk, and he can't talk to Aizawa. The mask is completely shut, even if he doesn't test it.

He doesn't know why the mask is shut, but it doesn't matter if he doesn't need his quirk.

*

The eggs look confused, and so does All Might. It might not be just because of the face mask.

The best part of the Heroics Exam was that Eri wasn't going to go to it. She and Mirio were still asleep, and Aizawa didn't want to wake them up. That meant that she wouldn't see him wearing a facemask.

The downside was that he had to pick his own face mask, and Aizawa made that more difficult by giving him the rest of them. 27 stared at them, found himself counting before he gave up at 26, and just closed his eyes and picked at random. It just happened to be one that said 'Delete Face.'

Just a coincidence.

Aizawa looked, but didn't react at all to it. Not a single twitch of his eyebrow, not a pull of a frown or narrowing of his eyes. Just looked at him for a little bit longer, before he looked away and started drinking his coffee again.

It's probably not a good idea to drink an entire pot of coffee in less than an hour, especially when it was the dangerous brand that was slightly poisonous, but it doesn't seem to be having an effect on Aizawa.

When he looks at the eggs, he looks even more tired. "Your exam will be a joint training session with Class B at Ground Gamma. The rules will be explained there so I don't have to repeat myself. Do your best to represent what Class A stands for."

The eggs are very confused, but All Might smiles in relief. Provost Piston raises his hand, and he probably shouldn't. "Aizawa-sensei, just to clarify for the sake of Class 1-A, are we going to face expulsion for our-"

"That depends solely on your performance today," Aizawa answers, before his voice drops to a growl. "Do. Your. Best."

The eggs look scared, but it doesn't last long. 27 finds himself walking a bit faster than Aizawa to use him as a shield whenever he hears one of their footsteps pick up and get closer. Luckily, it's effective, and 27 is able to make it to the exam site without a single one of the eggs talking to him. Once they get there, Provost Piston organizes them like a sheep dog does a flock, pacing and nipping at their heels to arrange them in neater rows than Class B forms.

Threatening Quirk Thief waves at him, and 27 doesn't even give him the dignity of a glare in response. He'll deal with him when he can deal with him, and there are too many witnesses and too many people here who would stop him.

Aizawa and White Chocula go over the exam rules, which he already knows. Teams of four decided at random, they seem very well balanced for Class A. Aizawa looks a little relieved to see Hundred Ears picked as the egg that would boil twice, and 27 agrees. He can see that the maze of pipes and dark corners is well suited to Sprout Senses' detection skills.

There's a few large screens set up outside to watch the matches, and the teachers stand on the small stage with the implication that the hero students shouldn't. That they should stay on the ground and either plot or rest, but not approach.

No matter how close 27 stands to Aizawa, several of the eggs are still staring at him, glancing at the stage like they want to cross that boundary. 27 would really rather they didn't.

Aizawa gets his scarf back from All Might, and 27 decides he doesn't like All Might anymore. "I'm glad that young Midoriya wasn't selected for a second match. Recovery Girl would have liked to excuse him from this exercise altogether but-"

"What did the problem child break this time?" Aizawa asks, and 27 would really rather he didn't.

Entirely Perchance glances at him, so he knows what he's doing by answering, but he still does it anyway. "Ah, well, he broke two fingers, but he wasn't aware of it. He said that his body seemed to move on its own to break out of young Shinsou's quirk. The laceration was rather shallow, but it was also healed by Recovery Girl's quirk." 27 knows that Aizawa is looking at him, but he's going to ignore it as long as he can. It seems like a good plan. "But I'm sure that young Midoriya will have enough time to recover before his match, since it's the last one-"

Aizawa starts walking away, but 27 doesn't follow. Complete Possibility asks how he's feeling, and 27 has to force himself to nod before he realizes that's not a response, signing ' Fine ' afterwards. He's staring at the screen instead of Total Mayhap, but he's not paying attention to the match at all.

He should probably take off the mask. He should probably be ready for whatever is going to happen to him after this, when there are no witnesses. His owner wanted to break the eggs, but didn't know that 27 already broke that one. He probably won't have to ask if he's angry.

Midoriya straightens up from leaning on Floaty's shoulder when he notices his owner approach. "Drink this."

"Class A is resorting to doping!" Loud Fang accuses, and his owner tosses a glare over his shoulder at him.

"It's coffee ," his owner corrects, and takes off the lid to hand it to Midoriya, who drinks it and seems to perk up afterwards. Satisfied, and ignoring the questions being pelted at him whether 27 is alright or in trouble or what they have to do to not be expelled, his owner walks back to his original place beside 27. Still not looking at him.

He's angry.

27 hooks a finger around one of the loops around his ear before his owner stops him. "I'm not angry," Aizawa says with a sigh. "The problem child's self-destructive drive is apparently in his subconscious. That's good to know."

He says that like he plans to surgically remove it. Maybe it's fine to break the eggs a little. On accident. If it's informative like that.

Amphibian Fibber's team wins, and Aizawa asks them to explain what they did wrong, while Chocula explains it to his students. The eggs have a good perspective on their faults, and Aizawa doesn't correct them or praise them for that. Sparky keeps waving at him, but 27 is trying to pretend like he isn't here.

It's really hot outside, even if it should be cold. He probably should have asked for some coffee.

The second match is incredibly destructive thanks to the Fungus Girl. Class B wins without a single loss of one of their members, and that worries 27. Aizawa said that he wasn't going to expel them, but then told his students that their performance would determine that. 27 doesn't care for Double Dark, Flashy And Stupid, or Not So Invisible With Mushrooms, but Eri would be upset if Momo was expelled.

Momo recovers from being knocked unconscious quickly enough, but when Black Bird asks to see Recovery Girl for the mushrooms in his lungs, 27 can't help but wince. He might not have had mushrooms in his lungs, but that familiar cough and wheezing wasn't something he wanted for Blackened Overcast.

They decide to take a break, because this couldn't be dragged out long enough. 27 watches the hero students sitting down, some of them even laying down to take a nap, enviously. He tries not to stare enough to invite their attention, but too many are looking at him and then at the stage. Considering when he would rather they didn't.

Chili doesn't seem to understand implications very well. He steps onto the stage with his eyes locked on 27, and a hand in his pocket. 27 steps a bit closer to Aizawa, and convinces himself that's not cowardly. It's using his environment to his advantage.

"I don't want our friendship to suffer from restraining you," Central Divide says, pulling out a package of gummies that have cat paws patterned over the packaging. He's lucky that 27 is too curious whether the gummies are shaped like cat paws too, that's the only reason he takes them.

They are. It's amazing. "Todoroki," Aizawa says, taking a very long time to say anything after that. "Why."

That's not a very good question, but Todo acts like he understands it. He also raises his hand towards 27, fingers left limp. Not trying to touch him, and that's why 27 allows it, but it is odd. "Sensei, do you utilize the purrito technique when you need to restrain an aggressive cat?"

Aizawa stares for a while, before he answers. "I find scruffing to be less stressful. Why do you ask?"

Todo's eyes widen a bit when they look at 27, before his head tilts a bit as though he's trying to look behind him. Aizawa hides his face to the point that his nose is covered in his capture scarf, and looks away.

"Todoroki. Prepare for your match." As soon as Todo steps off the stage, Aizawa takes a very long pull from his thermos, glaring straight ahead when he starts muttering. "Teaching is rewarding."

Chocula covers his mouth to smother his laughter, while Witching Hour throws her arms over Aizawa's shoulders from behind him, grinning. "Oh, isn't it though? Aren't you glad that Mic and I finally wore you down?"

Aizawa takes another, longer drink before he answers that. "I'm retiring."

00:00 gives him a feral grin while she traces her long nails over his chest. "Oh? You're not thrilled about Principal Nezu restarting the Duckling Model?"

Aizawa looks like he really hates ducklings. "I'm retiring immediately."

27 eats one of the gummies and puts the rest in his pocket. It hurts to swallow, but his wince is covered up by the mask. It's nice to be able to hide things like that.

27 finds himself watching Replicate Webbing more than the other eggs in the fight. The others are fighting recklessly and risking getting injured, but he can't afford to with a second match. Though four are knocked unconscious and Excessive Vertebrae is injured, Humanoid Squid is basically unharmed at the end of the 20 minute mark, ending the match in a tactical draw.

Screaming Dracula preens about that, loudly, much to the eggs' dismay. He's been goading them quite a bit over the course of these matches, but with a win, loss, and draw, those taunts are harder to brush off. Especially for Aizawa, who walks forward to address the eggs and give them a bit of psychological punishment.

The damage when he says that Vlad must be a better teacher than him reverberates clearly in each of the eggs. Rattles them. It's an odd way to inspire them to do better, but a mixture of self-preservation, rivalry with Class B, and pride for their organization might propel them to make tactical decisions rather than forceful ones.

The next match could end either very well or very poorly. Blasty has tighter attachments to Tapey and Long Lobes than he does to Sucrose Hurry, and out of all of them, he's the loudest and least willing to compromise. He'll either lead the pack or abandon it, but he leads it. And leads it well.

A total victory in under 5 minutes. The eggs cheer loud enough to shatter themselves, while Class B glares, their class victory now impossible to achieve. Even Aizawa has to offer praise, and after that, everyone else falls over themselves to do it.

He can tell it makes Bakugo uncomfortable. It seems like he only wants to hear those words in his own voice.

Midoriya looks awake for his match. Wide awake. Hopefully Chocula won't realize that he might have been right about the doping scandal.

27 hasn't appreciated listening to Quirk Thief's crowing, nor his waving or stares, but the way he cups his chin again and grins irritates 27 all the more. And when he turns to address Midoriya, 27 starts reconsidering whether there are too many witnesses here. "Perhaps the prideful goons in Class A would like to make this match a bit more interesting. When Class B proves once again that having the intellect necessary to strategize and communicate will cinch the victory, we should get a few spoils of war for it. Your ward, specifically."

27 has been sold. Twice. He's been rented maybe a hundred times. Sometimes he's cheap, sometimes he's not, but 27 has never been cheap enough to be traded over a training match.

Aizawa isn't saying anything, and he knows what that means. He is up for trade. To motivate the damn eggs.

The eggs bristle, and Ashi looks like she'll forget that the match hasn't started yet by the way she's scowling, but Squidly holds her back and argues. "Class B doesn't have anything to offer up."

"We'll give you Monoma," Heavy Handed Leader says, slapping the Quirk Thief's back. "Anything you want to do to him, anything at all is up for grabs. And that's fine, right Monoma? You're going to do well and represent Class B, right?"

Quirk Thief tosses his hair back, grinning so maniacally that 27 thinks someone should tranquilize him. Witching Hour is standing right there, perfectly able to do that. "Of course! Are those terms agreeable to the swine of Class A, or should I repeat them a bit slower for you?"

"You! Are! On!" Ashi agrees, and Octo Man resorts to wrapping an arm around her waist and physically lifting her off the ground to keep her from charging. The rest of them seem just as agreeable to those terms. Midoriya raises a clenched fist and looks at 27 to nod, and 27 doesn't know what the hell he means by that.

When they scurry off to the exam site, Chocula sees an opportunity to goad. "They didn't say which ward-

"Eri is not a part of this deal, or any deal, and if you try anything you will pay for it, Kan," Aizawa snaps, and 27 finds himself agreeing to that at least. Aizawa glances at him and sighs. "I didn't agree to any of that either. If Class B wins, there's no way to enforce it, but if Class A wins-

"LIES! TRICKERY! DECEIT! DON'T LET THEM GET AWAY WITH IT, CLASS B!" Chocula screams into the microphone, and it's incredibly annoying.

Midoriya abandons his team after a few minutes of waiting, and 27 can see that Quirk Thief's team is planning a round-about ambush. Quirk Thief himself is targeting Midoriya, and they exchange words that the screens don't catch before their fight begins. Sensory Overload picks up the ambush, alerting Floaty to the first wave of projectiles thrown at them. Ashi would have been a better choice, but 27 finds himself grateful for it when that first wave doubles back around. Acid would have made that rubble far more dangerous.

Sensory Overload grabs both Floaty and Ashi, and Floaty levitates all three of them to dodge effectively, but they're cornered. They needed Midoriya's offense and mobility to get the time to properly prepare their own attacks since their foes were long-range.

27 looks back at the screen where Midoriya was, feeling the same shock as the other onlookers. Black tendrils were seeping out of his arm first, before his entire body, lashing out at Quirk Thief before it started to pull him towards his teammates' base.

Some of the others wonder if this was a new ability that Midoriya was hiding, but that's impossible. He has strength and speed enhancement, and emitting black tendrils like that isn't related to it at all.

What the hell was in Aizawa's coffee?

Aizawa frowns before he starts running towards the exam site, followed by Entirely Perchance. Midnight notices it, notices that something is wrong, and follows through a different route.

That leaves 27 with Chocula.

That's not okay with 27.

He feels like more people are staring at him than he knows there are at this exam. He feels his nerves singing that he'll get in trouble for this, he'll get punished, he's acting out on his own and he has no reason to follow Aizawa like this. Aizawa will turn around and catch him and something bad will happen. He tried to escape, he broke an egg to do that, he's still wearing an insult around his face and now he's acting on his own without any instruction to do so.

But it's fine. If he's in trouble, he'll know. He'll know if that's what makes Aizawa angry.

When he gets close enough to see the battle, he knows something's wrong. Midoriya is biting back screams through clenched teeth, Floaty is holding onto him to levitate him, and both the eggs and Class B students are hiding behind enlarged pipes and other debris. Aizawa's back is turned to him, but 27 can see his hair standing straight up, not just floating, before Aizawa yells at Floaty to release Midoriya and get to safety.

Aizawa didn't try to cancel Floaty's quirk. He tried to cancel Midoriya's.

And it wasn't working.

27 feels like his head is suddenly too heavy, too hot, too full of something, but he knows what that something is. He knows what he has to do, he has to do it again. Just like Eri's quirk, Midoriya's couldn't be controlled, and it was hurting people. But just like Eri's quirk, 27 could control it.

27 takes a deep breath, even if it hurts his throat, and lets the words come to him, even if he nearly tastes blood when he screams hoarsely. "Are you trying to fight it?!"

"I'm try-" 27 goes limp when Midoriya does, it hurts. He braces his hands on his knees, feels himself shaking but just tries not to fall. If he falls, he might lose concentration, and more than the hot and muggy fog inside his head, more than the searing pain behind his eyes, more than the pain in his throat that feels like he swallowed fire still burning, he needs to say it.

It takes him too long to pull the air into his lungs, deep enough to do it, and his voice comes out so hoarse that syllables become soundless, despite the air hitting his throat that tells him they were said. “De tiva... Deactivate your quirk.”

He hears something fall to the ground, his eyes still closed too tight to see it. He breathes out, it hurts, and he feels like he breathes out too much because he sways, losing control of his body in a pitch black moment. There’s a hand on his shoulder, holding him upright. “Shinsou, release your quirk-”

It doesn’t so much release as swell until it snaps, like the string is trying to fray at the ends and unravel. The pain swells and seems to burst, his vision turning white behind his eyes before it fades, and he feels his arms shaking. But he breathes in through his nose, forcing it down, and with every breath the pain starts to recede until it’s something he can ignore. Midoriya and the others are talking, and it’s probably about what happened to Midoriya’s quirk. It’s probably important.

But Aizawa keeps staring at him, his eyebrows pinched together. He looks so openly worried that 27 can’t stand to look at it. ‘It’s fine.’

27 tries to stand up straight, but relies on the firm pressure of Aizawa’s hand more than he wants Aizawa to know. He feels weak, he has to convince himself that falling flat on his face to block out the light and have something firm beneath him is not a good way to get Aizawa to stop looking at him.

‘I’m fine.’ Aizawa presses the back of his hand against his forehead and 27 is too tired to jump away from the sudden warmth of it. He just lets his eyes fall a bit more closed, pretends that he’s a little less in this situation.

“Does your head hurt?” 27 doesn’t catch himself in time, starts to nod before he shakes and Aizawa catches it too clearly on the back of his hand. “How badly?” It’s hard to tell when it’s this hard to keep his eyes open. “Do you need to see Recovery Girl?”

27 shakes his head. He doesn’t know how to sign something that Aizawa would believe, but he doesn’t want to leave. He doesn’t want to go alone there.

Aizawa frowns, and 27 thinks he’ll make him. That 27 is bothering him just by standing there. That he can’t stand the sight of 27 after seeing him use his quirk on one of his students. “Tell me if you do,” Aizawa says, and waits like he expects 27 to change his answer, before he pulls away his hand to look at the eggs.

The eggs are worried, for Midoriya and for 27. Midoriya is holding out his arm the same way he did before, staring at it like he’s trying to make those tendrils come back again.

27 would really. Really rather he didn’t. Aizawa seems to agree. “The match is postponed until a decision is made whether to continue. Everyone head back to the staging area, except for Toshinori and Midoriya.”

And 27. Maybe Aizawa meant ‘everyone’ to include him, but 27 ignores that implication. If Todo gets to do that, he should too.

“I would like some answers as to what happened here,” Aizawa says, and it doesn’t sound like a request at all. Completely Possible and Midoriya look at each other nervously, before Midoriya starts rubbing his arm.

“I don’t know? I was trying to use Air Force Shoot Style, but then I saw those black things start coming out of my hand where my quirk was building up, and I couldn’t stop them and it was starting to hurt, and..." Midoriya frowns, staring down at the ground. "I really don't know, Sensei. I can't make it happen again either."

"Young Midoriya also had a quirk slip last night, destroying his bed while he was asleep. Perhaps it's related to the stress of Midterms and-"

"Then he needs to see a quirk specialist to sort this out," Aizawa cuts off, horrifying both father and son. "I'm not going to allow an uncontrollable quirk loose in an exam. Even if this is your exam, Toshinori, I'm sure you'll agree with me."

Entirely Perchance doesn't look like he will, but he definitely doesn't want to admit that in front of Aizawa. "I do agree with postponement, but perhaps we should return to the others before any decisions are made."

Aizawa doesn't like that, but he doesn't say anything. Midoriya looks like he wants to say something to 27, but luckily Aizawa walks fast enough that he has an excuse to turn away and ignore that.

It's hard to tell if Aizawa is walking closer to him or if 27 isn't catching himself well enough when he closes his eyes, but it's nice.

It would be nicer if his head didn't both hurt and itch at the same time.

*

Aizawa glares as the only comfort he has left is sealed away in an evidence ziplock that Nemuri keeps on hand for these kind of unfunny jokes. "Recovery Girl has a testing kit for quirk enhancement drugs, but I won't be surprised if she finds something even worse in this stuff."

Kan glares like the results have already come back as a false positive. "We can't allow the exam to end incomplete like this. Eight students are relying on this grade, and All Might hasn't prepared a make-up for this kind of scenario."

Kan is so much more obvious when he's trying to be logical. "Neither I nor Midoriya can control his quirk. It's reckless to proceed under those conditions. The safety of my students is more important than Toshinori's lack of preparation."

No one seems to understand that this was Toshinori's fault. Even if he was the only teacher on staff who hadn't at least taken a course for education, and even if this was his first year, he should know to be prepared for something like this. Someone should have told him.

Nemuri and Kan both look like they want to blame Aizawa for that, as Toshinori's co-teacher, but he honestly didn't expect to explain something that simple. Toshinori was a fully grown adult, and Aizawa had enough trouble with all the children he had to manage.

One of those children was giving him a very good reason to call the entire exam off until he could convince him to drink something. He tried to hand the coffee off to Shinsou, sure that even if it was coffee, both he and Midoriya had drank enough to prove that it was safe. But Shinsou continued to refuse it, first in sign then by shaking his head. ' No, no, no, no. '

His discovery of the word could not have come at a worse time. Short of taking off the kid's face mask and forcing it down his throat, there was no way to get Shinsou to drink something.

That plan shouldn't sound nearly as tempting as it did to Aizawa, but he couldn't ignore how raspy and choked Shinsou sounded when he spoke. He sounded worse than he did in the interrogation room when they first met, and Shinsou hadn't drank anything for nearly three days at that point.

Even his students' grades were becoming less and less meaningful to him as the discussion continued to be dragged out, especially as he watched Shinsou sit down and press his face into the bend of his arm, clearly suffering from a migraine he decided to lie about.

Suffice to say, it was a relief to see that familiar shock of blonde, even if the arm sling was still concerning. "How's the exam coming along for the first year herole..." It was clear to see the exact moment when Hizashi laid eyes on his ward, and Aizawa felt a shiver of dread run down his spine. Hizashi didn't know the half of it.

His husband walked a bit more rigidly, smile too tight and looking more like a grimace as he made a beeline for Aizawa. He should count himself lucky that Hizashi was still in his hero costume, and that it was hard to see his eyes behind the sunglasses from this distance. But the distance was closing very quickly.

"Eraserhead," Hizashi said, too flat and too neutral, his face leaning in a bit too close. "Why does Shinsou look like that?"

The near whisper that his husband was using was louder than his quirk. "He used his quirk to control Midoriya. Successfully. He's refusing to go to Recovery Girl."

And of course, as soon as Hizashi looked at him, Shinsou changed his mind. ' Head pain. Hurts. Help. ' Shinsou looked up with glassy eyes, face a bit too slack before he winced and covered his face again.

Little shit. "It's alright, Shinsou, we are heading right over to Recovery Girl to get you patched up!" Hizashi shot him a scathing glare, and Aizawa knew it would be pointless to argue his side at the moment, or try to ask after his husband's health. He noticed that Hizashi angled his injured arm away from Shinsou when he offered a hand to help him up to his feet. And he noticed that Shinsou stumbled a bit when he stood, in a way that was almost natural.

Manipulative. Little. Shit. And he had Hizashi completely wrapped around his finger.

When Toshinori suggests having Nemuri posted close to the battlefield to act as a referee for the Problem Child's quirk mishaps, again, Aizawa sighs and agrees. He's outnumbered here, and if they wanted to risk the lives of everyone involved, the first being Aizawa's when he would have to test whether the capture scarf could restrain any of those black tendrils, then he would have to let them.

He's willing to accept anything to be able to go home to his husband, in whatever mood or state he happened to be in.

*

27 finds himself picking at the face mask while he hears Yamada grumble to himself, the words indecipherable beyond the occasional 'that man' or 'I swear.' He really didn't mean to do that. He just wanted to leave, and he wanted to leave with Yamada. And he was curious whether he could actually pull it off.

But he had. He made Yamada mad at Aizawa, and he's not sure if he likes it.

When they get closer to Recovery Girl's office, 27 has to tap on Yamada's shoulder because he's walking too quickly for him to keep up. "Oh sh- Shinsou, I am such a scatterbrain right now, I completely- are you okay? I'm walking too fast, aren't I? Jeez, why can't I just--"

‘ It’s fine, ’ 27 signs, a bit unnerved by how quickly those grumbles turned to nervous whining. Yamada seemed a bit off today, and it probably had to do with his injured arm. ‘ Head not bad. Getting better. ’

Yamada smiles at that, but it doesn’t really reach his eyes, and 27 notices the bruising around one of them behind the sunglasses. “That’s good, but we should still get Recovery Girl to look at you. With the...quirk and all, last couple times didn’t end so hot for you,” Yamada insists with a lot of hand-waving. It wasn’t even sign.

Yamada definitely wasn’t okay.

Recovery Girl doesn’t look very okay either. She was laying on one of the cots but sat up as soon as they entered, sighing when she saw Yamada. “Present Mic, you’re usually more responsible than Eraserhead. Don’t start coming to me instead of a doctor.”

“Nope, I just got discharged, oh, 20 minutes ago? Right as rain, but Shinsou here is having a bit of a headache from his quirk and I was wondering if you could do a little check up to make sure everything’s okay,” Yamada says, a bit too fast at times and a bit too slow at others. He was not right as rain.

‘ You’re hurt, ’ 27 signs, ignoring that Yamada tries to brush him off, starting to talk more and more like Existing Amplifier as he keeps repeating that he’s ‘right as rain.’ ‘ Not going to. Unless you do. ’

Yamada’s wincing smile comes out before he starts patting the sling around his shoulder. “It’s alright, Shinsou, I already saw plenty of doctors and I just need some rest, but I’ll be fine!” 27 crosses his arms, unmoving, and that smile starts to fall to become a bit more pinched, his voice rising in pitch with it. “Shinsou, I really would feel a whole lot better if Recovery Girl could take a quick look at you. I know the sling looks bad, but I just got a little banged up-”

‘ Eye, ’ 27 signs, pointing to the right one that was bruised along the side. ‘ C-O-N-C-U-S-S-I-O-N. ’

Yamada winces again, this time raising his hand halfway to touch the ‘bruising’ that was looking more and more suspicious. “Yeah, you’re right, but trust me, I’ve gotten way worse, and the concussion is really mild, nothing to worry about-”

“Present Mic, take a seat right here,” Recovery Girl said, patting the cot. “Shinsou seems concerned, and it would be best to reassure him properly. And quickly, as I have no idea when the next round of injured students will arrive.”

Yamada sighs, sitting on the cot and taking off his sunglasses. It wasn’t just bruising, there were tiny scratches as well disappearing into his hairline, and the white of his eye flaring red from the corner where the damage was. “I got tossed around a little bit, banged up my head, but really it’s fine.”

Recovery Girl tells Yamada to follow a light at the end of her pen, then shines it in his eyes to test how his pupils will react. “Have you taken painkillers for the concussion? And cover that left eye for me before you read this.”

“Yep, following the doctor’s orders, you know me, Chiyo,” Yamada says, before he covers his eye, wincing in pain after he does. “Uh, lot of painkillers actually, I’m just gonna read that last line because I’m a bit too fuzzy on the others. My vision isn’t usually this bad-”

“And the arm?” Recovery Girl asks sternly, and Yamada opens his mouth, grinning like he’s going to say ‘it’s fine’ and it’s ‘right as rain,’ but Recovery Girl doesn’t let him. “Your arm, Present Mic.”

Yamada ducks his head, working the sling off before he starts gently pulling his jacket off to reveal it. “Chiyo, I’ve seen a bunch of doctors, I’m even cleared for patrol tonight, it’s really fine-”

It was not fine. The bandages wound around the join of his arm and chest were holding gauze already soaked with blood. 27 had bandaged Eri enough times to know that they needed to be changed or else they would stick to the skin too much when they were removed. Luckily, Recovery Girl seemed to agree with that, already unwinding the bandages.

“Yeah, I must have rattled it around too much, but I can take care of that while you take a look at-”

“Present Mic,” Chiyo repeats herself, stopping her progress to put her hands on her hips. “You have a ward in your home that shouldn’t see you in this state. Now, I appreciate that you tried to be considerate to the demands I have to meet, but I can’t allow you to be reckless. What caused this injury?”

Yamada pulled a grimace, shaking his head a bit, but Recovery Girl just stared until she wore him down. “I got a little shot? It was a ricochet, it was really nothing-”

“I wouldn’t have discharged you like this,” Recovery Girl muttered, continuing to unravel the bandages. 27 found himself looking away, unwilling to see Yamada’s skin torn like that. It was bad enough to see the blood and know who it belonged to.

“Shinsou, it’s really fine, it looks way worse than it is. I’ve gotten into way worse scraps as a hero, trust me,” Yamada says, begging 27 to believe him, but 27 doesn’t even want to consider that.

27 slips a hand under the collar of his hoodie to feel at the scars, until he finds the circular dip he was looking for. It was on the same side. ‘Shot not fun. Be careful.’

Yamada looks like he wants to jump off the cot for some reason, his face a mixture of seriousness and panic. “Look, Chiyo-”

“Lay down, eat this, I know you don’t want to rest until you get home and even then I doubt you’ll want to, but do not make me call Eraserhead in here to deal with you,” Recovery Girl says, handing Yamada a granola bar and two different colored pieces of candy. “Now, let’s have you take a seat right here.”

27 sits down on her stool, and once he does he can’t force himself to sit upright, bracing his arms on his legs. Recovery Girl puts that clip around his finger while she makes him look at the penlight, and 27 grimaces and blinks through the first one before she lets him give up.

“Shinsou, when is the last time you’ve eaten?” Recovery Girl asks, so nicely that it almost has a brittle edge to it.

27 squints, trying to remember. ‘W-A-F-F-L-E-S. Yesterday.’

Recovery Girl looks at Yamada, who looks like he just wants to hand over the half-eaten granola bar instead of answering, shrinking in on himself before he does. “Shinsou said breakfast yesterday. Look, I really should have kept a better eye on Shouta-”

“This. This,” Recovery Girl says sharply, handing 27 another granola bar and three different colored candies. “You need to drink all of this, before you take this painkiller, and once Present Mic takes you home you need to eat a nutritionally sound meal and go right to sleep.”

27 tests the seal on the water bottle, before he squeezes it. He knows that he should check for any warping in the clear plastic, where it could have been injected with something and then burned to cover up the hole, but Recovery Girl won't stop staring at him with that pinched scowl. He lifts up the face mask to take a drink, but when it hits the back of his throat the pain flares so badly that he can't help but cover his mouth, wincing.

“You haven't drank anything yet? Since....” Yamada trails off, but 27 nods, forcing himself to drink more of the water to chase away the worry on Yamada's face. “Okay, that's okay. We should have a few water bottles like that, and I can run to the store to get more-”

“I'll send you home with some, dear,” Recovery Girl promises, already pulling more from the mini fridge by her desk. Once she has eight of them in a bag, she walks back to 27 and asks to see his throat. 27 has to pull the mask under his chin, but after staring inside his mouth with her pen light, she feels at the bottom of his jaw close to his throat, humming to herself. “You have a slight fever and the back of your throat is irritated, but your lymph nodes feel fine. Do take care to wear that face mask and use hand sanitizer, I've already seen a few colds and flu cases.”

She hands him more candies, and when 27 starts eating the granola bar, he needs another bottle of water to keep his throat from hurting. Recovery Girl kisses Yamada's shoulder once 27 is finished, telling them both to rest, and 27 has to argue with himself to not just slump forward and rest like that. Either the candies were drugged to make him want to sleep or the granola was, but the leather jacket on Yamada's back looks too tempting to let his head fall into.

When they do get back to the dorm, it's all 27 can do to keep his eyes just open enough to see Yamada's feet in front of him, but when Yamada opens the door he hears too many voices inside.

“Yama! Twenny!” Eri calls, running out from the kitchen to greet them both. 27 sees Mirio wearing an apron, waving at him, and 27 wishes he were anywhere else. Especially with Tamaki and Neji sitting at the table, laying on their arms and either falling asleep or already asleep. “We made lunch together 'cause everyone else had a really hard day, and I got to stir the soup the whole time so it would really stick to the rice!”

“Eri did a really great job helping me cook,” Mirio says, and 27 busies himself with considering whether to crouch to Eri's level to pick her up when he wasn't sure if he could stand up again. “We have some scorched rice porridge, tofu and veggie stirfry, and some hamburger steaks. We were just about to make some smores for dessert too! Sorry about inviting Neji and Tama-”

“Mirio,” Yamada says, his voice wavering like he's about to cry. “I really, truly, honestly appreciate you. More than anything. You are a lifesaver and I don't deserve you.”

Eri takes his hand and pulls him to the table, and he hates that she puts him in the chair where his back is facing Mirio, even if he doesn't have to look at him. He can see Neji and Tamaki are in fact asleep, a bit of drool escaping the corners of their mouths, and Neji still has a spoon in hers. He can also hear Yamada hugging Mirio while he tries not to cry, lavishing Mirio with praises that he keeps trying to brush off. “Really, it's nothing! I just figured that the last thing you'd want to do after the mission is cook, so I-”

Yamada sobs, and it sounds like Mirio starts patting his back while he shifts from rejecting his praises to trying to soothe him with shushing sounds. Eri leans against 27's leg, staring at them confused. “Yamada had a rough day. It's fine,” 27 says, trying to make sure Eri wasn't worried, but she hears the slight rasp in his voice and frowns.

“Twenny, you’re sick!” Eri says, eyebrows pinching together and 27 ignores the complaint in his arms to pull her into his lap.

“No, I’m not sick, I just haven’t drank anything for too long. I’m really fine,” 27 says, letting Eri press her fingers against his neck, but when he feels her fingers brush against the face mask he freezes.

He forgot to take it off.

He rips the mask off, fingers still shaking, how could he be so stupid? It was bad enough that he sounded sick, but now he’s covered his mouth, he’s reminded her of what he used to look like with the mask, she’s going to have nightmares for weeks thanks to him and his stupid idea and his selfishness-

“Twenny, you gotta wear it if you’re sick!” Eri whines, pulling at the face mask still held tight in his fist. “But you should wear the cuter ones that have little cat faces on them. Shoji should wear cute cat face masks too! You should share with him!”

27 just stares, still unwilling to breathe, to startle this. He’s pretty sure she’s lying, she’s covering up how badly she’s worried now, how badly this affects her.

But she just looks at him, just pouting because she wants him to do what she tells him to, and her legs swing but don’t kick. She’s not bothered at all.

“You like Shoji,” 27 asks without asking, too tired to try to monitor himself. Too numb all over to feel it. “It’s fine that he wears a mask.”

Eri nods, each of her feet kick once in turn, like she doesn’t know why she has to explain it. “Shoji didn’t like me at first, but I think he does now. And his mask looks really comfy, but I think it should be cuter. It’s kinda boring.”

Yamada smiles and ruffles Eri’s hair when he sets down a plate of food in front of 27. “Ugh, my kids are amazing.”

Mirio comes around the other side to set down a water bottle, trying to catch 27’s eye. “Feeling better?”

He doesn’t, really. He doesn’t think he ever can feel anything more than this sickening dread in front of Mirio, hearing those words that he said to him when he tried to escape. Seeing the way that Mirio looked so sad and hurt, and seeing it twist to look even worse the more he thinks about it.

But 27 nods, and Mirio smiles like he actually means it. “That’s good. I’m really, really glad, Shinsou,” Mirio says, patting his shoulder before he turns away.

27 stares at the food long enough for Eri to offer to feed him, and 27 forces himself to pick up the chopsticks just to keep her from doing that. He manages to eat a few bites of the hamburger steak and stir fry before he switches to a spoon to eat the porridge, exhaustion seeping in too deeply for him to do something as demanding as balancing his food on a utensil.

27 doesn’t even realize that Yamada sits down to eat too until Eri jumps down to make smores with Mirio. Once 27 sees Yamada smile at him, the bruising faded a little bit around his eye and the red irritation faded too, he can’t help it anymore.

27 lays his head on the table, listening to Eri’s voice for a few seconds before he falls asleep.

*

Aizawa opens the door slowly, half hoping that he can sneak into his own home and curl up inside a sleeping bag in a closet. He knows Hizashi will want to talk, that he will want to talk very loudly and very angrily about the state Shinsou was in, and even longer if he knows anything else that happened last night.

He knows he should talk to Hizashi. He wants to know the details of his injuries, even if he trusts that Hizashi took care of them. He knows that he needs to check on Shinsou, on Eri, he has a mountain of essays that he still hasn't graded.

But he. Is also. Tired.

So when he opens the door to see Eri and Mirio feeding the goldfish and not a single sign of Hizashi, he feels relieved enough to nearly collapse and fall asleep right in his doorway. But Eri notices him, and the sound of her excitedly calling his name gives him the strength to open his eyes and crouch down to meet her.

"Zawa! Me and Mirio made lunch 'cause everyone had a really hard day. Yama and Twenny had such a hard day that they fell asleep, and Twenny fell asleep right at the table!" Eri says, more impressed by Shinsou than concerned.

"I'm glad. Shinsou could use the rest," Aizawa says, running a hand over Eri's hair while he tries to convince himself not to fall forward and sleep on the floor.

"You look like you could use it too, Aizawa-sensei," Mirio says, and if Aizawa had the strength to be irritated that his own student would see him like this, he would be. "I'm fine with watching Eri if you wanted to take a nap. It looks like the first years' Midterms were a killer."

It was honestly one of the more relaxing parts of his week. Aizawa nods, dragging himself to his bedroom on instinct before he realizes that Hizashi is in there, before he reasons with himself. Hizashi is probably exhausted too, he might be so deeply asleep that Aizawa can check his injuries without waking him, to finally put to rest that still present and irrational worry that he was injured more than Aizawa knew. He knows Hizashi worries more when Aizawa is injured, and he knows that he probably gives Hizashi plenty of reasons to be. But Aizawa won't truly find rest until he knows that Hizashi is safe, and healing well.

He looks at his husband, his limbs splayed chaotically over the bed like he wants to keep it all to himself, but that only makes it easier to check. His eye looks better, the bruises fading, but when he picks at the T-shirt to look at what must be his injured shoulder, the back of a hand swats at his arm.

He looks up to see Hizashi blinking at him blearily, and it's hard to tell if he's angry or just freshly woken. "R'covery Girl... Gonna be fine, Shou," Hizashi mumbles, before he opens his arms in an invitation Aizawa can't refuse, even if he takes a moment to slip out of his scarf and shoes to do so.

Aizawa settles against Hizashi's chest with a sigh, his hair falling into his face and his eyes falling shut for good, but he can't bring himself to care. "Shinsou ate... and slept."

"Mhm," Hizashi grunts, his hand falling heavy on Aizawa's chest. "Wasn't for you?"

"No," Aizawa answers. "Manipulative."

Hizashi offers a reassuring huff, almost a laugh. "I know."

“Tried to run away last night. Thought I was going to kill him. Used his quirk twice,” Aizawa says, fighting the heaviness in his limbs to give his report. “They’ll want to test it-”

“Shh,” Hizashi shushes, pulling his head a little closer to Aizawa’s. “We’ll talk about it.”

Not right now.

It's Different

Chapter Summary

27 doesn't want to go to the 1-A dorm shift tonight, but his feelings on the matter change after a drastic event. Aizawa finally gets to deal with his class for their 'rebellious' actions. A nice family brunch turns disastrous.

Chapter Notes

A bonus chapter in celebration of Chapter 29 of The Last Resort being posted!

Trigger Warning: Nightmares, 50 mention, Bug scars theorized about in graphic terms, graphic vomiting

Previously on Wards of UA: After the interrogation, Shinsou had 4 repeated nightmares before he attempted to use Midoriya to run away from UA. Shinsou was captured during that escape by Midnight, who was later locked out of the dorm along with Mirio and Eri when Class 1-A started their 'rebellion.' Shinsou has been referring to Class 1-A as 'eggs' after Aizawa compared them to eggs. Shinsou went through sensory deprivation conditioning at The Miasma to be trained to answer to '27.' Class 1-A knows that Shinsou was convinced that Aizawa would kill him and the students after the events of Shinsou's attempted escape. Shinsou would hide his lost teeth in his room when he was at The Miasma. Yamada told Aoyama to avoid using French around Shinsou, because Shinsou reacted poorly to learning his mother taught him some French. Midoriya and Ashido tried to get Shinsou to drink something after he tried to escape, and he refused because he said he knew it would be poisoned. Midoriya and the other 1-A students know that Shinsou usually only answers questions to trade for information. During the escape, Shinsou brainwashed Midoriya and almost took control over Bakugo before it 'snapped.' Shinsou thinks that Monoma's attempt to be friendly and give him a pain relief kit was threatening. After Bakugo taught Eri how to say 'Fuck,' Shinsou used a pressure point in his shoulder to hurt him. Kan and Aizawa have a running bet that whoever's class wins the Joint Training Exam gets to boss the other around for a day. Monoma traded his day in a similar manner depending on the outcome of his match, in a bid to try to get Shinsou to spend time with him instead of with Class 1-A. Yamada told Monoma that Shinsou might appreciate spending time with someone else who was fluent in JSL. Aizawa has 'tested' Shinsou's drinks before after learning that the poison that Shinsou fears would take effect in 10 minutes. Shinsou and Eri ate oatmeal every day that Eri wouldn't be taken to be experimented on. Bakugo told Aizawa that the one thing that Shinsou doesn't like to eat is oatmeal. Shinsou has a system of clapping to allow someone into his room, since he can't verbally give permission. When Aizawa collected Shinsou from being 'kidnapped' by 1-A, Ashido asked him where Shinsou's mom was.

27 wakes up feeling too hot, a humid fog enveloping him, and pressure on his stomach and face. Then he hears her humming, and despite the sweat gathering on the back of his neck and under his arms, the warmth feels too nice to disturb it with anything more than a smile.

He feels Eri's hand pull at his cheek, and she stops humming. "Twenny, you're s'posed to be sleeping!" 27 opens one eye, just enough to see Eri laying next to him, her white hair loose and messy across his bed and her eyes too wide and curious. She pinches at his cheek, probably interested to see how the scar there moves.

"M' 'wake," 27 says, and tries to mean it. He could drift and drowse, probably fall back asleep if she let him, but he doesn't want to. "You 'member the song."

Eri nods, poking under his eye now at the deep bruising there, always present even if he does sleep. "So you won't have bad dreams."

27 pulls his arm around her, hates that he couldn't keep that to himself. It was bizarre. He had been so exhausted last night, he wanted so badly to sleep next to Eri thinking that it might be the last time that he could, but he couldn't put it out of his head. That woman's quirk that forced him to talk left things he couldn't escape, like the cold and darkness of The Miasma. The nothingness when he was inside Chisaki, how her quirk felt exactly like it did when Chisaki tried to use his voice and his quirk.

The worst part was waking up Eri. Worrying her. By the time Midoriya arrived, he was sure that Mirio was going to have Midoriya kill 27 just because he was bothering her so much. And he felt like he deserved it at that point.

He couldn't even tell her goodbye properly, but he's glad that he didn't have to. "That song has words," 27 says, one of so many different things that he's never told her, that he has a chance to. "I just never got to say them."

Eri rolls over onto her side to fully face him, pulling her knees to his chest and pulling away the foot that had been pressing against his stomach. "I wanna hear it!" Her wide red eyes are so bright, and he smiles thinking that even these little things can be so exciting for her.

He remembers the words to that song, to so many that he made up or changed. Words that were kept inside his head, his mask locked at night when she would have those bad dreams, when he could only hold her and hum. He doesn't think half of those words fit anymore, so he changes them. "Er-i is a prin-cess, and she has a sil-ver crys-tal. A. Sil. Ver crystal. A. Sil. Ver crystal. A. Sil. Ver crystal, and she can save the pla-net."

Eri's eyes go even wider, and he feels like he's lying to her by changing the words now. "That's like Sailor Moon! Sailor Moon has the silver crystal to save everyone! Did you know Sailor Moon back then?"

27 nods, and that's another lie. The words used to be that Eri was crying, but she will smile tomorrow, but she doesn't need to know that. She doesn't need to remember when she used to cry, because tomorrow already came for her. She already smiles. "I watched a lot of it."

He probably didn't. He watched enough of Kawaii Kawaii Pussycats to remember it, enough that he had a lunchbox from that show, according to that news article about his fake kidnapping. He probably would have hated Sailor Moon because he would have thought the Kawaii Kawaii

Pussycats were better, and he couldn't have liked both because they both wore schoolgirl uniforms.

But Eri doesn't need to know that.

"Twenny," Eri says, pulling at his cheek when his eyes fall closed again. "Are you sleepy?"

He forces his eyes open again. He is, but she clearly doesn't want him to be. "Nope. Just comfortable."

Too comfortable. When the door opens he can only half-pull away the arm thrown over Eri, and can barely lift his head to see who it is. And when he sees that it's Mirio, he almost tries to pretend that he's still asleep. "There you are! I was wondering why it was taking so long to check on Shinsou," Mirio says, winking at Eri but she probably doesn't realize that he's trying to scold her, because he does it so gently.

"Cause Twenny's awake now, and he's comfy," Eri explains, and Mirio smiles like he's trying not to laugh.

"That's good, I'm glad you finally got some sleep, Shinsou," Mirio says, and 27 stares at his shoulder so that he can still see that smile, even if he can't look at it fully. "Aizawa-sensei and Yamada are awake now, so I guess I'll see you guys on Monday!"

"Okay! Bye Mirio!" Eri says, waving at him. "Twenny says bye too!" She picks up his hand and waves it for him, and he lets her. Even if he has to close his eyes.

When Mirio leaves, 27 turns his face to press it against the pillow, forgetting himself for a moment that Eri catches.

"Twenny, what's wrong?" Eri asks, her fingers wrapping around his, holding too tightly. He looks up and sees the worry on her face, and he knows he can't lie to her. But he can half-lie.

"Nothing, I just.... I said some really weird stuff to Mirio... and he probably thinks I'm stupid now," 27 says, knowing that wasn't even the half of it. Mirio probably did think he was stupid to think he had been bought by Aizawa, that he was going to be killed, but more than that Mirio was probably disturbed by 27. Disturbed by what he said, disturbed by what he threatened to do. Disturbed by his quirk now that he's finally seen it.

Heroic. Mirio thought his quirk was heroic, but he probably doesn't think that anymore. Not if he believed that 27 could have killed Midoriya by forcing him to activate Full Cowl at 100%, which 27 couldn't. Once it started to hurt Midoriya, the control would have been broken, but he hoped just the threat and the fact that Midoriya was All Might's son might have helped him escape.

But he didn't escape, and he wanted to stay here. But that meant dealing with Mirio, dealing with everyone who had seen 27 like that. And he wished that he didn't have to.

"Mirio doesn't think you're stupid!" Eri argues, before she starts playing with his hand. "I say weird stuff to Mirio a lot, and he never acts like it's weird. Maybe if you feel bad, you should draw him a picture so he can tell you that you did a good job, and you can forget about the weird stuff."

27 hums, wishing it was that easy. That he could be a little more like Eri, and be forgiven like that. "Maybe."

27 closes his eyes, finding them still too heavy. Finding himself still too comfortable. It would be nice to just stay here, but he can't.

If he's here at UA, it means he still has to do things he doesn't want to, like going to the 1-A dorm with Aizawa. Going back to the Safe Room, and trying to pretend that everything that happened last night didn't.

But he gets to be here with Eri, with Yamada and with Aizawa, and maybe that makes it worth it.

*

His wards are planning something.

Aizawa notices when Shinsou seems to trail behind a bit more, whispering to Eri, and Eri whispers back a bit too loudly. He's only heard snatches of their conversation, enough to know that it doesn't involve him. If Shinsou did try to use Eri in a scheme against him, Aizawa knows he wouldn't fare well against it, even with prior knowledge.

Eri also has a plan of her own, and Aizawa might have helped in the loosest definition of the word, but he hopes that it works. The duffel bag he cleared out for her purposes is slung on his back, and he wonders if that will increase his students' worries before the long deserved stick drops on all of their heads.

When he walks into the common room, he's pleased to see that all of his students have been gathered, and that they seem to know what is coming. He also sees that they're still eying Shinsou too intently, and Aizawa knows that he'll need to talk fast to get their attention before they try to get Shinsou's.

But apparently, this was part of his wards' scheming.

He hears Eri trying to cry, 'trying' being the operative word. She's sniffing, but Aizawa knows that she tends to hold her breath first when she's upset. "Eri, it's okay," Shinsou mutters softly, picking her up and making sure to let Eri bury her face in his shoulder. He smooths a hand over her back to hide the fact that her shoulders aren't shaking like they would if Eri were actually crying, before he looks up at the students with a pinched and worried expression. "I'm sorry."

Eri whines, a bit too loud, before she offers a weak hand to wave at the students. "I-I'm gonna miss you guys! Zawa, please -"

On cue, Shinsou turns and enters the stairwell, as though he wanted to shield Eri from a horrible sight soon to befall his students.

Aizawa has kept his mouth completely hidden by the capture scarf, sure that he would betray a laugh if he didn't. His students were fearful before, but now they're horrified, and Aizawa can't say that the discipline he worked so hard on will ever live up to what Shinsou has done to them. "Out of all the performances that I saw today, one stands out as the most deserving of praise."

He lets Bakugo preen for a few seconds before he continues.

"Tsunotori from Class B," Aizawa says, and more than in this certain scenario, he means that. Too many heroes were willing to die, willing to push themselves beyond the beyond and into an early grave. "Tsunotori recognized that the situation she was in was too risky to pursue alone, and that she was ill-equipped to fight Shoji on her own. Instead of taking that risk she reduced the risks that she could manage. In a real world exercise, she would have been protecting civilians while waiting for reinforcements to arrive, or heroes who were better equipped to fight the villain she encountered."

And he doubts that a single one of his students saw that action as anything other than cowardly.

“This is clearly a lesson that Vlad teaches better than I can,” Aizawa says with a sigh, closing his eyes for effect, and when he opens them he thinks that his students couldn’t look more crushed. But he’s going to have to crush them a bit more. “But, I’m going to have to try harder, and to do that, I’m requiring a list of 1000 scenarios in which you would need to wait and call for someone else to help you with that situation. That list is due by sunrise.”

He hears several loud protests, and he understands why. They did do well in their Heroics Midterm, and they are likely still exhausted from that.

But they should also be expelled, and as such have no right to complain. “If you have justifiable reasons not to complete that assignment, let me know now and I can finish filing your expulsion form.” Dead silence met his ears. “On top of that, you will be responsible for returning your dorm to the same condition it was in before you moved in, and that includes the sidewalk damage. The supplies necessary are outside the back door, and all of the repairs will have to be up to code by sunrise. Yaoyorozu will be expelled if her quirk is utilized.”

“Sensei, that’s child labor!” Kaminari protests, and even if it is, they have only one recourse. One that apparently, Aizawa needs to remind them of.

“All of you were complicit in kidnapping a ward, and damaging UA property to do that,” Aizawa reminds, and if they thought that their pure and utterly misguided intentions were enough to be forgiven for that, they were sorely mistaken. “None of you were equipped to deal with the situation you meddled in, and instead of calling for help, you locked out Midnight, a hero who specializes in that situation and who already had it under control.”

Bakugo seethes, the only one of his students who doesn’t look stricken by that. “She knocked him out and left, like a real fuckin’ pro-”

“To call Present Mic,” Aizawa interrupts. “Because the difference between you hatchlings and a fully fledged hero is knowing when someone else is better suited to the situation. Lives can be saved or lost because of that difference in mindset.”

Aizawa knows that the events of last night could have turned far more disastrous if his students hadn’t restrained Shinsou, despite whatever reason they had to do so. Shinsou was armed, dangerous, and desperate, and he didn’t doubt that he could have also been in an altered state of mind at the time due to how he perceived his situation.

“Your phones will also be confiscated until each of you either complete your tasks, or the sun rises on your failures to do so. UA has no right to withhold property from expelled students,” Aizawa says, opening a bag that had been in his pocket to collect all of his students’ phones.

It was honestly a bit disturbing to watch some of them shed tears over that, more so than the other punishments laid out and the risk of expulsion still looming over their heads.

*

27 stares as Aizawa and Eri go through the contents of that duffel bag. While 27 had been curious why Aizawa would want to take all of his hero costumes and goggles to the dorm, he didn’t comment on it, but that wasn’t what he did.

Eri struggles to pull out the Gengar, too large for her to even wrap her arms around half of it, and he pulls it out for her, even though he’s still confused why she brought it.

He’s confused why she brought a lot of this stuff.

There's a hot plate that Aizawa is setting up by his desk, with a cat face mug sitting beside it. There's also two thermoses full of some liquid, a bottle of honey, five of Eri's books and an English book that he hasn't even started reading from his bookshelf. There's also two of Eri's giant unicorn plushies, and Aizawa's sleeping bag. And after Aizawa plugs in the hot plate, he pulls out a pen and notebook.

"Eri said that you were having nightmares last night," Aizawa says, before he hands the pen and notebook to 27. "There's several methods of dealing with nightmares, and we can try all of them if it's necessary."

Eri nods her head, struggling to crawl along the cot to drag the Gengar to the top where she wants it to be. "Zawa is the best at making nightmares go away! He's even better at it than Mirio!"

That might be because Aizawa can look like a nightmare himself, but he doesn't look that way now. The scarf is hanging on the doorknob, his hair is pulled back in a bun, and he changed out of his hero costume as soon as he returned from cracking the eggs. He's wearing that same black shirt that looks too soft for him to wear, and sweatpants. Either he permanently cracked the eggs or he doesn't think he'll have to deal with them again tonight.

27 stares at the notebook, wondering how it's supposed to help, before he puts it down to help Eri arrange everything the way she wants it to be. The Gengar goes on top of their pillows, the unicorns stand guard on either side, and the sleeping bag is unzipped to lay at the foot of the bed in case it's necessary.

27 doesn't think it will be, though. He's still so unbearably tired, almost angry that he had to get up and walk to the 1-A dorm instead of sleeping in his own bed uninterrupted. Even if this is the same room that Chisaki haunted so thoroughly last night, it feels different. Even if the only difference is Aizawa being there, like he usually is. Like he's supposed to be. Even when 27 still thought that Aizawa was his owner, it was easier to relax with him there because he was supposed to be there.

Eri seems to want to put him to sleep immediately, despite how often she woke him up when they were in his room. She tells him to get comfortable, to put on the sleepwear that she picked out for him. He does, he brushes his teeth and changes into the soft pants and softer shirt, and finds it easier to ignore the short sleeves if he wears the face mask with cat whiskers that she picked for him.

She has a sleeping mask to go over his eyes too, bright pink with cat eyes drawn over it in black, but he doesn't want it for too many reasons. He doesn't want to sleep yet, and he doesn't.

He doesn't want her to know that he's scared of the dark.

It's embarrassing. Eri can sleep in the dark, and even though she has plenty of nightlights here, she doesn't need them. When the lightbulb burnt out in the bathroom at the 8 Precepts, she could sleep just fine. It was 27 who had to try to wheedle Rikiya or even beg Hari to get another one that he could change out. It was 27 who couldn't sleep in a pitch black room like that, who couldn't shed the terror creeping under his skin that wouldn't be pried out no matter what he tried.

He likes that it's easy to hide that here. Maybe Aizawa and Yamada think that Eri's scared of the dark, because there's always nightlights turned on in the hallway, the string lights in his room and above Eri's bed are always on. The computer screens that show what the hero students are doing provides enough light, even if it's too bright sometimes.

There's always light here. It's never really cold. It should be easier to forget about all the things that UA isn't, but it's not. Especially when he sleeps and can't see it.

But Eri curls up next to him, warm and soft by his side, and he can't overlook how soft the cot has become with her efforts. He practically sinks into the Gengar behind him, the unicorn plushie under his arm is perfect to rest it on, and if he has another odd spell of feeling so cold that he can practically feel his blood freezing, the sleeping bag looks warm enough to fight it off.

He's comfortable, almost too comfortable to waste it on sleeping. Eri wants to catch more Pokemon anyway, so they do.

27 finds himself glancing at the monitors to watch the eggs organize their punishments. Half of them scurry around to replace the still broken door or lay cement to repair the sidewalk, the other half are in the common room agonizing over their notebooks. Aizawa didn't tell him what their punishment was exactly, but it looks like it's both physically and mentally demanding.

27 wonders what he would have to do to get punished like that. It's odd that he hasn't been punished for trying to escape, for using his quirk on Midoriya. Twice. Aizawa wasn't even angry about that, and he still doesn't know what really makes Aizawa angry.

He wonders if the eggs will be angry at him, but he can't ask them now. Their phones are in a bag, and he doesn't want to leave to talk to them. Eri doesn't seem like she wants to do that either, and he doesn't know why. Even when they run out of monsters to catch, even when it seems like she doesn't have anything to do and she doesn't seem that tired yet, so she rests her head on his shoulder and watches the screens too.

But she must have been more tired than she seemed at first, because she doesn't even last through a full hour of Yamada's radio show before she's fast asleep.

*

Twenny's taking too long to come back from his outside trip. Eri tries not to get scared, but the room seems way darker than it's supposed to be. Whenever she looks at a really dark spot, the shadows start moving and it gets really scary, so she tries not to look at it. She tries to just hold her legs, to be good and not be scared, but it's getting even scarier.

It's so scary that even when He comes in the room, the shadows are scarier than He is. "The heroes left you here. They all left you here with me," He says, and the shadows get dark and start moving around like they're going to hurt her.

Eri's still really scared, but she gets scared enough to run. She knows He's lying, she knows that the heroes are coming to save her, and Twenny is coming back too. She knows he is, she knows it.

The shadows are chasing her, and she knows they're going to hurt her really bad if they catch her, and she tries to run faster but she keeps running slower instead, no matter how hard she tries. She runs and runs and runs until she sees a window in the wall low enough for her to look in, and she stops because it has a light that makes everything look orange and warm.

Twenny's inside that room, with Yama and Zawa and Mirio and all the other heroes. They're laughing and smiling, like they don't even know that Eri is getting chased outside. They don't even care.

She knows they don't care when Twenny looks at her, and his face gets mean. He looks at her like he hates her, he really hates her, and then everyone else is looking at her like that too. Eri feels more scared of that than the shadows that were chasing her, and she tries to knock on the window but her hands won't touch the window, even when she tries. "Zawa! Twenny!"

His hands are really big, and really loud when He claps them close to her ear. "Talk properly," He says, and she doesn't have to look to know that the shadows are all around her now, even if she's trying to make Twenny and the heroes not hate her. "Talk properly. Talk properly. Talk properly, talk properly, talk properly."

He keeps saying that, over and over until his voice gets scary, it gets so loud and his clapping starts to hurt. Twenny just keeps staring at her with his face getting even meaner, like he hates her more and more and more and -

"-ri, it's just a bad dream, it's just a bad dream," Twenny holds her really close, and his hands feel really big and warm on her shoulders, but Eri can't stop breathing so loud, and making whiny sounds that kind of help the scary feeling come out of her better.

But she doesn't want to sound like that, she doesn't want to make Zawa and Twenny look like that, she doesn't want them to go away and leave her again. "Don't leave! Don't leave, please don't leave!"

"Eri, I'm not," Twenny's face gets really sad and his voice gets really sad too. "I'm not going to leave. I'm sorry, I'm not. I'm here. I'm not leaving."

Zawa sits on the bed and puts his hand on Eri's head, and his thumb makes little circles that feel kind of nice. Eri tries the circle breathing trick that Twenny showed her, and it's kind of hard to do when the circles are that small, but Zawa and Twenny being close and helping her helps her a lot.

When Eri feels like the scary feeling is gone, she doesn't really want Zawa and Twenny to stop being so close to her, even if she knows that's bad and selfish. Zawa knows the scary feeling is gone though, because he puts a hand on her shoulder. "Do you want to talk about it?" Zawa asks, and Eri nods because even if she doesn't want to, she knows it'll make her feel better.

"Twenny didn't come back and no one liked me anymore, and He was telling me to talk right, and Twenny really really hated me-e," Eri says, and she has to hold her breath so she doesn't cry because just talking about it makes her feel even sadder than she was in the dream.

"I don't hate you, Eri," Twenny says really quiet, and she looks up to see his cute mask is gone. "I'm sorry you had that dream, but it's not real. We're at UA, and I'm not going to leave. I'm sorry."

Eri frowns, because Twenny seems really sad, but it's not his fault. "It was just a bad dream," Eri says, because saying it helps her remember. And because Twenny seems even more sad about Eri's dream than Eri is now.

"And we're very prepared for bad dreams," Zawa says, giving her a really nice smile. "Do you want tea or milk?"

Eri picks at Twenny's shirt because she's not really sure she should have those. She wanted to have them in case Twenny had bad dreams again. But maybe it's okay, because Twenny might like the tea better because he's bigger, and big people like Yama and Twenny actually like tea. And Zawa makes the best milk in the whole world, even better than Mirio. "Milk please."

Zawa smiles, and he sets Eri's books down in front of her before he starts making it. Even Twenny smiles when he pulls the books closer and lets her look at them to pick one. "You have a lot of options."

Eri doesn't really know which one to pick. She really likes when Zawa reads the book about the alley cat, because he makes all the cat noises really good, and he always sounds just like a cat. But she really likes when Twenny reads the one about the color clown, because he makes the ‘splishes’ sound really splishy.

And Eri really, really, really wants to pick a book that Twenny and Zawa can both read to her, because she thinks that if they did, she would never ever ever have a bad dream ever again.

Zawa hands her the milk, and it’s really warm and really sweet. Her hands feel warm holding the big cup, and just drinking a little makes her feel really sleepy and safe. “Zawa, can you and Twenny read me this one?”

Eri almost spills her milk, but it only sloshes when she moves the cup to point at it. Zawa picks it up and starts reading it to make sure he knows the words, but Twenny frowns. “You have a lot of other books. We could read a new one.”

“I don’t think I’ve read this one,” Zawa says, but he puts it down to say something with his hands that Eri doesn’t know, but it makes Twenny nod after a while.

Twenny makes sure Eri is all tucked in and warm, and that the big purple Grenny is nice and fluffy under her. Zawa moves her unicorn to sit on her legs so he doesn’t squish it, before he sits next to her on the bed, and holds the book out for Eri and Twenny to see it.

And just having Twenny and Zawa close to her at the same time makes Eri feel so warm and safe that she doesn’t think she can ever have a bad dream ever again, and she can’t help but smile about that and wiggle down so she’s super warm under the blanket.

Zawa gets to be the narrator person, and he reads really slow and soft until the saggy elephant kicks over a bush or shakes the jungle, because then he’s really surprised that the saggy elephant does that. Twenny gets to be the mean parrot, and he makes his voice really high and crackly, and makes his laugh really mean. It’s Eri’s job to make an elephant sound whenever the saggy elephant sighs, and elephant sounds are exactly like yawns, and they always make Eri feel a little more tired.

Zawa makes the saggy elephant sound really sad when he talks about how he tries to look less saggy, and really scared when the tiger and crocodile want to eat him. Twenny always makes the lion sound really whiny when he talks about how he’s still hungry after eating all those other animals, and how he wants to eat the saggy elephant. But when all the other elephants come to save the saggy one, Eri has to yawn a whole bunch, and it even makes Zawa yawn too to help her.

The saggy elephant is really silly, because he doesn’t know he looks just like all the other elephants, but he looks so happy dancing with them with their one-two-three kicks that Eri can’t pick out which one he is.

Eri’s really tired after making all those yawns, and really warm with Twenny and Zawa cuddled close to her. She can’t even take another drink of milk, even though she still has a lot, because she’s so comfy, and she really wishes she could be less comfy so Zawa and Twenny would read her another book. They make her even more sleepy than when Zawa and Yama read to her, or when Mirio does.

Eri frowns, because she doesn’t want to go to sleep now, because she might miss Yama playing her song if she does and that might make him sad. “Dad, can Dad read to me too? On his show?”

Zawa gives her a kind of funny smile, and takes her milk away. “He probably would if his boss wouldn’t get mad. Would you like to send him a picture so he can send one back?”

Eri nods, and cuddles close to Twenny and grabs his arm because Twenny tried to run away. Twenny tries really hard to keep Yama from getting pictures of him, but Eri knows that Twenny is just teasing Yama. Zawa takes a picture with his phone so Eri can see it before he takes it, and all of them are in the picture smiling. Eri still looks really tired when she tries to smile, and Zawa kind of does too. Twenny looks like he doesn't like that his picture is taken, and his hair is kind of smushed against the wall like he was trying to run away from it more.

Zawa sends the picture to Yama and after a while he gets the picture back of Yama smiling and waving in his radio show. Even the lady that works with Yama is smiling and waving behind a big window, but her waving is weird because her fingers are doing something like she's talking with her hands. Twenny has a really weird snort when he looks at it, and Zawa smiles a little more when he does. "Hizashi and Byte Sound hope that you have good dreams tonight."

Eri nods, and closes her eyes so she can work hard to have good dreams, and maybe she can fall asleep before Zawa goes back to look at the heroes to make sure they don't do bad stuff like they do at night. "Does... Byte Sound like me?" Eri asks, and has to stop to yawn.

"Mhm," Zawa says, and he sounds kind of tired too. It would be really nice if Zawa fell asleep too, and then he couldn't leave. "Zashi has to keep her in that room to make sure she doesn't steal you. She is very interested in meeting both of you. And stealing you."

Eri cuddles really close to Zawa but makes sure to keep holding Twenny's hand so he can't leave either. "Can you stay until I fall asleep? Because you like me?"

Zawa looks at her, and nods before he puts a hand on her head. "Of course. I...like you, Eri," Zawa says, but he says 'like' kind of funny. "I like you, and care about you, and I hope that you'll have good dreams."

Eri nods, and she tries to think of all the good dreams she could have. Maybe she could fly on cotton candy clouds, or be a scientist in a jungle with a bunch of animal friends. Maybe she could be a hero with Mirio, and they could punch bad guys together and both have really cool capes.

Maybe she could dream that she's in that orangey warm room with Twenny and Zawa and Yama and everyone, and they're all laughing and having fun together.

*

27 holds the mask in his hand, and wants to burn it. Wants to burn his hand with it, how could he be that stupid? That selfish?

Eri hasn't had a bad dream in weeks, she's been growing and thriving and losing her first tooth. She's forgotten about it until he brought it up, he reminded her. Either she's grown enough that it's harder to read her, or he's just that selfish, that stupid. He actually believed that she was fine with it.

Aizawa looks away from the monitors, still trapped by Eri's arms wound around his, and looks at 27. He should look angry, he should look like he's going to send 27 out to complete a punishment for this, but he doesn't. He looks tired. "I don't think that it's related to the face mask. Just a change in routine is enough."

She had five books to pick from, but she picked one that Chisaki gave her. She didn't want him to leave, almost like she knew that he tried to escape last night. Aizawa might think that reading the book together would be different, it would help her forget when he read it to her in that room, but either he doesn't know or he's lying. 27 doesn't know why he would, but he has to be. He has to know that this is 27's fault.

27 runs a hand through his hair, shifting slowly so he can see if Eri will stir if he pulls away. She let go of his hand after she fell asleep, and started clinging more to Aizawa. Aizawa looks tired enough that he might appreciate this.

' Can watch students. Wake if something happens. I can't sleep, ' 27 signs, and he's not lying. He was tired, so honestly exhausted that he fell asleep despite wanting to hear Yamada's show, but now he doesn't feel that way at all. He feels as angry as he was when he wasn't able to sleep because of the nightmares, but it's different. He's angry and hot and irritated that he feels so warm now, too warm to even stand Eri's body heat.

Aizawa looks at the monitors before he looks back at Eri. "Wake me up when they alternate duties. I need to keep an eye on Kaminari and Ashido."

27 nods, and moves slowly and silently to take Aizawa's usual place in the computer chair. It feels weird to sit there, but the chair itself feels comfortable and soft. The desk seems cluttered with the phones and all the things that Eri insisted on bringing, but 27 doesn't touch them, just watching the screens without really watching them. Listening to Yamada's show, but listening more to Aizawa's breathing until it starts to even out and slow.

He looks to see if Aizawa isn't comfortable, if he's just half-lying on the cot and might wake up on his own, but he looks like he'll be able to sleep for a while. His head tilts slightly towards Eri, they're both curling in towards each other. Eri would probably be happy about that if she were awake.

27 stares at the hot plate, the one that Eri wanted to bring if he had nightmares. He gave her a nightmare instead. She's free in this place, thriving and cared for by two fathers, and he's no longer necessary here.

He's not necessary.

He isn't here for the investigation anymore, they don't need him for that. Eri doesn't truly need him either, and even if she wants him, she probably wants him as much as the plushies on her bed. But he gives her nightmares, unlike they do. They're not even slightly troublesome, but he is. He's troublesome to everyone from the hero students to Aizawa. He tried to run, he hurt Midoriya, he says weird things and does weird things because he's broken, because Yamada says he has PTSD, but he doesn't have PTSD, he's just a troublesome person.

He's troublesome to Eri. He's a reminder of Chisaki, and he shouldn't be. He should really just leave if he can't change his face enough to not remind her, but he can't. He can't know if that wouldn't trouble everyone too.

Sparky said something about transferring once. Maybe he could transfer into the 1-A dorm. He wouldn't be troublesome to Eri, he would only be around her as much as she needs him and he could make sure those times aren't a reminder for her. He could make sure to stay in his room and not be troublesome for anyone, to keep quiet so eventually the hero students forget that he's there, forget what he's done too.

27 realizes that he hasn't been paying attention to the monitors or the radio show, someone else is speaking and Yamada should be the only one who speaks. He looks at the time and realizes that it's late, he didn't even hear Yamada play Baby Shark or end his radio show, but when he looks at the camera feeds they go black.

Everything goes black.

27 blinks, he knows he's blinking, he knows that his eyes are open and it's still pitch black. He brings his hands to his eyes, he feels his fingers start to shake when his nerves start screaming, it's just dark. It's just dark, nothing has changed.

Nothing has changed. He's been dreaming. They haven't put the mask on yet, he must have heard from Bug that they will. He must have been dreaming.

He stands up slowly, feeling around the room. The room is different, there's smooth walls instead of brick, but he knows that's not enough. He might just be dreaming. He finds the door, the door is different, the knob actually turns, but it's dark outside too. He can't see where Bug is, but he knows she's there. She's going to catch him.

He walks forward one more step before he freezes. He waits.

He can't move, he knows this is bad enough, he just wants Bug to catch him, to turn the lights on, to hear her voice if she's nice if this is a nice one if she doesn't leave without talking to him maybe she'll talk to him he just wants her to talk to him he wants anyone to talk to him please talk to him he'll be good he won't talk he won't this time he'll be good he'll do anything anything they want he won't talk he won't say anything he knows his name he'll do anything just talk just talk just talk

He feels fingertips searingly hot on his chest and he gasps, his hands move too quick for him to know what they're doing. He has something warm and soft in his hand, he feels like he's squeezing it too hard. He has to breathe to make himself stop, he has to breathe and that's when he notices it.

There's a circle of light in the darkness, hands and arms that appear too sharply, stand out so much in the light. Midoriya is standing in front of him, his hair catching the light oddly, too much like 50's, and even if it's still dark he can see Midoriya wincing like he's in pain.

27 looks down to see the hand that he's holding is scarred, and he's holding it too tightly, enough for the skin to turn white around his fingers. There's a wider circle of light on his shoulder, people are talking. People have noticed him.

"Hey, is Aizawa-sensei in there?" Sparky whispers nervously, maybe 27 did something to make him nervous. 27 doesn't know, it takes long enough for him to figure out the question, but he doesn't know. Aizawa might not be here, he might have left.

The circle turns away and 27 can't stop himself from squeezing, he has to look at what the circle illuminates, the door and the doorframe, before he hears footsteps and watches it disappear. The world is too black now, too dark.

He feels another hand on his hands, soft and trembling. "H-Hey Shinsou," Midoriya says, his voice high and strained. "I-It's okay, you know. Kaminari just kind of knocked out the power."

27 doesn't know what those words mean, but he wants more of them. He doesn't know what to do to get that, he doesn't know what they want him to do. He'd do anything. Anything, anything at all, anything but let go of this hand, he might not be able to hold another one.

"Kaminari, come on," Stress Bake hisses, and 27 hears a rustle of plastic before he hears more footsteps, and the light returns to shine on more shoulders and chests in the hallway.

"Look, maybe we can call an electrician, but we really can't wake Aizawa-sensei up right now. I will die if I try it," Zappy says in a rush, pleading for the others to listen to him.

“Ix nay on the ie day,” Adhesive Strips whispers back, strained as though he was hissing it through clenched teeth. Probably talking about him. That’s nice, it’s nice that they see him. He hasn’t melted into the dark, he’s still here, still here because he has one of their hands.

“Kaminari, seriously,” Aux Lobes hisses, a bit too loud, and a series of heavy footsteps snatch away the light before it hits the top of the doorframe. “We need to....” Amplifier 2.0 trails off, looking at something horrifying inside the room. Maybe she found one of his teeth, maybe the room is more horrifying than he remembered it. Maybe the bricks came to life after he named them. “Ochako’s dad is a construction guy, let’s see if he can help us.”

The light comes back, pointed at the white ceiling, and he hears the bag rustling, he sees more lights come on to illuminate faces before they illuminate each other. 27 can force his fingers to release, even if he doesn’t let go of the hand, he can stop demanding so much of it, but the hand on the back of his just pats his hands, the hand he’s holding twists and moves as the bones inside do, as the fingers curl and flex.

“Hey, Shinsou, do you want to come down with us? Unless you want to stay here, if Eri’s scared of the-” Midoriya cuts off when 27 pushes his hands towards Midoriya. He can’t talk, he knows he’ll get in trouble, and he doesn’t have his hands, not that they could see them. “Okay, let’s head downstairs so we’re all together.”

Midoriya pulls away the hand that was on top of his, but he doesn’t take away the other one. 27 watches all the things that appear from the dark, shoulders and stairs and walls. He has to use one of his hands to catch the hand rail, he can’t see well enough to know where his feet are, if he has feet in the dark, but Midoriya doesn’t take advantage of that to pull away.

There’s a lamp on in the common room, sitting on the floor in the middle to illuminate the notebooks and pens thrown around, and the students looking at them. It’s soft and warm, and comforting.

“Aizawa-sensei is asleep, so we took back our hostage,” Sparky says, a hand on 27’s shoulder. The others don’t seem happy about that, and Momo sighs with a hand on her face.

“This is exactly why Aizawa-sensei assigned us that list. Exactly,” Momo repeats, and she might be right. Aizawa might not like that they keep kidnapping 27.

27 doesn’t really mind it, though.

Aux Lobes and Sparky take the bag of phones to Floaty, begging her to call her dad, and Ashi points at either him or Midoriya. “What’s with the hand holding?! Did something happen up there?” Her eyebrows move up and down, her smile tight and exaggerated, and that means something that Midoriya takes offense to.

“It’s not like that! I just kind of scared Shinsou on accident,” Midoriya says, waving his free hand, but he doesn’t pull away the other. It’s probably weird, but it’s not weird enough that 27 will either. “Are you okay, Tokoyami?”

Wheezing Crow straightens from slumping over his legs, nodding at Midoriya. “Dark Shadow has been tamed. I apologize for worrying you all.”

“Non! YaoMomo’s thinking quick and my sparkles are here for you, mon amie!” Frenchie declares, swinging his arms around dramatically before he sees 27, wilting. “Ah, par- I mean, sorry!”

“Non,” 27 says, to see if he can say it right. The way Frenchie says it is different, it’s lighter until it’s harsh at the end, and 27 sounds harsh all the way through. His voice sounds like his throat should hurt, but it doesn’t.

Floaty talks on her cell phone with her dad, her voice high pitched and only gets higher when she apologizes for waking him up. Ashi launches herself off the back of the couch and runs to the kitchen, the other students are sitting around or standing close to the others, a lot of them are crowding around Floaty. Midoriya probably wants to be one of them.

But 27 is holding his hand, so he can’t. “Did you work everything out? With Aizawa-sensei?” Midoriya asks, nervously, like he doesn’t want to say it. He doesn’t want to talk about how stupid 27 was.

27 nods, even if he could talk. But maybe he should, maybe Midoriya wants to make sure that 27 won’t hurt him again. “Yamada is getting paid for me. I’m not going to try that again.”

Midoriya smiles, relieved. “That’s good. I mean, it’s good that you’re not going to leave. Everyone would be really worried about you. Eri would be really sad-”

“I can’t kill you either,” 27 says, even if he probably shouldn’t. He’s giving away a good weapon, a good threat, but Midoriya is giving him his hand, so it’s fine. “I was lying.”

Midoriya tilts his head before he starts scratching the back of it. “Kacchan was pretty convinced, but it doesn’t really make sense... With your quirk... It has....” Midoriya’s lips twist and he screws his eyes shut, before they open, too wide and too bright, his free hand in a fist. “It can’t maintain control when the target is in pain, right? Because the endorphins from that are really strong, it could probably affect the part of the brain that your quirk uses to control-”

Ashi slaps a hand over Midoriya’s mouth, before she holds a glass of pale pink liquid with a bendy straw out to him. “Here! Wait!” Ashi takes a sip, exhaling in relief after she does. “Yep, bendy straws make all the poison go away! See? Definitely not poisoned!”

27 takes a sip, even if he didn’t need her to tell him that. He’s not stupid, he knows that Ashi wouldn’t poison him. She might be trying to suffocate Midoriya, because he keeps trying to talk behind her hand. “It’s sweet.”

“Strawberry yogu-milk!” Ashi says, now that she knows when he asks questions. “It’s the perfect thing for when you’re sick. It’s the only thing I used to drink when I got really sick as a kid.”

She pulls away the hand on Midoriya’s mouth to press the back of it to his forehead, frowning. “It’s always hot,” 27 says, trying to take the strawberry yogu-milk from her. She might forget that he has it, and he can steal all of it. “I’m not sick.”

Midoriya starts scratching his head again, like he has 27’s quirk, and 27 sighs. He didn’t really want to admit that much, but Midoriya looks upset about it.

“Pain is an interrupter. I can’t make people do something complicated, and I have to be specific otherwise they make up their own interpretations of what I mean,” 27 says, and he has to look away from Midoriya’s intense gaze. “I could control three at once, but now it’s only one. And it’s weird.”

“Shinny,” Ashi half-whispers, her eyes wide and haunted. “Don’t.”

Midoriya takes a deep breath. “Is it pain only to the target or if you get hurt, does that also interrupt your quirk? How much pain? Is a papercut enough or maybe just something uncomfortable that isn't painful? How specific do the commands have to be? How do you control one person and not the other if you need to talk to make them-"

"Five," 27 says, counting the questions. He's starting to lose track of how many things Midoriya wants to know. "Five questions. Tell me how to transfer to UA."

Ashi grins, jumping on the balls of her feet. "Shinny's gonna be in the hero course! I don't care if Aizawa-sensei wants to put you in the stinky boy's side, there's a free room on the girl's side and we're gonna treat you right!"

"Um, you haven't been in school since you went to school with Ashido and Kirishima, right?" Midoriya asks, and 27 wavers before he decides to not count it against one of his questions. He nods, and Midoriya looks more nervous. "You might need to talk to Principal Nezu and take the entrance exam in the Spring. The r- the exam is kind of tough, though."

27 knows, he knows that he's probably too stupid to do it right now, but he can cleave onto these hero students and prepare himself for it. "The target has to be in pain. As long as I concentrate, it's fine. It depends on how much pain, how many people I'm controlling. Being uncomfortable doesn't affect it. People can't really think under my quirk, but they can see and react. If I told you to walk, you would walk in any direction, so I would have to tell you to walk forward. And I tell the person I want to control... It's hard to explain."

Talking about strings might be weird, but that's how it works. Midoriya's eyes are practically glowing like he activated some part of his quirk, nodding to himself. "Do you know what part of the brain it affects? Like, um," Midoriya stares at his free hand, clenching it and unclenching it a few times, like he's considering beating the answer out of 27. "Do you want some snacks? Or a video game? Or maybe-"

"I don't know," 27 admits. He might have lied and convinced Midoriya to help him with his tests so he would be ready to take the entrance exam, but Midoriya also might have found out about it.

The rest of the lights come on, and several students either sigh in relief or cheer. Floaty looks even more relieved, holding one phone to her ear while the other is held by Jirou before she pulls it away. She thanks her father and apologizes again, tells him to be safe at work.

Blasty kicks through a door that leads into the dark, followed by Kirimson Shark and Squidly. "Blew fucking all those breakers, you shitty phone charger bitch! Oi, why the fuck is-"

"Hey, Shinbro!" Kirimson Shark calls, waving at him like he's across a field instead of across a room. "Is Aizawa-sensei her-"

Blasty elbows Kirimson in the side, but not hard enough to do much damage. "That's what I wanted to know, Shitty Hair, don't fucking interrupt people. Learn some fucking manners."

"Aizawa-sensei still seems to be in the dark about this," Toko says, and 27 wonders if he did just to make that joke. "We should return to our tasks and ensure that when light falls upon us again, it will not alight upon our failures."

"And Kaminari should not be tasked with cleaning the electrical outlets," Provost Piston decides with a chop of his hand towards Sparky. "We have approximately two hours and 37 minutes before sunrise, and our guests should be arriving at 10, so if we are to gain the four hours of sleep necessary for semi-functional-"

"We should get back to work," Momo interrupts, even though 27's pretty sure that someone taught her manners. She seems to be irritated, either she doesn't deal well with not sleeping, the others are annoying her, or she was concussed during the Heroics Exam and hasn't had much time to recover from it. Or all three. But when she looks at him, she talks like she's talking to Eri. "You could stay here with us, Shinsou, but we'll be rather busy with our assignments from Aizawa-sensei."

27 feels the mask when he tries to tell her, so he has to drop Midoriya's hand to sign. 'Can help. My fault.'

"It wasn't really your fault, Shinsou!" the Fluent One says, waving his hands. "It's nice that you want to help, but we did something pretty bad. We're really sorry about that."

27 has no idea what he means, they wouldn't have acted so recklessly if he didn't make them. And he wants to help anyway, to ingratiate himself to them. To make sure he can transfer smoothly, that they won't keep him from being able to move in here, close enough to Eri but distant enough not to disturb her. 'I want to. It's fine.'

The students give him easy tasks. Dusting things, writing down scenarios for their list. They have to clean everything so it looks like no one lives there, but they're hoping that doesn't include their rooms. They worry about that a lot, and several of them think that certain ones would be impossible to clean even when they move into the 2-A dorm.

One of them wrote down needing to call for help if they're in a rescue operation in a flood, in a hurricane, in a tsunami, and if it's raining, so 27 writes down several different scenarios of being attacked with different weapons or quirks. He counts to make sure that they have enough, they've each filled out several pages and the numbering system is off or non-existent if it's there, and they've actually named 1024 scenarios with no repeats. It's very Plus Ultra of them.

Provost Piston and Momo make their final inspection, and Momo seems relieved that 27 counted for her. Then they announce that they can all go to sleep, that they still have 5 hours before these guests show up, and that they should sleep anyway. Sleep is important, four hours are important.

Ashi offers to walk with him back to the room, but he shakes his head. He's tired, he's tired again but he doesn't want to leave. He doesn't want to go back there.

They still leave, even if they want him to leave too. They worry that Aizawa might blame them if 27 is out of place, but Blasty argues that 27 just does weird shit, that it'll be fine. 27 appreciates that.

He's alone in the common room, the lights are still on. He looks at the walls and he drinks the last of the yogumilk to prove that he can, that it's easy. There's no mask, there's nothing that forces him to suck water from a rusty faucet through his teeth. He can just open his mouth and suck through the bendy straw.

He's not there. He's not at The Miasma. He's not at the 8 Precepts either.

He's at UA, and he has no idea what that means anymore.

*

Bakugo puts up with it for almost an hour before he starts making his way back to Shitsou. The fucker is too stupid to sleep, it's clear as fucking day on his face and Bakugo's known that from day one, but he's not putting up with that shit.

The fucker is just staring at the wall, like there's not a fucking TV with a thousand channels and five fucking game consoles staring him in the face. He's full of fucking shit when he looks at Bakugo, trying to act like he's not tired. Fucker is fucking exhausted but he's too fucking stupid to fall asleep on his own, and no one fucking gets that shit.

Fucking no one gets how fucked up Shitsou is, and it's pissing him off.

"Oi, I'm making some milk and chamomile bullshit, and it's not fucking poisoned," Bakugo says, because he has to fucking tell Shitsou that shit thanks to whatever weirdass obsession he's had about being poisoned for fucking ever. Fucker's problems with eating shit has probably been a big fucking red flag this whole time. "Get over here and watch me so you know that shit, alright?"

Shitsou still follows basic fucking orders and shit, and Bakugo forgot how fucking creepy his staring is when he doesn't fucking talk. He sets the water to boil and shit, the milk is in the microwave even if it tastes better getting boiled in a pot like the old hag makes it. He's got to wait to let that shit steep and shit, and he's not fucking doing it in this weird fucking silence.

"Try to talk to me," Bakugo tells him, turns around and crosses his arms and fucking dares Shitsou to prove him wrong about this shit.

"I can," Shitsou says, and he sounds like he's fucking gargled some nails or some shit. Bitch needs to fucking hydrate. Or needs someone to remind him to hydrate, and no one is doing that shit. "I won't ask questions. Not trying to quirk you."

Bakugo scoffs. "Like I'm scared of your fucking quirk. Fucking ask questions, that's some shit you need to get over. Fucking Kaminari gets to fuck up our whole power grid, no one's gonna beat you for making some creepy fucking human puppets."

Even if it is fucking creepy. Deku looked fucking soulless, like there were no fucking lights on and never had been, just moving so fucking creepy and ramping up All for One like he didn't fucking care if it splattered him.

"Apparently, that shit unlocks your shit talking," Bakugo says, and starts plopping some tea bags from Yaoyorozu's high class stash into a mug. "You can talk to anyone you quirked. Eri, Ashido, now Deku and me. Maybe Shitty Hair, he doesn't fucking remember if you did. Pretty fucking sure if Micsei and Shitsei don't take your ass to a quirk specialist now, it's fucking child neglect or some shit."

"It's not," Shitsou says, because he's real fucking stupid about this shit. He's probably just been through so much fucking nightmare shit that the subtle abuse goes right over his fucking head. "I can wear a mask again. It's fi-"

"Fucker," Bakugo turns around and fucking seethes, because Shitsou fucking means that shit. "That shit. Isn't fucking happening. It will fuck you, the fuck up. And no one here is scared of your shitty quirk. You got that shit?"

The fucker doesn't, because he just fucking shrugs, and that's not a fucking answer anymore. But he's probably not going to believe that shit until Shitsei tells him, because Shitsei fucking owns him and shit in his fucked up head.

"Shitsei is fucked up, but he's only fucked up at us. You could fucking get away with murder, fucking hell." Shitsou pretty much fucking did. He didn't actually kill Deku but he probably fucking could have. Shitty Hair said his quirk was fucking dangerous, and he wasn't fucking kidding.

But Shitsou has some fucking pinky swear with a dead chick not to kill anyone, and he's fucked up enough to keep it. Shitsou's issues have fucking issues, and they balance each other out like the shittiest house of cards ever made. It's fucked up , but what isn't about Shitsou?

"When's the last time someone fucking fed you?" Bakugo asks, because he fucking has to. Fucker is still too twiggy, even with the delusions about poison and shit. And Eri isn't , and that brings that shit to a whole new level of fucked up.

Shitsou takes way too damn long to answer, so Bakugo opens the fridge to see what he has to work with. He's too damn tired to make some fancy shit, but he needs to get over that shit because he's not fucking sleeping either. Just thinking about that fucked up dream makes him want to shove some toothpicks under his eyelids to fight that shit off.

"Fuck it, we've got eggs and oranges and shit, don't fucking ask for some fancy fucking omelettes because I'm just making eggs. Some fucking egg boats too, and don't tell that cheese bitch I like that shit, alright?" Bakugo says, and he doesn't have to fucking worry about that shit because Shitsou can't fucking talk to Aoyama anyway. Even if it's fucked up, it's a fucking relief that one of his shitty friends can keep some shit to themselves.

"You should sleep," Shitsou says, like he can fucking talk. He's probably never fucking slept, and he definitely hasn't in a while with how fucking huge his fucking eyebags are. Fucking Micheal Kors Insomnia line in the works over here. "They'll drug you again."

Shitsou might be right , but he doesn't have to fucking say it. "And I'll beat their asses, again. I'm not fucking sleeping til I forget some shit, alright? My fucky brain is dealing with some shit, and I'm not dealing with my fucky brain until I beat the shit out of it by not sleeping. It fucking works , so don't argue with me."

A bunch of fucking articles say it's unhealthy or some shit, but that's just because it works too damn well. Stingy fucking therapists don't want everyone jumping on this hack or they'll lose all the fucking money they make. Got a fucked up brain? Just don't sleep until it becomes fucking mush so you don't have to deal with it.

Maybe that's why Shitsou looks like that. And that's why he's so damn stupid. "When's the last time you slept? Like, really, full fucking 8 hours and shit?"

He looks over to see Shitsou looking at his hand, counting and shit. And when he gets to fucking four , Bakugo starts looking for that Benadryl stash. Fuck it, maybe he can convince Shitsou it's seasoning instead of poison.

"Why the fuck isn't anyone else keeping track of this shit? You're a fucking disaster, and no one fucking gets that," Bakugo grumbles, and he can't fucking find that shit when it's hard enough to keep an eye on the fucking egg boats in the pan. There's a fucking balance between toasting the bread and burning it, and it's hard as shit to flip if it's too soft.

"I have nightmares," Shitsou says, and fucking duh. Why the fuck wouldn't he? "Tea doesn't work. The medicine just made me weird."

"Then don't sleep until you can't think about it," Bakugo says, and he gives up on the Benadryl because he doesn't want to see Shitsou acting weird. Fucker is weird, and he doesn't want to see what weird is for him. "Like, when you can't fucking think anymore, and you have to try to remember how to fucking walk. You can sleep like a fucking baby after that, no nightmares at all. Nightmares are too fucking complicated for your fried ass brain."

"I could make you sleep," Shitsou says, but the way he fucking says it is weird. Like he's trying to be helpful and shit instead of threatening. “You can’t think under my quirk.”

Fucking. Nightmare fuel. And Bakugo didn’t need any more of that shit. Apparently Deku’s hack ass quirk has a secondary function to give him fucking nightmares, and it’s not fucking appreciated. “No fucking thanks, I’ve got this shit covered. Fuck Class B if they want me to be fucking hospitable and shit. All the other extras need their fucking brainstorming and reflection shit, but you saw my match. Five fucking minutes and I had that shit in the bag, what the fuck are they gonna tell me?”

While everyone else is playing host and shit to those fucking extras, Bakugo can take full fucking advantage of Monoma’s hack ass quirk. That’s the fucking brainstorming that everyone else needed to get on, get a new fucking perspective on their shit by letting that whiney theatre bitch try their shit out.

But that theatre bitch has some weird fucking plans for Shitsou, and now Bakugo’s curious. “Why the fuck is Monoma obsessed with you? He wanted to steal you and shit, like you’re a fucking quirk. He’s fucking weird, but he’s got a fucking weird ass crush on you or some something.”

“He threatened me,” Shitsou says, and doesn’t fucking elaborate but he needs to. Bakugo’s all fucking ears and he’s got Monoma all to himself tomorrow to sort that shit out permanently. “I don’t know why. I didn’t break his hand, but I should have. He tried to steal my quirk.”

The quirk stealing was Bakugo’s fault, and it was fucking hilarious that Monoma got his little fingers twisted for it, but that doesn’t explain why he fucking threatened Shitsou. Maybe Shitsou could handle that shit on his own, and he’d probably get away with it because Shitsei doesn’t fucking bother to feed him so why would discipline be on the fucking table? But Bakugo isn’t going to let fucking Monoma threaten Shitsou and get away with that shit. “I’ll sort his shit out, don’t fucking worry about it.”

Shitsou didn’t look that worried in the first place. He looks way more concerned with a healthy fucking breakfast, but he’s going to have to get over that shit because he should have been paying attention.

“Here. Eat and drink and shit, you need the fucking vitamins if your ass is getting sick,” Bakugo says, setting the table for him because Shitsou just doesn’t do shit like that on his own. He’s an overgrown toddler with serious fucking issues, and it’s a fucking miracle that he doesn’t need to be spoonfed.

“I’m not getting sick,” Shitsou whines, because he’s stupid like that. He sounds fucking sick, he looks fucking sick, Ashido says he has a fever so he definitely fucking does. He needs to get over squishing the orange slices and just fucking eat them, fuck.

“Your ass is gonna get sick if you don’t eat all of that shit. Fucking take care of yourself, hydrate and fucking sleep. If you don’t, your immune system gets weak and you’ll get your ass wasted by disease.” And finally, he’s found a hack to make Shitsou do shit.

Just threaten him with getting sick.

Shitsou is fucking inhaling those oranges, he’s drinking the shit out of that milk tea too. The tea and having a full fucking meal will probably put Shitsou’s ass to sleep, and maybe when Shitsou wakes up he’ll look a little more like a real fucking person.

Bakugo gets him some fucking orange juice too, and fucker doesn’t even check it. Fucking nutrients really do that shit, they’re fixing Shitsou’s brain problems fucking immediately. And Bakugo has time to make some fucking coffee, two caffeine pills too because he is fucking tired but he's not dealing with that shit yet. He's not going to close his eyes and see that shit again.

"Great, now go the fuck to sleep," Bakugo tells Shitsou, and he doesn't care where he does it. If he wants to go back to Eri and Shitsei so no one gets accused of kidnapping him again, that's fucking fantastic, but Bakugo can and will read him a fucking bedtime story if that shit will make any fucking difference.

Shitsou shakes his head, but he sounds better with all the fucking hydration going on. "I'll have nightmares. Something reminded me of it."

Bakugo sits down at the table and drinks some coffee until he can think of something to say other than 'fucking same.' Yeah, he has issues and Shitsou has issues, some of their issues are the same fucking issues, but Shitsou needs to get over his issues. "What reminded you? We'll fix that shit so it doesn't happen." Shitsou shakes his head, because he's so fucking helpful, but Bakugo lets it slide. Shit might be pretty fucking horrifying. "It's stupid how that shit works."

Shitsou is back to doing that silent staring shit, and he has to know that it's fucking creepy. He knows that he doesn't have to, he can fucking talk now, and it'd be better if he did because Bakugo wouldn't feel like he has to fucking talk about it either.

"Deku's weird fucking quirk has me a little fucked up," Bakugo says, and he says that shit quiet so Shitsou knows not to talk about that shit. That's the fucking best thing about Shitsou, he can keep that shit to himself. "I had this fucking nightmare where I was back in that shitty bar, and I was puking that weird black shit again, but fucking Deku was there too. Fucking Deku and me, fucking both of us got snatched but we didn't go to that fucking parking lot in Kamino. We were right in front of that guy and he just fucking..."

He didn't even look at Bakugo, even when he screamed at him. Even when he tried to use his quirk, but his quirk just wasn't fucking working, like fucking Shitsei was on that bastard's side. That bastard knew who Deku was, what his quirk was, and Bakugo didn't fucking matter to him.

"He fucking killed Deku. Fucking ended the whole fucking world. I fucking ended All Might, ended Deku, the villains fucking won permanently because of my ass and I can't fucking..." He's too tired to quirk, so he just drinks some more coffee and hopes he can find some fucking balance between this shit. Too exhausted to quirk, too awake to sleep. He just needs to get to that point where it doesn't fucking matter anymore. "I'm tired of dealing with this shit."

Shitsou looks at his fucked up hands, more scars there than fucking Deku's, before he touches one of those really fucked up ones. Three long scars all over his arms, one almost goes to his neck, and Bakugo doesn't want to know what made them. If someone took a fucking oversized potato peeler to Shitsou and fucking peeled him or some shit, or if someone just ripped the skin off like ripping out a fucking cuticle. Or if it was worse. "I forgot about it. Chisaki helped me forget."

"He didn't fucking help you with shit," Bakugo reminds, because Shitsou is so not going to form some kind of attachment bullshit to the dead fucker. "He fucking tortured the shit out of you, so don't fucking send him a thank you card for any kind of shit. Got that, shit face?"

Shitsou fucking pouts, and Bakugo's three seconds from wiping that shit off his face. "It was easier when I didn't think about it. I didn't have to remember."

Bakugo didn't really have the option of getting tortured to keep the fucking summer camp bullshit out of his head, but he might have picked it. Not that he thinks Shitsou's lucky or any shit for that.

“I don’t know what to do here,” Shitsou says, and Bakugo doesn’t know what will fix that whiney ass tone in his voice, but he’s gonna fucking do it. “They don’t need me for the investigation. I’m just a reminder for Eri. I don’t...”

Fuck , if Shitsou cries, Bakugo is going to fucking lose it. “Oi, don’t fucking worry about that shit. Fucking pick up a hobby or some shit, find some shit you’re good at. Or shit at. Then make yourself good at it.”

Fucking fuck fuck , Shitsou looks like he’s going to fucking cry and Bakugo is nowhere near close to anything surrounding handling that, fuck.

“Teach me that pinching shit,” Bakugo says, holding out his arm. He’s pretty fucking sure Shitsou could fucking wreck his shit if he tried. The last time he did that fucked up shit to his shoulder he fucking saw white like his eyes decided that shit was too much to deal with. But even if Shitsou found a way to pop his whole fucking arm off like a fucking action figure, that shit would be easier to deal with than watching Shitsou fucking cry.

And maybe Shitsou does know how to do that shit, because he looks fucking excited to try. He looks over Bakugo’s arm before he puts a hand on his forearm, feeling around for some shit under his skin before he finds it. “Breathe out.”

Bakugo rolls his eyes but fucking does it, and it’s a fucking great thing he did. Shitsou presses down on a fucking agony button with his fucking thumb and Bakugo would have screamed if he could, but Shitsou apparently knew that. He just throws around his free hand, not sure if he should bite it or wave it or try to punch Shitsou in the face, before he starts slapping the table because fucking fuck FUCK.

Shitsou lets up and Bakugo’s still not sure if he should deck him across the fucking face. “Sweat related quirks have swollen glands and ducts. Pressing down on one hurts-”

“No fucking duh ,” Bakugo hisses, he didn’t fucking need a demonstration of that shit.

Shitsou just rolls his fucking eyes, the fucking twerp . “You use yours a lot, so they’re bigger. The gauntlets on your costume protect you from that.”

And Bakugo is never going to fucking change that , fuck. “Great. Let’s put your ass in the support department, fucking crazy eyes is going to go apeshit over your fucking reviews.” Actually, they’d probably get along great. Too fucking great, that crazy bitch would probably make a robot baby programmed to hit every quirk’s pressure points and Shitsei would probably love it. “How do I fuck up Kaminari with that shit?”

Apparently, Kaminari’s quirk probably uses his nervous system, so his nerve endings are either really fucking sensitive or really fucking dull. With the shit that Shitsou shows him, Bakugo finds out that his nerve endings aren’t fucking dull at all.

*

Aizawa stands at the bottom of the stairwell and considers whether he really wants to know what’s going on.

“Oi, how much harder do I have to go? You’re fucking falling asleep, you fucking liar,” Bakugo grumbles, pressing two fingers behind Shinsou’s jaw and below his ear to trigger a his mandibular pressure point.

“You’re doing it right. It hurts a lot,” Shinsou answers, and more surprising than the fact that he does is that he isn't affected by the pressure point at all.

It's also surprising that Shinsou is participating in a somewhat normal activity for a teenage boy. Even if he clearly knew a bit more about pressure points and painful restraining holds than the average teenage boy, Aizawa has observed this kind of bonding ritual enough times to know that this was somewhat normal.

Sneaking out of the Safe Room to do this sort of activity with a friend was also somewhat normal, but considering the fit that Eri had woken up to when she realized Shinsou wasn't there, he didn't appreciate it. "Mom!"

Eri runs to bury her face in Shinsou's stomach, her arms wrapped around him tightly. Both Shinsou and Bakugo seem startled by that, Shinsou hesitating before putting a hand on her head to reassure her. "Eri, what's.... You had a nightmare."

Eri shook her head, twisting her fingers in Shinsou's shirt, but didn't move to respond. She likely didn't want to say what Aizawa was only now piecing out.

Eri wasn't coping well with being separated from Shinsou. With the Heroics Exam, the interview at the station, the dorm shift without her and Shinsou isolating himself after discovering Furokage Mizuki's picture, they had been spending considerably less time together. And it seemed that Eri was reaching the point that she couldn't tolerate it much longer.

Aizawa was still unsure how to remedy that situation appropriately. If Shinsou was able to cope well with it, able to forge new attachments to others, then it wouldn't be conducive to stunt that and reinforce his bond with Eri. But he also wasn't sure whether Eri would be reassured by spending more time with himself or Hizashi in Shinsou's stead.

Before Aizawa could begin to face that situation, he needed to make sure that his students had been dealt with. "Your peers seem sure that there's nothing to worry about."

Bakugo huffs, leaning towards the coffee table to pick up a stack of papers. "1024 times we need to run away or call for help. Everything's fixed up and cleaned like we don't even fucking live here. I'll walk you through it."

That's completely unnecessary, but Aizawa finds himself hoping that this is a situation in which Bakugo is approaching an adult instead of attempting to resolve the issue himself. Bakugo points out the repaired door with a wave of his hand, and Aizawa notices the kitchen has been thoroughly cleaned, including the inside of the cabinets and refrigerator. Bakugo pauses to start making coffee, and Aizawa steps in to pull out his usual blend, well hidden and tucked into the bend of a pipe underneath the sink.

"Are you actually going to help Shitsou if I tell you shit?" Bakugo hisses, an aggressive statement with a pleading tone. That worries Aizawa in more ways than one.

"That would be my job," Aizawa answers, and waits for whatever Shinsou had admitted to Bakugo, someone that he obviously felt more comfortable with than either Aizawa or Hizashi.

"Right, like making sure he eats and sleeps and shit, doing a great job so far," Bakugo grumbles under his breath, but he looks away under Aizawa's stare. "Don't fucking leave him alone or let him get bored. He's going through some fucking midlife crisis shit."

Aizawa breathes in the smell of brewing coffee, in hopes that the air carries enough caffeine to understand that statement, before he finds it lacking. "What do you mean by that?"

“He almost fucking cried because you’re not bugging him about the investigation, and Eri’s giving him some fucked up empty nest syndrome,” Bakugo answers, staring at Shinsou and Eri with a cocked eyebrow before he glances back at Aizawa out of the corner of his eye. “You gonna do anything about that ‘Mom’ shit? It’s seriously fucked up-”

“I appreciate that you told me this,” Aizawa says, resting a hand on Bakugo’s head before the teenager shakes it off. “Don’t bring it up to either of them.”

Shinsou had held out longer than Aizawa had expected. Shinsou had probably never had the opportunity to appreciate being a child with few responsibilities, between his ‘jobs’ at Miasma and Eri’s care at the 8 Precepts. Perhaps fighting the investigation had given him a sense of purpose, and with the absence of that coupled with the sudden realization that his circumstances were much different, that he was free for the first time in his life, Shinsou found himself lost.

He would likely lose himself in Eri’s care again if Aizawa wasn’t careful to manage that. “You should sleep,” Aizawa mutters, noticing the way that Bakugo was eyeing the coffee, under eye circles already developing from one night without sleep that Aizawa was mostly responsible for.

“Nightmares, but I fucking got it,” Bakugo answers, and Aizawa finds himself a bit surprised that he admitted that so easily. “I’ll sleep in like, two days. It’ll be fine.”

Aizawa doesn’t want to know what those two days will look like, considering that normal class schedule will resume tomorrow. “Research ‘Image Rehearsal Therapy.’ If that doesn’t work after a week, I or your parents can schedule an appointment with a general practitioner to prescribe medication that can help.”

Bakugo glares at him, more shock than actual irritation. “Oi, what the fuck does that mean? Did the hag sign over her fucking parental rights to you or some shit and no one told me?”

“Limited guardianship in order to make some medical decisions, mostly in place for emergencies,” Aizawa answers. “It’s the same for every student who lives on campus, though I’m only responsible for Class 1-A. Chronic nightmares may not be an emergency, but I doubt that it would be questioned.” And he doubts that Bakugo would go to his parents with this, even if it did become an emergency.

Bakugo crosses his arms, glancing back at Shinsou and Eri. “You gonna get Shitsou on that shit?”

“If it’s necessary,” Aizawa lies. Shinsou seems to have taken the same great lengths as Bakugo to avoid having nightmares in the first place, and may be less willing to discuss the issue with Aizawa. And even if he did, medication would still be out of reach as Recovery Girl would be unable to prescribe it, and no other medical professional could truly evaluate Shinsou without The Commission’s approval.

Aizawa pours himself a cup of coffee and takes a sip, wondering how much easier both Shinsou and Eri’s wardships would be to manage if they both had the skills necessary to communicate their needs clearly.

*

There are too many people, and 27 doesn’t like it.

He lets Eri cling to him, and tries not to appreciate it too much, knowing that she’s only doing this because that nightmare must have been horrible. Horrible enough for her to lie that she had it. He gave her a horrible nightmare, and he shouldn’t feel so entitled to wish that he could escape this crowded room, but he does. He finds himself staring at Aizawa, pretending that he had him under his quirk and could command him to let them leave without talking to him.

But Aizawa is giving commands to Chocula, giving him a list of errands to run and half of them were assigned to Aizawa by Yamada. 27 wonders if he should tell Yamada that, if making Yamada angry at Aizawa would feel good this time now that Aizawa is irritating him.

The Quirk Thief had his arms full of drink carriers that he's been dispersing to the hero students, but when he approaches 27 with one still in his hands, 27 hates that there are too many people here for a different reason. "I do apologize that I was unable to save you from these wretched barbarians of Class A and give you a reprieve for a day, but I hope that this will make up for it."

It's a purple drink.

27 doesn't want it. He doesn't want it. He doesn't like Quirk Thief and he doesn't trust him, shouldn't trust this drink either. Out of anyone at UA, Quirk Thief would definitely try to poison him to make it easier to steal him, and 27 doesn't even know why he wants to steal him. He didn't seem to enjoy stealing his quirk last time.

27 takes the drink but hands it to Eri, to gauge Quirk Thief's reaction. He wouldn't try to poison Eri, he'd be unsettled by the threat of that happening. Few people in this world are demented enough to want to hurt a child, and even fewer who would hurt Eri. Despite what he knows and what he suspects about Quirk Thief, he doubts that he would stoop to that level.

Quirk Thief looks unsettled, but it seems to be more out of confusion. "I wasn't aware that Eri would be here, otherwise I would have made sure to bring something less caffeinated."

Eri tries to hand it back to 27, and he wavers before he hands it back. It has coffee in it. It's purple. But he doesn't want it.

He doesn't want it, and he just has to remember that.

Quirk Thief's eyes widen a bit before he tosses the empty drink carrier towards the kitchen counter, smiling a bit too wide and shakily. ' Do you like T-A-R-O? '

Quirk Thief is too good. He's too good at whatever game he's playing at, he knows too many of 27's weaknesses and he's been plotting too long while 27 was unaware of him. 27 is woefully outmatched here, he doesn't even know what Quirk Thief wants, but if he's not careful, Quirk Thief will get it.

Aizawa finally seems to realize that 27 has been begging him to end this and give him an escape. "Monoma, come to the staff dorm after you're done here. Vlad will let you in."

Aizawa is in on it. Whatever Quirk Thief wants, Aizawa wants that too, and that means that 27 is fucked. He's surrounded, two people that he can't fathom and can't manipulate are working together to force something out of him, and because it's Quirk Thief and Aizawa, he has no idea what they want. What either of them could want but especially what both of them could want.

Aizawa brushes off Quirk Thief's enthusiastic agreement and starts to walk out, and 27 follows him far less relieved than he thought he would be. Eri keeps trying to hand him the drink but 27 really doesn't want it, he doesn't know what to do with it either. He can't bring himself to throw it away, and it's stupid. It's just purple.

"Here," Aizawa says, holding his hand out to take the drink from Eri. Maybe he'll throw it away, maybe he'll give some indication of what it is. Instead of doing that, he takes off the lid and takes a sip, before he puts it back on and hands it back to 27. “It’s 10:15. And it’s a taro latte. It’s sweet, but it blends well with the coffee.”

That doesn’t really matter. He knows Memory isn’t involved, the poison might take longer than 10 minutes. But if Aizawa drank it, then it isn’t poisoned, because he wouldn’t risk that. He’s involved in this plot, whatever it is.

He might be bluffing, he might have drank it because he has an antidote, only drinking it to make sure that 27 drinks it. But 27 finds himself too curious to know what the plot moving against him is, what Aizawa and Quirk Thief could possibly want from him. It might be something simple, something he can be useful for. If that’s so, they could have just asked.

27 takes a sip, and it’s warm and sweet. It’s not as sweet as a Mocha, it’s far more muted, but 27 finds himself appreciating the color more than the flavor of it. And he knows it’s weird.

It’s probably weird enough that neither of them know it.

“Zawa, is Monoma coming over?” Eri asks, as enthused about the idea as 27 is. When Aizawa tells her that he is, she pouts and leans a bit closer to 27, head nearly resting on the arm of his hand that she’s still holding. “But he’s the dark face of UA. Even if he gave Twenny coffee, he’s still really mean.”

“He’ll only visit for a little while. I need his help with something,” Aizawa says, and 27 wants to know what it is, but he doubts Aizawa would just tell him. It would be far easier if he did. “I would like him to copy both of your quirks. He may notice something with yours that would make it easier for you to control it. And I would like to know if Shinsou’s quirk would be able to affect Hizashi.”

27 stares for a moment, trying to understand why Aizawa was making this difficult. Why he was doing something so irrationally unnecessary. He could erase Eri’s quirk, 27 could control it. 27 wasn’t going to use his quirk on Yamada, he would never think of doing that. Even if Yamada was deaf, which Aizawa thought affected his quirk somehow, 27 didn’t see any point in using his quirk on Yamada.

27 was pretty sure that he could make Yamada do anything he wanted anyway, just by asking for it.

But Aizawa must be scared that he would. He didn’t say anything about 27 using his quirk on Midoriya, but he must be worried that 27 was planning to use it to escape again. He must be worried that 27 would use his quirk to do something worse, to hurt someone, and he must not have planned to make a mask yet because his quirk came back too soon. Bakugo seems to think that he wouldn’t do that, but Bakugo must be wrong.

27 has to walk faster to catch up to Aizawa, but he needs to know, he needs Aizawa to know that what he’s doing is unnecessary. That it would be fine. He’s pretty sure the mask would even be padded well this time. ‘ Can wear mask. ’

Aizawa looks at him, still betraying nothing with that look, and it’s still so irritating. “You can. Recovery Girl wants you to, since face masks can protect your immune system.”

That’s not the mask he was talking about, but it’s an answer that he needed anyway. Aizawa knows that Eri wouldn’t want to see 27 wearing another mask, it would make her upset. That’s why he doesn’t want to give 27 a mask, he doesn’t want to make one. Quirk Thief isn’t unnecessary, they want to make sure that Yamada can be a mask. They want to know if he’s immune to 27’s quirk so he can be around 27 at all times, he can break any control that 27 holds over someone else.

That's even better than a padded mask. It feels stupid, but 27 would like it if Yamada had to be around him all the time, even if it was just his job to make sure 27 didn't use his quirk. Yamada treating 27 like 27 did to Eri at the 8 Precepts. Control, but also care.

27 doesn't want to think about how nice that would be.

*

27 realizes it when he finds himself staring at the cards and unable to do anything else. He's too exhausted, his brain is mush just like Bakugo said it would be. But he can't let it be.

He's been trying to hide it by bracing his head on the table with his hand, by humming like Eri does when she's trying to think of a good strategy, or when she's trying to bluff him to reveal a card that's in his hand. It's easy to play along to let her win like that, to pull a fake grimace when she draws out saying a number that he has, when he earns an excited wiggle of her feet by losing that card. But he hasn't been paying attention, hasn't been feeding her enough false tells, he's been playing the game too honestly and now there's no way for her to win.

He has seven full suites, and there's only 13 in this game. And that means that he's won.

But he doesn't want to win, because that means that Eri loses. He's never done that, he's never beaten her at any of these games and he doesn't want to, but he can't think of a way to let her win, what rule he needs to bend for that or what new one he can make up.

His brain is too mush for that, so he just stares and tries to force it to solidify. To give him something.

"Twenny, are you sleepy?" Eri asks, and 27 sucks in a breath, realizing that he's been breathing too slowly. He's not just sleepy, he almost fell asleep.

"No, I'm fine," 27 lies, and tries to think of something. Anything. It should be easy, but it would be easier if he didn't let it get this far. Maybe he can distract her, he can slide two of his suites to her side while she's distracted and maybe she won't notice. Maybe she doesn't count things like he does.

He hopes she doesn't, but he doesn't know. She might count things all the time, she might have counted the dresses to name them like he named the bricks in his room. He taught her how to count, but he doesn't want her to count like that. But she might. He might have taught her to count like that on accident, with good intentions but scars all the same. "Twenny."

"Do you have-" 27 forgets himself, but there's a reminder in his throat. He's grateful for that, but not for the panic, not for the way he barely remembers how to swallow against a cough.

He's getting sick. Even if he ate that food and drank everything that Bakugo gave him, he's still getting sick, and he can't. He can't scare Eri like that, it couldn't have come at a worse time. He's already made her upset, he's given her a nightmare because he reminded her with the face mask, she woke up without him and that scared her because it's happened too many times before. It might happen again.

He doesn't know what they'll do if they know that he's sick, and he doesn't want to find out. Chisaki might have been right, maybe they should be separated if he's sick, he doesn't want to infect her or get her dirty with his germs. Yamada and his owner might not want that either, they want Eri healthy and well and well cared for but they should know that 27 isn't good for that, for any of that. They should probably take him away.

“Twenny, you’re sleepy and you should take a nap! I promise you won’t have bad dreams!” Eri says, and he’s sure this should work. This should be distracting, and it should keep him from getting sick.

“I’m not sleepy, I’m hungry,” 27 says, almost choking on the last word trying to keep it so quiet. Aizawa has been on his laptop and shuffling through papers next to it, papers that might concern the investigation but 27 has been ignoring that. He knows he’s too sloppy right now to cover his tracks, and even if he knows he should know what they know, he doesn’t want to get caught so soon.

He doesn’t want to get caught, but he needs to eat. He knows he needs to eat to keep from getting sick, to get nutrients, but he also feels hungry in a way that doesn’t make sense. He ate a lot of Blasty’s food and he shouldn’t be hungry so soon after that, but he is.

He has those snacks that Recovery Girl gave him, but he doesn’t want to eat them. He wants to have something to eat just in case he needs it, but he feels bizarrely irritated thinking about eating them. He feels like he wants something else, and that’s bizarre by itself. He doesn’t know what he wants, but he knows he shouldn’t want it, he should just eat and be grateful that he can, that everything he’s eaten here is nothing like what he’s eaten before.

It’s irritating, and he can’t even bury his head in his arms to forget about it because Eri will think that he’s tired. And he is, but he doesn’t want her to know that.

Yamada walks in, finally awake after sleeping for so long, and 27 can barely hide his relief. He knows how to get things from Yamada, getting food is easy, and 27 can use him to distract himself from how tired he is. ‘Can you teach me to cook?’

Yamada has one eye closed, 27 was too sloppy to notice he was yawning, but he blinks for a moment before he smiles, and it looks odd. It looks like he’s tired. “Oh, sure thing Shinsou! I sure hope someone didn’t forget to feed you guys while I was down and out.”

That ‘someone’ looks up from the paperwork, eyes a bit wider in surprise. “We had cereal.”

27 honestly forgot, but they did. He had a full bowl of it, but he still feels hungry. And he shouldn’t, between the breakfast Blasty made him and the cereal, he’s eaten as much in a few hours as he used to eat on a good day before UA. If Bug remembered both meal times, if he didn’t trade or refuse a meal at the 8 Precepts.

He’s almost unnerved by his own greed, but maybe he can convince Yamada that it’s not. That he just wants to learn how to cook, and he needs to eat some of it to make sure it tastes right. But Yamada looks tired, maybe he shouldn’t have asked. Maybe now that he knows that he’s eaten, he’s already eaten their cereal, he won’t want to waste more food on him.

But Yamada looks happy for some reason, like there’s some joke that 27 can’t piece out even if it involves him. His smile has too much teeth, so he knows it’s not entirely a kind smile, but he still trusts it. Even if he probably shouldn’t. “Well, let’s see what we can whip up, listener! I know I’m not in the mood for cereal, and that’s just not filling enough for a growing boy.”

Growing? 27 probably can’t grow, he’s not like Eri. He’s not that young. He’s already taller than some of the hero students, and that should be enough. Maybe he’s shorter than Yamada and Aizawa, but he should be. He’s read that children who don’t eat enough don’t grow very tall, that they can have deformities because of that. He isn’t deformed, and he’s probably lucky for that, but he doesn't think he can grow any taller.

27 gets up and watches out of the corner of his eye to see if Eri will too. She stands, and he walks back to get his glass of water once her back is turned, and slides three of his matched suites to her side. That's done, Eri will win now, and now it's a little easier to accept that he can be a little selfish.

Yamada hums to himself as he looks through the cabinets and refrigerator, before he pulls his hair in a messy bun. He usually braids it on Sundays, he might not have wanted to do this much. He's probably still tired and wanted to drink some coffee first, but 27 forced him to do this by asking for it.

It should feel nice to be able to do that, but it doesn't. It does feel nice, but it feels weird. It feels like guilt and something else, something selfish. 27 should be better at not being selfish.

"Someone needs to go grocery shopping," Yamada says, and 27 wonders if Aizawa will admit what he's done, that he handed that task off to Chocula. If Yamada will get angry with Aizawa if 27 tells him that he did. If it'll feel good this time if he does.

"Someone should be getting groceries right now," Aizawa hiding a rare smirk behind his coffee mug. Apparently, Yamada already knew that he would do that, because he's not angry. He just grins and shakes his head before he looks back at the cabinets.

This is really taking too long. Yamada must be tired, he must be too exhausted to do this. 27 is asking for too much, and he can't find a way to take it back, to ignore it. Maybe this odd hunger is a punishment for that, the way it's still there even though he can feel his stomach twist and knot. He's just being odd, he's being selfish and it was a mistake to let that out. He should have just tried to sleep, to wake up less odd.

Yamada stifles another yawn, and 27 feels worse. Yamada is tired, he's probably still recovering from the concussion even though he worked last night. 27 is making him do this, he's forcing him to, and it doesn't feel nice at all. "Let's see, we've got some pancake mix, a few muffin mixes too, some oatmeal-"

"Oatmeal!" Eri cheers, and he has no idea why. He catches himself grimacing, and he didn't want to give away that tell, but he can barely stand the thought of it. Tasteless, lumpy clots that only serve one purpose - to fill a stomach just enough. Whoever made their breakfast at the 8 Precepts made it thicker than the watery gruel at The Miasma, it was at least better at making 27 feel full. Even if Eri ate less of it and ate a better version of it, there's no reason that she would want it.

But muffins sounded delicious. He's only held one before at The Miasma, when he snuck out of his room and paid the price for inviting Bug's attention like that in the worst way. He traded Mocha just to hold that muffin, and it wasn't worth it. But the cat officer brought him muffins a few times while he was living at the police station, almost like he knew that 27 was tempted by that more than anything else they tried to make him eat. They were warm, he watched the steam fade away from them and couldn't help but try to hold on to the smell before they eventually took them away.

He knows that these muffins wouldn't be poisoned, that Yamada wouldn't poison him. Yamada would probably make some that would smell even better, they would be even warmer because they'd be fresh.

Yamada looks at him after looking at Eri, his eyes are too green, too inviting. It's impossible to think of lying to him when he's looking at his eyes. "Well, that is one very enthusiastic vote for oatmeal, but what feels inspiring to my aspiring little chef today?"

It's cruel that he asks that, that Eri looks at him with her hands curled into fists in front of her chest. She wants oatmeal for some absolutely unfathomable reason, and Yamada is still giving him the choice, but it isn't a choice at all. 27 can be a little selfish, but not that much, he can't let it go that far. ' O-A-T-M-E-A-L. '

He deserves this anyway. For being so selfish.

"Oatmeal it is!" Yamada declares, and pulls out a tin that should really look more menacing. It should be black with a red skull on it, it should look like poison because it pretty much is. It's a slow poison and that makes it the worst poison, because it prolongs every inch of suffering. It always seemed to expand in his bowl whenever 27 considered the risk of passing out during a match if he didn't eat it.

"I wouldn't mind muffins, though," Aizawa says, cupping a hand around the back of his neck while he leans back in his chair. "Since it takes a while to bake, it would be a good snack to have on hand."

27 is truly willing to die for Aizawa right now. He's had to be willing to die for a lot of people, for people who rented him and paid for that level of protection. Chisaki often demanded that kind of dedication from the 8 Expendables, and presumed it from 27. But right now, in this moment, he would die for Aizawa's sake.

"Well, that's pretty big talk for a guy who tried to mix batter with a spatula," Yamada says, and 27 needs him to not. He can't do this to him. 27 can accept a certain level of cruelty, but dangling that hope in front of him only to snatch it away is just too much. Especially because it's Yamada. It's such a cruel betrayal that it's almost enough to make him cry. "But, snack muffins sound good! We can set this water to boil and start mixing up a little mix tape. Sound good, my little chefs?"

27 feels like he could cry for a different reason, and he's probably nodding too much, but even Eri agrees. It's almost enough to forget what else Yamada is making, but when he forces 27 to measure the oats in a cup, it's enough of a reminder. He's never seen this side of the process, but just that much, just scooping the oats into that measuring cup feels like a horrible crime. He wonders if whoever cooked at The Miasma had that muffin sitting out just to cope with it.

But he can turn his attention to the muffin mix after that. He honestly has no opinion on the flavor to choose, and he's glad that Eri is there to make that decision. She picks a matcha flavor, probably because it reminds her of Momo and her passion for tea, and 27 gets to measure out the milk and preheat the oven while Eri mixes the batter and Yamada butters a pan.

And then Yamada ruins it. "I wonder if sprinkling some oats on top would work out like I think it will. It would be nice if they toasted up in there, but I usually use some pistachios or sunflower seeds."

If Yamada puts oatmeal on these muffins, 27 will die. He's read books where characters waste away from giving in to such deep despair that they can't go on living, they fade away because their will to live was so incurably poisoned. He's never understood how that could happen until this moment, but now he knows. He knows that he will die if Yamada does this to him.

"Or sugar," Aizawa says, and 27 will die for him. "The matcha can be a bit bland."

Yamada raises an eyebrow at Aizawa, and 27 feels a sickening dread pool in his stomach. "You sure do have a lot of opinions on these muffins that you're not making with us. What's that little story about the hen that went through all the trouble of making bread, but didn't get a crumb of help?"

27 knows that story, he read it to Eri, and Aizawa must have read it too because he rolls his eyes. “You know why I can’t. I’m cursed.” 27 will not die for Aizawa anymore.

“You’re not cursed, Zawa!” Eri says, and he doesn’t want her to say it. He doesn’t want her to think it, but if she says it, he’ll have to correct her and it’s so hard to correct what she says without making her do it. “Only people in movies are cursed, but real people aren’t cursed. That’s just stuff that villains say.”

27 feels relieved enough to cry, he feels blessed. He doesn’t know which hero student taught her that, but he owes them so much. He wishes he could have come up with a line like that for her to believe.

“You’re right,” Aizawa says quietly, seeming scolded enough by Eri for 27 to forgive him. “I’m just very bad at cooking. I would like to help, but I would probably ruin what you’re making.”

Yamada sighs very loudly, like he’s tried to correct Aizawa for saying that too many times but he can show the irritation from it. “Well, I guess this little red hen can spare a slice if you fix me up a cup of coffee for it.”

27 really must be bothering Yamada, and he’s not sure if he can make it up to him. He tries to keep out of Aizawa’s way while he helps Eri pour batter into the tin, topped with sugar thanks to Aizawa. Then they put the tin in the oven, and 27 waits eagerly for the smell of baked muffins now that the task of making oatmeal is unavoidable.

“Alright! So I usually boil it halfway with water, so it’s a little quicker, before I drain it and use coconut milk for the rest,” Yamada explains, and 27 wonders if that will make it different. If that’s a special touch that Yamada adds to it, something like the way a mother changes a recipe to make the food better. He hopes so. “And I know Eri will want some apple slices, cinnamon, and a little bit of honey on hers. I’m a sucker for greek yogurt and pears, but I think we’re out of those, looks like even the dried ones have been nibbled up.”

Those...all sound really good. They sound like they absolutely, do not belong on oatmeal. But it sounds really good.

“Let’s see, we have cinnamon, sugar, honey, syrup, I think that’s all the pantry can say about it. Powdered sugar? Nah, it’s probably too powdery. Apples, we still have a lot of apples. A few plums hanging around, some chives and eggs could make it pretty savory. What flavor are you feeling, Shinsou?” Yamada looks up at him from crouching in front of the refrigerator, still holding the chives, and 27 forgets that he’s talking to him. He’s talking to Shinsou Hitoshi.

Shinsou should probably know what kind of flavor he feels like eating, when he knows that he wants something specific. When he knows that all of those toppings sound nice, when it shouldn’t be a surprise that people put things on oatmeal to make it taste better.

Shinsou probably shouldn’t feel like crying, like there’s a chasm opening up in his chest because he never fucking knew that people did that. That he could have known, he could have a preference like Eri does, but he doesn’t.

‘ I don’t know ,’ 27 signs, because he has to sign something. Yamada is looking at him weird, like he’s concerned about something, and 27 doesn’t want it to be him. ‘ Sweet ,’ he can’t remember the sign for savory. ‘ A little ,’ because he doesn’t really want it to be sweet, but he’s not sure if it should be savory.

“Are you sure? I could whip up an omelette instead, or we could wait for the muffins. You don’t have to eat oatmeal if you don't want to, I'm just kind of a scatterbrain in the morning and I forgot-"

27 shakes his head, ' I want to. ' He doesn't know if Yamada knows, how he knows if Eri never minded it. But he knows if Eri did, if she used to frown to herself before Yamada started making her oatmeal like that, if that happened while he was away, she knows the same thing that he does now. ' It's different. '

It's different enough to try.

Yamada makes him sample everything they have that goes on oatmeal, from a slice of apple that he really doesn't need to the chives and honey that both taste too powerful on their own. He likes the greek yogurt, and wonders if he would like the pears too, and picks that to go with apples and honey. They have a lot of all of those things, so if the oatmeal doesn't taste different enough, he can add more of those things to it.

Yamada makes Eri's bowl in his usual way, taking care to put all those little slivers of apples in a circle before he drizzles honey over it and sprinkles sugar and cinnamon on top. 27 can smell the muffins beginning to cook, he can smell the sugar on top of them strongly enough to make him forget he can't smell it from Eri's oatmeal. He tries to copy what Yamada does with his own bowl, to put a bit of yogurt in the center but when he tries to smooth out the top for the apple slices, it dips into the oatmeal and ruins it. "Oh, that's fine! It looks good Shinsou, it's just a little tricky- it'll still taste the same anyway."

It doesn't.

His stomach twists again at the first bite of it, and he finds it too hard to swallow. It doesn't taste like that, it doesn't taste anything like that, he's never eaten oatmeal like this before. This isn't even oatmeal , it's delicious.

It shouldn't make him angry, but it does. He feels so angry that he feels sick, like he just wants to vomit out this feeling inside of him, but that means that he'd lose this food that he's already eaten. These things were so simple, Yamada just makes them complicated, but they aren't. The coconut milk was in a can, and canned food is cheap, even if it's not as cheap as water. Just that much, just that much could make a difference. He could have gotten a spoonful of sugar or a packet of it when he made a client happy, not that it happened often. It still could have happened.

He could have had this before, but he didn't.

"You don't have to eat it, Shinsou," Yamada says quietly, trying not to disturb Eri's happiness from eating this treat, the way she hums with her happy hum but it still sounds so different from the way she used to. 27 doesn't want to disturb it either, doesn't want to disturb any of them, not Eri and not Yamada and not Aizawa. But he can't eat the rest of it with his stomach so tight, with his inability to separate disgust with himself and disgust for this meal.

This food isn't complicated, but he is. He's too complicated and his mind is too simple now, too tired to understand it. ' Sorry. Tired. I like it. ' He feels like crying because he likes it.

Eri apparently learned the sign for 'tired,' and she seems too excited about it. "You should take a nap, Twenny! I can nap with you so you won't have bad dreams!"

27 looks at her nearly full bowl of oatmeal that Yamada put so much care into and frowns. "I'll be fine, Eri. You should finish your food...."

He doesn't want to remember saying that. He doesn't want to remember the hundreds of times that he's said it. He doesn't want to remember why he said it, that unspoken threat that Chisaki's glare held.

You're supposed to be taking care of that, Dog.

"But I wanna--"

"I don't want you to," 27 says, his words falling out in a rush, too rough, too sharp, too wrong for Eri and he hates it. He hates it as soon as he hears them, as soon as he says it, and rubs his eyes with his hands to try to work something better out of his mouth. "I'm sorry, I'm just weird. I'm sorry."

He just has to leave. He can't change his face enough, he's worse than the reminder, he's worse.

He gets up from the table and tries to ignore that Yamada and Aizawa might be disturbed by that. That Yamada might be insulted, that he might not be allowed, but he has to pretend that he is just for the chance to hide his face, hide the mess inside himself threatening to come to the surface, and it begins to before he reaches his room.

He throws the back of his head against his closed door once he's inside and sinks to the ground, feeling nothing for too long before it breaks. Before he remembers what he did, all of it, everything he's forgotten to think he deserves to be here.

He's done that to her, forcing her to eat for materials. He put her under his quirk and walked her to The Chair, again and again and again. He's taken her to that place, never a place that she's safe, he's never done that, only standing and watching while she's hurt again and again and again.

He's selfish. He's selfish and rotten, he's an ugly person meant to be thrown away. He could have shown it to Chisaki, he could have proved that Eri didn't have to be taken out of the room, that even when he got sick and lost his voice, he still had his quirk. She wouldn't have been taken out of the room, she wouldn't have learned to do that clap. That was one thing he could have protected her from and he didn't fucking do it.

He can't leave. They won't let him. They won't do it, but they should. They should make sure that Eri's happy. If they won't throw him away, they should make him into a better person, a person who doesn't remind Eri and a person who wouldn't hurt her.

They can't. They can't make him into Shinsou Hitoshi.

Shinsou Hitoshi doesn't have scars, he's never met Chisaki and he's never been sold. Shinsou Hitoshi likes greek yogurt and pears, and he knows that he likes it, and he can say that easily. Shinsou Hitoshi isn't mute, and he doesn't have to be, because he was born without a quirk and that changed his life drastically.

Shinsou Hitoshi kept Mocha, and ate muffins, and went to school with Ashi. Shinsou Hitoshi is a good person, a great person, and he's never done a single thing to hurt Eri. Eri grew up smiling because Shinsou Hitoshi smiled at her, Eri grew up better and Eri is taller because she ate food to grow instead of eating for materials to be used to repair her.

27 wants to be Shinsou Hitoshi, but he isn't, he can't force his way through that wall and into a better reality. He can't change his name that easily. He can't forget, no matter how hard he tries, and he can't sleep because he remembers too much.

27 wants to be Shinsou Hitoshi, but he can't change his name.

Someone has to change it for him.

He knows how to do that. He knows how to forget, how to turn those memories into dreams, into things he's not sure of and things that he might be wrong about. He doesn't know what will stick in the end, what will be his mother's eyes in the rearview mirror, but he thinks it will be enough. If just one thing haunts him, it will be enough.

He knows that when someone comes in here, they'll call him Shinsou. He knows if he answers to it, it will become his name.

27's fingers shake, but he pulls the string lights out of the outlet, and ignores the maggots writhing in his stomach.

*

Yamada puts away one bowl of oatmeal, and finds himself looking at a sad little bean only staring at hers. And he imagines that Eri's excitement to help with brunch preparations wasn't just for the excitement of helping.

Shouta seems to notice that too, setting aside his little research project to hopefully put it to good use when he closes the laptop and looks at Eri. "Is something wrong, Eri?"

Eri pouts a bit at that, chin resting on her arms while she stares at the oatmeal like it will bring Shinsou out of his room. Almost like she knows what Shouta is trying to do by pretending the answer isn't obvious. "No," Eri answers, and that word has never sounded so hollow.

"I have a feeling that something is bothering you, and I would like to help if that's the case," Shouta says, and those big pitiful eyes turn to him full of hope. "But I can't know what it is if you don't tell me."

Absolutely everyone in this room knew what was bugging the little bean, but the person who probably had no idea wasn't in here. But this little exercise might just be the trick to help Eri communicate that to him a little better.

Eri shrinks into herself a bit, like she's weighing the possibility of being in trouble. She's honestly never been in trouble at UA, and the few little shenanigans she's pulled off have never seemed worth even half of a time out. It's always seemed like the wards had been punished enough for things that weren't their fault, and adding a time out to that seemed too cruel.

"I miss Twenny," Eri admitted, doing a great job of 'communicating needs and wants clearly' to Shouta. "It's bad, but... I liked it better when he didn't leave."

Yamada had to admit, that was a little bad. Shinsou was doing surprisingly well being apart from Eri, he was making those same tentative steps towards connections with others that she had made a bit more easily at first. He knew it was hard because they trusted each other so much, because they only had each other for years, but as much as Eri wanted to be a little kid and be taken care of by Shinsou like she had before, Shinsou deserved to be a teenager. He deserved to have some space and the chance to explore himself as a person.

He deserved to explore what being free really meant now that they both were outside of that room.

"It's not bad to feel that way," Shouta reassures, with the same gentle tone that he always uses, that Eri never seemed to doubt anymore. "Do you feel like you haven't spent enough time with Shinsou lately?"

It's a nudge, but it might be one Eri needs. She nods, still looking at the oatmeal like Shinsou might just pop out of it. "Even if he's weird and grumpy, I still wanna be with him, but he doesn't like me anymore."

"What makes you say that, little bean?" Yamada asks, sure that it couldn't just be a little time apart to make Eri think that Shinsou didn't even like her.

"He wasn't playing like he's s'posed to. He always acts like he's really play-sad when I pick his card, and he didn't at all! He really didn't want to play with me but I made him do it," Eri says, and almost realizes what Shinsou was doing with his little 'play-sad' act.

"Shinsou was very tired today, because he hadn't slept well," Shouta says, drawing a guilty little frown over Eri's face. "I think that he was playing Go Fish with you despite that, because he knew that you wanted to play with him. Because even if he was tired, he wanted to make you happy."

Eri tilts her head at that, before her head falls to her arms in a huff. "But I want Twenny to be happy too. Even if he's asleep, I just wanna be with Twenny."

Yamada glances at Shouta, trying to hold back his own excitement to tell her the big revelation, and he gets that nod that he's waiting for. "So it sounds like Shinsou was trying to make you happy, but he didn't really know the best way to do it, because he didn't know exactly what you wanted. And if you just want to spend time with Shinsou, I'm sure that he'll be happy to do that if you tell him that."

Eri still looked a bit unsure about that, a bit like she might get in trouble for saying something that bold, but Shouta's nod seemed to be enough reassurance. "Can I tell Twenny now? If he's sleeping I promise I won't bother him, I'll just wait until he wakes up to tell him."

Yamada smiled, sure that he wouldn't mind if Eri had the patience to carry through her little promise. With midterms behind them and quite a few chores on Kan's shoulders, it would be nice to just spend some time with his husband on a lazy Sunday afternoon knowing that the wards wouldn't need them for a few hours.

Then Yamada heard a door open so hard that it slammed against a wall, before another slammed shut, and in the silence he could hear the faintest sign that none of that slamming was due to teenage hormones. That was the sound of a teenager throwing up.

He glanced at Shouta but honestly didn't want it to be a question, and answered it himself by rushing down the hall. Maybe Shouta was just as capable of checking on Shinsou and making sure he wasn't riding out the waves of nausea on his own, but Yamada wanted to be there.

Maybe want is a strong word for a guy who's just as much of a sympathy vomiter as a sympathy crier, but Yamada just swallowed down the twinge in his stomach when he heard that wet heave and knocked on the door. "Shinsou?"

He realized a bit too late that clapping was probably as likely to happen as talking for Shinsou right now, and sheepishly opened the door to see what he'd find.

No mess on the floor, probably thanks to the rush that sent all those doors flying, but the poor kid hugging the toilet looked like enough of a mess himself. Yamada felt another twinge when he recognized that coiled tension in Shinsou's back, the fact that he wasn't breathing right now due to the fact that he probably couldn't with another upchuck soon to be chucked, but he tampered that down to kneel on the floor and have no idea what to do with his hands.

Shinsou probably wouldn't appreciate him holding back his hair, and luckily his hair wasn't long enough for that to be a concern. He wasn't entirely sure if a reassuring hand on the back was a great idea either, if he'd flinch and mess up his perfect aim thus far, but when Yamada heard that sickening heave, he couldn't just watch.

"Hey buddy, it's alright," Yamada muttered, running a hand over Shinsou's back and imagining that he could draw whatever upset his stomach right out of him on the upstroke. "Well, it's not alright, it's definitely not fun for you right now, but we'll just get that out-" Another successful heave cut him off, and Yamada held his breath until the smell wouldn't get to him quite as strongly. "You'll feel better after this, just got to get through the worst of it."

He knows he checked the expiration date on that yogurt, but he can't remember if Shinsou has had dairy before. Greek yogurt was close enough to lactose-free for most, but Shinsou might be a bit more sensitive to it. He probably was, they had no idea what Shinsou was used to eating before he came to UA, but it didn't seem to be very varied.

A small watery deposit was made in the porcelain throne before the dry heaving set in, and after the second one seemed to promise that the worst was over, Yamada gently pried Shinsou far enough away to flush. The acrid smell faded a bit at that, enough that it probably wouldn't trigger another spell from either of them, and Yamada let Shinsou dry heave a few more times over the toilet before he got up to start setting the poor kid to rights.

"Okay, let's give this a little swish first to get the taste out," Yamada says, handing off a cup of water and wincing when Shinsou's eyes got a little wider when he tried, like the second coming was coming. But luckily, all that came out was the rinse. "And a bit of mouthwash too, just be careful with it. Just a swish, that gag reflex is pretty sensitive right now."

That bubblegum pink was a bit easier to see coming out of Shinsou's mouth than the stuff that came out beforehand, and Yamada flushed it all away before sitting down with a wet hand towel to brush away the sweat on Shinsou's brow, worrying whether it was really a bout of food poisoning that caused it. "Sor...s-sorry."

Yamada took in Shinsou's glassy and unfocused eyes, his chest full of twinges now that his stomach was fine. There's always an instinctive shame that comes with that kind of violent sick, but he hopes that it isn't worse for Shinsou, and that Yamada's attempts to be there through that didn't make it worse. "It's fine, buddy. Just a little upset stomach, nothing to worry over. You didn't do anything wrong."

Shinsou grimaces, turning his head away from the wet cloth before he shakes his head. "W-wanted to b-be norma-al. W-w-wanted..."

Shinsou sucks in a breath and Yamada finds himself trying not to do the same. He should have known, he should have known better than to trust that Shinsou knew what was best for himself. Sure, the kid needed to eat more and needed to eat when he wanted to, but he probably had an idea that his food intake wasn't what it was supposed to be. That it wasn't 'normal,' and that might have inspired him to push himself beyond his limit to fix that. "Shinsou, it's okay. It takes some time, but we'll get there, alright? You're normal, you're normal for you and that's perfectly fine, alright? That's right where you need to be right now."

Shinsou seems too worn out to fight a few more dabs to his temple, something that Yamada hoped would soothe him a little bit. Yamada wiped away the lingering moisture with the dry half of the towel, before he stood up to fetch the thermometer from the cabinet, hoping he'd be able to find a sign one way or another from the reading.

And just like he figured, it really didn't tell him much. Shinsou had a fever, but he almost always did, and even if it was just a hair above mild, he couldn't be sure if that made him sick.

Even if it wouldn't be surprising if he was, after drinking that woman's spit.

"Let's get you to bed, alright? A little ginger tea and a few crackers to settle your stomach, just a few," Yamada says, finding himself both unnerved and relieved that Shinsou lets him pull him up to standing with an arm around Yamada's shoulders. He knows Shinsou doesn't like being touched so much, but the weakness that makes it hard for the teenager to walk on his own, his unfocused eyes and the fact that he spoke probably means that he has far bigger issues than that to deal with.

Yamada has to turn on the lights, surprised that the string lights are out. Even when Shinsou sleeps alone, Yamada imagines that he prefers to know exactly where he's waking up before any doubts can set in, and that's exactly why Yamada made sure to set them up before Shinsou came to UA.

"Okay, let's just sit right here," Yamada mutters, helping Shinsou lean back against the wall at the head of his bed, pulling a throw blanket from the foot of it over him when the kid seemed too exhausted to be moved under the comforter. "Just get that tea--"

Yamada felt the smallest tug on his shirt and looked down to see Shinsou holding onto the hem of it, shaking his head. His expression seemed close to tears, lips twisted in a tight grimace and eyes nearly shut, before he breathes in and managed to hide half of that. ' Sorry. Fine. Don't. '

Yamada sat down on the edge of the bed, ignoring that the leg pulling away wasn't just to make room, and tried to find a way to smile reassuringly. "It's no problem, Shinsou. You're not feeling too hot, and making tea for that will do a lot to help you, it won't bother me at all."

' Bother. Cooking, ' Shinsou signed, lips twisting again, and Yamada was reminded that even those little requests could be hard for Shinsou to ask for in a different way. That the kid has probably learned not to rely on an adult, and probably sees even something as enjoyable as sharing a love for cooking to be a great burden for Yamada.

"You weren't bothering me, Shinsou. I like teaching you things, and you know that. I like taking care of you too, you know?" Yamada says, his hand resting on a knee that he's relieved doesn't finch away. "You're probably feeling a little nauseous, but does your head hurt? Feel a little sniffly or a little cough coming on?"

Shinsou shook his head, a sniff still coming, but with the hand coming up to wipe at the corner of his eye, he didn't think it was a sign of being sick. ' Don't. E-R-I. Not sick. Don't. '

Yamada winces, knowing that his little bean's efforts to keep Shinsou healthy by making sure he brushed his teeth and washed his hands weren't just for his benefit. Sometimes it seemed fine, it was starting to look like that little tic was beginning to fade, but Yamada imagines that there was a reason for it. "Before you guys were rescued, you got sick, right? And something bad happened after that?"

Shinsou nods, and with shaking hands he does exactly what Yamada was afraid of, and what he half-suspected already. That small, quiet clap seems to rattle Shinsou more than himself. ' Took her. Taught her that. My fault- '

"No," Yamada argues, trying to keep himself from grabbing one of Shinsou's hands to keep him from signing that lie, convincing himself of it more through that. "Shinsou, that wasn't your fault. Nothing that Chisaki did was ever your fault, and it wasn't your fault that you got sick. You really couldn't help that, any of that."

Shinsou grimaces, hands folding together and fingers squeezing too tightly, trying to keep from signing something else. Yamada knows there's something else, and he hopes that Shinsou will let him know about it.

"I know something's bugging you, kiddo," Yamada says, and hopes that Shinsou can open up about it. He knows that there's plenty of reasons that he can think of to set Shinsou this on edge, he knows that absolutely nothing that Shinsou will tell him will be a surprise. It would be a surprise if it's just one thing.

' Can't sleep. I want to forget, ' Shinsou signs, and Yamada would be lying if he said he didn't want that too. His kids have been through so many things that he wished didn't happen to them, and so many that he wishes they could at least forget. He knows that Shinsou remembers more, and opens up about less of it, but he hopes that with the investigation leaving him alone, he can open up about it for his own sake.

"Is it your mom again?" Yamada asks, hoping that knowing she was captured wasn't a reminder for Shinsou that she exists, that she did whatever she did to him. That it didn't start up those nightmares again.

Shinsou shakes his head, eyes too red and irritated, too hollow after seeing too much. ' Dark. C-H-I-S-A-K-I. All of it. If I sleep. '

All of it was too much, all of it too dark to even think about. Years of darkness, of terror and pain, and all of that was coming down on Shinsou too hard right now. Coming when he couldn't run or distract himself from it, and when Yamada couldn't be there to stop it.

Unless he could be.

"You do need to sleep, kiddo," Yamada says, unwilling to let himself wonder when was the last time Shinsou did get more than a handful of hours. "How about this - I'll get the tea really quick, and stay here, and we can just talk. Do something to get your mind off of all of it. And I'll be there if it comes back, alright?"

Shinsou takes a while to consider it, but just the smallest nod answers him, and Yamada can't help but smile at that. He's not as experienced on nightmare duty as Shouta or Mirio, but he knows that he can try his best at it. And he knows he can distract Shinsou from anything that might come up later when he's sleeping.

But when he goes back to the kitchen to see a settled Eri and an unsettled husband, he's not sure if he can distract him from this. "I need to talk to Ashido and Midoriya for the case. Is Shinsou..." Shouta lets the question trail off, and Yamada isn't quite sure how to answer it.

"Think he might have eaten too much, just gonna whip up some tea and let him rest for a bit," Yamada says, asking Eri to help him pick out a mug while trying to push the smallest amount of dread from Shouta's crossed arms and fixed stare at the door. "You need to go now?"

Shouta makes sure Eri's back is turned before he signs it, a scowl working over his face. ' Extradition not approved. They know something. '

It was amazing that Shinsou Ui could still be hurting Shinsou from halfway across the world, to pull away Shouta's attention like this. "Okay, just don't take too long. Sounds like we might all be down for a little afternoon slumber party. Does that sound good, little bean?"

Eri nodded, both hands clasped around a purple cat patterned mug that she was staring a bit too intently at. “Is Mom mad?”

“No, sweetheart, Shinsou’s not mad. He’s not sleeping too good and not feeling too hot, but we’ll fix that up together. Does that sound good?” Yamada asks, getting a bit more excitement on the next nod from his best little helper in the whole world. He gets distracted when the timer for the muffins goes off, frankly relieved that he was there instead of trusting Shouta to know to turn the oven off after taking them out. “Shou?”

Shouta looks up, and he knows the hesitation to leave probably shouldn’t be a hesitation at all. Their wards needed him here, and even if Yamada could manage it, he’d rather be able to focus on Shinsou to set him to rights before patching things up with Eri.

But he knows that Shouta won’t really be here until he knows one way or another if Shinsou Ui will still be boarding that plane, and he hopes upon hope that those two students know something. “Just let me know how it goes, okay?”

Shouta nods, almost forgetting to tell Eri goodbye, and nearly forgetting his capture scarf as well. Yamada’s long since given up the fight about jackets, but he’s pleased to see that Shouta puts one on himself.

And he doesn’t want to think about what would happen if the woman who gave Shinsou so many bad experiences that turned into nightmares walked away from Interpol’s custody scot-free.

Image Rehearsal Therapy

Chapter Summary

27 knows that he's getting sick, but he has a plan to hide that. Monoma arrives to evaluate Eri and Shinsou's quirks, and makes a startling discovery when he does. Aizawa and Shinsou both have nightmares, and are able to have a late night talk because of it.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: Blood, Flashback, 50 mention, Bug mention

Previously on Wards of UA: Shinsou has been struggling with nightmares, most prominently from the night that he attempted to escape from UA and had 4 successive nightmares that caused Eri to worry. One of the first signs that Shinsou taught Eri while they were still living at the 8 Precepts was 'Danger', and taught Eri to stop doing whatever she was doing when he signed it. Shinsou threw up the last chapter and Yamada was going to bring him ginger tea and stay with him while he fell asleep to keep him from having nightmares. Eri has been unhappy with how little time Shinsou is spending with her, and the separation between them has increased since she lost her first tooth and developed a 'tooth whistle.' Shinsou thinks that wearing a cloth face mask reminds Eri of the metal mask he wore at the 8 Precepts, and that it gave her a nightmare last night. Shinsou tried to imitate the conditioning he went through at The Miasma to 'forget' everything that happened to him and 'rename' himself as 'Shinsou.' Aizawa invited Monoma to the dorm to copy Shinsou and Eri's quirks to evaluate them, to see if Monoma could find a way for Eri to control hers and if Shinsou's quirk would affect Yamada, as a condition of Shinsou's wardship depends on Yamada being immune to Brainwashing because he is deaf. Shinsou told Bakugo that Monoma was threatening him, and Bakugo planned to resolve that while Monoma was '1-A's Servant For a Day.' Vlad King has been doing errands for Aizawa since his class lost at the Joint Training Exam. Eri likes giving characters like Mirio and Kirishima high fives. Shinsou thinks that Mirio sees him differently after Shinsou used his quirk on Midoriya to try to escape UA. Shinsou Ui's extradition was denied, and Aizawa left in the last chapter to talk to Midoriya or Ashido, suspecting that Shinsou told them something about her on the night he tried to escape. When Aizawa has a flare up from his PTSD related to USJ, he recites his class roster as a ritual to ground himself. Ashido thought that All Might and Aizawa could have been in a romantic relationship before Shinsou told her that Aizawa and Yamada were married. Shinsou can use his quirk to take control of Eri without talking to her. Aizawa promised Shinsou that the investigation would never need to question him again, after Shinsou was forced to say The Miasma's name in an interrogation with Jun. Shinsou's first sign name, that he didn't give to Aizawa, was 'Zawa Coffee.' Shinsou has a cat plushie that looks similar to one that he had when he was a child, and both are named 'Mocha.'

The needles. The needles are in her arms and legs too deep, the blood is running over her arms and legs, pooling onto the floor, she's going to die.

"Twenny!"

She knows she's going to die and that only makes it worse, she's terrified and he can't do anything, he can't speak, he can't make him answer, he can't stop this.

"Twenny!"

He has to try, he has to do something, he doesn't care if he dies, it should be him and not her, he should be in that chair, he should take those scars and those wounds on himself.

"Twenny!"

He looks down and doesn't see the restraints. The blood isn't flowing like it should, it's running out, it's running out of her and over her arms and onto his hands.

His hands are the restraints. He's holding her here, he's the one keeping her from getting out, he's killing her.

"Twenny," Eri whines, warm, he's too warm, she's warm, her hair is in his face, she's holding onto him too tight, something bad happened, she's scared.

He jerks away, he has to know, he has to know if Chisaki's here, if he scared her, if he hurt her but he's not.

He's not at the 8 Precepts. They were rescued.

He looks down at Eri's fuller face, her cheeks rounded like they should be, her eyebrows drawn together in worry like they shouldn't. His hand is still on her shoulder, her arms aren't bandaged, aren't bleeding. She's safe, it was a nightmare, and he's worried her over that again. "Sor-"

His voice is rough and hoarse, and the pain in his throat triggers a cough that he can barely swallow down. He knows that she's caught it, she's seen too much of it by the way that her eyes widen in fear. "Twenny, you're sick-"

He shakes his head, signs 'Danger' when he realizes how loud she's being. She stops, he's too thankful that she listens this time, and spots the mug by his bed and hopes that it has something to drink inside of it. The tea is cold and bitter, but he hopes that it recovers his voice just enough. "I'm not sick, Eri. Just thirsty."

He sees Yamada sleeping in the computer chair, notices the music softly playing from the phone on the desk. Yamada was supposed to distract him, supposed to bring him this tea, but he must have fallen asleep before either of those things could help him.

He feels the pain in his throat and knows that the tea won't be enough. He won't have tea at school tomorrow, and eventually, they'll notice. They'll know when he loses his voice only because he won't be able to talk to Eri.

Eri looks at him too seriously, making him think that she knows what he's thinking, and that she disapproves. He knows that she will, she won't like it, but he needs her to agree to it. He knows he'll get better, he just needs to hide it in the meantime. "Twenny, I gotta talk to you."

He fights not to raise an eyebrow at that, how serious she sounds and how it almost sounds like she's so much older than she is. He nods, drinking more of the tea so that he can answer her.

She squirms a bit closer despite her bravado, seriousness falling away into pleading, and he knows he'll do whatever she wants so badly. "Twenny, do you have problems with my tooth whistle?"

He tries not to laugh, because that's ridiculous. "No, I don't. I...really like your tooth whistle," 27 answers, trying not to admit that he likes it a little too much. It's adorable, it's a reminder that she lost her first tooth, that she can lose her teeth here, that she's growing and thriving because she can.

One of her feet brushes against his leg, toes curling and picking at his pants. "I can stop if you don't like it. I know you don't, 'cause you don't wanna be around me anymore."

"Eri," 27 says, running a hand through his hair while he tries to figure out why she was being absolutely ridiculous. "I want to be around you and I really, really like your tooth whistle. And I really like you. I just... had to do a lot of stuff for the investigation. And I don't...."

He frowns, finding himself pressing a hand to his forehead to chase the small relief from his cold hand. He's not sure if he wants to admit this, if he wants to know the answer. If Eri would start to realize it if he said it.

"I don't want to remind you of the bad stuff we went through. I'm not going to wear the face masks anymore and I shouldn't have-"

Eri shakes her head, and he can tell just by how wide her eyes get that he has to remind her to be quiet with a finger pressed against his lips. She shrinks a bit at that, glancing at Yamada, and presses herself a bit closer to the bed with her hands cupped around her mouth. "I like the masks, Twenny. They're cute. And you don't remind me of bad stuff."

He knows he does. He's part of the 'bad stuff.' She's just too young to realize it, but one day she will. She'll hate him for it.

"You're the good stuff. Like when you read to me, and you sing, and I really..." Eri trails off, her toes picking at his pants, and he can feel the strain in her feet when she does it. "I really miss you. And I wanna to spend time with you. Because the good stuff here isn't good without you."

He puts the mug back on the bedside table to hold her close, knowing that she's that upset about it. He should have realized it, he's supposed to know her better than this, but he really didn't see it.

She wants him here. She still needs him like this. Even if he's just comfort to her the same way her favorite plushie is, that's enough. He can't take that away from her, they're family. Until Yamada and Aizawa tell her outright, he's the only family that she has, and he can't abandon her like that.

He almost did. If it worked, if waiting in the dark until he forgot everything had worked, if it had renamed him, he would have forgotten about her. He would have forgotten how small she was, every inch that she's grown since he met her. He would have forgotten things that she's left behind and grown out of, her happy hum and her dancing, all of the drawings that they lost but he still remembers.

Out of the corner of his eye, he can see the picture of 50 on his desk, lit up by Yamada's phone. He could have forgotten about her too.

He can't afford to only have one thing that haunts him. He can't pick between Eri and 50. "I'm sorry. I'm just weird here."

She shakes her head, but when she finally settles, when he knows that she believes him, he has to prove that he's weird here with a request that he knows she won't like and won't understand. But he has to make it.

"I'm not going to leave, and I'm going to spend more time with you from now on. But I really need you to do something for me, even if you don't like it," 27 says, and he can tell by her pout that she already doesn't like it. "I need you to pretend that I can't talk to you anymore."

She doesn't like that. She shakes her head, and he knows just by the wideness of her eyes that she's going to be too loud, too angry at that, and he presses a finger back to his lips in a panic, glancing at Yamada to make sure he's still sleeping.

"I can still talk to you when we're alone, if we're really quiet. But it's really important for everyone else to think that I can't," 27 says, and he doesn't want to scare her, but he needs her to listen. He can cover everything else up, he can be more careful and he won't be so reckless with eating so much. But he knows that he's going to lose his voice, and he needs to make sure to lose it in a different way first.

Eri stills for a moment, her head tilting curiously with her horn digging into the pillow beneath her head, before he sees a spark of excitement in her eyes. "Is it a logical ruse?"

Yes. "Yep, it's a logical ruse. I'm going to trick Yamada and Aizawa, and I need you to help me with that," 27 says, relief sinking in so deeply that he nearly sinks through the bed with it. "Even if they seem really sad about it, just remember to keep it up, because it'll be even funnier when they find out because they were so worried."

Her lips twist up, unsure whether she wants to go that far, to make Yamada and Aizawa worried, but he needs to prepare her for that if it comes. He needs her to hold out despite that, to keep the lie going.

"It's just like with Class 1-A. We made them really worried, but it was really funny after that. And I want to do a logical ruse with you on Aizawa and Yamada, to prove that we're better at it than they are," 27 says, tugging on that previous excitement about the logical ruse, and her desire to spend more time with him.

He knows it's wrong, but it works. "Okay, I'm gonna act really sad-"

"No," 27 cuts off. He knows that will bring more attention to it in the worst way, Aizawa and Yamada wouldn't be able to stand it if she were upset by it. And he doubts that she could be convincing enough long term. "I want you to pretend that you're okay with it, or maybe that you're a little sad sometimes. I'm going to tell them that I can't talk to you, but I told you that it's a game that we're playing. I want them to be a little worried, but if you're sad, they'll be really sad about that too, and that's too mean for a logical ruse."

Eri nearly smiles at that, cheeks twitching in a grin that looks a bit too devious, but he can't help but smile back at it. She nods, holding up her pinky like she does for Mirio, and he takes it as she squirms even closer, trying to hide her giggling with her hand.

She's getting a little too excited about these kind of cons, and it will probably come back to bite him one day. But for now, he needs it. "Okay, so we're going to pretend that we're playing a game where you have to understand what I'm saying with my hands. I know you know some signs, so that'll make it easier to believe. And I can still talk to you through sign if I really need to, when we're not alone."

Eri nods, still excited about the logical ruse, and he hopes he can play it off if she slips. He doesn't want Aizawa and Yamada to be too concerned, but he doesn't want them to be suspicious either. He just needs to hide his voice for a while, and maybe they can be fooled into thinking that it's his quirk. Since there's nothing they can do for that, they'll leave it alone, and when he recovers on his own, he can convince them that it's acting normal again.

As normal as his quirk is now.

27 hears a knock on the door and nearly startles at it, unsure what to do. He waits to see if Aizawa will answer it, cursing himself that he hadn't checked his location before he started telling Eri the plan. Surely he wasn't close enough to overhear, otherwise he would have put a stop to their plans before they got underway.

He waits and hears another series of knocks, louder this time, but still not loud enough to wake Yamada. Eri jumps up to do that, shaking his arm to wake him up into a panic. "Oh, what's- fell asleep, jeez, I didn't mean to-"

The knocks are incredibly loud, the person making them seems frustrated, and 27 finds himself very content to pretend that he's still weak from vomiting while he sips at the ginger tea. Yamada seems irritated enough by the knocking to not address him or Eri trailing him at all, storming out with a scowl that must have melted away quickly when he answered the door.

"Oh, Vlad! Sorry, I didn't hear ya the first- and Monoma!"

Shit. Quirk Thief.

27 covers his eyes with his hand, chasing the cool relief from his skin despite that. Quirk Thief would know if he's lying, he's the most dangerous player in this game because of that, and he didn't even realize he would be a part of this game. Even if he seemed to be in pain after stealing his quirk the first time, he would know that his quirk has recovered somewhat. It would be impossible to lie and say that it's gotten worse when he would know the difference, when it probably wouldn't hurt him as much.

27 drinks his tea, seeking to finish it off and keep his voice from breaking if it's needed. Maybe he can postpone the con until after Quirk Thief leaves. Maybe he can discredit him if he says his quirk is fine by proving that it's not in his silence with Eri. It was already risky enough to trust her, but with Quirk Thief in the mix, this plan has become almost too dangerous.

Almost. He knows that he still needs to pull it off. He can't let them know that he's sick, he can't let Eri know either. He just needs to buy an excuse with his silence, and if his quirk can't provide a reason, maybe his broken mind can. He's already told them about the nightmares, but if he makes it sound worse, if he makes himself sound pathetic and crazy enough, maybe they won't question it. Maybe they'd just rather leave it alone and ignore it.

Eri retreats back to his room and closes the door, and he knows by her frown that she's as happy about Quirk Thief being here as he is. "Zawa's not here, so maybe we can trick Yama into making Monoma leave."

That.

That's perfect.

27 can't help the grin on his face, can't help but feel his chest swell with pride. Eri was so good at this, a little too good and he knows this will bite him back one day. He knows she gets away with too much and it'll only make this worse, but right now, when he needed it? This was perfect. "We should do that. Aizawa told him that he just needed his help with something, but he probably didn't tell him what it was. We just need to think of something-"

He cuts himself off when he hears footsteps, and hopes that Yamada hasn't heard his voice when he opens the door. "Hey guys, Monoma's here to do some fun quirk copying tests!" Damn it. "It'll just take a minute, and then we can have some muffins as a snack. Does that sound good?"

Eri turns to him, and in that silent look conveys how not good that sounds, and how much she wants him to find a way out of it. But he can't, he knows he can't, this is beyond him and they just have to hope for the best. ' Not good. But will. '

Yamada sighs, cupping a hand around his mouth while his voice drops to a whisper. "He's really not that bad, and I'm keeping Vlad around to keep him in line. He's not going to do anything crazy in front of his teacher."

27 doubted that. One look from Eri said that she doubted that too. But with a sigh, they both resigned themselves to their fates.

If Eri wanted to hold his hand and practically hide behind him, at least he could offer her that shelter.

And if 27 happened to walk so that Yamada's taller frame was half-hiding him from the Quirk Thief and Chocula, it wasn't cowardice. It was using his environment to his advantage.

But one look at Quirk Thief's singed hair and deep set scowl makes him want to hide fully behind Yamada to take the opportunity to laugh. It seems like Blasty took matters into his own hands. "I wasn't threatening you! I don't know how you, a defenseless ward trapped in the devious machinations of those barbarians of Class A could be manipulated into thinking that way, but I, a hero who walks the path of justice could never possibly fathom even considering the possibility of-"

"Okay, we got it, turn the volume down just a tad, Monoma," Yamada asked, and if Current Amplifier was telling someone to turn it down, that was incredibly telling all by itself. "Someone might have gotten the wrong impression about that nice little gift you sent, and someone might have gotten ahold of that and taken it the wrong way. Shinsou is very sorry about that." He was not. "And it looks like... Todoroki or Bakugo-"

"The filthy mouthed uncouth-"

"Okay, yep, Bakugo will get a very stern talking to, don't worry about it," Yamada reassured, the same way someone might coo at a rabid dog just to keep it from snarling. And it worked exactly the same way. Foam still dripping from its maw in Quirk Thief's unhinged eyes, but his crossed arms and pursed lips at least seemed to promise blissful silence. For now.

Chocula sighs, putting groceries away and disturbingly seems to know where everything is supposed to go. "Since Eraserhead isn't here, I'll take it that I'll be finished after grading his 3-A Heroics Midterms and updating both of your gradebooks."

"Vlad, it's fine, I can take over the gradebooks since you've had enough on your plate already," Yamada says, bringing a flicker of life back into Chocula's eyes. And 27 would rather that he didn't, because his eyes settle on Eri for a bit longer than 27 would like, giving her a small wave. "You guys have both had a pretty demanding day, so I'll try to cut it a bit shorter. Monoma, I'd like you to try to copy Eri and Shinsou's quirks and see if you can use them."

Quirk Thief's eyes went a bit too wide, his grin too tight, and 27 lets Eri hide behind him fully when he realized what that meant. Quirk Thief was going to touch Eri and steal her quirk. And he didn't want that to happen.

Maybe if Eri started crying, or seemed too scared to do it, Yamada wouldn't make her. He won't let Quirk Thief touch her. 27 looks to see if Yamada is looking at them, maybe he could sign whisper to Eri, but it's too late. Quirk Thief is already advancing, trying to mold that too manic grimace into something reassuring, a mask that he doesn't wear enough and that makes it all the more fake.

But he kneels down, and it almost seems natural for a second, it wanes just enough to make it seem like he's not completely insane. "It won't hurt, and I won't have it for long. Whenever you're ready, you can give me a high five."

No. He already knew her weaknesses.

He feels Eri shift from one foot to the other, and that shuffle pulls her a little bit farther away from him. He feels the urge to pull her back but he ignores it, he knows that Yamada is insistent on this. He just keeps his eyes locked on Quirk Thief to make sure he doesn't do anything he shouldn't.

She gives him a high five, neither hard enough to hurt his hand or soft enough to bruise his ego, and 27 wishes that she did. It's goddamn unnatural and Yamada needs to stop this.

"Ah, it's a dud," Quirk Thief whines, picking at Eri's horn on his head it needs to go away. "It's an accumulation type quirk. Since I can only copy the fundamental abilities of a quirk, I can't copy what's already been stored."

27 takes a deep breath, and tries to force his quirk into Yamada's mind to make him stop this. "Oh, that's too ba- wait, sorry," Yamada says, pulling out his phone to pull it quickly to his ear. "Eraser, what's u... Wait, they didn't. Are you- are you kidding me?! Well, of course 1-A has to be expelled, even the ones that weren't involved probably knew about it!"

Quirk Thief gawks, mouth stretched too wide in an open grin, those unsettling eyes too focused on all of his dreams coming true. Or so he thinks.

27 has been staring, but he can't see any difference, and eventually Yamada notices that too, sighing before he gives up the ruse. "Sorry about that, Eri's quirk accumulates emotions, so I kind of thought--"

That was an overwhelming emotion. It's only a few centimeters, but it's noticeably larger, and Quirk Thief notices that too, wincing before he starts picking at the horn again. He might need to be tortured horribly to test whether he can control the quirk when it builds up to the point that it can release, but if he keeps fondling that horn, 27 will gladly do it.

"It doesn't work when I'm happy," Eri whispers, and 27 feels the guilt pull for not noticing. Eri and Mirio both wanted Eri's quirk to accumulate pure happiness, but if it doesn't work like that, if it can only be triggered by despair and pain, then it won't work.

"Or, maybe Monoma wasn't really all that happy about 1-A getting expelled," Yamada lies, shooting Quirk Thief a pleading look. 27 sees Quirk Thief's mouth drop open to protest, he knows that he's going to do it and he's going to devastate Eri, and 27 will torture him horribly for that.

But then he sighs, looking to the side to shield his expression better, to hide the lie a little bit. "It would be a bit too quiet and peaceful in the hero course without Class A. And perhaps Class B would have to work harder to stand out as the superior class without such an easy comparison to prove it.”

Eri still doesn't believe it at first, her eyes too wide and her head tilted a bit too far, but then she finds something that amuses her. “Mono, it's okay if you wanna be friends with Class A! All the heroes should be friends, even if you've got a dark face!”

He sees the twitch throbbing under Quirk Thief's eye, but he manages to keep his expression from cracking fully. “I'll...consider that, Eri. And I do not have a dark face! Please disregard whoever has been feeding you such lies!”

Quirk Thief stands up, making himself far too close to 27, and looks at him. Eri swings their joined hands, her grip loosening, but he is not going to give Quirk Thief a high five. Not unless he can do it with a knife. He still has that horn and he needs to stop.

27 must have been obvious, he must have given that away and he can't even blame himself for it because it's just that wrong, but Quirk Thief notices it. There's a smirk picking at the edges of that half-reassuring smile, twisting it fully, before he brushes his hair back and his fingers caress the horn that he's stolen obscenely. “Do you think it suits me, Shinsou?”

27 looks at Yamada, he has to stop this, he has to stop 27 before 27 stops it permanently. But Yamada doesn't see it, he's just wincing like Quirk Thief said something odd but he doesn't realize it. He can't comprehend how unbearably, unnaturally, abominably wrong this is. ‘Can I hurt him?’

Yamada never tells him no if he asks for it. “No! You can't- Monoma, can you un-copy Eri's quirk for me? For Shinsou? It's a little-”

“No, I'm very sorry, Present Mic-sensei, but I seem to be unable to do that right now,” Quirk Thief lies, his eyes narrowed into slits but his grin is far more menacing. “It's just so draining to release a quirk before it's time limit, and after everything that Class A put me through, especially that undignified barbarian with a foul mouth and fouler-”

“Monoma,” Chocula calls, sighing in a certain way that seems to remind Quirk Thief of his place in the world - under Chocula's thumb. “It's not dignified to treat a ward like that.”

That's weak, and he hates Chocula all the more for it. He can't even control Quirk Thief, and even Quirk Thief seems surprised by that, before that grin returns all the wider. “Of course, I wouldn't want to upset you, Shinsou. Perhaps we can trade for it? I'll release Eri's quirk if you...”

He's bad at making these deals, and that's the most heroic thing about him. Quirk Thief's eyes glance over him, unsure what he wants from him but he seems to want a body part for some reason.

“Hold my hand. Nicely,” Quirk Thief finishes, hand outstretched and 27 doesn't want to do it nicely. He stares for too long, thinking of which fingers to dislocate or that ever-so-tempting pressure point right above the wrist. He wonders if he could slip up, if he could break Quirk Thief's concentration by breaking something of his, then try to blame it on his training, that he didn't mean to do it.

But Yamada wouldn't like that. 27 sighs, and holds onto the hope that Quirk Thief might be in some amount of agony over this. 27 is, he hates the feeling of Quirk Thief's skin on his hand, he hates that it's still warm even if it's him, he hates that he barely feels like jumping away from it.

He hates Quirk Thief's eyes, because they look too much like his. White pupils, pale blue irises.

But nothing changes, and he imagined that it would be the dark circles under his eyes that Quirk Thief would steal.

Nothing changes, that horn is still there, but before 27 can fix that himself by twisting Quirk Thief's hand just right, he sees those eyes widen a bit before the hand draws away to press against the side of his throat, too quick for 27 to stop him.

His hands move too quick, a pat on his head, a pat on his nose, he tries to grab his hair and that's when 27 finally catches him, catches the finger that he was most looking forward to ripping off, but before he can Yamada interrupts him. "Monoma, what's with the-"

"It's a vocal type, but what quirk exactly does he have?" Quirk Thief asks, and it's irritating that he can pull away so easily from 27, that he almost seems to know he can take these sorts of liberties when he's too weak to punish him for it. "Where would his quirk factor- Dear god, what level of quirk suppressants do you have him on? Whatever specialist you're going to needs to be fined, disbarred, imprisoned-"

"Monoma, what's going on?" Yamada asks, a bit more irritated but there's an undercurrent of concern there that 27 doesn't like.

Until he does. "I can't copy his quirk. I can't even feel it, it's like," Quirk Thief pauses, his fingers grasping at something in the air, eyes too wide in shock. "It's like he's completely quirkless."

Amazing.

Amazing.

He ignores the small part that doesn't make sense, and just bathes in the relief. Quirk Thief can't even steal his quirk, it's that messed up, it might actually be gone and that's nothing but good news.

Aizawa and Yamada will believe that 27 can't talk to Eri. Aizawa won't have to worry about 27's quirk being used on someone, he won't have to see it being used on Yamada. Mirio will forgive him, he'll know that he can't do something like that anymore. The hero students won't fear him, no one will fear him, no one will ever want to rent him or buy him because he's finally, truly worthless.

If Yamada wasn't lying. If he stays after the investigation.

He won't lose this.

He won't lose anything to his quirk ever again. He'll never hurt anyone, he'll never be able to, his words will be just words and they can be trusted, people will talk to him. He'll never have to worry that Aizawa won't, that Yamada won't, they'll never act like his mother because they'll never have to worry about that.

Yamada only seems to see the part that doesn't make sense, the part that doesn't make any sense at all. He doesn't want his quirk, he's never wanted it, even if it feels nice sometimes, even if he'll never feel that way again, it's fine. He can be kept, he can be trusted, it's a trade and it's a good one and it's fine. "Shinsou, it's okay, we're working on it. Just, uh."

It's fine. It's fine, it's fine, it's fine. He won't miss it. He wishes he never had it, he'd never have gone through that, he should have been born quirkless, he wouldn't feel a missing part, he would never have gone through that. He could have never gone through that, he could have been Shinsou Hitoshi.

“Thanks for taking the time, Monoma, I really appreciate it. You too, Vlad, help yourselves to some muffins before you guys leave,” Yamada says, practically herding them out with his arms outstretched, making sure that they grab the muffins and know exactly where the door is, and that they keep walking towards it.

“Present Mic-sensei, I really must insist that you contact a better quirk specialist-”

“Absolutely, I completely agree and thank you for letting me know that,” Yamada says, his voice shaking for some reason, it doesn’t make sense, none of this makes sense, he can’t lose his fucking quirk.

Yamada turns to him after locking the door, his green eyes too wide, Eri holding his hand too tightly. “Twenny, why’s your quirk gone? What happened to it?”

Shinsou opens his mouth and almost forgets, but he appreciates it because it only makes it more believable when he closes it. When he doesn’t know where to begin to answer her, when he doesn’t feel enough of the room and he feels too much of himself. When he remembers that he’s not supposed to. ‘I can’t talk to her.’

He might have made a mistake, because Yamada looks too concerned and sad right now.

*

Aizawa has made a mistake.

He should have looked harder to find Midoriya.

“Sensei! Which one looks like a ‘Rupert’?” Ashido asks, dancing around the children half her size that are far more fitting patrons for this type of store to hold up two deflated teddy bear skins.

She submitted her witness statement at the station. He knew that she was bothered by it. She asked to go to the mall, and he agreed to it by not outright refusing it.

But he didn’t plan on this.

“That one,” Aizawa says, pointing at the burnt orange skin that has lines of velvet instead of fur, and tries to say it with all the solemnity that it doesn’t deserve. Ashido nods far more seriously than the situation calls for, before sprinting towards a store worker to begin an incredibly convoluted process of ‘bringing the bear to life.’

His student wants it to be understuffed, so that it’s lumpy. She selects her own ‘heart’ for it, and he finds himself too relieved to be left out of that decision, but when she tries to make him join in to give this sad, lumpy bear CPR, he has to threaten to detract from her grade for every mistake that she makes to make her stop.

Eri might enjoy coming to this store one day, but he’ll make sure that Hizashi is the one that takes her. Those skinned plushies are unnerving. “Sensei, this boba shop has the best herbal jelly in the world! I bet it’s even better than your jelly pouches!”

He can still see a flicker of it behind her eyes, behind the wide grin and the sad, lumpy plushie held in her arms, and he agrees by not disagreeing outright, and follows his student to what will be their last destination.

Ashido orders three drinks, too complicated for both himself and the ‘boba-rista’ to keep track of, but he can ignore it while waiting somewhat patiently for the underpaid cashier to wrap his head around it. He orders coffee with herbal jelly, and pays for all four just so he can convince Ashido a bit more easily into picking a corner booth along the wall. He sits so that he can see the full span of the shop, all of the entrances and exits and most of the mall surrounding them, and wonders if the urge rises because her name is one of the first that he recites when he needs to.

The herbal jelly is sweet, but good. He wouldn't mind if it was a flavor that came in jelly pouches.

"Ah! Tasty," Ashido says, her other two drinks wrapped up in a bag on the table, and Aizawa settles in to wait. He knows it won't take long, Ashido has never been good at hiding things and he appreciates that all too much.

It takes three sips, but he sees it. He's grateful that he's never seen his mother's eyes in hers, not with the fact that she has irises to break up the black surrounding them and that she's nothing like his mother. Manic at times, and irrational, but in completely different ways. There's a completely different calm that settles in before it breaks.

"They're going to make her pay for that, right? Sensei?" Ashido asks, and it's a question that seems too easy to answer at first, even if he honestly can't answer it for certain. Ashido seems too much of a child sometimes to make it difficult to lie to her. "She hurt Shinsou like that and... everything is her fault. They really can't let her get away with it."

"Your statement corroborated a suspicion. It's more compelling than just wanting to question her about a kidnapping that occurred over a decade ago," Aizawa states, simple facts. Cold logic. Ashido isn't a child, and doesn't deserve to be lied to. "It helped."

Ashido's focused stare on her to-go drinks confirms a less serious suspicion of his, and he wonders if he should pick a drink up so that Hizashi doesn't feel left out. "I hate it," Ashido says, a serious tone that he's rarely heard from her. "You don't really get it, Sensei, and it's fine. Maybe I shouldn't get it either, I just... I feel like it hurts me. To know that it happened, that it happened to Shinsou, and that.... Stuff like that happens."

There's a reason that Aizawa knew that he was meant to be an underground hero. He's known that things like that happened long enough that it doesn't hurt. Sometimes.

He's not sure how he will feel when he looks at Shinsou after this. "It's probably stupid. This doesn't really make up for it, and I know nothing will, but I don't... I don't know what to do or what to say or how to help."

"There's a certain hero that I think you're familiar with," Aizawa says, drawing the panic to still, the wound to start to close now that it's drained just a bit. "He always rushes to the scene with the same smile, and shouts 'It's fine. Why? Because I am here.'"

He doesn't try to keep the wryness out of his tone, and he notices that she catches it, and seems both amused and terrified to let him know that she's amused by it.

"I think that you resemble him a great deal in some ways," Aizawa says, and doesn't miss the pure shock that draws her eyes to widen like that. "There's something to be said about how reassuring a cheerful and honest smile can be in a dark time."

Ashido seems to flinch at that, recoiling further and further away from that cheer before she speaks. "I really can't, sometimes. I really...try, you know? I really don't want to make him sad and I just really want him to be happy, but I really can't... fake it. You know?"

"Honesty can't be faked," Aizawa answers, because he knows. He knows all too well that he's not that type of hero and has never tried to be. He also knows that Ashido and Toshinori are only similar because of that, and the difference is far better for it. “Shinsou is a person who knows when someone is being honest or not, and he distrusts dishonest people. That’s why he seems to like you more than the others. He can trust that you’re being honest with him.”

Ashido’s smile is always honest, but it betrays a great deal because of that, and something that he said must have both been reassuring and embarrassing for her. “He doesn’t like like me though, right? I mean, he’s- we’re-”

Her pink skin tone almost hides that telling magenta hue on her cheeks, but he’s learned to pick things out like that. And instigate them when he’s in a mood to.

“Okay, maybe we’re still kind of married, but it’s been a really long time and I think I probably forced him to do it. We should probably take things slow, get to know each other again. Because I’ve changed! I’ve changed a whole lot as a person, I’m perfectly fine with eating pickled radishes now so I really can’t make him eat them for me anymore, so where does that leave us? I forced Shinnou into a marriage of convenience and we really need to take a step back from that-”

“I agree,” Aizawa interrupts, taking a very long sip of his coffee so that he can keep his eyes open rather than closing them to pretend he doesn’t have to deal with this. He didn’t want to instigate it this far. “I believe Shinsou considers you a friend. And I doubt that daycare marriage ceremonies are legally binding.”

That shouldn’t be news to her, but it seems to be a relief to hear that. Ashido’s head nearly falls onto the table as she sighs. “Thank god, I was a little bit popular back then, and... you know. Maybe I have 12 husbands and three wives. Kirishima and I got divorced back in 2nd grade, so we’ve got that straightened out. It would be so awkward if we didn’t, though.”

It would be a nightmare for him. Kirishima already had a tendency to go with the strongest current, and if Ashido had a stronger influence on him than she already does.... With Kaminari still a free agent of chaos....

He prefers teaching first years for a reason. They’re too busy being overwhelmed with UA’s expectations to form those kinds of attachments, and Nemuri enjoys that the second years have gotten used to it. But if Principal Nezu has his way, he will lose that one, simple joy in life and find himself as a ‘mother duck’ to Class 1-A all the way until graduation.

He’s irritated about that. He knows he is. He’s just unable to process that until it comes to fruition. “There’s a crepe shop I like.”

She doesn’t seem to believe it until he orders it. Hizashi laughed himself into fits for days, but Aizawa knew the owner before he moved his location to the mall to take advantage of the proximity to a selection of tween girls oriented stores and specialize in certain designs. The crepes are still delicious, even if the one he orders is bright pink, overstuffed with fruit toppings and whipped cream, and topped with two churros shaped like cat ears.

She orders the same thing, and he can see it in her eyes. She wants to memorialize this moment in a selfie, but she knows that it will never happen.

He still has a bite left when the bus draws close to UA, but Ashido has finished hers and her agony is all the more obvious for it. Even if it wasn’t the full crepe, just the logo from the shop and the shade of pink from what’s left would be enough to devastate his students.

She moves quick, but he knew it before she tried, chewing quickly with the wrapper hidden tight in his fist. “Ashido.”

She looks up from her phone looking devastated enough, regret clear as she runs through every opportunity that she didn’t have the courage to seize.

“No one will believe you,” Aizawa says, earning a grimace that threatens to spill over into tears, before she throws herself back into her seat and pouts. He knows that she will try to convince them it happened, and she may even plot to catch him at that shop one day. But she’ll never be able to prove it.

But then, a smile works back over her face, nearly erupting into a giggle. “But I’ll know! I’ll keep your secret, Aizawa-sensei!” Her head tilts just a certain way, her eyes narrowing just a bit. “And maybe you can-”

“Blackmailing a public servant is unbecoming for a professional hero,” Aizawa interrupts, making his way to the bus’s exit while Ashido drags herself behind him morosely. “And an underground hero would know not to make unenforceable threats.”

He can’t help the grin when he sees her startle in shock, something that shouldn’t be surprising to her considering his unique method of discipline. And when he sees Hizashi’s text message, he remembers that he needs to make some threats of his own against other public servants.

“The 1-A dorm is that way,” Aizawa reminds, though he had been considering ignoring the fact that she was trailing him, already knowing her purpose. He had expected that Shinsou might appreciate the visit, and that Aizawa would appreciate the distraction of it more.

“Aw, Sensei! I just wanna hang out with Shinny for a little bit-”

“It’s not a good time for that,” Aizawa says, though there’s much more to be said about it. “Your classmates’ habit of entering the 6th floor is bad enough, but inviting yourself to my home isn’t going to be taken lightly.”

Ashido is beginning to develop Nemuri’s immunity to his glares, and he can honestly think of very few things that are more terrifying than that. “Is Shinny okay?”

“He’s fine,” Aizawa lies, “He will be at school tomorrow and subject to all that entails. But I’m not subjecting myself to it tonight.”

Ashido believes that, pouting and insisting that he take those drinks to Eri and Shinsou, and begging him to tell Shinsou to message her ‘on their very private, BFF’s only and no one else’ chat.

One day, Class 1-A’s insistence that the group chat containing Shinsou doesn’t exist won’t amuse him anymore. And it might be today.

*

He’s wished for impossible things. Maybe they shouldn’t come true.

Yamada and Aizawa haven’t said anything about it, but they’re worried. He’d rather they not say anything about it and ignore it. It’s fine.

It makes dinner more awkward, quiet. It feels more like he should talk and that’s a horrible feeling, straining against a mask he has and one he put on himself. Eri seems to be dealing with it better than he is. She’s catching on to new signs a lot quicker, and he doesn’t have to finger spell as much.

The glass of water can only do so much, and he tries to take sips of it so it's not suspicious that he's drinking so much of it. His throat is burning whether he drinks water or not, and he's going to ask Yamada how to make tea so that he can make it. He can probably flatter Yamada by drinking it as often as he plans to. It'll make it even easier to hide it.

His head hurts, his body hurts, he's tired and can't pick between being too cold and being too hot. It's frustrating and he just wants it to be over, hates thinking that it might take longer without medicine. He'll just have to hide it longer.

He tried it.

He tried to use his quirk on Eri when they were washing their hands before dinner. He knew that Yamada wouldn't see it, but it didn't matter.

It didn't work. He's quirkless.

It's fine.

He's sitting at a table with three people who have quirks, and he's the one that doesn't. It's fine. It's fine, he doesn't need it. Even if The Miasma finds him, he'll be safe. Aizawa will protect him.

Maybe.

He might.

There's a chance.

‘ Can you teach me to make tea? ’

Yamada does, and he takes that opportunity. Eri finds it boring, very boring compared to Aizawa's gradebook, and Aizawa decides to do his grading in the office once he catches her attention. Aizawa and Yamada have been working together as heroes for years, they've lived together, they're married. They probably do things like that all the time when he doesn't notice it.

“Shou has been trying to get a quirk specialist set up. It's a little complicated with the investigation, but don't...” Yamada talks quietly, too quietly. “Don't give up on it, you know? We'll get it fixed up, don't worry. Are you...okay with that?”

A question. He really, really fucking hates that and it doesn't even make sense. ‘ It's fine. Can talk to Eri. Like this. ’

He shouldn't have gotten what he wanted.

*

There's a panic barely muted in the effects of the medicine, and he hates that the medicine doesn't always work. That when it doesn't, when he only feels groggy and exhausted under its influence after he wakes up, it feels like it came to the scene of a disaster too late.

He knows why it doesn't work. Dr. Tenma stopped asking about his sleeping schedule years ago, but still prescribed the medication. Still told him that it's only truly effective when taken regularly, with a steady sleep schedule. He's never going to have that, and he'd rather have a medicine that works regardless.

Aizawa pulls himself away from Hizashi, thankful not for the first time that Hizashi doesn't know if he's sleeping deeply enough. Hizashi stopped asking what the nightmares were, but he doesn't have to ask to ask. He prefers when he doesn't, because making his own tea in the dark is enough to settle him sometimes, and despite what he told Bakugo about IRT, it never works for him.

There's no way to change a part of that nightmare into something less horrifying. If anything, it only grows more monstrous.

There's a spike of fear that comes when he sees that shock of purple hair in real life, quickly followed by shame. He knows that his mind is simply more sadistic towards him after USJ, and that last nightmare was a particularly cruel one. And he knows that despite what has changed today, Shinsou is probably still suffering from nightmares.

He seems to be taking a page out of his own book, a kettle simmering on the stove while he looks through the cabinets for the tea. Aizawa takes a moment to remember that the last time he caught Shinsou in the kitchen at this hour with the stove on, he was trying to burn off a tattoo, and he's thankful at least that it's different. That it feels like progress, at least. "Nightmares?"

Shinsou startles, looking at him and nearly closing the cabinet as he does, as though he was stealing what he's completely welcome to. But he seems to remember that without reassurance, eyes falling back to half-closed, nodding. ' Tea. Helps. '

Aizawa nods, because it does. Not much, but a pause before attempting sleep again can have an effect, make it easier. He needs to make sure that Shinsou makes that attempt. "I'm awake for the same reason. Would you like me to make it?"

Shinsou's head tilts before he shakes his head, turning back to the cabinets. Shinsou seems to yearn for some amount of self-sufficiency in some areas, especially obvious with his desire to learn how to cook. It's good that he wants to learn those skills, bringing himself to the level that most teenagers on the cusp of adulthood are at. Things that they learned easily through observation are completely new to Shinsou. ' Pick. '

Shinsou holds out two tea canisters, one for chamomile and one for ginger. He's not sure why Shinsou offered the ginger, if he thinks that Aizawa is odd enough to prefer it for some reason, but he points to the chamomile then sits at the table, watching Shinsou prepare it.

There's self-sufficiency, and then there's care. Shinsou shouldn't have learned to care for another before learning to be self-sufficient, but he did. Aizawa often wonders how that came about, how deep it runs. What a 12 year old boy would do to make himself into a caretaker for a toddler. How he could possibly succeed at it when he had learned little else but torture and pain.

Shinsou selects his own mug, and Aizawa's. Aizawa notices that it's the solid black one that he usually drinks coffee from on Mondays because it's larger than the others. He takes it from Shinsou and wonders if there's an attempt to be spiteful in that, to use it now and hope that he wouldn't notice when it's dirty in a few hours, or if it's just being startlingly observant. Pattern recognition. "What was it about?"

Shinsou takes the seat across from him, surprisingly. He imagined that Shinsou would prefer the chair next to that to create more distance, making this conversation less intimate, more comfortable. He tries not to be concerned with that, and fails. ' Training. ' Shinsou signs the same way he always does, betraying nothing, but he takes a sip while the tea is still a bit too hot, possibly still steeping, and that betrays too much unsettlement. ' New one. Training was fine. '

Aizawa wonders if this openness about his past was possible for Shinsou because he was that unsettled by the nightmare, or if it's due to the investigation requiring nothing from him from now on. That he had won and lost by that, unable to fight under Jun's quirk but winning peace afterwards. "Combat training?" It's a rather pointless question, completely vague and open to interpretation. Open to correction.

Shinsou nods. ' Before other numbers. Solo. Against teacher. It was fine. ' Aizawa imagines that nothing at Miasma was ever fine, and Shinsou's insistence on it is only more suspicious.

"With your quirk?" Aizawa asks, quietly enough that he regrets asking before he does it. He regrets it all the more as he begins to see Shinsou close himself off, just a half-shake of his head, just staring at his tea where it's raised.

Almost like a shield. Like he's being interrogated.

"It's always the same nightmare for me."

He doesn't know who is more surprised, Shinsou or himself. Aizawa doesn't talk about his nightmares, even when he knows that rationally, it would help. Rationally, he should, because he tells others to do it. He's told Hizashi a few vague things, pieces that aren't the whole of the horror, and he doesn't intend to tell Shinsou the whole of it either. Shinsou shouldn't know anything about USJ.

"A strength enhanced villain shattered my arm and my skull. I blacked out before I could know whether the people I was protecting were safe. Even though they were." He demanded to know, as soon as he regained consciousness and before he even registered that agonizing pain, he was screaming to know. "I think it stuck with me because I didn't know."

He never caught that nurse's name, but he's thankful for her, that she didn't try to restrain him, and didn't try to tell him to calm down first. Your class is safe, no one was injured . He blacked out immediately after hearing that.

But he needed to know it for himself.

Other members of staff took over meeting with his students' parents, he wasn't expected to do it. He only managed to meet with the Hagakures because they were visiting Tooru's older brother in the same hospital. He nearly bit through his lip and wept as soon as he left the room, but even though he wasn't supposed to stand up on his own, he was a fall risk until the brain damage was truly healed, he did it.

He didn't try to do it again.

Shinsou wants to say something, his hold on the mug adjusts for a sign that he doesn't use, but considers. It takes a moment, but he places the mug back on the table. ' I didn't know E-R-I was safe. They told me. I didn't know. '

Aizawa feels that too keenly, nodding while he stares at his own tea. It might have been worse, to agonize over one person that had relied on him for years, such a small and defenseless child, than 19 teenagers that he had known for a few months. But irrationally, he doubts it. He feels that it's probably the same. "I'm sorry that it took that long."

Shinsou doesn't wave it off, doesn't answer to that, and seems distracted by something else to say. He doesn't sign it, but it's a question in itself, hesitant all the same for it. His finger points to his cheek, on another scar, but his own isn't the one he's curious about.

"Yes," Aizawa answers, his fingers tracing that strange divot, skin made unfamiliar in a way that's only worse at his elbow, where the decaying quirk took hold. "It's the only scar I received from it."

It's a joke that few people know as a joke. He doesn't wear shirts that display the scar on his elbow, not out of avoidance but a preference that took root long before it. He walked away with more scars than those two, but he's heard awed comments on campus that he feels no need to correct. He was attacked by that thing, and even though he was all bandaged up like a mummy, he walked away with only that one scar!

In certain instances, and certain occasions, he can talk about it. Pieces. Not the whole of the horror, not when it doesn't serve a purpose. Not when he can scarcely remember the whole of it either, only pieces at a time. The burning in his eyes, his vision blurry and fading black. That monster's eyes dead, its beak wet with drool. The bones of its hand a vice around his head, its claws like knives in his scalp and on his face.

Pieces.

Pieces are safe.

' Pick one, ' Shinsou signs, then places his hands close to the middle of the table, his forearms resting on it. The tattoo is on display, he's started wearing T-shirts to sleep in shortly after Chisaki, but he knows that Shinsou is talking about the other marks that his history has left on him.

Trading scars and stories is both a child's and a hero's favorite past time, it's a fun game to play. It's not with Shinsou, not when he has more scars than some heroes and not when the biggest scars stir up a deeper horror than Aizawa can handle right now. Possibly worse than the Nomu. It could be a Nomu for all that he knows.

He draws a line below the second knuckle of each of his fingers on his own hand, mirroring the ones on Shinsou's left hand. He imagines that there's a story to that one, and he's surprised to see a small, amused smirk on Shinsou's face as he looks at them. ' Punch knife quirk. Stupid. Like Now Music. '

Aizawa smiles too for a moment, before he remembers that hospital trip. He had to use the capture scarf to hold Hizashi's wrist to his chest, to keep him from waving around those broken fingers after he tried to punch a lead pipe. He was probably sleep deprived enough at the time to forget that he didn't have speakers on his hands anymore. "There's a technique that can help with nightmares. Image Rehearsal Therapy."

Shinsou seems interested, as much as he seems sleep deprived. His hands are folded loosely over each other, under his chin, and Aizawa doubts the chamomile tea was that relaxing.

"You try to remember as much of the nightmare as you can, or write it down. Then try to change it so that it's not a nightmare anymore. You picture the way it's changed when you fall asleep," Aizawa says, and tries not to betray the frustration that he feels.

He's tried. Remembering the nightmare is easy, every visceral detail that only inspires his darkest fears. He's written it down hundreds of times, catalogued almost every small part of it that changes. He can't change it himself, and he can't make it any less horrifying.

He's tried to make it absurd, making himself the one that grips the Nomu's head and forces him down, forcing him into dogeza to apologize for interrupting class. He's tried to make it more vengeful, imagining a particularly nasty villain is in the Nomu's grasp and that he merely watches, content to be unable to stop it. He's even tried to make it sexual, to make it Hizashi who holds his skull to the concrete a bit more gently, that someone he trusts is the one pinning him down like that.

It doesn't work. The Nomu is still there, crushing someone's skull and it's often his. It's been Hizashi's too many times as well.

And now it's been Shinsou's.

Shinsou, who didn't beg him to cancel the monster's quirk, to save him from it. Shinsou, his eyes wide with silent terror, but too resigned to the monster's violence. Aizawa was standing in the water next to Asui, next to Midoriya, but the water might have well have been solid concrete because he couldn't even move to stop it. To throw himself at the monster if he couldn't erase his quirk, to do anything to stop it.

Shinsou, still silent, but his eyes closed and he seemed to fade from life before the Nomu crushed his skull into the concrete, purple hair in a dark blue fist amid a sea of swelling red.

Dreams are supposed to be a way that the subconscious communicates to consciousness. Dreams are supposed to have meaning, and nightmares probably do too.

Shinsou never asked him to fight the investigation, to stop it. He probably wouldn't have considered it a possibility, not when he still seems to be unable to understand that he should be safe. And even if he did, Aizawa would have been powerless to stop it.

Aizawa didn't cancel Jun's quirk, he sat and watched Shinsou being tortured, forced to speak and forced to feel what Miasma did to him. He's promised that it will never happen again, that Shinsou will never face another aspect of the investigation for the duration of his wardship, and he will keep that promise. But it might already be too late.

Shinsou's muteness may be related to his quirk, or it may simply be trauma. He may have failed Shinsou by being unable to procure a quirk specialist thus far, or he may have watched those wounds being dredged to the surface and not realized that they would fester even deeper for it. Shinsou being unable to talk to Eri now was because he simply watched, he closed his eyes to it and didn't try to use his quirk again to stop it. He thought that would be better than Mind Slice.

No. He's lying to himself.

He wanted more than the name of the Nomu Organization. He wanted to find those that were responsible for hurting Shinsou, for making him fear his own name, for making him call himself '27' and forcing him to answer to that. For making him say that 'name' instead of the one he has, instead of 'Shinsou Hitoshi.'

'I can't,' Shinsou signs, seeming resigned and disappointed in that, staring at his tea long before he drinks it. 'Training not scary. Scary because.' Shinsou hesitates, his head tipping forward just a bit, as though to hide some break in his expression, one that only comes in a brief wince. 'Quirkless. Teacher found out. Worthless.'

Aizawa isn't surprised by that. If nightmares are a way for the subconscious to communicate to the conscious, then Shinsou's fear of being quirkless and thereby being worthless was probably already known to his conscious mind.

Aizawa doesn't want to ask if Shinsou knows that his mother sold him. He knows that he does. He doesn't know if Shinsou knows what his price was.

Selfishly, utterly selfishly, Aizawa never wants to know it. "Then, you could dream that you have your quirk. That you could use it," Aizawa finds himself too hesitant to say it, staring at his tea, considering. Considering what would have happened to Shinsou if this new dream were his history, if it would be a brighter one, or a shorter one. “And you could escape.”

Shinsou’s eyes widen for a moment, before he swallows. He shakes his head, but drinks his tea, likely to hide the discomfort that the idea caused. ‘ 50 still there. I wouldn’t. ’

Shinsou’s attachment and loyalty to Furokage Mizuki was truly that deep. He wouldn’t even try to escape in a nightmare if she wasn’t there, a child clinging to an adult for the adult’s safety as well. Irrationally.

He ignores how maternal that makes Furokage Mizuki sound, that Shinsou truly wouldn’t be parted from her even for his own life. “She wasn’t the teacher?”

Shinsou’s eyes widen again, hands curling where they lay on the table, and he can’t help but notice that they curl the same way they do around a scar. It sickens him deeper than it should, to know that whoever had carved those long scars across Shinsou’s arms had been around him so much, had trained him in other ways. ‘ No. Only knives. For a while. ’

Aizawa nods, and imagines that’s why Shinsou prefers knives. He hoards pieces of joy and finds them in things that are hardly recognizable as something that would make him happy. He imagines the face masks are the same way, but worse. “You could imagine that she’s there. And it wouldn’t matter if you were quirkless. You would have someone to protect you.”

Shinsou’s hands twitch, a flinch that tells him that he’s stumbled upon a wound he hadn’t even considered. A meaning to that nightmare that makes far more sense.

“Or me,” Aizawa says, and feels the shame curling deep in his chest. He wasn’t there, not for a single moment of that nightmare, and he hasn’t forgotten that he could have been. In a million different ways, he could have gotten to Shinsou sooner. But he’s here, now. “You’re living at UA, surrounded by heroes every day. You could have your pick of any quirk or hero that would defend you.”

‘ 50, ’ Shinsou signs, still uneasy and still unwilling to look at Aizawa, eyes focused beside his mug of tea. ‘ Quirk would be best. For escape. ’

Aizawa fights not to find some amusement in that, that even when creating a dream, Shinsou wants it to make sense. Tactically. Logically- “That sounds like a good plan,” Aizawa says, bringing a hand to curl around the side of his neck and fighting not to avert his gaze. “It can take practice to work, but it’s effective. I hope it works for you.”

Shinsou nods, seeming to take that as an invitation to leave, as Aizawa half-meant it as. Part of him recognizes that they rarely talk like this, that this connection through nightmares might be a deeper one than through observing Class 1-A’s training. The other part recognizes it, and irrationally wants to dismiss it. ‘ Good night. ’

Aizawa looks down at his tea, wondering how long it will be before he’s finished it and can attempt to sleep again, and he almost misses it. “Good night...”

Shinsou’s shock, echoing his in a far worse way, irrationally makes him laugh a bit.

“Good night, Shinsou,” Aizawa says, though his hands move with a different name. He wonders how long Shinsou has had a different name for him as well. ‘ Sou Coffee. ’

It’s irrational, but he likes ‘ Zawa Coffee ’ better.

27 lays awake for too long, swallowing cough after cough and hating that he didn't bring something to drink with him. He drank a lot of the cough medicine in the cabinet, unsure how much 30 mL really was, but it isn't doing anything other than making his head swim. He's distracted, incredibly distracted, and can hardly remember to picture the nightmare differently, the way he wants it to be.

He would have liked to dream that he and 50 escape, even if it wasn't because of a nightmare. It's been years since he dreamed of escaping with 50. And it doesn't happen tonight.

He's not training with Bug, she's not telling him to talk through the locked mask before she sends Cherry and Blossom into him. She's not scowling darker and darker, her hands pressed against the sides of his head and the imagined chittering of those bugs aren't ringing too loudly in his ears.

He's in the backroom that he first met Eri in, before he was sold to Chisaki. Chisaki is glaring in front of him, his hands are still missing but he doesn't realize that until he wakes up. He hardly notices Chisaki because he can only feel The Miasma at his back, he feels the stare of every Number and Boss and Memory and Bug.

"You're worthless," Chisaki groans, his head lolling to the side like he's throwing a tantrum about it. He's disappointed before 27 even did anything, he won't have a chance to escape The Miasma, he's going to be taken back by all of them. Eri stands in the corner that he didn't send her to, crying alone so loudly. He's never going to meet her, he'll never learn her name because he doesn't have his quirk.

"Hey," 50 calls, standing next to Chisaki but she doesn't look down at him once. "We're getting out."

She throws Mocha at him, and he catches him, though he nearly slips through his uncoordinated fingers. When he looks up, Eri is held in 50's arms, no longer sobbing, no longer thin and small and bandaged. She's smiling, they're both smiling, he knows that if he runs to them, they'll escape. They'll all be in that field of sunshine with Yamada, Aizawa might be there too-

He wakes up.

He almost doesn't catch the cough in time, disturbs Eri when he turns quickly to bury his face in the pillow so that it isn't loud. He's grateful that she doesn't really wake up, that she stirs but when he looks, she's fast asleep.

He lays back down and glares at the ceiling, because he knows it's Aizawa's fault.

*

If he has that nightmare once during the night, he often has it again. Sometimes he wakes before it reaches the usual conclusion, he's only looking into the Nomu's eyes with the same hopelessness and frustration, or he's trying to cancel that decaying quirk to protect whoever that hand is reaching for. Sometimes he's protecting Asui, he's protecting Hizashi, he's protecting Eri. He usually succeeds, he at least protects them, despite how sadistic his mind has become.

He has that nightmare, but it's different again.

He feels the vice around his head far more clearly than he did when it happened, he feels the same strain trying to cancel the decaying quirk but this time he's trying to protect Shinsou. Shinsou stands alone in that pool, like Eri does when she's there, but instead of terror he only seems surprised by the hand reaching towards him impotently.

Aizawa knew what would happen next. Even in that dream, he was waiting for the vice to tighten before he saw the concrete rise to greet him. For a moment, he was almost bored of waiting for it, frustrated that it was taking so long, before he looked up and must have conjured him by that.

It was just a flash, a whisp. Shirakumo swinging his bo staff to send the Nomu flying in an almost comical way, and before Aizawa even registered that the vice around his head should be gone, he saw that grin. The most honest smile he's ever seen anyone wear, and hasn't seen in over 15 years.

When he realized that Shirakumo wasn't at USJ, that he couldn't be, he woke up. And shortly thereafter, cursed himself.

He shouldn't be so logical even in his dreams.

The Safety Sick

Chapter Summary

27 knows that he's sick, but he has a plan to keep anyone from finding out about it. He's able to go to school, but the plan quickly unravels.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: Brief mention of disordered eating (Specifically, Bakugo accuses Shinsou of purging), Shinsou once again convinced he's going to die (twice), 50 mention

Previously on Wards of UA: Shinsou convinced Eri to pretend that he couldn't talk to her anymore to better hide that he was getting sick. In Chapter 42, Shinsou beat Yamada in a game and a bet was made that if Shinsou won, Yamada had to wear an 'Existing Amplifier' (knock off of 'Present Mic') shirt to school, and this is the first day at school post-midterms. Shinsou has a lockable 'stash box' where he puts things that he takes as trophies for meaningful events. Since Hari held Shinsou underwater by his hair when he was tortured with the bleach bath, Shinsou's hair being touched can be a trigger for him, and Shinsou had been trying to de-trigger himself by 'training.' During the Joint Training Exam, Aizawa attempted to erase Black Whip, and after discovering he couldn't, demanded that Midoriya see a quirk specialist to get answers as to why his quirk couldn't be erased and had changed so drastically. Monoma attempted to copy Shinsou's quirk and failed, saying that it felt like Shinsou was completely quirkless. On the night that Shinsou tried to escape UA, he told Midoriya that all his mother saw in him was a phone, then later told Midoriya and Ashido that his mother sold him. Shinsou can talk to anyone he has Brainwashed, and that includes Midoriya and Bakugo. At Shichi-Go-San, Shinsou had to wear a disguise just in case someone from The Miasma recognized him, and that disguise included cat ears. Shinsou plays a 'Question Game' of trading questions, only answering questions when he has one to ask himself. Shinsou thinks that the only difference between villains and criminals are that villains wear costumes and act out their deeply held personal philosophies. Aizawa and Yamada are aware that Eri seems to be terrified of Shinsou getting sick. Aizawa knows that Shinsou believed that he was sold to Aizawa, but believes he convinced Shinsou otherwise after he tried to escape from UA. Aizawa knows that Miasma was cold, and the last time that Shinsou had a dream that he was at The Miasma, covered him with a blanket to fight off the cold. Shinsou was fused with Chisaki and Nemoto at the end of the raid, and freed by Eri using Rewind, but Shinsou came away with tattoos that he didn't have before, at least one from Nemoto.

27 feels like he should just give it up.

He's aware of every little motion while he gets ready, because it's pure agony. Just pulling himself from his bed makes him want to collapse back into it, knowing that whatever Yamada and Aizawa will do to him when they find him like that isn't worth the effort of this con.

But he knows it's not just for them. It's for Eri too. She can't know he's sick, she shouldn't worry about him like that. She's excited for him to wear the face masks to school, and he's excited that it'll make it easier to hide when he needs to cough.

But when Yamada comes back after waking them up wearing a sour look on his face, 27 finds it in himself to be excited for another reason. "I almost forgot that I have a little deal with you, little listener. But, if you don't want to see me dressed up as Existing Amplifier out of the kindness of your heart, I completely understand--"

Even the grin that pulls across his face hurts, and dragging his stash box from under his bed makes his arms too sore, but he wouldn't give up either of those things for the prize he won. He didn't think Yamada would actually let him do this, nonetheless remind him of it, but he's glad. He's happy enough to ignore that he probably could have made him wear this shirt to his Midterm.

Yamada sighs heavily when he holds out the shirt, like he's looking at something that will slowly kill him instead of just embarrassing him in front of the students. 'Existing Amplifier' is printed in big block letters on the top of the shirt, and the bottom half has a black and white cartoon of Present Mic with jagged, messy lines that make him look stupid. The more 27 looks at it, the more he starts to feel like it's a mistake to enforce that bet they made, the cartoon does come off as more insulting than he would have liked. "You know, there's absolutely no one else who could make me wear this, Shinsou," Yamada says, folding it in half to toss it over his shoulder. "Not even Shouta could get away with it."

Yamada says confusing things all the time, things that twist something inside 27's chest and make him feel weird. It doesn't feel like guilt anymore, but it's close to that. It feels a little bit like pride, like he's really making Yamada do this, but he knows he's not.

27 notices that Yamada is looking at the stash box, and 27 wonders if he's noticed that the stash is bigger, and what he feels about that. If he's really okay with 27 doing this, being this weird. Maybe he was fine with it as long as he didn't see it, and maybe the box was a better way of keeping it out of sight.

But Yamada seemed to like knowing the stories behind some of the things in there. The 'pieces of happiness,' even if they're not always like that. It's not always a happy memory, like the straw from his chocolate milk when Eri's quirk erupted, or the face mask from when he had to meet Chisaki.

But sometimes it is. 'Hair mask,' 27 signs, awkwardly with the bit of plastic from the packaging still tucked between two fingers. Yamada applied a hair mask on him because 27 asked him to, to help him get used to other people touching his hair. To quiet the screaming inside his head whenever someone did, that place that Hari dug into too tightly and left a wound inside his mind. At first, he just wanted to make sure Eri could play with his hair, he just wanted to dig out that wound and become less odd for it.

But he liked when Yamada did it anyway, regardless of whether it was training. It just felt nice. Sometimes when Ashi plays with his hair, it feels as nice as it did with the hair mask, but sometimes his nerves still act up. But not with Yamada.

Maybe it wouldn't be weird if he asked him to do it again.

"Maybe we could make our little spa day a regular thing," Yamada says, smiling but his voice is oddly strained. "You might be due for a little trim too, unless you want to grow it out. Maybe we could do that sometime.”

27 nods, unsure if he wants to change his hair. It feels weird to have an opinion on it, especially when his opinion would be the only thing that matters in that decision.

He could grow it long, because he doesn’t have to worry about whether it would be a distraction during a job or a fight. Bug used to pull him aside once every few months and pull all of his hair into a fist at the back of his head, and cut off whatever was in that fist to make sure it wouldn’t be distracting. He got lice a few times, he still doesn’t know how, but he had to hold himself still while she buzzed all of his hair off, ignoring the nicks to his scalp and ears, and how the mask vibrated when the clippers touched the strap.

He would like to have the hair on his nape to be short again, to be soft like that. It seems odd to just get his way with something like that, to decide how he looks just because he wants to look that way.

But he likes it. ‘Short on neck. I like hair like this.’

Yamada smiles wider, that kind smile blooming in full and his voice returning to normal. “We can definitely pencil you in at Yamada’s Premium Boutique: Hair and More! Just a trim off the neck, and leave the party on the scalp to ‘fern’ on out!”

27 can’t help but roll his eyes. Maybe his hair doesn’t lay flat no matter what Eri tries to do to it, but he’s not going to be insulted by a guy who makes his hair stand straight up on purpose.

Maybe Yamada got to him too much, because when Eri insists that he needs to match and ‘rep the youth’ for Yamada’s show, he doesn’t argue. Even if he was looking forward to wearing one of the cooler cat designs on his face.

Yamada nearly choking on his coffee when he saw the ‘Get Your Hands Up!’ face mask made it worthwhile though, and probably made it easier for 27 to get a cup of coffee to soothe the ache in his throat.

*

Aizawa already arranged for homeroom to be a time for his students to practice any new ideas that came from collaborating with 1-B, and Gym Gamma quickly fills with the sounds of his students’ quirk training. As usual, it’s loud, and it’s difficult to hold a conversation while Bakugo seems inspired to make the largest explosions he can, perhaps outdone in that special training session where Monoma copied each of his students’ quirks to offer a new perspective on them.

Each student, except for the one standing next to him, who would continue to stand next to him and lose these training opportunities as long as he didn’t see a quirk specialist.

Midoriya had a unique nervous energy about him at times, especially apparent now. His attention seemed divided between hyperfocusing on the training below, perhaps appreciating the vantage point from the elevated walkway, glancing nervously and guiltily at Aizawa, and looking at the wards who were working on their self-studies at a very deliberate distance.

Aizawa very deliberately put himself within that distance, because while Midoriya had a well of reckless determination once he set his mind to something, he was easy to frighten into submission when the stakes were less dire. And wanting to talk to Shinsou and Eri wasn’t a dire matter, it was a mere want, and something that Aizawa had every right to withhold from a student who wasn’t taking this odd and uncontrollable evolution of his quirk seriously.

Aizawa and Toshinori had argued back and forth all weekend through email, but Toshinori's position as a Heroics instructor and whatever unprofessional mentorship he had with Midoriya was no match for Aizawa's position as his homeroom teacher. He was forced to call on Principal Nezu to explain that to Toshinori, which finally put the conversation to an end.

Aizawa couldn't erase Midoriya's quirk if it went out of control again, and until the explanation for that was found along with a solution, Midoriya couldn't be allowed to risk quirk training.

Midoriya knew that and didn't remedy the situation at all. He's old enough to make his own doctor's appointments, and he's not a commuter student like several others. Mrs. Midoriya could have arranged for a quirk specialist and taken him there, Toshinori could have swallowed his ill-placed pride and taken care of it. Aizawa wasn't being unreasonable, but they were.

There's only so many times that Midoriya could look up at him like a kicked dog before he had to remind him of that. "Did you attempt to do what I asked at the Joint Training Exam?"

Midoriya fidgets with his fingers pressing against each other, too much like the young child he's acting like. "N-no. Um, All Might wanted me to see someone specific, but he hasn't been able to get in contact with them. I know why I shouldn't train until then, but I really-"

"Do you know how many students have died during quirk training or exams in UA's history?" Aizawa asks, and he's not surprised that even the walking encyclopedia Midoriya doesn't know the answer. "35."

35 children died on these grounds. Almost always hero students, almost always due to an incredibly destructive quirk being left unchecked or unsupervised. Aizawa's quirk might be the most effective control when his students lacked it themselves, but as a homeroom teacher for first years, he knows he needs to instill it within them before he can risk handing them off to another instructor.

"And how many do you think have died under my watch?" Midoriya mutters an answer that might not be entirely correct, but he repeats it more firmly than he feels it. "Zero."

He knows in the back of his mind, in some rational way, that he wasn't responsible for Shirakumo's death. He was a student, he was 16 years old. They weren't warned about the villain attack and the first blow was long range. The hero supervising their internship didn't know either, he wasn't prepared to lead them or defend them, and too soon Aizawa was standing alone among the rubble with children to protect, a villain to face, and a dead body that he hadn't discovered yet.

Heroes stand among the dead too often, but he refuses to let his students suffer that grim reality too soon. He refuses to let them cause it, and as much as he can tell that Midoriya's new quirk form is powerful and can be incredibly deadly, he knows that it would completely shatter Midoriya if it was. If he lost control and caused a casualty.

It wouldn't be easy for Aizawa to watch that happen, his quirk once again useless, but this time without All Might charging in as reinforcement. His number is zero, and the day that changes will be the day that he resigns. He's not sure what will happen after that, and he refuses to consider it.

With the Problem Child properly schooled into place, Aizawa glances back at his wards. Eri pulls at the collar of Shinsou's hoodie, pulling him out of a brief nap to help her with her workbook. Shinsou's sleep patterns were difficult to call a pattern, and it's hard to say whether his grogginess is due to the week without waking early for school or his persistent nightmares. As much as it is odd that Eri is demanding his attention so insistently, it's odd that Shinsou didn't seem to be tempted at all to watch the training below, or that he wasn't affected by the coffee that Hizashi gave him.

He may be avoiding the sight of the students using their quirks, now that there was a fear that Shinsou had lost his.

Aizawa might have been tempted to schedule the quirk specialist appointment for Midoriya himself, just to get this pointless ordeal over with, but he had enough work cut out for him to secure Shinsou one. Naomasa reported that only one member of the Commission of Wardship Affairs had signed off on a quirk specialist, even with this new information coming to light, and that wasn't enough for Aizawa. Even if the members of that commission's names were kept off the record, supposedly untraceable, he was going to have to find them. To talk, and those conversations would vary wildly with whatever else he discovered about each member.

They can't let Shinsou go on like this. They can't make the kid mute because they refuse to sign a pointless piece of paper and accept a doctor that's already been thoroughly vetted. If the wardship wouldn't be immediately terminated when the quirk specialist logged their findings, as required by law, this would have happened far sooner.

Aizawa tries to focus on his students, but Midoriya keeps glancing at the wards, and Aizawa knows that will only invite Eri's attention. If she wasn't so insistent on getting Shinsou to spend time with her, she probably would have glued herself to his side by now.

"Zawa," Eri calls with a tug on his sleeve, probably forgetting that's a 'secret' nickname that shouldn't be used around students after the long break, though he can be relieved it isn't her other nickname for him - 'Dad.' "Can you make a quirk doctor appointment for me and take Twenny too? He's really sleepy without his quirk."

And there was the other secret that he didn't want his students to know. Midoriya looks completely baffled for a moment, but it pulls into deep concern when he looks at Shinsou. "Present Mic and I are going to make an appointment about that."

Aizawa doesn't offer to make that appointment for Eri, watching her face drop from pinched fear to a far deeper relief. He imagines that as terrified as she is of doctors, of their gloved hands he suspects, she would still be willing to risk it if that were the only way to take Shinsou to a quirk specialist.

He just hopes that Eri doesn't piece out what Shinsou being 'tired' really means, that this bout of severe depression isn't a burden for Eri as much as it is for Shinsou, Yamada, and himself. And he hopes that neither Eri nor his students attempt to cure it with any heartfelt but ultimately useless gestures.

"Wait, Sensei," Midoriya sputters, a realization fully formed and one that neither he, nor Shinsou based off of that grimace half-hidden by the face mask, appreciate. "Shinsou lost his quirk? How- that doesn't make any sense--"

"Midoriya," Aizawa says sharply, trying to convey in his tone and his glare that he shouldn't know this and shouldn't think about it now that he does. "You're not involved in this."

He would like to make some stronger threats to stop the gears still whirring in Midoriya's head, but with Eri still standing nearby, he can't make them. He can't expect a 5 year old to keep something like this a secret, and it's unfortunate that both of his wards have to spend so much time in the proximity of his students. Especially with this, and especially with Midoriya. "I know, but...if something's wrong with Shinsou's quirk...it's kind of my fault, isn't it?"

It would be easier if Aizawa could blame the Problem Child, but he can't. Midoriya had no way of knowing that his own quirk was going to go haywire at the exam, and absolutely no way of knowing that Shinsou would use his to subdue it.

"I mean, it's nearly impossible to lose a quirk, except if it's taken by All for One," Midoriya continues, his voice nearly shaking around that villain's name. "But if it's strained, or affected by certain illnesses, or--"

"I don't know what you're doing at UA if you have a doctorate in quirk studies," Aizawa interrupts. While he's very obviously not above using a student to evaluate either of his wards' quirk issues, anything that Midoriya would tell him if he continued wouldn't be new to him.

He and Hizashi both tried to find any explanation, Hizashi nearly convinced that Shinsou must have vomited a majority of his quirk factor cells out after eating too much. The strain would be convincing if Shinsou had lost his ability to talk to Eri immediately after using his quirk at the exam, and he doubts that Shinsou contracted Malaria strain H or any other incredibly rare and lethal ailment. Even if the temporary effect of those explanations would be a relief, they were only slightly more likely than being attacked by the villain who stole Ragdoll's quirk.

Aizawa doesn't have an explanation, he doesn't have anything to offer Shinsou as reassurance that this was temporary. He can only try to make sure that this stalemate with The Commission ends with Shinsou going to a quirk specialist, and getting answers for all of them.

*

Yamada was only able to keep the smile up as long as it took the two wards to walk out the door to the staff room to wash their hands before lunch, before he fixed Shouta with the same concerned grimace he saw on his husband. "This is getting pretty bad."

Shinsou was always free to take a nap or do whatever he wanted during class, within reason, but Yamada and Shouta both knew that Shinsou liked to keep himself productive. Either reading or studying by himself, helping Eri with her workbooks, and very rarely on his phone. Shinsou sometimes got distracted during Yamada's English lectures, glancing up at the board to follow along for a bit, sometimes with a flash of a disappointed frown when one of the students didn't answer correctly. Yamada honestly looked forward to those little distracted moments, and he hoped that the whispers and giggles that the Existing Amplifier shirt inspired might bring around that devious little smirk in his ward.

But once Shinsou arrived to class, he didn't take out any of his study materials or books. He just laid his head on his arms, and hardly seemed to move unless Eri wanted to pester him. He wasn't sleeping, even if it would be understandable if he wanted to catch up on a lot of missing sleep.

He was just waiting for the time to pass, and completely uninterested in anything around him. It just wasn't like Shinsou to act like that, and any time that Yamada tried to check on him, all he got was a sloppily signed 'I'm fine,' and a listless gaze in answer.

The glare Aizawa directs at a wall confirms that it must have been the same for his free period. "He's withdrawing from Eri as well."

And that definitely wasn't like Shinsou.

Shinsou always had an eye on Eri, always ready to give her whatever she wanted, from attention to help opening a snack. Yamada knew that losing the ability to speak to her had to hurt, it could be the most painful thing that Shinsou could go through, and it must be to make him pull away from her to isolate himself as much as he could in a crowded classroom.

And it was hurting Eri too. She made it abundantly clear yesterday that she wanted to spend more time with Shinsou, that she needed a little TLC to make up for the time he's spent away from her. Even though she seemed to be doing well enough before Shinsou came to UA, it was clear that she still wanted to use his presence as a shelter. And at her age, it wasn't unusual to want to stick close to the person who had practically raised her.

There's nothing else to be said between the two of them, and that's all the more frustrating. There's nothing they can do to bring Shinsou's voice back, nothing to stop this hurting from either of their wards. Try as they might to draw Shinsou out of his shell, or offer fun activities for Eri to distract her from Shinsou, it just wasn't working. It was a quick-fix, and not even a good one.

And just when Yamada thought the knot in his chest couldn't get any tighter, when the wards come back for lunch he sees the puffy red irritation around Shinsou's eyes. The kid had to have been crying in the bathroom, and despite how hard Shinsou was trying to hide this pain to do that, Yamada wanted nothing more than to call him out on it and take him home. Even if home had nothing to offer but familiar comfort, it was something he could do.

He'll probably have to face a bit of Principal Nezu's wrath when he takes a leave of absence to make sure Shinsou won't have to go to school tomorrow, or any day after that until this is taken care of, but Shinsou was hurting enough. The very least he could do was make sure that the kid was a little more comfortable in his sorrow.

*

27 rests his forehead on the cold porcelain, trying to breathe and trying to get the strength to move again. He was lucky that this wave of nausea crashed so suddenly, that he was already close to the bathroom when it hit.

He forces himself to lean back, to clean up, to wipe the tears from his eyes that came while he was puking but he must be losing his mind completely. He feels the tears well up again when he wishes that Yamada were here to help him like he did before, and the mere thought of it sends a weight to the pit of his stomach. He's being ridiculous, why would he want Yamada to deal with this? To deal with him, and to deal with something so disgusting?

He's shaking when he finally pulls himself to stand up, nearly stumbles when he does. He's so hotcoldhot, this feeling is pure torture. It's impossible to hide as well as he thought he could, and he really doubts he can do this. He might be like this for a week, maybe more, and the thought of that is unbearable.

When he reaches for the latch on the door, he hears the door to the bathroom burst open and freezes, knowing that Eri wouldn't have the strength to throw that door open so hard that it smacked against the wall. And he should have known who it was just by how the door was opened. "It smells like fucking puke in here, why the fuck can't we do this somewhere else, Deku?"

"I'm not sure if I'm supposed to know about it, so I don't want anyone to overhear," Izuku says, and 27 nearly rolls his eyes when they don't seem to realize that someone is here to overhear whatever they wanted to keep private. He catches himself when he gets dizzy again, and takes the opportunity to press his forehead to the cold stall door as gently as he can to keep from making any noise. "Kacchan, do you still... not like quirkless people?"

27 feels his blood run cold. Deku wouldn't. The damn blabbermouth wouldn't just- "I don't have a fucking problem with quirkless people, Deku. Good quirks, bad quirks, no quirks, I don't give a shit. Why the hell are you bringing that up?"

"Well, Shinsou talks to you more than anyone else so-"

Bakugo scoffs, and 27 can hear someone leaning against the sink counter, probably Bakugo. "He doesn't fucking talk to me, he's been ignoring all of the chats like he wants to be mute on that shit too. Either that or Mic-sei ate his fucking phone or some shit."

"It's not that," Deku mutters, and 27 wants to throw his head through the stall door. He was acting stupid, the phone is fine, it doesn't remind him of how little his mother sold him for. He shouldn't have said anything about it, he should have kept his mouth shut when he was going crazy because Deku can't keep anything to himself and he should have thought about that. He should have thought during any point in that night of pure insanity. "Look, I just don't want you to say anything bad about being quirkless around Shinsou. He's-"

"Not fucking quirkless, and you fucking know that. Seriously, what the fuck are you on about-"

27 can't stand the taste of bile still lingering on his tongue, these nosy hero students talking about him like that. Like they had to be ever-so-careful about his feelings, like he was really so broken that he could snap at the slightest insult. He opens the door and enjoys the sight of Deku startling so much that he throws his arms up in a defensive block, and tries to glare at him to make his terror worsen. But the way he nearly stumbles again probably makes that completely ineffective.

"Shinsou, are you okay-"

"Don't fucking tell me you were purging or some dumb shit you twiggy ass shit stain," Bakugo snarls with his eyes narrowed into slits. "Fucking, if you're puking so you can keep looking like a corpse I'll fucking make you into one-"

"Fuck off," 27 tries to say, but what comes out is a mixture of a croak and a whine, barely understandable even to his ears. He knows what that means, he has days at most before he loses his voice completely, and it won't matter if Eri continues the logical ruse, he'll still be completely mute.

Bakugo and Deku trade a look, and while Deku's concern is plain to see, 27 can see that the normal and natural anger on Bakugo's face has fallen completely away, making him look strange. 27 ignores it, walking to the closest sink to rinse his mouth and trying to ignore the burning pain in the back of his throat. "Oi, you're sick as shit. Why the fuck are you at school?"

27 ignores that, he wants to just ignore that this ever happened, that they know now and now he has to deal with that. He doesn't want to, and he doesn't want to so much that he can't find a way to convince them to ignore it too. He just presses a wet hand to his face selfishly, chasing the brief moment of relief while his other hand grips the side of the sink to keep himself from falling.

"Shinsou, do you need to go to Recovery Girl? You really don't-"

27 shakes his head, trying to find the strength to convince them he's not sick, but a look in the mirror shows how plain it is to see. His face is too pale, he can barely keep his eyes open, and his hands shake too much. He looks pathetic, and maybe that will work better for him. "Don't. Eri."

The whining hiss when his words fade into air only makes him sound weaker, and he hopes that it's enough to make them ignore this. He's useless, quirkless but only Deku knows that right now. They should just ignore him, he has nothing to offer them. "The brat's gonna have to get over that shit, you're dead on your fucking feet and you look like shit. Either you're coming with me to get some fucking medical attention or I'm dragging your ass over there, but there's no fucking way

I'm letting your plague riddled ass walk around like this."

27 pulls up the face mask and considers his options. He doesn't have the knife, but if by some stroke of luck he manages to get Bakugo in a pin, he might be able to threaten Deku into silence. He'll strike hard and fast, take them both by surprise. As soon as he can lift his arms.

"Shinsou, do Aizawa-sensei and Mic-sensei know that you're sick? You really shouldn't be at school right now," Deku says, his hand reaching out for him but 27 pulls away from it, shaking his head while he wishes that this dizziness would just stop. It's too difficult to hide when he feels half-drunk, when he feels more than half dead.

"Almost done, just today," 27 mutters, the hand still resting on the sink his only support when he feels his legs start to shake too. He knows this is taking too long, Eri will be worried enough by that. He just needs these two hero students to let it go, to ignore him. "Just today. Please."

He doesn't know how to deal with what will happen tomorrow when he's still at school, he can barely fathom tomorrow when he's just trying to get through each moment. He's so tired, he wants to let himself fall to the ground and he doesn't care what happens afterwards, but he has to. He can't let Eri worry about him like this.

Deku frowns, clearly opposed to the idea of letting him have even this, even this much, but he's silent. He's considering it. "You're nauseous, and you're losing your voice. Do you have a cough or a fever or-"

"Deku, you're not gonna let him-"

"Cough, maybe fever. Cold," 27 mutters, pressing the back of his hand to his temple to try to keep his eyes open. "Throat hurts. Medi-" A cough cuts him off, a wracking fit that he finds too hard to fight, even if his throat flares with the pain so much that he's sure he'll taste blood after it ends.

Izuku's hand rests on his back, he's not sure what he's trying to do with that, but something is working behind his green eyes that he hopes will help him instead of hurting him. "Okay. Ochako has some medicine for nausea, I think I have some pain killers that can reduce fevers too. It'll make it a little easier to get through the day, but you have to tell Aizawa-sensei and Mic-sensei that you're sick. Okay, Shinsou?"

The sigh he breathes out is pure relief, medicine. Medicine that easy to get, medicine traded for an empty promise he had no intention of keeping. 27 nods, he feels the tears welling up in his eyes again and he can't tell if it was just from the cough or just from the relief. It could be easier, he could get through today and worry about tomorrow later on, worry about it when he can.

A knock on the door reminds him of Eri, makes it easier to walk even if he feels Bakugo's glare boring a hole through him. He knows that Bakugo disapproves, but maybe Izuku could convince him. Maybe Izuku has a reason to, a plan for 27, but it doesn't matter. Whatever the cost, he'd pay it when he could. He'd do anything for relief from this.

Eri clings to the pocket of his pants, silent while they walk back to the staff room. Lunch is too quiet as well, he hears Aizawa and Yamada's concerns too loudly because of it. He picks at his lunch and eats the smallest morsels he can manage, slowly, slowly settling his stomach and giving him the strength to stop shaking.

After lunch, he finds himself surprised by Izuku's cunning. Instead of trying to hand the medicine to 27 in an obvious way, he calls out to 27 and Eri with two drinks that he got from a vending machine. Eri's favorite lychee soda, and an orange juice mixture for 27. And in the trade off, he feels a paper packet held close to the can by Izuku's fingers.

Izuku answers Eri's excited gratitude and gives 27 a small nod, which 27 returns all too thankfully. Izuku wants something, he's made a debt and a promise because of a moment of weakness that he couldn't hide.

He'll deal with that later, when he can, but for now he's all too eager to take the medicine so that he can get through the day better equipped to hide it.

*

If there's one good thing about Mirio, it's that he's huge. He's tall, broad shouldered, and if 27 leans close enough to his desk, he's completely hidden from Aizawa's sight. He meets Mirio's wave and a smile he doesn't believe a bit easier knowing that relief will be coming quickly. He sits in his seat and waits for Aizawa to begin the lecture so that everyone else in the room will be distracted.

But he forgot that there's a certain ritual to this class.

He notices Mirio's stare first and spots the timer on his phone, counting down the five minutes that Class 3-A has to 'bother them.' Usually the bothering is only done by the Big Three and Shizuo, but it seems like the entire class has focused their attention on either himself or Eri. Despite himself, he hopes it's just Eri.

"ERI!" Neji screams, running to Eri's desk to bounce on her toes, barely restraining herself from grabbing Eri by keeping her arms held behind her back. "Did you have fun at Shichi-Go-San? Did you take a nice picture and go to a festival and eat a lot of candy? If you didn't eat a lot of candy, I'm going to give you all the candy! You've got to eat all the candy at Shichi-Go-San!"

Eri looked a bit startled at first, but quickly warmed up to meet Neji's enthusiasm. "Yeah! I ate a lot of candy that Twenny got me, and I got a really good picture! I wanna show you, but Zawa said only Class A can see it if they did really good on their tests!"

Too many heads turn in unison towards Aizawa, and 27 imagines that all of them wear the same disappointed and desperate pout that Neji wears. "Aizawa-sensei! That's unfair! All of us did really good on our first year Midterms so we should get to see-"

"You did not," Aizawa interrupts sternly, and there's a flicker of irritation in his stare that says he was highly disappointed in that. 27 hadn't realized it before, but Aizawa must have taught this class like he teaches the current Class 1-A. He wonders if they were better or worse behaved during that time, which rooms in the dorm used to belong to the Big Three. "Seven of you received failing marks on your Heroics exam, and if I recall correctly, you failed one of your fundamentals, Nejire."

Neji looks stricken for exactly two seconds, before she finds a rebuttal. "But we did really good on our Hero Ethics Midterm, right? Right? So we should see the picture, right? Sensei, it's unfair! We did really good so we should see the picture too!"

Aizawa's eyebrows twitch in irritation, and Neji should probably stop bothering him when this five minute timeframe isn't supposed to target him. But he must notice that even though Neji is the only one voicing her opinion, every other student is looking to him hopefully, even Mirio. "You did pass the threshold I set for Class 1-A." Several hands raise into the air for a cheer that doesn't have a chance to begin. "But I don't have that picture."

Neji folds over on herself, nearly falling to the floor in her despair. Everyone looks disappointed, even Eri. Even Mirio.

“We can wait another day to see the picture, guys, and just be thankful that we get to see it. And you can’t ignore how cute Eri is everyday, she’s sitting right here!” Mirio tries to reassure his peers, but that smile is so fake that it’s barely a smile. 27 doesn’t know why he hasn’t seen the picture yet, but a weight settles in his chest at the thought.

Maybe this could start to make up for what he did. Maybe Mirio would forgive him for saying those things, trying to escape, threatening to kill Izuku with his quirk. He’d forgive him because he can’t do that anymore, he’s quirkless, and forget about it because he could see this picture.

27 pulls up the picture that he took of the framed one on his desk on his phone, and turns the screen to face Mirio. As soon as Mirio looks at it, he cups a hand around his mouth, eyes going wide then starting to water. “Eri, you’re so beautiful in this picture!”

There’s a clamor as it seems like every student jumps out of their seats to crowd around his desk, trying to look at the picture on his phone. Neji climbs on top of Shizuo’s back to look at it, and 27 hands the phone off to Mirio so he can deal with all this attention. There’s too many people crowded around him despite that, all of them cooing over the picture, and 27 feels the weight of their presence like it’s pushing him to lay his head on the desk and hope that they go away soon.

“Eh? Where’d Shin-Shin’s cat ears go?” Neji asks, her fingers combing through the hair on the sides of his head. The feeling of her fingertips on his scalp made him flinch at first, but that gentle pull that followed feels nice, nearly making his eyelids fall shut.

“Take your seats,” Aizawa snaps, and 27 jolts at the sound. He thought it was fine, even if he was distracting the students and he didn’t really mean to do that, he just wanted to show Mirio but Aizawa is angry and it’s his fault, he didn’t mean to do that.

27 scarcely breathes until the students are in their seats and 27 notices Aizawa’s stare, his expression an odd and soft concern. Aizawa nods at him, and 27 nods back, but has no idea what that means. He’s supposed to be angry, but he’s not, he’s clearly not, and that confuses 27 even more.

Mirio puts the phone on his desk, looking at 27 with an odd, wincing concern. The smile isn’t there, the one that 27 wanted to see again. The one that he probably won’t see until he finds a way to make this right. “Sorry about Neji. Are you feeling okay, Shinsou?”

27 nods, and the weakness he had before seems to double. Just three more classes, and the medicine will help.

But he has no idea how to change the way Mirio sees him.

As soon as Aizawa starts his lecture, 27 opens the juice and forces the medicine down, and no matter how he tries to swallow, the pills feel like they catch in his throat. He stops himself from chasing away too much of the burning ache with the juice, he knows he needs to ration it better to last throughout the day.

He tries to follow along with the lecture, but propping his chin on his hand makes it too easy to let his eyes fall shut, and he knows he doesn’t have the strength to sit up without it. He tries to follow along with the discussions, but the words keep turning to muted sounds, turning into wordless music that becomes too easy to fall asleep to.

He finds himself staring at Mirio's back instead, unsettled by how Mirio could be so close to him but still feel so far away. He just wants things to be normal again, he wants to take back that night desperately. In a hundred different ways, it could have gone differently. If he just fell asleep, if he drank the warm milk to make that easier, if he could have fucking realized that they weren't going to kill him after the investigation. Heroes are people like Mirio, heroes save people like Eri and they're too pure-hearted to even kill people like him.

He can't get Mirio's face out of his mind. The pain that he caused him to look like that, even if he was too angry at the time to feel it, he feels it a hundredfold now. He just wants it to go away. He just needs Mirio to know.

27 pulls the phone closer to himself and pulls up LNE, wincing at all the other chats that are full of messages. Even Yamada has messaged him here, but he doesn't have the strength to open any of the chats except the one that he needs to.

Mirio has messaged him a lot, almost every day. Asking how he is, what he's doing, what he's eating, how Eri is. Telling him about parts of his day. But all of that stopped after that night, and only one message was sent the day after.

Eri's Plushie Dealer: I know you're not on your phone a lot, but I hope you're really okay now. I'm sorry I didn't know that you were thinking that way, and I hope that Aizawa-sensei straightened out any misunderstandings. I'm not really the same hero I was when I went to the raid, but I hope that you feel like you can always talk to me if you're scared or worried about something.

27 holds his breath until he can control it, until his eyes only water but he knows the tears won't spill over. He really thought he was going to do that again, he was going to use his quirk to escape. Mirio felt like he needed to keep tabs on how fucked up his mind was now, how crazy. Maybe he was told to, maybe Yamada or Aizawa knew that he would slip more easily with Mirio, that he trusted him more.

And he still did. He couldn't deny that, Mirio was kind, even to a person like 27. He was still offering him the ability to talk to him, inviting him to, even if that had another purpose.

It's fine. Even if he stops talking to him once he knows he's less dangerous, he's nearly toothless and especially now. It's fine.

He might see that smile one more time. It'll be enough.

Eri's Mom: I'm quirkless. I don't know how. I can't do anything like that anymore. It's fine. I'm sorry I was stupid.

He feels his nerves singing with white electricity when Mirio puts a hand to his pocket, probably where his phone is, but he doesn't pull it out to read it in class. 27 still isn't sure if that was a mistake, he feels like he shouldn't have sent that but he just hopes that Mirio doesn't read it in class. That he doesn't try to talk to him about it.

He knows he won't. There'll be no reason for Mirio to talk to him anymore after that.

27 looks at Eri, but Eri turns her head away from him. He knows she's upset about something, she's irritated by something and it's probably him, but he can't force himself to ask what it is. He doesn't feel like he can handle knowing what he did wrong, on top of the mountain of things he's done wrong.

27 just stares at his desk, fighting the urge to just close his eyes, and waits for the day to be over.

*

With his head on his desk, 27 endures the cacophony of 1-A demanding to see the Shichi-Go-San pictures, made all the more unbearable by the headache that set in during Yamada's free period.

He's lucky, so goddamn lucky that Yamada seemed to think he was just tired. Yamada had stolen Aizawa's sleeping bag at some point and offered it to 27, rambling about other things like how he probably shouldn't have coffee for a while until his sleeping schedule evened out, asking if he was comfortable or if anything was bothering him.

27 agreed to anything safe to agree to, shook his head to any offers of things that wouldn't help him or questions that he couldn't answer honestly. Despite how tired he was, how oddly comfortable the sleeping bag was, he didn't sleep. He just listened to Yamada teaching Eri bits of English and JSL, listening to how much happier she was becoming with every correct answer. He must have been doing something wrong when he tried to teach her things, she's never been that happy to answer him.

"Sensei! I apologize on behalf of my fellow students' indiscretion, but Midnight-sensei did confirm that we met the requirements for-" Loud Motor is cut off by Aizawa slamming a book onto his desk, and 27 can't bring himself to look up when he knows he can't hide the wince. He wants to cover his head with his arms to block out the sound but he knows that would make him too vulnerable. If he can't bring himself to open his eyes he should at least hear what's going on.

"Since you're so full of that youthful energy, we're going to put it to good use in Gym Gamma," Aizawa orders, met with sighs and groans from these hero students who just couldn't be quiet to save their lives.

27 hides his grimace with his forehead against the desk. He was almost done, it was supposed to be easy, but now he had to move again. He could have stopped it if he just handed Eri the phone with the picture on it, he could have made them all shut up and leave him in peace.

Eri tugging on his sleeve reminds him why this has to be so difficult. He knows he's not hiding it well, he knows that the medicine should have made this easier, but it didn't. He still has to go along with it anyway.

He stands up, even if he has to hold the chair for too long to get his balance, and even if he takes Eri's hand too gratefully. He hates this.

He misses being able to talk to her. He knows he can't, he knows it was his idea and he knows why he did it, but he hates this. It's not the same to sign to her, it's not the same when she signs back sometimes. It's too quiet, everything is too quiet except when it's too loud and he hates all of it.

It's too much effort to not drag his feet at times, he just focuses on walking as normally as he can, trying to keep his eyes open. He knows Aizawa would spot it immediately if he made it anymore obvious, and he's being stupidly obvious even now. He's just grateful that Aizawa doesn't notice, he's too irritated by the hero students. He tries to follow close to Aizawa, he knows that's where they're supposed to walk and he knows very well that it keeps them safe from being pestered by the hero students.

IcyHot doesn't seem to know that, though.

He doesn't mind that Todoroki is walking beside him, he gives off a very cool air. Literally, the side of 27's body that's closest to him is colder than the other. It feels nice. He's sweating for some reason, but maybe Todoroki's effect makes that less noticeable.

He needs to look back, he doesn't know who's behind him, which students are closer to him. Whether Blasty is going to strike soon, if he's still irritated about 27 being sick. It sounds like too many footsteps. It sounds loud, it echoes loudly, it rings in his ears and makes his head throb.

It's far worse when his owner opens the door, he's not prepared for the sunlight and it blinds him for too long, his eyes squeezed tight against the pain, against how much he knows he can't close his eyes now. There's people all around him, he still doesn't know who's behind him, he knows better than to not know-

"-a headache?" His owner asks, his eyes focusing on him but when they glance behind his shoulder, they narrow in warning. The heroes that were behind him file through the door, giving him a wide berth, but he knows some of them linger close by.

27 nods, and even if he does it slowly his head throbs. If he admits this, it might be all his owner needs to know, and he might stop looking at him after that. 27 might be able to find a quiet place away from the heroes, recover enough of himself to stop slipping and be aware of his surroundings. He needs to, he needs to know and he's forgetting that.

There's a blissfully cold gust of air against his forehead, his eyes have fallen closed at some point and he can't bring himself to open them again until he's felt more of that relief. He sways forward, hardly meaning to, and suddenly there's skin against his forehead. The back of someone's hand judging by knuckles, they feel oddly soft.

He opens his eyes enough to see Todoroki's face, both unnerved and reassured by how it never gives away what he feels. He needs to know, and he doesn't want to right now.

"Todoroki, take Shinsou to Recovery Girl. I don't have any painkillers on hand," his owner says. He should open his eyes to see what his face looks like, if he's looking at him or at Eri. He probably said the last part to make sure Eri doesn't think he's sick, and 27 appreciates that at least.

Small hands squeeze tight around his own, and his eyes spring open, jolting away from the hand. He looks down at Eri, and she tries to smile at him, but he knows her too well for that. Her eyes are a bit too wide, too pleading for him to believe in that toothy grimace, the one she uses far more often for the heroes than him. "It'll be okay, Twenny! You'll be back before you know it!"

She knows him too well too. Knows that he hates being ordered to leave her, but it was an order. He places his other hand on top of her head, just resting it there, and tries to find something reassuring to say back, but he can't, he just ignores the swimming in his head to nod.

That isn't enough, it's not nearly enough, but she tries to convince him it is with her nod, her hands releasing his.

Halfsies walks past him, back through the threshold 27 must have been standing at for a while, annoying the heroes while they had to walk around him. He wonders if they'll get back at him for that, these hallways becoming as dangerous as the ones at The Miasma were.

Evil Cat Owner walks slowly, but he doesn't look at him. It's a relief that he doesn't, any of the other heroes would probably stop and stare, pester him with questions or look at him with that same odd mixture of sincerity and confusion. But Polar Temperatures plays a better game than they do, he doesn't speak unless he has a plan for his words, and that makes them all the more powerful.

“You can use it again,” Todoroki says, lifting his hand up. It’s so odd that he refers to his hand as ‘it.’ It’s unnervingly similar to something 27 would say, or rather think, because he’s learned not to say things like that.

27 starts to shake his head, but the pain reminds him that Chili wouldn’t see it anyway. He wishes he could just say ‘No,’ politely refuse but make it clear in his tone that he doesn’t want any further conversation. He misses being able to convey those kind of sentiments, his words are only words when they’re signs or spoken from the phone, too bare to be half as useful.

IcyHot keeps that hand aloft at his side, but the other rises in front of his chest. 27 is directly behind him, which means he won’t see the exact moment it bursts into flames, but he’s learned how to tell by the smell. “Are you trying to hide your scars?”

The question game. Maybe Todoroki doesn’t realize that it’s far harder to play right now, or maybe that’s exactly what he wants 27 to think. He wants 27 to be confused, off-guard, or underestimate him by assuming it’s a lack of social awareness that causes him to ask.

Chili’s pace doesn’t falter. Even his feet don’t give anything away.

“Tha-at would be po-ointless. E-everyone has see-en them.” Polar Temperatures looks over his shoulder when he hears the phone start talking to him, just a slight rise in his eyebrow. Maybe surprise, maybe irritation. Maybe he wanted 27 to feel ashamed by not being able to answer, like the face mask he was wearing now was a locked metal one that he used to wear.

Either way, the game is still on. And it’s 27’s turn to ask.

“Flames do-on’t cause sca-ars like that.” Turnabout is fair play, and besides, it’s interesting. The scar on Chili’s face is too smooth, where burns wrinkle or bubble or melt.

He would like to know for more than pure curiosity, because if he answers honestly, 27 will know his weakness. Whatever caused IcyHot’s scar will make him freeze up in a fight, especially because it’s around such a sensitive area like his eye.

He thinks IcyHot knows what he’s thinking because he hesitates, weighing whether 27 will catch dishonesty in his tone if he lies. 27 probably won’t, not with the way Chili talks, but maybe the weight of his gaze can unsettle Haltsies into thinking he will.

“My mother poured boiling water on my face.”

Todoroki is good at this game. If he wanted 27 to be caught off guard, he is. He’s not sure what to call the white numbness that blooms in his chest, but he wants to call it shock, rather than sympathy. Shock is only slightly less dangerous, but maybe Todoroki knows that he’s won both.

“She’s better now. She was sick at the time,” Todoroki says, catching the silence. Maybe he realizes that silence doesn’t give anything away since he’s talking to 27, because he turns to look over his shoulder as he takes his turn. “Are you a villain?”

If it wasn’t for the effort Chili had made to measure his reaction, 27 would have thought that he wasted his opportunity. 27 might have given him something about The Miasma if he asked the right question, still distracted by wondering if his own mother had ever thought about doing something like that to stop him from quirkling her. “A cri-imina-al.”

Even if The Miasma had uniforms, they certainly weren’t costumes. And he certainly never did anything out of his own personal philosophy, except choosing to keep his shoplifting to under 1000 yen every time he did it. Choosing to smile at the bookstore owner, even if she didn’t see it, and ask how her day was before he ordered her to hand him the receipt.

The owner was so odd under his quirk, he never felt the string go taut. He panicked the first time that happened, and demanded the receipt while he was still trying to figure out what had gone wrong, why he had missed. But she handed it to him with those same slow movements he was used to from his victims, even if her eyes were still brown rather than white.

Why did she react like that every time? How many times had he quirked her? Did she have symptoms of Mental Quirk Abuse? Does she live a bit better now that he's not stealing from her? What did she think when he ran out of her store that last time, falling out of his head? Did she figure out what he had done and report him to Sir Nighteye? Why wasn't he in prison for that-

Cold air on his face. He leans into it again, because he's so hot, he can feel sweat tickling his skin as it runs down his back and neck. Why is it so hot today?

"-seems to have a fever, and this helps," Todoroki says, words fading back from the noise. He opens his eyes to see that he's in Recovery Girl's office, the old woman standing in front of him with her clipboard held to her chest.

27 swallows down the most ill-timed cough he's ever had, teeth bared against the face mask. IcyHot shouldn't have told her that, he shouldn't have let him find out, he should have lied to Aizawa, they can't find out he's sick.

'Not sick.'

Recovery Girl frowns at him softly, with pity. "I'm sorry dear, I'm afraid I don't know that sign. Just take a seat on the bed, and Eraserhead will be here shortly-"

"Perhaps you could use your phone, young Shinsou?" All Might asks, 27 realizes he's standing far too close to him for him to have missed his presence.

His phone. His phone isn't in his hand anymore, not his pockets. That phone is worth more than he is-

"It's in your hand," Todoroki says. He's right, it was just his damaged one. It goes numb sometimes, and he seems to have forgotten that it's still there, attached and everything.

"I-eu-o no-ahcha." 27 gives up, the letters are too small and his hands aren't cooperating with him right now.

He's odd. He's made himself seem odd. He's made himself seem like a child, the way Recovery Girl just wrinkles her brow and pats his arm, Todoroki keeping his hand to his forehead as he walks him to a cot.

He feels sick and useless and he can't be, not now. It's not safe, Eri isn't safe.

"Do you have a headache right now?" Recovery Girl asks after he sits down, unable to keep himself upright as he slumps over onto his elbows braced on his knees. He tries to nod, but the pain flares again at the slightest movement, and just signs instead.

"That means 'yes,'" All Might translates, oddly proud of himself for knowing that, like he wants to be made useful. He shouldn't have to worry about that, though. He's All Might, they're never going to get rid of him even if he's not useful. His name means too much. He's so lucky for that, so blessed. 27 will never have that, 27 will always have to prove himself or he'll die.

“Did you try to use your quirk?”

“No,” All Might translates again, his voice closer now. 27 should really open his eyes, people were moving around now. He catches flickers when he tries, the pain inside his head keeping him from keeping his eyes open, the room brightening with each blink.

Something cold is pressed behind his ear, beeping frantically when it does, screaming at him but he’s too tired and sluggish to move away. He needs to get over that, quickly. “Todoroki, can you be a dear and grab a few ice packs from the fridge?” Recovery Girl asks, and the hand on his forehead retreats.

He opens his eyes enough to see what is placed in his hands, a paper cup of water and a small pill. “You need to take that, and drink two more cups of water before you can rest,” Recovery Girl tells him, a bit sternly. Perhaps irritated by how he’s just staring at it.

“Poison,” he mumbles, intending to irritate her more for being so sloppy, but his voice startles him too much.

“I-It’s not poison, young Shinsou!” All Might says, so alarmed that he doesn’t need to look up to know he’s waving his hands around nervously. “It’s medicine, and you need to take it!”

27 tries to glare at the medicine, not sure if he does. He feels so weak, like he just went through a round of quirk training for the 8 Expendables. Hari’s alone could leave him shaking sometimes, barely able to stand after his muscles were frozen for so long, and he knew it was always intentional. And Hari would usually go first when it was, then Rappa. It’s a wonder he didn’t die like that.

“Would you like me to take it to prove that it’s safe?” All Might asks. Before he can answer, still shocked that they would risk their greatest asset if he called their bluff, he calls his own, taking the pill and cup from his hands, nodding as his gaze follows them, before he puts the pill in his mouth and swallows a sip of water.

“Toshinori! That’s not safe for you!” Recovery Girl scolds. “On an empty stomach no less!”

“Oh! I have eaten, this box is for....”

Did All Might just poison himself?

Another cup of water and pill is in his hands. Recovery Girl is still scolding All Might, probably panicked that they might not be able to recover him, but he doesn’t hear what she’s saying, just her voice. She gave him an out, though. If he takes this pill, he won’t be there for the fall out, the Number that killed All Might.

It’ll keep Eri safe if he takes it, people will blame him and hunt him down if he doesn’t. She’ll be caught in the crossfire, the world raging against him for taking their symbol, the entirety of UA rioting against him at last.

He drinks every drop, even if he has to fight to swallow. He should have said something better to her, he just didn’t know it would be the last time he’d see her. He hopes she’ll be okay, that she’ll be safe. She’ll grow up to be happy, and forget about him somewhere along the way. Maybe she won’t hate him too much for this.

“Here,” Todoroki says, calling his attention before he makes a show of opening a bottle of water, the cap offering resistance before it breaks. That doesn’t really prove anything, there are many ways to tamper with a sealed bottle besides, but at this point it’s too late anyway.

He drinks it, and even if he struggles against each gulp, he tries to do it quickly. It should start working faster that way, and he's selfish enough to want it to be quick.

"Thank you, Todoroki, you can return to your class now, but please tell Aizawa to report to my office," Recovery Girl orders, and Todoroki nods. 27 wonders if he's figured out that their game has ended now, or if he's still under the impression that the poison was just medicine.

"Chiyo, I think it will be alright for now," All Might says, poking at a band that had been wrapped around 27's wrist at some point. "His fever is already beginning to break."

Recovery Girl sighs, and tells Todoroki that his owner should come at his leisure. Hopefully that means after he's dead. Hopefully he won't bring Eri, he won't let her see him.

What if he does ? What if that's what he wanted, he wanted Eri to see him, to be in pain? What if they have The Chair hidden in here, and they just want to use it one more time for another round of bullets?

He tries to stand up, tries to fight off the exhaustion inside him as it doubles. He knows his knees won't hold him, legs already shaking, but he has to get away from this somehow, has to fight it.

"Young Shinsou, you need to rest," Toshinori pleads, but even in 27's weakened state, he knows those bony arms wouldn't be able to restrain him, and the poison should be taking its toll on Toshinori first.

"Not safe," 27 slurs. It's not safe for him to rest, he'll succumb quicker. He has to fight it, Eri is in danger and he can't protect her.

"You are safe, Shinsou," All Might says, resting his hands on his shoulders in warning, that he will fight him if he tries to stand up again. "It's fine now."

He doesn't say the last part of his catchphrase. There's something in the tension of his grimace, the wrinkles around his eyes. Something 27 should figure out, try to read from him, especially now that he's touching him, hands on his shoulders.

But 27 is going to die. He can feel it in the unnatural heaviness in his limbs, his eyes falling closed and he can't open them anymore.

His pillow is incredibly cold, maybe they're trying to preserve his brain. Dissect it after he's dead to figure out how his quirk works or why he's so broken. Toshinori pulls a blanket over him, and he can't help but wonder why he did it, why he poisoned himself, but he kind of hopes there's an antidote he can take. He's not even sure why.

"It will be alright, young Shinsou," All Might says, while 27 tries to hold on to his slipping consciousness. Maybe All Might took the antidote beforehand. Maybe he's safe, at least. But it won't be alright for 27. He's not going to wake up from this.

"Stay," 27 mutters, trying to see if his body will obey him if he orders it to, if he's trapped under his own quirk.

Maybe he is, and the strain of trying to order himself around breaks him, because he slips into the nothingness once again.

*

The obstacle course for Class 2-A's Heroics training still hadn't been taken down in Gym Gamma, just as Aizawa hoped. He sets his class to begin running it, keeping an eye out for any who might slip up on the sheer rock walls or fall into one of the many gaping pits. Since no quirks were required for the course, and the inability to use them would tire out his students more efficiently, Midoriya was allowed to participate. He knows that Eri doesn't need supervision, she knows how to keep herself occupied, and his class does need his attention.

But he finds himself distracted by Shinsou and Todoroki's absence. They both should have been back by now. Even Eri seems to know it by the way she's watching the students, fidgeting nervously by his side.

A series of explosions eventually drew his attention back to his class, unsurprised to see Bakugo being restrained by two of his fellow peers while Kaminari waved around that Uno card. His idiots seemed to have found a new game where whoever holds that card has immunity to whatever consequences their words would usually earn, and like most of these bizarre and childish games, Bakugo was tired of it and attempting to end it in his usual way.

By exploding it.

Aizawa can't bring himself to either antagonize Bakugo by scolding him and keeping the game going, or allow Kaminari to reap his just rewards by confiscating the card and ending it. He probably should care about his students' antics, given that it's his job, but he doesn't.

Eri seemed to be interested in what was going on, entering the sidelines of the fray and drawing Aizawa's attention back to it. "Kaminari, what's that?"

Kaminari grins, eager to brag to Eri. "This is a Reverse card, and whoever wields its mighty power can say whatever they want, because whatever anyone says to them gets reversed back on them."

"Don't tell her that stupid shit you dumbass-" Bakugo growls, only to bite back his words in a screech when Kaminari thrust the card towards him like a priest conducting an exorcism.

Aizawa fought the urge to cover his face and pray that he wouldn't have to deal with this for two more years. The next class should be better. He knows he's been telling himself that for years, but if he gives up hope now, he won't be able to go on. He needs one irrational thing to believe in.

"Kami, can I borrow it? Please?" Eri asks, possibly unaware that Kaminari's bravado shrinks as his face whitens, though Bakugo seemed eager for Eri to get her way, grinning menacingly.

"Y-yeah, I guess, just uh. Give it back when you're done, alright?" Kaminari agreed, and as soon as he handed over the card, began sprinting across the gym and ignoring the obstacle course's set path to do so. Aizawa ignores that, seeing as Bakugo's pursuit seemed a good enough alternative in training to run while surrounded by clear and present danger.

Aizawa was curious what exactly Eri wanted the card for, but when he notices her hesitant stare when she returns to his side, he finds himself a bit disappointed in himself. He's tried to make sure that she could always come to him with her concerns. He thought that they were past the point of fear with Eri at least.

But when she holds the card up to him, he knows that they're not. "Zawa, what's the difference between lying and a logical ruse?"

Aizawa crouches down, considering his answer. This seemed to be a much bigger question than the one that Eri was asking, but it also presented an opportunity he would be a fool to not take advantage of. "Logical ruses are only when I either play a trick on someone, or if I know about it.

Otherwise, it's lying."

It might be a bit underhanded to handicap Hizashi's ability to prank him with Eri's aid, but given how cruel he was with that power, Aizawa didn't feel guilty for it at all. And with Eri's guilty frown, he knew that there was a logical ruse in motion against him that he could reveal now and get vengeance for.

"Eri, you're not in trouble for lying to me, or being involved in a logical ruse," Aizawa reassures, drawing a hesitant and hopeful look from his ward. "In fact, there are people called 'informants' who work with me to tell me about the schemes that other people are planning. It's a very important job, and I think that you would make a very good informant. And informants get paid for telling me about those schemes, usually in candy apples."

Eri was very fortunately one of the cheapest informants he had. He gets an excited nod, though the card is still held out towards him. "Twenny's lying 'cause he can still talk to me! It was supposed to be a fun logical ruse but you and Yama are really worried so it's not fun anymore and I don't wanna do it!"

Aizawa's eyebrows rose, shock settling in first. If Shinsou wasn't completely mute, and he had decided to lie to both Hizashi and himself by manipulating Eri into this scheme. "Did...he talk to you this morning?"

Eri nodded. "He sounded really thirsty, but he can talk. I don't think he's really good at logical ruses, Zawa, they're always really mean!"

This one was particularly cruel. Hizashi and himself had been agonizing over this, over Shinsou either slipping that far into fear that he couldn't speak to Eri, or his quirk affecting his ability to speak to that degree. Over their inability to do anything to help him due to the circumstances of his wardship.

He had told Shinsou about his own nightmares last night, had found a connection with his ward and what he thought was a foundation of honesty and trust, but the entire time, Shinsou had been lying to him.

He knows they're not past the point of fear with Shinsou, and this only proves it. But it's hard to convince himself that Shinsou had any good reason to worry them like this. "I'm glad that you told me this, Eri. You're not in trouble."

"Is Twenny in trouble?" Eri asks, bending the card in her hands while she looks like she's considering giving it to Shinsou to protect him from any fall out from her revelation.

It takes a moment for Aizawa to find an answer to that. "No, he's not in trouble, but I will be talking to him about this after school. Lying like that is not a good thing to do."

Eri nodded, in agreement with something that she probably didn't fully understand, and he hoped that she never would. That she would never reach the point of lying and hiding things from her caregivers, and that she would always feel comfortable to come to them with her concerns. "You should teach Twenny to make good logical ruses, Zawa."

Aizawa rose to his feet with a grunt of agreement, though he doubted it would happen. Shinsou had something that he was trying to hide, and it was probably a good thing that he needed to enlist a 5 year old's help to pull it off. Shinsou was too good at hiding things when left to his own devices.

He noticed Kaminari sprinting towards him with wide and panicked eyes, Bakugo closing the distance between them with absolutely no hesitation given to Aizawa's presence. "Eri, can I have the card back now?!"

Eri might have nodded, but Aizawa took the card and the decision from her hands. "I'm confiscating this."

Kaminari's eyes went wider, and he stopped to dodge under Bakugo's tackle, twisting and turning to try to avoid the comeuppance he had earned. "Please, Zawa-sen..."

Kaminari stopped dead in his tracks and didn't seem to be breathing. In fact, Eri was probably the only one in that gym able to do so, though Aizawa tried to give no indication of it.

He knew this would happen one day.

He's been called 'Dad,' he's been called 'Era-sensei,' he's been called 'Shitsei' as well. If it happens once, just one slip of the tongue, it will happen again because the first years are like lemmings. If they see one fall, they can't help but jump off the cliff themselves.

He knew Eri wouldn't be able to stop calling him that, and he's stopped trying to correct her. He accepted the threat of this in theory, but in practice, he just wants to ignore that it ever happened.

"Kaminari. I'm confiscating this," Aizawa repeats, deciding to ignore it this time. He knows it will happen again. He knows it. He doesn't know how long he can ignore it, but he allows himself one more irrational hope that it won't happen again.

"Y-yes sir," Kaminari replies weakly, unable to dodge the tackle from Bakugo that sends them tussling on the floor. Bakugo is apparently going to see if he can charge Kaminari with static electricity by dragging his knuckles over the top of his head, and as long as it doesn't earn either of them a trip to Recovery Girl, he'll allow it.

When the doors to Gym Gamma finally open, he guards himself to make sure that Shinsou won't see any of this seething resentment threatening to become apparent, but instead only sees Todoroki enter. And that irritation seems to find a new outlet as he watches Todoroki slowly make his way towards him, too slowly for an explanation that Aizawa sorely needs.

Todoroki glances down at Eri, his eyes going slightly wider, before he cups a hand around the corner of his mouth and still speaks too loudly to hide his words from her. "Shinsou has a severe fever. Recovery Girl asked that you go to her office at your convenience."

'Severe fever' and 'at your convenience' didn't make any sense at all, especially coming from Recovery Girl. Aizawa barely restrained himself from making his way to her office immediately, forgetting that he still had a class to supervise, and quickly checked the time on his phone to see if he could simply dismiss them to get changed under Iida's direction.

Sounded thirsty.

Aizawa fights not to roll his eyes, how had he not seen this? The lethargy, the vomiting yesterday, how hoarse Shinsou had sounded at the Joint Training Exam and his sudden passion for tea. He thought it was distress after Monoma's evaluation of his quirk, overeating, refusal to drink anything that wasn't sealed or made himself out of fear of being poisoned. He accepted things he shouldn't have, took the explanations by piecemeal without considering the bigger picture.

Shinsou has been sick for days under his watch, and he hadn't seen it. He allowed him to hide it, allowed him to manipulate Eri into hiding how his voice was probably still hoarse and would have given him away.

Before Aizawa calls to dismiss his class, ignoring that he'll likely receive a less forgiving warning from Principal Nezu than when he did the same on his birthday, the doors open again to his worst nightmare. "Eraserhead! How about a little joint training with Class 2-A, since you feel like you can use our setup whenever you want?"

Midnight holds the door open for her class to file in, and Aizawa barely holds himself back from using the capture scarf to throw her into the nearest pitfall. He didn't have time for this nonsense, he didn't ask for it at all, and he's not going to deal with two classes when he didn't want to deal with one.

He meets Midnight at the door, intent to tell her to gather her class and guide them back to whatever they're supposed to be doing, before he catches her wink and softened smile. "Toshinori was trying to get ahold of you. He's with Shinsou right now, and he said he'll take over Hizashi's class once you two get there. Sounds like he's got the Safety Sick really bad."

Aizawa spares a glance at Eri, standing a bit away from them but still observing the conversation. Reassured that she wasn't having the reaction he anticipated so far, he turns back to Nemuri for an explanation. "What do you mean by that?"

Nemuri puts a hand on her hip, pulling a pout. "Shou! You should remember this from the certification course! I know it's been so long, and you're so unsuited for-"

"Nemuri," Aizawa interrupts, regretting that he asked at all when he could be halfway to Recovery Girl's office by now.

And Nemuri thankfully gets to the point, dropping the act entirely to look oddly proud. "Kids are pretty amazing. Even in ways they can't really control, they try not to be vulnerable until it's safe for them. You really can't call it a wardship if they don't get sick at least once."

He remembered that. It was something that he heard a few nurses talk about while Eri was still in that persistent and feverish coma. Part of it was her quirk, but they believed that when she felt like she was free, she was truly safe, her young body was overwhelmed by it. Her brush with the outside world after years of isolation that occurred two weeks prior seemed like a more rational explanation, and that same reasoning held out for Shinsou as well. Shinsou was just sick, there was nothing more to it.

'You're safe.' He's told Shinsou that countless times. He thought he had proven it as much as he could, despite the demands of the investigation making that protection hollow at best. He could protect him from Miasma at least.

But if Shinsou believed him, when he proved he was safe in a different way, safe and free.... "Eri, we're going to see Shinsou now."

Eri offers her hand but he picks her up anyway, even if he can't allow himself to worry her by running, he feels the need to set a quick pace.

If Shinsou believed he was safe, he needed to be there.

*

27 struggled to open his eyes, his body weak and wracked with too much pain. Too hot, entirely too hot. He wanted to pull himself away from this smothering heat but couldn't move a muscle, weak. Pathetic.

He feels someone close to him, he's sure it's 10. 10 tries to stay as long as he can when he needs to be healed by his quirk, it's more dangerous for him sometimes. Even if he's not allowed to open the mask, sometimes he can figure out what 27 needs if he looks at him, almost like a telepathy quirk. He can feel the wet rag on his forehead but it's not cold anymore, and maybe if he stares at 10 he can ask him to flip it over.

He needs to open his eyes, but just a flash of light from doing that makes him bite back an embarrassing whine. It hurts, and it's hard to convince himself that he's been hurt worse. It's just a fever. He doesn't remember how he got hurt, but he'll be fine as long as he recovers before the next job. He's been getting them more often but he's still not working as much as the other Numbers. As much as he should.

He hears people talking, and he doesn't know why they're there, he can't figure out who it is. Everything is mumbled, whisps of sound that he can't hold onto. It's too hot to hear anything, he's drifting in heat and pain and he just wishes 10 would talk to him. Sometimes he reads, sometimes he just talks. He just wants that, like a pathetic little kid.

10 takes away the rag on his forehead and replaces it with one that's ice cold, and he can't help the sigh that slips out at that. Then 10 pulls at his wrist, and he forgets himself for a moment, terrified that he's on the table in the Red Room and he just doesn't know it, but something is being ripped off of the inside of his wrist. He's pretty sure it's not supposed to be there, it doesn't hurt. It would hurt if 10 were ripping the skin off of his arm like that.

It's cold, whatever 10 puts on his wrist after that, it's cold and so nice. He feels himself shivering afterwards, the tiny shakes he can't fight shaking out pain in its wake, but 10 does the same on the other wrist, his ankles and the sides of his neck. It isn't until the last cold thing is placed on his neck that he feels rough fingers catching on his skin, callouses.

10 has soft hands, even if they're bent with age. They shake sometimes, and these hands are steady.

This isn't 10.

27 manages to open his eyes, only seeing blurs of color, tries to drag himself towards the wall but barely manages to move himself before he collapses. He blinks, trying to focus, his breath coming out too quick, too exhausted from moving. He's weak, 10's not here and he doesn't know what that means but he knows it's not good. He hears the voices again, clearer but he still can't make out the words. "10?"

His voice comes out too cracked and hoarse, too high and reedy and pathetic behind that. Whoever they are, they know he's scared, he's weak, and he can't do anything to stop this, anything to defend himself. He knows there's no point to stop himself from crying but he tries, even if they're going to kill him he doesn't want to cry in front of them.

He doesn't have the mask, and he knows what that means. His jaw is free, but not for long. It won't be long before he won't even feel it anymore.

He sees 10, still too blurry, and someone else that looks strange beside him. Small, white, wearing blue clothes, red eyes. They're oddly familiar. There's someone wearing black much closer to him, black clothing and a pale hand. They're a Number, but he doesn't know who, why they would be touching him, why 10 would let them do that. "...sou, it's alright."

He doesn't know that voice. How long has he been sick? Is this a new Number?

Are they going to kill him as a test? Has he been out that long? Bug must have decided he was wasting too much time to get better, but she didn't want to do it herself. This guy must be meant for assassination, they must think that 127's workload is getting too heavy, they need another man for the job. But they want to make sure he can do it, that he can kill. He can even kill the weak and defenseless like 27. "...ou, you need to sit up. It's just me."

27 doesn't know him, he's acting irritatingly familiar with him. A hand slips under him and tries to pull him up, forearm braced against his shoulder blades. This guy is strong, whoever he is, those hands are huge.

It hurts to be moved, but not as much as moving. It's a struggle to keep his head upright until he feels his shoulder brush against a wall, tilting his head against it to chase the cold relief. The wet rag that was on his forehead falls off, landing on his stomach and he winces at the loss.

"He needs to drink all of that, but go slowly. He still seems delirious," an old woman says. 27 tries to turn his head to see where she is, but the burst of pain in his neck stops him. But when he feels something smooth pressed against his bottom lip, he finds the strength to ignore it, turning his head away from it.

"Shinsou, you need to drink this," the hitman says, his voice is weird, soft. He's either good or bad at this, trying to lure him into complacency by talking like that or the guilt is already getting to him before he even does the job.

27 shakes his head, trying to find where 10 is despite his blurry vision. "10, I can work. Don't... please don't..." His throat burns too much, his voice barely audible, and even if he's given up on trying not to cry he just doesn't want to sob. It can't end like this, they can't kill him like this. He's tried, he's tried so hard and he knows he'll do good, he'll get better.

"Shinsou, look at me," the hitman says, that soft voice a bit more panicked. Bug is going to be mad, he can't even finish him off quickly and he's the easiest target he'll ever have. "You're at UA. You're not there. My name is Aizawa, do you remember that?"

Something pulls at the back of his head, and he almost feels like he's falling. He doesn't know what those names mean, why he keeps calling him 'Shinsou,' but it's familiar. It's like he's supposed to know.

"You're not at Miasma, you got out. You're safe, but you're sick, and I need you to drink this," that man - Aizawa - says, and 27 opens his eyes to see a small cup with red liquid inside it, held in a pale and oddly dainty hand. That hand also seems familiar.

"50," 27 says, coming out more like a growl. If he got out, she has to be here. She's supposed to be dead, but maybe she's not. Maybe 98 lied, maybe she made it seem like she died but she escaped. She came back for him, just like in those dreams.

"50... isn't here right now, but she'll be back. You need to take this medicine before she does, or she'll be worried," Aizawa says. 27 doesn't remember him, but he must be important to 50 too if he's here. Maybe he helped her fake her death, maybe he helped get him out too.

Aizawa lifts the cup to 27's mouth and slowly tilts it so that the liquid barely trickles in. The first swallow hurts, enough that 27 would try to jerk away from it but he finds himself too weak, but he knows he needs to drink more to soothe this pain. It seems like Aizawa is going too slow, it takes forever to finish that bitter drink, and the flavor sits on his tongue far stronger after that.

"The medicine is a very potent fever reducer, we should be seeing an effect soon," the old woman says, as Aizawa lowers him back to the bed. "Leave the blanket off, he's still at risk of overheating."

The cold rag is back on his forehead, but 27's eyes have fallen shut, too weak to open them again. Exhausted, he's too weak to move until this pain fades, and he hates feeling like this. He still wishes 10 were here.

But it'll be fine, because Aizawa's here. 50 trusts him, and 27 trusts him too.

Even if he can't remember him.

*

Yamada slips and nearly falls flat on the floor when he tries to stop sprinting, holding onto the doorknob to Recovery Girl's office. Toshinori offered to watch what was left of his homeroom but he dismissed them in a panic, barely remembering to thank the retired pro for his thoughtfulness. His ward was sick, Shinsou was so scared of being sick and he had reasons to be, even if they weren't true anymore. Shinsou was scared, and sick, and alone, and he just dragged him around school all day letting him suffer like that.

He feels like he takes his first breath in the last 5 minutes when he lays eyes on Shinsou, even though it's not a pretty sight with cold compresses stuck almost everywhere on the poor feverish teenager. Shinsou's face is flushed, he's sweating and wincing in pain even in his sleep, and Yamada knows he didn't look so hot today but he didn't look anything like that when he handed him off to Shouta.

But despite that, despite knowing that Eri's worry was all too clear in the way the little beansprout was frowning, sitting on the cot next to Shinsou's legs, he at least knows that Shinsou is safe. He's not fading away into the ether or wracked with horrible boils or dying - it's just a fever, just a little sick, and Yamada is here to take care of it.

Or, Recovery Girl is here to do most of the 'taking care' part, and she doesn't look too pleased to jump in this late in the game. "Eraserhead, I need to talk to Present Mic in my office. Tell me if any of the monitors start calling for me."

Shouta nods, barely glancing at Yamada and even if his hair hides most of his expression, that's a sign all by itself. Shouta's just as worried, probably feeling just as guilty, but while Shouta can drown with it in every little mishap that happens with their wards, Yamada knows that's not the way forward. They fucked up a little bit, but they can get a handle on it now. They can do better, they can take care of Shinsou when he needs them to.

But when Recovery Girl closes the door to her office, sits down without a huff or a single sign of that more familiar irritation, he starts fearing the worst. "He needs to go to a hospital," Recovery Girl says, and while Yamada trusts her judgement, he clings to an instinctive and incredibly necessary hope that she's wrong. "He's deliriously feverish, and it was brought on too suddenly. If his fever spikes any further, there's nothing more I can do."

Yamada feels that worried tone in the pit of his stomach. Chiyo wouldn't lie, and she wouldn't make a mountain out of a molehill. If she's worried, he's far beyond worried. "He was fine. Not really fine, he seemed a little out of it, but I wouldn't have taken him to school if he didn't- Chiyo, what the hell does that mean-"

"Yamada," Recovery Girl cuts him off, looking up at him behind her glasses and he can see the worry all too clearly with that. "This isn't a normal illness. His temperature rose five degrees in ten minutes, and at the highest point of his fever, he was two degrees from a lethal temperature. Even when taking into consideration the type of emitter quirk he has."

Yamada's mouth drops open, but not a single fucking word can come out. He trusts Chiyo knows what she's doing far more than he does, but he knows that the people trying to kill Shinsou have their hands in hospitals too. They don't know which ones, they don't know how they operate, and they know that it would be too easy for a nurse or doctor connected to Miasma to give Shinsou something that would kill him instead of treat him. And no one would know the difference.

Chiyo might know that too. She folds her hands, staring at them for too long before she asks. "Has he used his quirk recently? Is there any other factor that I'm-"

"He... lost it," Yamada says numbly, but after he says it, he hopes. "Monoma tried to copy his quirk and said that he couldn't feel it, that it felt like Shinsou was quirkless. That-that didn't make sense, but if it's doing this, then-"

"It doesn't make sense, it's impossible with Shinsou's circumstances," Chiyo answers, and he's all too relieved to see a bit of irritation with that, swelling when she sighs. "Obviously, Shinsou's quirk has been abnormal before he came to UA, and though it's not the most feasible explanation, it could be causing this."

Yamada waits with bated breath for anything, any reason that Chiyo could offer him. Maybe Shouta could just erase Shinsou's quirk and he'd be right as rain right after, Shinsou wouldn't have to suffer through any more of this. He wouldn't have to worry if his ward was going to die from a fever that they couldn't properly treat.

"It's rare, but some developing emitter quirks have severe fevers, sometimes frequent ones. That would explain the medical notes from the hospital and the police, but..." Chiyo shakes her head, frowning to herself. "It's impossible. There's no reason why Shinsou's quirk would regress to that stage of development-"

"Rewind," Yamada mutters, barely able to breathe after that.

How had they not considered that? They've known all this time that Shinsou's quirk slips and his mutism came after the raid, but they never even considered that something at the raid might have caused it.

"Eri Rewound him when she Rewound Chisaki. She didn't- it was a mess, he had the tattoo and everything, she could have-"

The realization in Chiyo's widening eyes provided enough relief for Yamada to nearly laugh. If Shinsou's quirk was just developing again, just a piece of him caught up in the fusion and affected by Eri's quirk to a higher degree, then he would recover from this. If his quirk was tied so heavily to his voice, when it did finally reach that stability from a fully developed quirk, he might even-Shinsou might even be able to talk again.

"We don't have any medical history from Shinsou's childhood," Chiyo says, and her muted confusion about that makes it clear that she doesn't know there might not be any medical history. If Shinsou's mom was such a stellar mom to hand her child over to a criminal organization like Miasma, she probably wasn't taking him to his annual checkups either. "His quirk registration file is oddly sparse as well. I have no idea if he had fevers when he presented his quirk."

"But he had to, his temperature has been up and down since the raid. He's-" Yamada stops himself, even if he wants to hope, he has to know. "Chiyo, it's not normal, but it's possible, right?"

Chiyo stares for too long, considering too long, before she nods. "It's possible, and it doesn't change the danger that Shinsou is in. If his fever reaches that pitch again, he needs to be taken to a hospital.”

“What if Shou-”

“No, ” Chiyo interrupts sharply. “If his quirk is that fragile, nullifying it could cause irreparable damage. And as he is a mental emitter, we can’t rule out the possibility of brain damage as well.”

Yamada dares to peek out the window on the door, and relief floods him with what he sees. Shinsou just looks like he’s resting, no longer as flushed and no longer in pain, and the numbers on that monitor beside his bed tell him the reason for that, familiar yellow numbers instead of orange ones. “He’s back to 39 degrees.”

And he knows he’s the only one relieved when Chiyo wrings her hands, shaking her head. “That’s not a good thing. His body can’t handle going up and down like that. I’m going to write up a treatment plan, is there anything else that you’ve noticed related to this?”

Yamada nods, all those little signs that were so obvious, things that should have made him check Shinsou’s temperature more often even if he knew a fever wouldn’t be clear until it climbed too high. “He puked yesterday, he’s been tired all day. You saw that his throat was irritated Saturday but he sounded fine until he...”

No. Shinsou wouldn’t.

“He said he wasn’t able to talk to Eri yesterday. It’s... It’s probably his quirk,” Yamada says, throwing his hands up while he shrugs, while he smiles too much to convince himself. Shinsou was smart, but he wouldn’t do that. He wouldn’t lie like that. “It really was right in front of my face, right? Jeez, what a blonde I am.”

Chiyo ignores him, focused on typing out her notes and pulling up websites to print out. “The vomiting may be related to the fever, but that only makes it more dangerous. He needs to increase his fluid intake, and especially after that kind of spell. I gathered that he was refusing to eat or drink when I evaluated his throat, and though I’m not privy to the reasoning behind that, he needs to eat and drink. I have a saline drip but I don’t want to use it.”

The printer in the corner of her office seems to be printing off a manifesto, and Yamada wonders if Chiyo is really going to blow through her paper supply allowance for the term just for Shinsou. Or if Principal Nezu even tries to enforce that with her, knowing that UA can’t afford to lose her.

“I have a mobile monitoring device for Shinsou’s temperature readings as well. It will alert you to any reading that crosses his warning threshold on your cell phone, so you can act quickly to avoid a severe spike in his fever. The instructions for that are in here,” Chiyo says, handing him a little novella that probably contains more information about fevers than any given medical textbook. “I’ve also included some recipes that are easy on the stomach and can soothe a sore throat, and over the counter medications that you’ll need to start him on in two hours. I’ll send you home with what I have, and plenty of cold compresses, but do not give him an ice bath if you see a severe spike. Only slightly colder than room temperature to disperse the heat.”

Yamada would be checking his phone constantly to make sure that spike never came, knowing that Shinsou shouldn’t have to go through any bath, no matter what temperature it was. When it would only remind him of the torture that he went through at the 8 Precepts, of his worst triggers. “Will do, Chiyo. Thank you so much for everything, we’ll get this down pat and make sure Shinsou gets through this just fine!”

And with a stack of papers an inch thick tucked under his arm, Yamada opens the door a bit too hard, swinging outwards and catching on the doorframe with a thud, but he's too grateful for it when he sees a purple haired head pop off its pillow at the sound.

Eri wastes no time in crawling closer to Shinsou, who blinks back against clear grogginess that seems to fade immediately when he realizes it's Eri. He pulls a hand to the side of his head, fingers resting on the cold compress stuck there like he wants to pull it off, before he shakes his head. "Not si-"

The coughing fit that cut him off didn't have to prove him wrong, not when Shinsou's voice sounded horrible. Yamada runs to the minifridge to grab a water bottle, his own throat aching in sympathy, but looks up to make sure that his little bean wasn't suffering too horribly from the proof that Shinsou was definitely sick.

And she wasn't. Yamada almost couldn't believe it when Eri rolled her eyes and huffed like she was 5 years old going on 30, putting a hand on either side of Shinsou's face when he finally caught his breath. "Twenny, it's okay! You don't gotta be scared of getting sick 'cause Zawa said you're not going away. And you're not 'sposed to lie either, 'cause Zawa would've let us stay home all day and we could have been watching movies all day. All day, Twenny! And you can't do logical ruses if Zawa doesn't know about it, okay?"

Shinsou just stared while Eri 'helped' him nod to agree, likely feeling the same kind of shock that Yamada and Shouta felt. "I'm not scared. You're...not scared."

Eri was definitely feeling pretty peeved at Shinsou over something, as she falls backwards onto the cot to express that a bit dramatically. "I'm not scared, Twenny! You always get really sad and scared when you get sick, and I don't want you to anymore! We could've watched movies and cuddled all day and talked and-and I'm never doing a logical ruse with you again! Not until you make better ones!"

Eri punctuated her little huff by crossing her arms, but despite her demands, Shinsou looked pretty 'sad' and 'scared.' Or 'guilty,' more likely.

He glanced at Yamada and Shouta with his head bent down, and Yamada glanced at Shouta to find himself surprised that the confirmation of his little suspicion wasn't news to him. And while Shouta could hide that shock and sting of betrayal with just a dry look in Yamada's direction, Yamada had to work himself up into something a bit more reassuring. "Yeah, let's not hide things like this, kiddo. You would've had a much better time at home instead of at school, and you kind of had us worried pretty bad."

Shinsou tensing up with that worried pinch between his eyebrows had Yamada pretty convinced that he knew that now. He probably didn't know half of the heart attack that Yamada nearly had, but there was no reason to kick the poor kid when he was down.

But Shinsou could have told him at least. Even if he didn't want Eri to know, even if he hadn't entirely warmed up to Shouta yet, he could have told Yamada.

And he wouldn't have had to wear this damn 'Existing Amplifier' shirt all day if he did. Nemuri has enough pictures on her phone to retire early if she sells them to a gossip rag, and he's more than a little worried that some of his students will do exactly that. Shouta faces the 'Delete Face' merch only because he's too stubborn to allow any legitimate ones to be made, but Yamada's knock-off market is small and he wants it to stay that way.

But far more than that, he just wants to take his kids home and settle in for a nice, long week of taking care of Shinsou.

Lemon and Pork

Chapter Summary

27 is sick, but that only means he has a new enemy to face - Yamada, Aizawa, and Eri trying to take care of him. And that begins with a bowl of soup.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: Food issues, Bug mention

Previously on Wards of UA: Everyone found out that Shinsou has been sick for a few days after he had a bad fever spike at school, and Yamada and Aizawa found out that Shinsou had only been pretending to be unable to speak to Eri in a 'logical ruse' to hide that he was sick. When Shinsou first arrived to UA, he would only eat or drink things that Eri handed to him. Shinsou has a fear of being poisoned (and coincidentally, has been poisoned a few times in this fic). Shinsou thinks that Mirio sees him as a criminal and a horrible person after trying to escape UA by threatening to kill Midoriya, who was under Shinsou's quirk at the time. Shinsou told Aizawa that the poison that he fears the most, Memory's poison, takes 10 minutes to show symptoms of the poison taking effect. Shinsou thought that Eri would be afraid if he were sick, but Eri had been trying to keep Shinsou from getting sick because when he was sick at the 8 Precepts, he was 'sad and scared.' Shinsou refers to Bug as 'Trainer' when he signs to Aizawa or Yamada, as neither of them know about Bug beyond that.

This might be plan #14, but Yamada holds out every hope that it might be the ticket. As enthusiastic as Eri was to take care of Shinsou, to cuddle with him and watch movies all day, and pretty much take advantage of the fact that Shinsou wasn't leaving this dorm anytime soon, she frowns at the tube of yogurt in her hands and drags her feet on her way to Shinsou's room.

"He's sick because he feels safe," Shouta mutters to himself, glaring at the pots of soup and bags of snacks and drinks that Yamada truly had no place for, his chin resting on his arms folded on top of the counter to look as miserable as Shinsou probably felt. About half as miserable as Yamada would feel if he let himself give in to the mounting worry.

Shinsou was refusing to eat.

Not the soup that Yamada made, not the smoothie, not a jelly pouch, or leftover oatmeal, or a muffin, or even a popsicle. Not a drop of the three soups that Class 1-A had delivered to their dorm after school, not any of the snacks. Since he would only drink something from a sealed container after checking it over, Yamada had been purposefully giving him water bottles in hopes that the water could stir up an appetite, but that plan didn't seem to be working either.

He promised that the nausea medication would keep him from puking. He offered to buy any take-out Shinsou wanted. He nearly begged Shinsou to just try a bite of anything, starting to sympathize with every mother who had to deal with a fussy baby that just refused to eat anything when they had to eat.

Shinsou just shook his head before he laid it down on the counter, silencing Yamada's obvious pestering when he signed ' Call police ' and retreated to his room like he thought that horrifying threat might be taken as inspiration.

Yamada's not going to force feed Shinsou. Even if the idea is starting to look a little too tempting with every hour that passes, with every surge of paternal instincts that scream for Shinsou to just eat something. He barely touched his lunch, or his breakfast, or the dinner from last night, and while Yamada has been writing off a lot of Shinsou's bad eating habits on stress, it's more important now that Shinsou puts it aside to eat something. Anything. If Yamada has to drive out into the wilderness and hunt down a magical glowing stag, he won't care about any mythical wrath he incurs after that.

He just. Needs Shinsou. To eat. Before he loses it.

When Eri trails back to put the unopened Go-Gurt in the refrigerator, shaking her head, Yamada hands off another water bottle and hopes this one might do the trick. Shinsou is hopefully unbearably hydrated by this point, and Yamada can see on the thermometer bracelet app that his fever has been remaining steady with only a few minor blips in the wrong direction, but the medicine and cold compresses are doing the trick.

Even if Shinsou had to open the medicine himself in order to take it, and put it in his pocket with a look that almost dared Yamada to ask why he didn't trust him.

Shinsou doesn't trust him anymore. He doesn't seem to trust anyone, not even Eri. And while Yamada knew that being sick was miserable by itself, and Shinsou would likely react poorly to being so vulnerable, he didn't really expect it to get this bad.

Shouta raises himself up just to slouch against the back of his chair, his eyes still locked on the soups like they're the reason that Shinsou has completely lost his appetite. But that pull of a frown tells Yamada that he's not mad at the soups, and he's not entirely mad either. And he's probably going to say something that he knows Yamada doesn't want to hear. "Shinsou might do better if he were moved to the 1-A dorm."

Yamada froze, wracking his mind to try to figure out what the hell Shouta meant by that. Sure, Bakugo had some choice words to go along with a soup that was so red it made his tongue burn just looking at it, but Shouta wouldn't take his student's words seriously. It didn't matter if Bakugo figured out that Shinsou was sick before they did, he should have told Shouta or himself if he was that incensed about it. And Midoriya definitely knew, fessing up to giving him some medicine that he hoped didn't interact with anything that they gave him, and Midoriya definitely should have told them. And by the nervous hand-wringing, he definitely knew that.

Shouta glances at him and sighs, as if he was being rational when he was clearly being fucking insane to consider what he said anything close to rational. "He tells my students things that he goes to great lengths to hide from us. It's clear that he doesn't feel safe here--"

"Shou," Yamada says a bit too sharply, a bit too rattled to care about that either. "We are so not doing that and I don't want to hear about it. It's ridiculous, you can't-you can't expect your students to take care of my ward."

He finds himself fussing with a soup, stirring it up like he hasn't tried serving it to Shinsou already, like he won't have to toss it right out despite all the old-wives-tale-medicinal properties that Ojiro promised were in it. Shouta should know better than to keep at it when he knew that Yamada was fussing pointlessly like this. “He probably feels more comfortable with them because he probably wasn’t tormented by someone his own age. And he was by older men.”

Yamada slams the lid on the pot a bit too hard and starts washing off the ladle in the sink, grinding his teeth at that. He’s not going to be compared to Chisaki, to Chronostasis, to any of those people and all of the ones he doesn’t have a name for yet. Shinsou did trust him, he might be a little shaken up and confused right now, and having his little con get found out like that might have set him a little more off-kilter, but what Shouta was talking about was fucking ridiculous. “No, and that’s all I’m going to say about it. That’s all I need to say to it, Shou.”

He found himself staring at the faucet just so he wouldn’t have to turn around and see that Shouta was still thinking about it. He didn’t want to see that right now and knew he wouldn’t be able to handle it if he did. He’s taken out his hearing aids at Shou far more often than his mom ever did to his mother, but he’s gotten to the point where they wouldn’t make any difference. He can hear what Shouta’s thinking about just by looking at him.

He wonders if his mom has any advice for this, or any sympathy she can offer. Or if he even deserves to have it. He definitely wasn’t as picky as Shinsou when he was a kid, but there were a few nasty bugs that made him miserable enough to inflict his suffering on everyone. Especially his mom.

He’d whine about his aching head to get her to do that tapping thing on his brow that no one else can do the right way. He’d pilfer popsicle after popsicle, once going through two boxes in one day, but his mom always stocked it right back with his favorite flavor. And even though he wasn’t a huge fan of soup, she’d make him the tiniest little finger sandwiches with the softest white bread and no crusts, and even when he felt like he couldn’t eat a single bite, she’d convince him with just one more.

He just needs to find Shinsou’s finger sandwiches.

And he knows exactly how to do that with plan #15.

*

27 frowned at the wall as long as he could while Yamada pestered him. Why couldn’t he just make up his mind? He told him to rest, to sleep as much as he could, to make sure to drink a lot. 27 could do those things, but he wasn’t able to because Yamada just kept pestering him to eat.

He can do everything else. He wants to do anything else. But Yamada just won’t let him.

He hides nothing when he finally gives in before he does something he knows he’ll regret, deciding to show how exhausted Yamada is making him instead of how irritated he is. He follows Yamada to the kitchen while he drags his feet, and when he sits at the counter he lets his head fall to his arm to hide his face while he coughs. Why won’t the cough medicine just work for him?

“Doing alright there, little listener?” Yamada asks, glancing up from his phone, and 27 answers that with all the indifferent silence it deserved. Of course he’s not alright, he’s tired and irritated and he still hates this. Even if he doesn’t have to hide it, even if Aizawa will let him stay here instead of putting him somewhere that Eri won’t be, this is still horrible.

But Yamada just smiles at that, dragging out another pot. He’s not going to give it up, and neither will 27. If they’re not going to force feed him, he’s not going to eat. He can’t. His stomach knots up at everything put in front of him, his mind twists it into something dangerous, and it’s too irritating to deal with. If he can’t eat until he gets better, he just won’t eat, and it’ll be fine.

“So, we’re going to make something that you’ll want to eat. And I’m going to cook it right here, you can see every little part that goes into it and look at it if you want. But we’ve got to get you to eat something, Shinsou. Even if it’s just a little bit, you really need to eat, kiddo.” Yamada starts setting out cans on the counter, and 27 has to hide his face against his arm again.

Yamada knows too much, he knows too much about him. He doesn’t even seem to think it’s weird, and that’s more irritating. But if he knew so much about it, he would know why 27 can’t eat anything right now. He knows it’s not poisoned, but his body still thinks it is, and he’s too exhausted to fight it.

Yamada’s smile is too tight lipped, he knows that Yamada is irritated about this despite how hard he’s trying not to show it. Aizawa shows it far more easily when he takes that yogurt tube out of the refrigerator for Eri to eat while they watch a movie. Yamada just keeps nudging those cans a little closer, the scraping sound all the more irritating, and 27 gives in and looks at them.

Canned soup. Miso, chicken noodle, tomato, onion, clam chowder, pea. There are pictures under the labels that are supposed to look appetizing, but even the pictures turn his stomach. He shakes his head and lets it fall back to his arm. Maybe he could just fall asleep like this.

“Shinsou,” Yamada says, too quietly but it sounds too loud to 27 because of that. Yamada should just be mad, he should just ignore him if he’s not going to force him to do it, he shouldn’t sound like that. He shouldn’t sound so sad. “Look, I just need you to eat a few bites. Just pick a soup that sounds kind of good to you, and we can work together to make it even better. We can cook together, make up our own recipe just for us.”

27 pulls his arm closer to himself, fighting that awful feeling spreading to his chest. Yamada shouldn’t talk like that, saying ‘us’ and ‘we’ and ‘our own.’ It’s cruel to twist him up like that now, to make him feel this misery on top of misery.

“The clam chowder and chicken noodle are pretty much already made, but I always throw a little more seasoning and a few more veggies in with it. The miso is a good, fishy kind of base for a lot of recipes. A little more nori and fish, put that over rice... Kind of like that rice porridge Mirio made-”

27 doesn’t look, he just swats his hand blindly until he finds one of the cans. Miso. Of course it would be. Even the name sounds like Mirio.

But Yamada just smiles. “Okay, miso! Let me just find...” Yamada trails off as he picks through cabinets until he finds a thin package that he was looking for, turning it around in his hands as he holds it up to show off that it’s unopened. He puts it down on the counter in front of 27 so he can check it himself, but he doesn’t do it. There’s no point to. “And fish? Does that sound good?”

27 shakes his head. It’s enough to waste this much of Yamada’s time, but Yamada seems inspired to waste more of it. He goes through all of the food they have, asking 27’s opinion on it. Even the yogurt. 27 shakes his head to everything, he gets tired of doing that and just shrugs when it sounds like Yamada thinks it should go in the soup. The soup he’s still not going to eat.

“Okay, miso, pork, chives, nori, little bit of lemon, these seasonings... I think it’ll work out pretty well!” Yamada clearly doesn’t believe that, but he seems too happy to do it. It’s that cheeriness that he hates. It feels like Yamada thinks 27 promised him something with that, and he can’t even find himself irritated by his presumption.

‘Not. Eat.’ 27 sits up just long enough to sign before he lets himself rest on the counter again, but he might as well not have bothered. Yamada just shakes his head, still smiling too much, too honestly.

“You’ll see it when you smell it! It’s better to work up an appetite when you can smell the meal coming together,” Yamada promises, and he just doesn’t fucking understand.

But smelling doesn’t require him to lift his head up anymore, so 27 lays his head on the cold countertop, moving when it feels like it gets too hot too quickly. Yamada notices and gives him another cold sticky thing to put on his forehead, but 27 knows it’s just a trap. Just a debt that Yamada wants him to pay, and he knows how Yamada wants him to pay it.

He rests his chin on the counter, the cold sticky thing blissful on his head, and feels his teeth rattling when another cough takes hold. Yamada gives him another water bottle, but he’s too tired to drink it, the ache in his throat enough to ignore, but Yamada clearly doesn’t want him to ignore what he’s doing.

Yamada angles himself so that 27 can always see what he’s doing to the food. He can see the rice going into the rice cooker, see the water from the faucet filling it. Yamada holds up everything for his inspection before he uses it, even the seasoning, and 27 feels like he can’t close his eyes no matter how badly he wants to. Yamada will probably be angry at the end, but this is all 27 can do. He’s trying.

He closes his eyes when Yamada isn’t looking, but Yamada was half-right about the smell being effective. When his eyes are closed, he can almost feel hungry, he can appreciate the pork searing on the stove, and how it changes when more seasonings are added to it. The sweet tartness of the lemon, the fishiness of the soup, even the mellow near-nothingness of the rice, these things smell nice.

But when he thinks about eating them, his gut clenches up hard enough to make his eyes water, and the frustration from that nearly makes him cry. He knows this is supposed to be easier, he knows it isn’t because he’s just that broken, and it’s going to irritate Yamada eventually.

He doesn’t know what will happen after that. Yamada will give up, but he might give up on 27 too. He’ll ignore that 27 needs to eat, not just when he’s sick. Even when 27 gets better, he’ll ignore it. It’ll be worse than Bug on her bad days, because the bad days will never stop, and it’ll be worse.

They’re not cooking together, but this will probably be the last time that they will. And that hurts more than the ache in his head or in his throat or his bones. It hurts.

He raises his head when Yamada starts to call for Eri, and shakes it. He doesn’t try to hide what he feels right now, he knows it doesn’t matter if Yamada sees it. It doesn’t seem to matter what he feels either, he’s told them over and over that he can’t eat and they keep ignoring that.

He stares at the bowl of soup that Yamada puts in front of him. There’s a pattern in the strips of floating nori, slices of lemon on the sides of the bowl. It looks nice, and when he closes his eyes, it smells better. He knows it’s not poisoned, he tells himself that until he starts to doubt himself by how insistent it sounds.

He wants to eat it, but he can’t. He knows he can’t before he even tries, when he picks up the spoon and tries not to disturb the nori, but he does. He just wets the spoon, telling himself that those few drops couldn’t hurt him even if they were nothing but poison, but it doesn’t do any good.

He lets the spoon drop before his head does. He doesn’t know what Yamada looks like right now, and he doesn’t want to. He knows what Yamada wants, and he knows that Yamada should know he can’t get it.

He hears Aizawa walk over, and thinks that whatever happens to him will probably come from his hands. Aizawa has been irritated enough already, as if he knew about that hazy dream that 27 had where he was there. He's probably just irritated that 27 is sick, even if he doesn't have a task for 27 to be unable to do because of it.

He doesn't lift his head until he hears the bowl slide across the counter, unreasonably offended that even if he wasn't going to eat the soup, someone would take it from him. But he sees Aizawa meet his eye, and eat a spoonful of it before setting his phone on the counter to face 27. It has a timer counting down from 10 minutes.

27 pulls his other arm onto the counter to completely hide his face. They can't know this much, and it's useless even if they do. They don't fucking understand how impossible this is.

He still feels Aizawa standing beside him at the counter, Yamada standing on the other side of it, he hears the movie that Eri is watching. He just wants to leave, he wants the ground to swallow him up and take him away from this moment. He doesn't belong here if he's going to be this troublesome.

He hears Eri approach and the feeling worsens, and he hopes that she just wants something from the heroes before he's proven wrong by the tug on his shirt. "Twenny, you gotta eat! You're not gonna get better if you don't eat!"

He grimaces with his face pressed to the counter, caught between lies and sanitized truths of 'I'm not hungry' or 'I can't eat.' He doesn't want her to know these things, he hates that he can't seem to hide anything from her. In a way that doesn't even make sense, he's unsettled because it doesn't seem to matter if he does.

She's fine with him being sick. It doesn't really scare her. Her eyes don't go wide, her fingers don't clench in his clothes when her worry becomes too much for her. She doesn't seem to care. And she's still angry with him, and he doesn't know why. He only knows how much it hurts, even if he can't do anything about it.

"No," 27 grates out. He can't even come up with a good lie, with anything that makes sense. It feels like his head is swimming, he wants to sleep just to escape it. He wants to pull his arms away because his face feels too hot, but he can't, he's too weak and he doesn't want to be that vulnerable.

"I'm not gonna eat 'til you do, Twenny," Eri decides for herself, and he can hear that irritation in her tone still stinging in his chest, before he realizes what she means. "I'm never ever ever gonna eat again. Not even if you tell me to! Even if I get really hungry, or if I have candy apples-"

"Eri," 27 snaps, the sting from his tone probably startles her more than himself, but he doesn't look up to see it. He doesn't want to see it. "Just... stop."

He presses his head against the counter harder, wanting to chase the slightest pressure from it into a bruise, into something that hurts more. He hates this, he hates himself, he wants to go away, he's the most fucking troublesome broken awful person and they can't even fathom that, because if they had the slightest fucking clue, they'd stop. They wouldn't bother. They'd leave him alone, and he wishes that they would.

But his chest tightens when he hears Yamada calling Eri away to help him find some blankets. It's a ridiculous task, he only says it because he wants to pull Eri away from him, because he doesn't want to deal with 27 either. And even if 27 wanted that, if he thought he wanted peace, he doesn't. He's a broken, messy person and he hates it.

He doesn't know why Aizawa doesn't leave either, and he doesn't know if he wants him to. He feels the vibrations of the timer going off against his skull, but he doesn't feel like he can eat, or even look at Aizawa to see if he's fine. He knows it won't make a difference anyway.

He feels Aizawa's arm moving closer to silence the phone even if he doesn't look, and feels the disappointed sigh more keenly than he hears it. "Is this different from usual?"

27 takes a moment before he shrugs. It is, but it isn't. It's not that different, only that he can't find a way to convince himself, and the fact that he's being pestered so much only makes it worse. He knows it doesn't make sense, that he's not really answering Aizawa, but he can't bring himself to explain what doesn't make sense to him either.

Aizawa doesn't say anything for too long, and 27 waits for him to leave. To be alone, like he wanted, when he doesn't fucking want that at all. Even if he deserves it. "The fever reducer that Recovery Girl prescribed can't be taken on an empty stomach. That's why Hizashi is so persistent about this. You can read the directions on the back of the medication where it says that."

Aizawa is trying to make sense out of nonsense, as though just reading the words that he already believes will make a difference. It won't. He knows it won't, he knows there's no way to change this. It's never been this bad, except at the police station, and he doesn't want to be like that again. Especially when he knows he needs to take that medicine, he needs to eat beforehand to do that, so they have to make sure he eats the same way the police officers did. Forcing him to live, and he doesn't even know why this time. They have The Miasma's name.

Aizawa shifts in his seat, but 27 doesn't look to see how that has changed him. He doesn't know if 27's insolent silence has gotten to him, if irritation is seeping closer to anger. If Aizawa is angry now, and what that looks like. "You've been taking care of Eri for a long time. I imagine there were times that she didn't want to eat, and you knew that she had to."

27 pulls his arms closer at that. Those words were close, but so fucking wrong at the same time. There were so many times Eri refused to eat, especially when she was younger. She didn't like oatmeal, she didn't like jello, she wanted to have her hair combed instead, she just didn't want to. And every time, he had to make her. Sometimes he could just beg, he could entice her by feeding her, he could praise her for every bite so that her wide red eyes would look to him when she took the next one, waiting for more praise. It only got more irritating as she got older, when she had those fits less, but more obstinately. It felt like a horrible torment just to sit there and watch her not eat.

"You're not a toddler. You can understand why you need to eat, and you can understand why Hizashi and I are insistent about it. We're trying to take care of you, and if there's a way to make that easier for you, I want you to tell us."

Take care of you.

It doesn't make any sense. Why? He's almost sure Aizawa doesn't mean it the way he should, he doesn't mean 'taking care' of a problem like 27 the usual way. And that doesn't make sense. They have The Miasma's name, they don't need 27 for anything, especially now that Eri is mad at him, now that he's made a lot of trouble by getting sick.

He hates that Aizawa says that, he says things that don't make sense now, now that 27 is too weak and tired to even figure out what they mean. He doesn't mean that 27 is like Eri, he doesn't mean that he's like 27, or Yamada is like 27. Taking care. He doesn't mean that.

No one wants to deal with 27 like this, no one should have to. 10 had to, because that was 10's job, and 10 did it well because 27 made him feel guilty for something. When he lost his voice at the 8 Precepts, no one had to take care of him, and Hari barely did.

Hari would drop the tray on the ground once he opened the door, not caring that it spilled oatmeal everywhere and made a mess, and that it would sometimes make the pills fly across the room. And he'd collect his payment for that effort by taunting 27, telling him how much Chisaki likes having Eri around, how it might not matter if 27 gets better if he takes too long. Different words with the same meaning, something that 27 understood all too well.

Aizawa doesn't have a reason to care if 27 gets better, he doesn't have a reason to take care of him either. It just doesn't make sense.

He can't ask what Aizawa means, he can barely turn his head to the side so he can look at him. He doesn't try to look at his eyes, but his mouth is in the same frown, he's slouching in his chair with his arms crossed, but he doesn't look angry. 27 sees Aizawa turn his head towards him, before it turns back to face forward before he stiffens. "If you eat five bites, I'll make you a cup of coffee."

As insulting as that was, to be bargained with like 27 was a child, it was a little amusing to see how much it humiliated Aizawa to have to do it. He can tell by his straightened posture, the way his hands hold his arms where they're crossed, that Aizawa feels uncomfortable doing this.

27 can't ask why Aizawa is doing this, but he can see how much he means it.

'Sleeping bag,' 27 signs, the signing awkward because he refuses to lift his head off the counter yet. He can't remember the sign for 'Scarf,' but he hooks a finger under an invisible one around his neck and tugs. He's asking for two of the most precious things to Aizawa for a measly five bites of food. It's a horrible trade, and Aizawa should get angry just for suggesting it.

Aizawa lifts an eyebrow, and his hands loosen around his arms for a moment. "You can have the sleeping bag for the week for five bites, but the capture scarf will cost ten."

27 has never haggled for a trade like this. He's not sure what that means either. Aizawa is willing to give up the things that he treasures for something that mundane, but not as cheaply as 27 demanded. And he definitely considers the capture scarf to be more precious.

27 pulls the bowl back in front of him and feels weak just from that. He lifts his chin just enough so that it can rest on his forearm before he picks up the spoon, dragging circles across the surface of the soup to try to put the pattern back together, the way it was before Aizawa messed it up. He knows he's just stalling, he's just trying to see if he can really do this. He tries not to think about the soup as food, not medicine either. It's just his, it's something that Yamada made for him.

He dredges up some rice from the bottom because he knows it will be more filling, and tilts the spoon so that he won't spill any of the soup when he pulls it to his mouth. There's a moment where he slips, when he thinks about what he's doing instead of what he's trying to do to Aizawa, when he doubts that he can even open his mouth because he's sure he'll spit it out before he even realizes what he's doing. But he lets it pass, and focuses on the task at hand. He knows that Aizawa doesn't mean what he promised, and he's going to prove it.

It's harder to chew when his chin is so firmly placed on his arm, he feels like he's moving the top of his head more than he is. It tastes good, mostly because of the hint of lemon, and the warmth of it soothes his throat for a moment. He swallows easier than he thinks it should be, it makes him think that he's lied to Aizawa and Yamada instead of having his body lie to him.

He doesn't know what Aizawa looks like right now, and he knows he doesn't want to know. He definitely doesn't want to know what Yamada looks like when he hears him coming back down the hallway. But he closes his eyes for a moment, just enough to convince himself that it might not matter, before he takes another bite.

27 has counted many things, he barely has to think about it sometimes, but he has to think about it now to keep himself from thinking about what he's counting. He tells himself that he's putting the food in his mouth, but that's somehow different from eating. He's not eating. He's just counting. He's just testing whether Aizawa will do this.

Yamada sets up the blankets on the couch so that Eri can watch the movie more comfortably, but 27 feels his gaze boring into him sometimes. He's sure that Yamada is mad, Yamada has tried to make him do this for hours and that he should have just done it hours ago.

It makes 27 forget what he's not doing, he's not eating. It seems to work if he doesn't think about it.

He pauses after the tenth bite, because he doesn't have a reason anymore. He's earned both prizes, and he wants to know what Aizawa's face looks like now that he has. But he also doesn't want to see it, and he feels like there's something in his stomach that needs to be filled, like he's half-hungry in a way that doesn't entirely make sense.

He eats slowly, he's sure that it won't work now. He lets his mind go blank and then he lets himself call it what it is - eating. He's eating the soup that Yamada made.

And he feels full, and warm, and tired, and different after eating half of it. He doesn't even know what it means, why it feels like that, what he really feels like to feel different. It feels like lemon tastes, but he's too tired to make sense of it.

When Yamada walks over to him, voice odd in a way he can't place, and tells him that he needs to take the medicine with the red packaging, he's too tired to do it himself. He pulls all three medicines from his pocket and puts them on the counter, letting his arm fall to his side after. If he could just stuff the medicine into his ear instead of having to raise his head to swallow it, it would be easier.

Yamada walks around the counter to show him how he pops the pills out of the packaging, that he doesn't do anything to it and doesn't do anything to the water bottle that's still in front of 27. He only hesitates to take it because he feels too exhausted now, he has too much body and not enough strength to move any of it, and he only does what he needs to in order to take the medicine.

He tries to swallow the pills dry, like he saw Bakugo do once, but they stick to the back of his tongue and taste awful, and he chases it with water but the taste makes him pull a face. There must be a trick to it, but at least the taste made him forget how tired he is.

And he is tired. Yamada wants him to move, to sit on the couch and watch movies with Eri, or to go back to his room. Yamada offers to help him do that, but unless Yamada wants to carry him, it's not going to happen. And 27 doesn't want Yamada to carry him.

27 closes his eyes, probably for too long because Aizawa is walking back from down the hall and he shouldn't have left without his notice. He has the sleeping bag in his arms, and the scarf in his hand. 27 can't tell what's wrong with his face, but it's different. His eyes are wider by the slightest degree, even if nothing else has changed. "Did you want to try to use the capture scarf?"

27 shakes his head, his mind too blank to catch himself. ' Don't want. ' He can tell that Aizawa seems surprised at that, the way his eyes nearly roll says that he's irritated. He's not sure why, he's not sure if he can care. He probably should, but it's enough effort to keep his eyes open.

Even though Yamada is still trying to make him decide where he wants to be, as though he can't just sit at the counter, Shinsou decides none of this is worth the effort anymore. Aizawa puts the sleeping bag on the back of his chair, and the capture scarf on top of it, and Shinsou lets his eyes fall shut.

His head tilts as his strength leaves him in a rush, leaving warmth in its wake. He's warm, he's comfortable except in pieces that he's not like the strain in his neck or pressure under his chin, but it's dull enough to ignore. Even if Yamada doesn't want him to fall asleep here, even if there are more comfortable places to do it, he knows it's fine.

It's fine if he falls asleep here, because Yamada and Aizawa won't hurt him.

*

Aizawa wavers before he sets the capture scarf on top of the sleeping bag again, this time laid on top of the desk chair in Shinsou's room. The sleeping bag is no real loss, he has that odd suit that Nemuri gave him for his birthday and though it seems too tight at times, the stuffing not thinned with age, it's useful for half of the things he uses it for. But despite what he knows about Shinsou, despite how much he trusts that Shinsou wouldn't use it against him, he doesn't want to give the capture scarf up. He's never lent it to anyone, had no reason to, and feels immaturely tempted to take Shinsou's 'Don't want' to mean he can back out of this part of the deal.

But Shinsou ate, and he wouldn't want to give him any reason not to make that effort again, especially now. Even if it makes him uncomfortable.

Hizashi grunts in exaggeration when he places Shinsou on his bed. Aizawa knows that Shinsou is hardly heavy enough for carrying him to cause a strain for a pro hero, and he knows that his husband is just relieved that Shinsou didn't wake up while he was being taken to somewhere more suitable to sleep than the kitchen counter.

Hizashi scoffs when he starts fussing at the blankets, pulling them over Shinsou only to fold them, and unfold them again, unsure whether it's too hot or too cold when it truly makes no difference. "Being such a horrible patient, falling asleep right at the kitchen counter.... I had to remind myself you don't have purple hair a few times, Shou."

Aizawa rolls his eyes, because this joke has grated on his nerves long enough. And they have far more important things to worry about. "His fever?"

"It's fine, Shou," Hizashi says softly, holding up his phone to prove it. "We've got one kiddo down for the count, and another who needs some serious movie-induced cuddling to get over some serious peeves going on."

Aizawa had noticed. Eri certainly hadn't been happy today, due to what he thought was confusion as to why Shinsou couldn't talk to her or why he seemed so tired, but seemed to stem from that 'logical ruse' that she certainly wanted no part in. And the irritation from that wasn't going away, seemingly flaring up at Shinsou in their every interaction. "Eri seems to be holding a grudge. That isn't like her."

Hizashi grinned at that, some joke that he's found amusement in when Aizawa found nothing about this situation worth smiling about. "Sold him out for a candy apple, of all things."

And Aizawa would have appreciated it if it happened sooner. "It's good that she did. It would have been better if she had come to us in the first place, or if my students did.”

Hizashi raised an eyebrow at him, as though there were something that he was missing. “You know, I wouldn’t sell out my mom for a candy apple. Would you?”

Aizawa knows what he means, and even if he’s wary to call it that, it would be a step in the right direction. Certainly a rough transitional period that would be difficult to manage on its own, even if Shinsou weren’t ill, but he also can’t ignore the direct question that Hizashi had asked. “Yes.”

There were a few times that his mother had tracked him down, calling it coincidence that she happened to be lingering outside the police station for hours, or that she decided to do her grocery shopping in Mustafu rather than the prefecture that she lived in.

He invited her to the wedding only because Hizashi seemed to think someone should sit on his side of the aisle, but every interaction he’s had with her as an adult has only made him wish he could find a reason to arrest her. Her quirk isn’t offensive, he would have no cause to detain her himself, but if she had so much as spit on a crosswalk in front of him, he would have tried to report her for it.

Hizashi’s cheer turns into a wince at that, before he raises his hands as if to reason with him. “Alright, point taken. But you wouldn’t sell my mom out for a candy apple, right?”

“Not even for a 20 hour nap,” Aizawa answers, and he absolutely means it. Not even for his life.

He knows that Eri sees Shinsou as a ‘mother’ more similar to the way Hizashi sees his own, even if that is changing. That only makes it more difficult to change it, because it’s harder to change a relationship than abandon it completely, and Eri’s anger towards Shinsou was more frustration at her inability to process that.

And if Eri needed some comfort to encourage that developing degree of separation, it was a very easy task to perform. Especially because Aizawa could take a nap once the movie marathon began to bore him.

*

Eri thinks she might be getting sick.

She feels really, really weird when she’s around Twenny, kind of like she has a tummy ache or her skin is really itchy, and it kind of makes her mad. It’s not fun at all, and she doesn’t like being mad at Twenny, but she kind of does. Even if it’s a little scary.

Twenny is just really, really, really dumb sometimes.

He’s super smart about books and stuff, and Eri used to think he was the smartest person in the whole wide world. She used to think he liked her a whole lot, almost as much as she likes him, but she knows that’s not true because he keeps ignoring her to do dumb stuff, and she hates it.

Yama said she could sleep in her own room, and she kind of wanted to, but she knows that she needs to talk to Twenny so she goes to his room instead. But Twenny is still sleeping.

Twenny sleeps way too much. Even if Eri said it was okay if he was sleeping, it’s not really the same as being with him. She sighs and tries to sleep, even if she can’t sleep on his arm, and it doesn’t really work. His pillows are cold and too big, she can’t get comfortable, so she just huffs and stares at Twenny to try to wake him up. And it doesn’t work.

She tries tugging on his shirt, and he doesn't wake up. She shakes his shoulder, and he still doesn't wake up. She tries to pinch his eyes open, but he pushes away her hand and rolls over before he makes a whiney sleepy noise.

It sounds really dumb, just like Twenny is.

Eri doesn't want to spend time with dumb people who don't want to spend time with her. She wants to spend time with smart people who like her, and people who don't give her tummyaches or make her mad even when they're sleeping.

She gets a little scared at the door, because it seems really big, a whole lot bigger than it's supposed to be. She feels really small, and a little cold even when she pulls her Hello Kitty blanket over her head. Zawa and Yama let her sleep with them when one of them is doing hero stuff, but there might not be a whole lot of room if they're both trying to sleep. Even if she's got her own bed, she kind of wants to sleep on the floor more than she wants to sleep there alone.

Yama opens the door like he heard her thinking about how to sleep on the floor, but he looks down at her like he didn't think he'd see her there. "Hey there, little bean! Having some sleeping troubles?"

Eri leans on one foot before she nods, because she's not really, but she kind of is. And she wants Yama to think she is so she can get to sleep with Yama and Zawa together. Yama smiles at her and ruffles her hair over the blanket, before he looks back into his room.

"Shou, get decent for our little interloper! I'm just going to check on Shinsou real quick and then I'll be back," Yama talks a little weird, a little louder than he usually does, and Eri doesn't know what 'decent' means but when Yama walks away to Twenny's room, she peeks her head in to see if Zawa is okay.

Zawa is pulling a shirt on really slow, like he's really sleepy. Eri never saw Zawa with his shirt off before, and he looks a little like Twenny in some spots because he's got marks like Twenny does. Zawa looks up at her when he's dressed, like he's a little surprised she's there, before he pats the bed and she runs up to get there, cuddling close to Zawa's side.

"Did you have a bad dream?" Zawa asks, even if he sounds really tired. Eri curls her toes, because she didn't, but she doesn't want Zawa to tell her she needs to sleep in her room since she didn't. But she also can't lie to Zawa, because lying is bad.

"No," Eri says, even though she doesn't know what to call her sleeping troubles. She likes her bed, but she really doesn't right now. It used to be okay for her to sleep alone before Twenny got back, but now she kind of hates it again. And she really, really, really doesn't want to sleep alone tonight.

And maybe Zawa knows that, because he just makes a sleepy kind of hum and falls back on the bed with his arm out, and Eri curls up beside him so she's really warm and comfortable. It feels really easy to fall asleep now with Zawa being comfortable, even more comfortable than Twenny is now. "It's fine tonight, but it can't be a habit. Okay."

Zawa is really, really sleepy, because he kind of talks like Twenny does when he doesn't want to ask a question. But even though Eri kind of wants to pinch open his eyes, she doesn't want to enough to do it. She just nods, and thinks Zawa might forget he said that when he wakes up in the morning.

Twenny doesn't always snore a whole lot, but Zawa snores almost all the time, even if it's really quiet. And it's really easy to fall asleep with Zawa's snores.

And it's probably a good thing if Eri falls asleep before Yama gets back, because even if she likes cuddling with Yama, his snores aren't really quiet at all.

*

Yamada barely remembered to at least grab a wet rag before he went to Shinsou's room, the notification from the fever monitoring app luckily grabbing his attention before he closed his eyes for good. He'll definitely need to go back to wearing hearing aids while he sleeps for a few nights, knowing that Shouta wouldn't wake up from that little chime, even if he would for Eri having a screaming night terror.

Shinsou was still asleep, even if the pained grimace seemed to tell him he could still feel some of the effects of that sharp fever spike. Chiyo was right, it definitely wasn't normal to go from mild to hot in a few minutes, and it probably didn't feel too great either.

"Hey, listener, it's alright," Yamada says, unable to hear his own words without his hearing aids but he focuses on the way his mouth moves, tries to gauge how loud the volume is but that's a crapshoot at the best of times. Shinsou stirs but doesn't wake up, and Yamada drags his knuckles over the flushed kid's forehead, careful not to touch his hair. The cold compress still seems cold to him, but it might not be for Shinsou.

He starts pulling it off, but he doesn't know if he wants Shinsou to wake up to that. He's not even sure if he should pull off the cold compress if it's doing its job, but he can't just stand around without something to do with his hands.

Shinsou blinks to waking, eyes unfocused until they widen too much, and he jolts up to back up towards the wall before the fever catches up to him halfway, nearly making him drop back down. The poor kid is still breathing a little too fast when he slumps forward, making the sight all the more heart wrenching. Those nightmares probably hadn't gone away just yet, and from his own experiences, Yamada imagines that the fever and medicine to combat it might have made them worse.

He really wishes he took the time to put in his hearing aids, but luckily Shinsou doesn't need him to talk. 'It's me. It's okay. Nightmare?'

The wet rag slaps against his hand a few times while he signs, but he has no idea what that sounds like. He sees Shinsou's head knock back against the wall when he nods, but he has no idea how loud that was or if it was hard enough to hurt him because of that.

Shinsou's eyes look a little glassy when he looks up at him, from the fever or nightmare, he doesn't know, but he can tell in that frown that the kid is too miserable to hide that it's a lot to deal with right now.

Yamada just nods, just tries to triage the situation. He needs to bring down Shinsou's fever first, but he can't just leave it at that. 'Fever bad,' Yamada signs, and holds out the rag so that Shinsou could put it on his forehead, sure that the kid wouldn't want to be touched right now, but when he sees the teenager's hand rise just to drop, he folds a leg onto the bed to reach over and put it on for him.

Shinsou tilts his head towards the wall a bit more to keep the rag balanced, his eyes fluttering closed for a moment before he exhales. Yamada knows that's not enough to really do much, but the night medication is supposed to hold out for 8 hours and with what Shinsou's gone through already, he doesn't think his stomach can handle any double-dosing. Yamada finds his knuckles brushing the side of Shinsou's face before he remembers himself, checking his phone in hopes that the bright light will wake him up a bit only to find that hot number trailing back down to mild.

It's not normal, but that might not be a bad thing. Maybe Shinsou's quirk was flaring up and getting him a little too hot, but something cooled it down. Maybe-

Maybe Eri decided to try Shinsou's room before she tried theirs.

Yamada sees out of the corner of his eye that another coughing fit has Shinsou slumped over, and traces his hand over that shuddering back even if he knows it doesn't do much. Shinsou's quirk registration file is incomplete, and they haven't been able to reach out to the doctor that created it because even that much would be a risk for Shinsou's safety. One of the sections that are missing is an evaluation of how it really works, how much of Shinsou's quirk relies on speaking and asking a question, how much is controlled by his brain.

With Eri at least, he doesn't have to talk. His quirk might have tried to reach out to her, the same way Shinsou has done before, and strained itself that way to make his fever spike. And it might have cooled back down that fast because Yamada came in.

Shinsou's quirk doesn't seem to work on anyone who is fully deaf.

The flush is fading when Shinsou sits up, and he seems a little more put together, even if he's not all the way there. He can put the rag back on his head by himself, but that miserable little frown is still there when he looks at Yamada.

Yamada feels pretty awful when he finds it too easy to smile at that little frown. Even if Shinsou is pretty miserable right now, he's miserable enough to look to Yamada for some help with that. ' Tea? Talk? '

Shinsou nods his head sluggishly, and Yamada gets up to brew up something to soothe Shinsou's body and mind. But once he sets the kettle to boil, he nearly jumps out of his skin when he turns to find Shinsou standing behind him, Shouta's sleeping bag wrapped around his shoulders.

Shinsou winces at whatever sound came out of Yamada's mouth in that moment of panic, but with no infrastructure damage around, he knows he didn't slip too far. Shinsou still sways a bit before Yamada pulls out a chair, wavering whether he needs to get those hearing aids or make sure that Shinsou isn't left alone, if that nightmare unsettled him enough to follow him to the kitchen.

Yamada has to keep an eye on the kettle to watch for the steam rather than listen for the scream, but he tries to keep the other on Shinsou. He's not laid out on the kitchen counter again, but his head is propped up by an arm on it, and that little support beam probably won't last long with how bad this fever is draining on Shinsou.

He adds lemon and honey to the chamomile, even if it's not so soothing with that jolt of citrus, it's better for Shinsou's throat. And Shinsou seems to like the flavor, breathing in the steam from the mug as he holds it, as they both wait for it to steep enough. But Yamada doesn't want to wait too long with this niggling worry in the back of his mind. ' Want Sho Sleep? '

Shouta is a little better at handling nightmares, with Eri and with Shinsou. He's better at getting Shinsou to eat too, even if it came down to good old fashioned bribery. He's not sure if Shinsou is just warming up to Shouta that quickly, or if there really is something about Yamada that makes him the less fun one to his wards, but he's too relieved by that small shake of a head. ' Mom. But different. '

Yamada takes a sip, hoping this won't go over the same way it did last time. Shinsou came to him after repeated nightmares about his mother ‘rejecting’ him, but something that Yamada said must have peeved him off. Shinsou might have just opened up a bit too much and found himself regretting that, or maybe Yamada’s own anger became a little too apparent, and a little too offensive to Shinsou. The poor kid was talking about it being his fault his mother put him into the hands of Miasma, because of his quirk, and that was a little too familiar for Yamada to hear without seeing a bit of red.

‘ Mom. But. Trainer at M-I-A-S-M-A. Mixed. ’ Shinsou signs, hesitating quite a bit as though he’s having trouble finding the signs that he wants for the words he needs to say. ‘ Laughing at me. Weird. Scary. ’

Yamada nods, the fever could definitely make even a tame kind of bad dream seem like a horrible one. Especially when it was already pretty horrible to have a dream with two people mixing up and fusing. Especially for Shinsou, who experienced that in real life at the raid on the 8 Precepts, but hopefully couldn’t remember that.

‘ Supposed to change it, ’ Shinsou signs, his eyes falling a bit past half-closed as he stares at the tea, seeming a bit exhausted at the thought even if he seemed no less determined to do it. ‘ Maybe. Alone. Mom and trainer not there. ’

Yamada catches himself humming by the feeling of it in his throat, cutting it off as soon as he notices. He runs a hand through his hair, not sure if he should weigh in on it if Shinsou has it pretty much figured out for himself. If he really doesn’t need Yamada to handle it. ‘ Maybe dream something happy? ’

Yamada has never really had a problem with nightmares like his wards or his husband, but when he was still being fostered and not yet adopted by his mom and mother, he had a few bad bouts with them.

His mom told him it’s always a rough transition, there are always little bumps along the way, and his wasn’t that bad with just a few nightmares and moments of panic when he was worried he’d really messed things up. It was just enough of a habit for his mother to come up with a dream for him when she’d tuck him in for the night. How about you dream about flying an airplane made of cotton candy? Or we go ice skating with some penguins in Antarctica, then warm up in an onsen full of hot chocolate?

He didn’t have those dreams, even when he tried his hardest to. Even when he was convinced that he really had to so that he wouldn’t be sent to a bad house in the shuffle that never came. He doesn’t know what kind of dream would be a happy one for Shinsou to have, but he hopes it isn’t one where he’s just alone.

But judging by that unsure frown, pulling down on one corner like he can’t figure out any other options, it might be. Shinsou might be happier when he’s alone. ‘ I don’t know. ’ He can see the exact moment when Shinsou does know something, when he glances at Yamada before he ducks his head to run a hand through his hair. ‘ Cook. ’

Yamada couldn’t help but grin at that, warmth filling his chest and nearly threatening to spill over. It feels a little selfish, and he knows it probably is. He doesn’t want Shinsou to be anything close to being alone, and he does want Shinsou to feel more comfortable with Shouta. But he has to admit that he was feeling a little left out too.

But even if Yamada wasn’t an expert on nightmares, even if he had so many plans to get Shinsou to eat that failed, and even if Shinsou still didn’t feel like asking for help from him when he knew he was sick, he knew one thing. Shinsou definitely wasn’t going to find any happiness from cooking with Shouta.

‘ Cook best food. Your favorite food. We’ll cook together. Have fun, ’ Yamada signs, and even if he’s talking about a dream, he’s hoping it might become real. He’s also hoping that Shinsou might finally tell him what he likes eating, knowing that if bribery had to come into play, the soup definitely wasn’t Shinsou’s ‘finger sandwiches.’

But instead, he sees a shrug. ‘ I don’t know. Like food here. ’ He gets another pause when Shinsou takes a drink of the tea, when he seems to want to look anywhere but at Yamada afterwards until he ducks his head a bit. ‘ Your food. My favorite. ’

Yamada has to cup a hand over his mouth to remind himself to be quiet, because he knows any squeal or peep that would come out would be deafening. Shinsou likes his food. It’s his favorite.

No matter how much his jobs demand from him, Yamada is never going to order take-out again.

Rat Dad

Chapter Summary

27 is sick and can't go to school, but Yamada fumbled and didn't make sure someone would take care of him while he stayed home. Fortunately, there's a friendly neighborhood animal principal at the ready.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: None!

Posted in honor of Wards reaching 20k hits! The weekend update is still on, too!

Previously on Wards of UA: Shinsou was discovered to be sick yesterday, and while Yamada mentioned that he would need to take time off while he was still under the impression that Shinsou was possibly depressed, he did not plan that out with Principal Nezu. Aizawa is uncomfortably unnerved by Principal Nezu. Shinsou learned to read by reading 10's Thesaurus and medical textbooks while he was at The Miasma. Ectoplasm previously mentioned that he doesn't agree with Mirio skipping classes to take care of Shinsou and Eri, and feels it is a show of irresponsibility for Aizawa and Yamada. Shinsou was under the impression that he was quirkless because Monoma couldn't 'feel' his quirk, but Yamada now believes that Shinsou's quirk is simply unstable after Eri Rewinded him at the end of the raid on the 8 Precepts. Shinsou internally refers to Principal Nezu as 'Rat Boss' after watching the UA staff have a sake toast before Midterms week, which was reminiscent to him of the right of Sakazuki. Shinsou has been avoiding using his phone or the chats for a week. Hagakure broke into Aizawa and Yamada's dorm to see if Shinsou was a murderer. When Shinsou asked Midoriya how he could transfer to the 1-A dorms, Midoriya told him that he would probably have to talk to Principal Nezu, and that the entrance exam was hard. 1-A still hasn't seen the pictures from Eri's first Shichi-Go-San. Shinsou received a book about meditation from the pile of Midterm offerings that both wards received. Shinsou wore purple cat ears and make-up as a disguise when he attended Shichi-Go-San, and still looked that way when Eri's family portrait was taken. Some of Class 1-A doesn't know that Aizawa and Yamada are married, but Shinsou confirmed it for Ashido accidentally. Shinsou's sign name for Yamada is 'Sunshine da' and Yamada's sign name for Shinsou is 'Shin Amaze.' Shinsou won the rights to Aizawa's sleeping bag for the week by eating 5 bites of soup in the previous chapter. In the previous chapter, Yamada began to suspect that Shinsou's fever was spiking when he was close to Eri because his illness could be due to his quirk trying to stabilize itself, and would get worse when his quirk tried to reach for Eri, since Shinsou is able to use his quirk on Eri without a verbal response. When Shinsou's fever made him delirious in Recovery Girl's office, Shinsou was begging 10 to say that he was well enough to work, under the impression that he was still at The Miasma and Aizawa was a Number that was going to kill him, since he didn't have the mask on his face.

Yamada liked to think he was pretty put-together as a fully functioning adult. Despite having three jobs, he seemed to fare a little better than Shouta did at remembering appointments and dates, when to pay bills or to eat at least once every day. But Yamada was also born as blonde as he was loud, and he did have a few slips now and then.

And it wasn't until he was halfway dressed that he remembered that he slipped up pretty bad this time. He hasn't asked Principal Nezu for the day off to stay home with Shinsou.

Even though Shouta has an ungodly amount of time off built up, it's like pulling teeth to get him to take advantage of it, even on behalf of their wards. Honestly, Shouta might fare better having his teeth pulled instead, and given how Shouta tended to forget to eat and thus forget to feed any charges in his care, Yamada had another reason not to go through any teeth pulling today.

He knows that Principal Nezu will like this early morning call about as much as he'll appreciate the incredibly late notice, but Shinsou is sick and he needs to be taken care of. He's sure that Principal Nezu can understand that, and even if he won't be too happy about it, it should be easy enough to get his classes sorted out.

He might have to pay for this. He might have to suffer horribly because of this blonde moment. But Shinsou needs him, and that's enough for him to eventually work up the nerve to press the call button and pretend that this is a reasonable request.

“ Present Mic, ” Principal Nezu says over the phone, and it's even harder to tell whether he's displeased than when they're talking in person. “ I understand the circumstances, but I'm afraid you're unaware of my own. Toshinori seems to have come down with a cold, and Ectoplasm has instituted a ban on his cloning quirk for the next two weeks. That seems to leave us at a bit of a loss. ”

Yamada winces, because he knows that he's probably a big influence on that ban. He knows he hasn't been putting his all into any of his jobs, it's hard to do it when Shinsou needs a lot right now and it's hard to convince himself that any of his other obligations are even important to him in the face of that. He doesn't want to do it, but he might need to pull out the big guns. “Then I'm resigning. Today.”

There's a long pause that makes him regret every single syllable of that. He knows it's awful, he's never quit a job with less than 3 months notice and he doesn't want to quit teaching at UA. Even if some of his classes drive him a little nuts sometimes, he loves it and knows he'll never find another job that's as fulfilling or willing to work with the demands of his hero work, but he needs to be there for Shinsou. “ Hm. I'd rather not allow that. Perhaps instead of such drastic measures, we move forward in a different way. If Shinsou simply requires someone to supervise him, then I can watch over him today. ”

Yamada found it a bit hard to reply to that, the Voice Hero himself at a loss for words, because he simply couldn't fathom how bad it could turn out.

He's not as scared of Principal Nezu as Shouta is, but he has a healthy fear and slight appreciation for what his boss can do. Principal Nezu can be terrifying when he wants to be, and while he mostly keeps his sadistic side to the students, there have been incidents. Yamada knows full well that he might be victim to one of them in the coming weeks thanks to his little declaration of resignation.

Putting a sadistic and terrifyingly intelligent being like Principal Nezu in charge of a vulnerable and incredibly traumatized teenager was an absolute recipe for disaster, in the absolute worst way. “You know, maybe I’m just overreacting! Shinsou might just perk up if I pump enough coffee into him, maybe we could just have him hang out in the staff room and get everyone to spend their free periods-”

“ Present Mic, it’s really no trouble. While I do prefer working in my office, I have a very well-designed animatronic just for these kind of occasions, and to be honest, ” Principal Nezu says, and Yamada’s mind catches on wondering what the animatronic looks like and if he’s been fooled by it before, almost ignoring the rest of what Principal Nezu says. “ I would like to meet with Shinsou myself. This young man is becoming quite an important fixture for the hero course, much like Eri. And I can’t help but be inspired to do what I can to help him, even in this small way. ”

There is one thing about Principal Nezu that makes him more and less terrifying - he never lies. He might have methodically triggered every phobia and fear of every teacher over the course of the first two months, and Yamada will never forgive him for testing both insects and spiders on him to see if there’s a difference - there’s not. But Principal Nezu never lies, and that’s how Yamada knows that he’s not starting now.

Principal Nezu wants to help Shinsou.

“If it’s no trouble,” Yamada answers weakly, still both unsure and horrified how this could go. “I can come back on my lunch and free period, and if I can wrap up 1-C’s lesson plans quicker I can come back before the end of the day-”

“ It’s no trouble, and I’m looking forward to it, ” Principal Nezu says, and hangs up before Yamada can try to work out the details, to pretend that he’s a little more comfortable with this situation than he really is.

And he knows that Principal Nezu probably did that just to make sure he was a little more off kilter, and ill-prepared for whatever vengeance was coming for him.

*

He can’t believe Hizashi has done this.

Aizawa tries to focus on his students, tries to become aware of any plans to drop by the dorm to see Shinsou before they come to fruition, but his mind keeps circling back to a fear that makes him go numb. Shinsou. And Principal Nezu.

He doesn’t know what Principal Nezu intends to do, or what he’s doing to Shinsou right now, but he knows it’s not good. Torture doesn’t always look like what Shinsou is used to, and he probably won’t be able to defend himself from any of it. He can only hope that Principal Nezu isn’t inspired by Shinsou’s defenselessness, that he doesn’t run through any of his usual schemes. Testing phobias, weaknesses, personality tics - Principal Nezu has one of the most terrifying tics of all, and that’s his hobby of condensing every single student and member of staff into a file that he keeps in his office.

Aizawa has seen it. He’s only read two pages of his own before he had to stop reading it, too unsettled to go on. Principal Nezu knows things about him that no one should, that he specifically shouldn’t, and given how many files there are in those cabinets, he doesn’t think it’s a habit born out of any specific intention. Principal Nezu just does that for whatever reason, and he doesn’t want him to do it to Shinsou.

Principal Nezu did create those exams to test where Shinsou is in terms of his education level, but Aizawa doesn't doubt for a second that he's going to do more with the opportunity given to him. It might be benign, like an IQ test, or it might be somewhat helpful like a psychological evaluation to properly diagnose Shinsou with PTSD.

It might be the phobia tests. Or worse, Principal Nezu might find himself intrigued by Shinsou's mental state, by the history that shaped him. He might be interested in learning how Shinsou ticked by taking him apart in piecemeal, peeling back scars to reveal wounds. He's not entirely convinced that Principal Nezu would know when to stop.

Aizawa sees Eri making another student-hop, walking away from the tic-tac-toe game she had been playing with Ojiro to wander over to Ashido, who beams at the distraction from her studying. Eri has always been allowed to mingle with the students during these free periods, and she seemed to know the proper time to do so without much explanation. She's never taken advantage of it to this degree, but it doesn't surprise Aizawa that she does.

There's an odd bit of frigidity between the two wards right now. Eri seemed to be holding a grudge about the 'logical ruse' where the two wards pretended that Shinsou had lost his ability to speak to her, coloring her every interaction with him. She seemed to be irritated at him even at breakfast, asking him repeatedly if he was going to eat even when he was eating, as though she were trying to shame him for having difficulty doing so yesterday. Hizashi had to step in, pretending to be baffled when he explained that Shinsou was eating right in front of her. Even her goodbye to Shinsou seemed to be a bit too terse.

Eri didn't seem to be lashing out in fear because Shinsou was sick, and it seemed that her insistence to keep him from getting sick beforehand was for his own benefit. Because Shinsou was 'sad and scared' when he became sick at the 8 Precepts.

Something about Shinsou and Eri's relationship had changed in a way that unsettled Eri enough to be angry with him, and pull away and into her other connections because of that. It was difficult to tell if Shinsou noticed that, or was affected by it as well with how exhausted and ill he was, but Aizawa was concerned about the fall out from that. Even though Shinsou was far older than Eri, he seemed to need her for reassurance more than she did him. Though that may be changing, given how Shinsou seemed to be opening up a bit more.

If Eri and Shinsou's relationship was changing, it was going to be a difficult task to keep them from suffering too much from the transition. Aizawa was at least somewhat hopeful that Shinsou might have the tentative connections with others to reach out to someone if it were too much, to find that he wasn't alone at UA even if Eri wasn't by his side. And Eri, of course, couldn't be lonely with all the heroes at her disposal.

But if there was one benefit from this sudden strain between Shinsou and Eri, it was that Eri was perfectly fine going to school while Shinsou stayed home, keeping her far away from whatever Principal Nezu had planned for the day.

Especially if the urge to hug Principal Nezu fell over her again.

*

Nezu may not have been given the opportunity to supervise any species' young like this, but he's confident that he's up to the task. It seems simple enough at the start, as Shinsou fell asleep shortly after he arrived and has continued on in that state for quite a while.

Long enough for Nezu to become, quite infuriatingly, bored.

He wouldn't call it 'snooping' as much as it is 'inspecting the living conditions that he has so thoughtfully provided his employees,' and since he regretfully left his mech suit in his office, there's little he can snoop through. The disadvantage of his small stature is not a new struggle, and without a helpful shoulder to perch on nor a robotic enhancement to elevate him, he grows bored again quite quickly.

Fortunately, he finds a boon in Shinsou's desk drawers - the teenager's placement exams. It's hard to say whether they're fully finished or in progress, but he takes a look anyway.

His understanding of math seems to be quite underdeveloped, and Nezu knows that he won't find much help between Aizawa and Yamada. History seems spotty as well, almost absurdly so. Quite educated on some concepts, and then some basic knowledge seems to be lacking, as though he's primarily educated by non-historical literature. Literature is astoundingly average, given his circumstances and lack of a structured education. English seems to place him among the second-years at UA, but Science holds a true conundrum.

Several basic concepts such as geology and biology are lacking, but his anatomical knowledge is highly advanced. It's as though Shinsou was being raised to be a serial killer.

It's interesting.

Nezu begins drafting an education plan to bring Shinsou to meet the demands of his current age, but can only do so much on his phone. He opens an online shopping app and selects textbooks, video lectures, audiobooks, and certain lesson packages that stimulate kinesthetic learning, but he would rather determine which educational methodology best suits Shinsou before checking out.

There are several things that he needs to test once Shinsou gives him the opportunity, and thankfully he doesn't have to wait long. Before Nezu refreshes his email again, almost wanting to find an urgent message to require his attention, he sees the teenager begin to stir, rising to look around with bleary eyes. It takes 1.06 seconds for him to find that Nezu is in the room, perhaps indicating some hyperarousal even when waking from a dead sleep. "Good morning!"

Shinsou nods, expression betraying nothing but exhaustion, and signs 'Good morning' in response. The stare holds for 5.55 seconds before Shinsou looks away to sit up, but offers nothing further in communication.

Shinsou should be a bit unsettled to be placed in the care of a complete stranger. He should be communicating that discomfort in some way, or at least attempting to remedy it by questioning Nezu's intentions or aims here. But he's not, and that's rather worrying. "Don't mind me, I'm merely here to supervise your day of rest and recovery."

Shinsou nods, indicating understanding and agreement with that statement, but makes no attempt at either of those things. His eyes are becoming slightly clearer, more focused as the haze of sleep begins to fade, but despite the abundance of things he could be doing, things that could allow Nezu to know more about him through observation, he's not doing anything.

'Evidence of severe under stimulation as a child,' part of Nezu's mind supplies. 'Irritatingly boring' says another.

It's far more satisfying when he doesn't need to push, but he knows that Shinsou will make it worth his while.

"Would you like some tea? I was beginning to fancy a cup myself," Nezu offers, knowing full well that he wouldn't be able to make it without a climbable structure or human present. And though thin, Shinsou does appear to be quite scalable.

Shinsou's eyes widen to a noticeable degree, the nod that answers him shakily done. Clear interest, yet there seems to be something to hide, some amount of guilt, perhaps. Certainly indicative of some self-worth issues or perhaps discomfort accepting small and necessary tokens like food or drink. Perhaps some fear from taking those things from a stranger.

Nezu allows himself to gently fall from the computer chair that he had difficulty getting on top of, and smiles pleasantly to invite Shinsou to rise and follow. Shinsou does follow, despite slowing to a glacial pace to match Nezu's short strides. Following, indicating further discomfort despite the fact that he is in familiar territory and has quite a physical advantage over Nezu.

He's not naive enough to believe it's being polite, though he has observed that Shinsou might be a polite young man. But learned subservience can also be disguised as manners, and Nezu is no stranger to those more palatable flavors of fear.

Once entering the kitchen, he sees another opportunity for a test. Shinsou stops and seems to realize that the stove, kettle, and absolutely every instrument necessary for making tea is inaccessible to Nezu due to his height. Nezu says nothing, observing a rising flush on the teenager's face that seems ill-suited to the situation, before he carefully steps around Nezu to begin preparing the tea.

He was able to piece out that the clearest solution to the problem was for him to make the tea himself, and didn't offer a single sign of displeasure with that, even if it were possible that Nezu may have manipulated him into it rather than asking directly. Another point towards submissiveness, though Nezu is still stumped over the cause of that odd flush still lingering.

A filled kettle is set to boil, and Shinsou begins pulling cannisters of tea onto the counter from the cabinet. There's a worrying trembling in his hands while he does this, more apparent when he holds up two cannisters for Nezu to pick from.

No further attempts at sign language, perhaps indicating that Shinsou believes that Nezu knows very little of the language. Perhaps it's an assumption made after this situation of mismatched language skills became common to Shinsou. The shaking in his hands seems a bit too violent for nerves, and Nezu notices a bit of sweat on the teenager's hairline and how his eyes are becoming a bit glassy.

It's incredibly concerning. "Chamomile is fine."

Lethargy, sweating, trembling, and rosy discoloration on the face. The last three have set in startlingly quickly, but Nezu is beginning to believe that any tests that he wanted to conduct will be compromised in the face of his suspicion. Fortunately, he is still in a position to carry out his task, perhaps with better results than Yamada and Aizawa's attempts at it. With his small stature and disarmingly adorable appearance, Shinsou may be a bit more at ease with the vulnerability that violent illness brings.

But that small stature brings about some difficulty in certain aspects of care, which is why he's watching Shinsou prepare the tea in hopes that he can finish that task. Tea, perhaps some medication if it's available and accessible to his charge, then a perhaps a return to bedrest may prevent vomiting. If necessary, Nezu might be able to climb onto the sink in the bathroom if he stands on the toilet to fetch a wet towel. It's certainly not the most pleasant course of action, but he'd hate to worry Chiyo with this.

He's relieved that Shinsou seems to know his own treatment routine. After pressing the back of his hand to his face, he picks up a package of fever reducers and a bottle of cough syrup, taking the pill with the syrup in an act of efficiency that would probably make Aizawa proud. Changing his cold compress comes next, and Principal Nezu checks his phone after gauging how much the official Present Mic ringtone startled Shinsou.

WAIS-7 163, Type B: Shinsou's fever just spiked, just letting you know because I didn't hook his bracelet up to your phone, I should do that. Is he ok???

Me: I am aware.

Nezu allowed himself a terse grin when he placed his phone back into place. Resignation, as though that were something that Yamada could decide to do. Nezu has made himself more than accommodating for the transitional period that two new children had brought upon his employees, but there had to be a limit. UA's leave policy was generous for a reason, and though family leave was used far less than injury leave, such drastic measures were uncalled for.

Plenty of UA's faculty were more than willing to help with the two wards, and the trust-building and 'nesting' period should be well and over with. It was time for the new parents to turn their young over for examination and coddling from the members of the extended family, and high past the time for Principal Nezu to do some examination of his own.

For starters, the tea was brewed quite well. Not perfectly, though Nezu prefers English blends far more than weak herbal ones and may be biased as a result, but Shinsou made an assumption that served him well to not use any additives such as sugar or milk. He sees a bit of lemon juice go into Shinsou's mug, no sugar to balance it out, and no reflection of what must be a bit of a sour flavor.

Shinsou is so very guarded, and that only makes him more interesting.

"I'm not sure if you're aware, but I am fluent in Japanese Sign Language," Nezu offers, as 68% of his plans require more open communication. This revelation seems to be news to Shinsou, though Yamada or Aizawa should have revealed that before leaving the ward to his supervision. "I simply can't sign as much as I understand."

When he holds up his cute paw with an adorable tilt of his head, he notices that Shinsou's eyes dilate in a way that seems a bit unnatural to an assumed-pure homo sapien. His eyes focus and widen in a way that Nezu has seen often enough before to send a bit of dread down his spine to the end of his tail, but the way that Shinsou seems to lean back in his chair seems to promise restraint.

Restraint is a hard thing to win from a human, but Nezu appreciates it, especially in this regard. "I'm curious as to what you like to do during periods of leisure, Shinsou. I myself don't have much to offer from my own preferences, as consulting for hero agencies and running the most prestigious hero training academy in Japan leaves me little time for leisure."

Nezu won't give any indication of it, but he does know a few things that Shinsou does as provided by the surveillance system on campus. It doesn't seem quite as prying after asking the Support Department's Lead Programmer to add Shinsou to a profile where video feed of him is catalogued and sorted with a weekly report as to his activities. A worrying 17% is spent sleeping, 12% using a personal electronic device such as his laptop or phone prior to last week's anomaly of 0%. It seems like there's little that Shinsou likes to do for recreation without the presence of others, often doing things that the other enjoys in the first place.

There are many things that Nezu would like to do with Shinsou, and several things that he is determined to do. But he knows well enough that it can be difficult to discover leisurely activities after spending one's life in a cage. And he wants better for Shinsou.

‘ I don’t know, ’ Shinsou signs, glancing at Nezu as though to test whether he was understood. He’s understood more than he knows, more than Nezu will indicate with his answering nod.

“I suppose it can be difficult to choose something self-serving. I believe we might be alike in that we prefer to be productive,” Nezu says, knowing that he’s nudging quite a bit, but he wants to make sure this is not subservience and a genuine lack of experience instead, proven right by widened eyes and a stilted nod, expression open in surprise at the connection. The revelation, or acceptance, Nezu isn’t sure, and both may serve him well. “I suppose we may be more comfortable with a mixture of the two, productivity and leisure. You may be aware that the students of UA have periodic examinations, but the truth of the matter is that nearly everyone on campus is evaluated in some way. As long as you’re amenable to it, I propose that we work on some exams that I’ve prepared for you, with one hour of dedicated productivity and 15 minutes of leisure to start with, increasing the leisure time as we progress further in the day.”

It should be discomfoting to see an ill-teenager’s eyes brighten at the prospect of exams, but Nezu knows very well that Shinsou isn’t a typical teenager. There are things that Nezu knows, and things he suspects, but his assumptions about the ward haven’t been proven wrong thus far.

There’s only one assumption that Nezu made before coming here, that he has found to be faulty. He doesn’t feel that he can offer his guidance without feeling the memories that gave him that expertise and connection in the first place like a shadow behind his back.

Like the shadows that fell over the cage, the snap of clipboards and clicks of pens, white white white rooms and a hundred needle sticks, bored voices, Today, we’ll be evaluating the subject’s anomaly in-

“The first test is one that I believe might be the most useful to us,” Nezu says, pulling out his phone to ignore how his cute little paws feel as numb as his face. “I’m pleased to hear you have an interest in education, and at UA, you’ll certainly receive all the resources you need towards that goal. But it would be beneficial to know how those resources could be most effective for you.”

He slides the phone to Shinsou with the testing app already pulled up, and without the phone, finds himself close to bored again. But it’s worth it.

There are things he knows about Shinsou, and things he thinks he knows. And the discovery process makes it all the more interesting.

*

Mirio finds himself smiling at every mirror he passes and every window that has a reflection, almost like he has to check to make sure he’s still smiling. And he kind of feels like he has to.

It’s a bad day.

He doesn’t have a lot of bad days, but it seems like the more time passes after the raid, the bad days feel worse instead of better. He could brush it off a little easier in the beginning, but some of those little things just stick on his bad days.

Like getting permission to skip class as soon as he asks for it.

At first, that kind of helped. He could convince himself that it was a sign he was still a member of the Big Three. If his teachers weren’t worried about him missing class, that meant he was still a top hero student, it meant that they trusted he could make up for lost time just like they trusted he could when Sir Nighteye needed his help.

It's not often, but on his bad days, it doesn't make him feel like a member of the Big Three. It doesn't make him feel like a hero at all. It just sounds like, 'Well, there's not really a point even if you were in class. You don't have your quirk or anything. You should probably stop relying on Principal Nezu to keep you in the Hero Course and just head over to General Studies.'

He's asked permission from most of his teachers, and Ecto-sensei said he would sign off as long as everyone else is on board. He really doesn't think Aizawa will tell him no, but if he does, he has plenty of good reasons why he should say yes.

Shinsou kind of seems to trust Mirio a lot, even if he doesn't know why. It's not like he did anything to help him during the raid. It's not like he really stopped Chisaki. He ran around the complex after abandoning his team, he stalled for just a few minutes. He probably just made a mess of things and no one wants to tell him about it, no one wants to say that if he didn't run off, he wouldn't have been fighting alone. He could have made sure Aizawa was there to cancel Chisaki's quirk, Red Riot could have stopped that bullet, Sir Nighteye might not have-

Mirio checks his smile again before he opens the staff room door, but he feels like he actually means it when he sees Eri. "Mirio! I missed you!"

"Eri!" Mirio says, dropping to his knees for a hug. He missed her, he missed her a lot and he doesn't know if he can stand going much longer without asking why Aizawa doesn't need him to watch her while he goes out on patrol. It's a little awful, and it's plenty selfish, but the bad day just kind of melts when he feels her arms around his neck squeezing so tight, sees her bouncing on her feet in her excitement to see him.

"Mirio, please come over and hang out with me! I really missed you and I want to hang out with you and-and Twenny is really dumb and you're not!" Eri says, the bouncing becoming a stomp that only confuses him.

"That's... a little mean to say, Eri," Mirio says, still baffled that some kind of tiff could make Eri act this way. Maybe she didn't know what Shinsou was dealing with, even if Mirio didn't know it too well himself. He doesn't know why Shinsou said he was quirkless, but he knows pretty well what that feels like to think that. Maybe a little too much, when he sees Eri get a little guilty sulk on her face. "Did you and Shinsou have a fight?"

That guilt just twists a little more when Eri twists to flare her skirt a bit. "No... He's just... He did something dumb, Mirio, and I really don't like it!"

Aizawa sighs when he walks over, putting a hand on Eri's head, and Mirio doesn't miss how eager Eri is to cling onto his leg after that. She's really upset, and seems way too upset to really explain what's upsetting her. "Shinsou and Eri pretended that Shinsou couldn't talk to her anymore, to hide that Shinsou was sick. It was Shinsou's idea."

Mirio can't really work a smile on his face after hearing that. Shinsou was sick, he was hiding things, something made him think he was quirkless, Eri was mad at him. Shinsou sounded pretty miserable on that chat message, as short as it was, but Mirio had no idea how bad it could be. "Well, I guess I kind of had the right idea pop into my head today!"

He can kind of get that smile back if he forces it, while he stands up and pulls the permission slip out of his pocket. He kind of figured that Shinsou didn't like going to school too much, and that maybe he could use a longer break as long as Mirio was there to watch him. He just didn't really look too good in class yesterday, but being sick at school was probably a good reason to look like that.

“Shinsou messaged me and, you know, I know you guys probably have it covered,” Mirio says, finding it a little harder to say it than he thought it would be. “But he told me that he was quirkless. I don’t really know what’s going on with that, but...you know. I’m kind of the guy to talk to about that!”

It’s a bad day, it’s a really bad day if he can’t even say it like he wanted to. He just wanted to laugh it off, make sure that Aizawa wasn’t going to read too much into it, but he knows he messed up because he’s actually made Aizawa look worried.

Mirio’s not really worried, he’s fine. He knows he can get his quirk back, and it really doesn’t bother him most days. Just the bad ones. Just the ones when it’s too hard to smile.

“Togata,” Aizawa says, and even Eri looks up at him with a sad little frown. “I didn’t know that he did that. It...might be temporary, related to his illness. If that changes your plan-”

“Nope!” Mirio says, crossing his arms and working up a smile that he half-believes. He feels stupidly relieved to hear that, even if he shouldn’t be. Even if he doesn’t really know, he’s just happy that Shinsou has a better chance than he does. “I’m here to help out! Since pretty much everyone else is okay with me taking a few days off, I can watch over Shinsou and help nurse him back to health! Nurse Lemillion to the rescue!”

It’s a little hard to say that name on his bad days, but he almost doesn’t wince when he says it this time. He’s helping, and that’s close enough to being a hero for him. It helps, Yamada says that whatever helps, helps, as long as it helps, and this helps.

And Aizawa must know that, because he takes the permission slip out of his hands pretty quick and signs off on it, leaving the ‘Days Allowed’ blank.

“My lesson plans are in my office, and I can leave them open to the relevant sections starting tomorrow. If any of your teachers have any issues, you can refer them to me, and I don’t mind if you want to start today,” Aizawa says, and Mirio might have missed it before, but he definitely sounds a little worried about something. If Mirio didn’t know any better, he’d think that Ms. Joke was hiding out somewhere on campus, making him just as uncharacteristically on-edge as he was during that training camp from his first year. “I can forge Ectoplasm’s signature.”

Mirio isn’t sure what to say to that, a little shocked that Aizawa actually offered to do it. “It’s fine, Ecto-sensei said as long as you were okay with it, he’s okay with it.”

“And I didn’t think you’d be okay with it,” Ecto-sensei says before he sighs, stepping in through the staff room door. Mirio has learned to tell that the slightly-slower way he moves means that it isn’t really Ecto-sensei, it’s one of his clones, but he’s not sure why he would go through the trouble to be here. “Eraserhead, we’ve already talked about this. My students didn’t enroll in UA to be your babysitters at the cost of their studies.”

Mirio would be lying if he said he didn’t know Ecto-sensei wasn’t happy about it, but he did agree to sign off on the absences if everyone else did. It’s not like Mirio has much to gain from watching everyone else quirk train, or fill out applications for hero agencies.

“Since Present Mic is also at school, I gather that you already have someone watching over Shinsou, making this completely pointless,” Ecto-sensei says, narrowing his eyes at Aizawa. “But you, a teacher at UA, are completely willing to dismiss a student from their studies. Why?”

Aizawa doesn’t so much as flinch when Ecto-sensei drops to that warning kind of tone. Mirio has never seen two teachers battle it out, even if he’s theorized a lot of fake tournaments to guess who would end up on top in a UA Battle Royale. He's always kind of rooted for Aizawa, erasing everyone else's quirks to win as long as Principal Nezu or Powerloader don't get to bring in their mech suits. But he doesn't really want to see a showdown between Ecto-sensei and Aizawa right now. "Principal Nezu is watching Shinsou today."

Something about the way Aizawa says that, and the way that Ecto-sensei steps back a bit, tells Mirio that he probably should have been betting that Principal Nezu wins the Battle Royale. "I...saw him in his office this morning--"

"He has a robot for that," Aizawa says, and that same kind of worried tone takes over, making Mirio think that Principal Nezu might be similar to Ms. Joke when he's not doing Principal-things. When he's doing things that make Aizawa sound that worried. "As much as I... appreciate his time and effort, I think it would be best if Principal Nezu returned to his duties tomorrow. Or sooner."

Ecto-sensei scoffs, raising his hand out to dismiss that. "Eraserhead, I'm sure it's fine. Principal Nezu wouldn't have agreed to it if he didn't have the time. And I'm sure it's... fine."

Mirio is starting to feel like he needs to check on Shinsou as soon as he can, whether Ecto-sensei signs that permission slip or not. Principal Nezu was plenty scary during his first year Spring Midterm exam, and Mirio will never forget the smell of diesel or that maniacal laugh that nearly made him drop his quirk while halfway inside a wall.

But he didn't think even his teachers were scared of Principal Nezu.

Aizawa's hand shakes when he pulls out his phone, his usual deadpan way of talking just a bit too dry when he talks. "Shinsou's most effective learning methodologies are: Verbal, Visual, Kinesthetic, and Reading. His IQ is 134 on the WAIS-7 scale. Observations regarding his blood type pathology--"

"How long has Principal Nezu had with--" Ecto-sensei starts, but Aizawa cuts him off.

"Three hours," Aizawa says, and that seems to mean something more to his teachers, but that worried tone is enough for Mirio.

"Ecto-sensei, I know it's starting to look like a bad habit--," Mirio starts, trying to convince his teacher that he's going to make it up, he knows how to cover up his absences and even if he didn't, he doesn't think he can focus in class right now, but Ecto-sensei stops him.

"No, you're right, you know your own limits and there's never been a problem before," Ecto-sensei says, "You can be excused tomorrow, but I can't excuse you from homeroom today. There's a guest who's quite insistent that she see you. Bubble Girl."

Mirio stopped trying to fake a smile after that. Just when he thought this bad day couldn't get any worse.

*

27 has 30 minutes of 'leisure,' and no idea what to do with it.

The Rat Boss was hard to figure out, much like whether he was a rat or a bear. He had a different way of hiding his emotions and tells, a near-permanent smile instead of Aizawa's permanent frown. He had tests, but they were tests that 27 didn't hate too much, for the most part. Maybe the lack of expectation was starting to unsettle him, but having a task in front of him made him feel better, made it easier to ignore the aches and coughs hardly dulled by the medicine.

He's already cheating by doing what The Rat Boss is doing - staring at the phone. But he plans to cheat a little more when he pulls up LNE and opens the group chat with Class 1-A.

He wants to get answers even quicker when he sees that they're still talking about him, even when he's not at school.

Will Die in 6 Days for Uttering the Forbidden Name: If P. Nezu attacks, do zig-zags! He's like a crocodile, he won't catch u!

Everything Floats Down Here: Fun things to do can u send the shichigosan pics???????

Froptimus Prime: Ocha needs this Shinsou. Please.

Will Die in 6 Days for Uttering the Forbidden Name: doit doit doit doooooo iiiittttt

Wed Wiot :3 : BE A BROOOO SHINBROOOOOO

RIP Shinsou, You Were Never Here Anyway: I know what leisure means, give me examples.

Dark Thots: Reading is considered to be the epitome of leisurely activities, but given your state of poor health, perhaps too taxing.

Will Die in 6 Days for Uttering the Forbidden Name: @Todoroki I can't find the Meme Manifesto and Shinbro needs it??? Pls send kthnx

Pinkie Pie: MOVIES and spa days and painting ur nails and SELF CARE BIOTCHHHHH

Flex These Arms Tape: I'm gonna loan you my weeb library, don't tell anyone what you see and don't judge me, k?

I'm Ji-Ji Now, Forever TT_TT: I like meditating during my free time. I think Iida bought a book about that for you?

RIP Shinsou, You Were Never Here Anyway: Tap to download

RIP Shinsou, You Were Never Here Anyway: Don't say anything about the ears, it was a disguise.

Everything Floats Down Here: hOMMGYY dfjaknfa ekdjriea

Froptimus Prime: Ocha is ascending as we speak

Wed Wiot: AAAHHHHHHHHHHH SO CUUUUUUTE!!!!

Dark Thots: I feel healed and full of life just looking at this.

Pinkie Pie: LOOK! AT! THAT! AND! TELL! ME! THEY'RE! NOT! MARRIED!!!!

I'm a Motherfuckin Scarboy: @Ashido They're not. Also, #cute.

Kwing Expwosion Murwder :3 : KAMINARI IF YOU FUCKING DO IT I'M GOING TO LITERALLY KILL YOU

Flex These Arms Tape: oh man oh god oh man who put Kaminari on that furry trip again this is so BAD

Will Die in 6 Days for Uttering the Forbidden Name: :3

Put Your Hands Down: WHERE THE FUCK IS HE?!?!?!

Silent but Deadly: Oh god no.

Will Die in 6 Days for Uttering the Forbidden Name changed RIP Shinsou, You Were Never Here

Anyway's username to Nyansou

Kwing Expwosion Murwder :3 : I FUCKING WARNED YOU.

Banished to Sensei's Shadow Realm: kaminari he's not kidding SOMEONE GET AN ADULT

Nyansou: Weak, but fine.

Will Die in 6 Days for Uttering the Forbidden Name: See? It's fi eakr reajk/rae ikl//////////

Nyansou: ?

A Cop: Shinsou, it might be best if you remain unaware of what just happened. I...would like to be unaware of it also.

Flex These Arms Tape: Delete everything, hit the gym, call a lawyer. We saw nothing.

Pinkie Pie: My new name is Bernadine Bonobos, and I'm going to live a new life in Greece as a divorcee with a dark past.

Sprakan Ze Deutch: oh mon dieu c'est beaucoup de sang

27 saw a new message from Yamada pop up among the other message notifications from his chats with Bakugo and Deku, and tapped on it quickly. He's not sure why, but he was hoping that the message would say that he was coming back to the dorm soon.

Sunshine Da: Hey listener! Things going okay at home?

Shin Amaze: Fine.

Sunshine Da: GREAT! I'm so glad to hear that!!!! I'm really sorry I couldn't stay home with you, but things are really okay? Taking your medicine? It's close to lunch, have you eaten yet? Drinking a lot of water?

Shin Amaze: Following the directions on the package. Just breakfast. Mostly tea, but will.

Sunshine Da: Good! I'm really glad to hear that! I made a bento box in the fridge, but there's plenty of other stuff, still a LOT of soup left. I can run by really quick if you need me to, but I think Principal Nezu probably has it covered.

Sunshine Da: Are things going okay with that? Having fun with him? Not Sunshine Da: You're doing ok?

Shin Amaze: Fine. I'm running out of leisure time, will message back in an hour.

27 let the phone fall out of his hands, and rolled over on his bed so that he could hide his face in the pillow. He knows he only has a minute left, he should be watching the time to make sure he doesn't miss it, but he can't help himself.

He wants Yamada to be here.

He tries to reason with himself. He's troublesome enough by getting sick, he doesn't want to ask for more when he's getting free medicine and good food, even people to watch over him. He shouldn't be so selfish, but Yamada makes him feel selfish at times. Yamada makes him weird, he says things that twist him up inside because it's too easy to believe them when he shouldn't, and that's all the more reason to be thankful that he's not here to put him through that when he feels so weak.

But he wants to hear Yamada's voice. He wants to see him. He wants Yamada to sit beside him and talk, even if there's nothing to talk about. Even if all that food and tea is free for the taking, it doesn't taste the same if Yamada isn't there to make it.

27 pulls himself up, finally disgusted with his own selfishness. He has perfectly fine food already made for him, he can cook for himself, he can take care of himself. That's so much more than he's ever had, he shouldn't be anything less than grateful for it.

The Rat Boss' voice reminds him how out of lines his actions have been, rolling around on the bed like a child, completely forgetting that he was being watched. "Ah, it's time for lunch. Yamada prepared something for you, but would you like anything specific? I can have something from Lunch Rush delivered."

27 shakes his head, standing up only to find himself nearly losing his balance. He might be weakened, but he's been weaker. He's done far more with less capability to do it, he's felt worse under Deidoro's quirk and still fought him. He can make his own food just fine.

He doesn't want to get close enough to the Rat Boss sitting in his chair to get the recipes in his desk, so he just drags himself to the kitchen to see what he can make. It's probably better not to try something from those recipes, he doesn't know how to make them right. He needs Yamada to-

No. He doesn't need Yamada. At all. He's being selfish again.

He looks at the refrigerator and finds a lot of food that's already made, with notes that have numbers and instructions to add water to it before microwaving it or to add something else. He sees his bento box too, but he doesn't want that. He doesn't want anything that Yamada made, because he's not here to make it.

He doesn't need to be here to make it. 27 can make his own food.

He's seen Yamada make rice and eggs enough times that he doesn't doubt he could do it himself. Even if neither of those things seem as delicious as the leftovers, he tells himself that they are. He's just being selfish again, he would have done anything for just a handful of plain rice at The Miasma. Even if it wasn't cooked, it would have been different, and that's enough. That's more than enough, he shouldn't care what he eats because it's all so different and that's what makes it good.

The Rat Boss' presence reminds him to make tea, and he starts that before grabbing a water bottle for himself. The rice cooker is already on the counter, so he fills it up with water then adds a cup of rice to it, knowing that it will take some time before it's ready.

He leans on the counter and closes his eyes for just a moment. He's weak, but he's fine if he keeps busy, keeps his task ahead of him and his body moving towards his goal. He needs more of some of the medicines, to change the cold sticky thing. He does those things, he hands more tea to the Rat Boss, and then starts making the eggs even if they'll be done long before the rice is.

He cracks the eggs into the pan perfectly. There's no bits of shell that he had to pick out when he made tamago, he doesn't even let the yolk drip on the counter or floor when he throws them away. He wonders if Yamada would be proud of that, if he'd smile and say he was getting better, if he'd make it into a bigger deal than it is.

The Rat Boss pulls some leftovers from the refrigerator, and just holds it in his hands after closing the door. It's odd until 27 figures out that he can't reach the microwave, so he takes the food and follows the instructions, grateful to have something to do other than picking at the eggs.

He didn't want to scramble them, he wanted to fry them like Yamada usually does. He likes the flavor of the yolk, he really likes it.

But when he looks at the pan, he notices that the yolks broke. The runny orange-yellow is turning more yellow at the edges, it's running into the pan and cooking too quick, and he can't stop that. He tries to, he picks at the parts that have run out so that maybe some of it can be saved, he can cook the clear part into white but keep the orange-yellow from turning yellow, but it just runs more and he has to scramble them and he didn't want that he just wanted Yamada to come home.

"Shinsou?" 27 wipes at his face, he tries to make the tears go away but the tightness in his chest just feels worse. His skin feels too hot but he feels cold, he hates this, he fucking hates this. "Is there something wrong with the eggs?"

There's not, they're perfectly fine, scrambled is fine, he's being selfishuselesstroublesome, he's awful, he's pathetic, he's crying and he can't stop and he just wants Yamada here.

27 shakes his head, and turns off the stove before he throws the eggs away. He's not hungry, he's not going to eat. It might be wasteful, but he doesn't care right now. He doesn't know what he wants, what's reasonable to want, he doesn't know what to do so he just sits at the table and hides his face in his folded arms.

He knows he's throwing a fit like Eri does sometimes, especially the way that he's acting exactly like she does. He never imagined that just hiding his face and giving up like this would feel this relieving. Even if he knows he's being watched, that this is probably a test because everything with the Rat Boss is a test and he's probably failing, he doesn't care. He just wants Yamada here, and that's all he can think about, he can't even try to tell himself he's being selfish.

He feels five soft things on his arm, patting him, and he can feel how smooth they are. It matches how pink they are, in a way he can't really explain, but it's distracting enough that he doesn't feel this overwhelming pressure hanging over him anymore. "This is quite a trying time for you, I know. I think a bit of tea, a bit of food, and a return to sleep will work wonders."

27 lifts his head a bit, just resting his chin on the counter to peer over his arms to look at the Rat Boss. He's still wearing that smile, but his hand is pulling away, only a flash of pink and he wants more of it. He knows it will make him feel better.

He knows how to ask without asking, how to not be so reckless, but he's too desperate for something to make him feel more than this hot, muggy oppression over him. Something more than the stinging in his eyes, or the ache in his throat. He lifts a hand and flares his fingers, and doesn't even consider that he might not be answered.

He is. The Rat Boss tilts his head in amusement, eyes closing for a moment, but he lifts his hand and flares his toebeans in answer. It's enough, those smooth pink bumps are enough. If 27 had his quirk, he would probably take more, he would probably make him show them off constantly, but it's enough. He won't be selfish.

27 drags himself to make his own tea, he gives the Rat Boss' food to him then takes out the bento box. There's always parts that are supposed to be eaten cold, and 27 picks at them until he's had enough. It's enough, he just has to remind himself of that.

The Rat Boss doesn't give him any indication whether he's really allowed to just go back to sleep. There were supposed to be more tests, more leisure, more things to do and sleep wasn't one of them, but the Rat Boss just climbs onto the chair again and waits for 27 to do something.

He knows what to do, but he wants to do it differently. He feels a sting of apprehension when he walks to the chair but he feels too many other things to let it be anything but dull, and takes the sleeping bag from the back of it. It's probably weird to sleep in a sleeping bag on top of a bed, but he's cold and he wants nothing more than to be the farthest thing from that. Pulling the comforter over the sleeping bag should help with that eventually.

27 should be more afraid of restricting his movements like this. Unzipping himself will cost him seconds that would decide his fate if he were attacked, but he finds himself too concerned with how cold he is. He tries to curl into himself to feel warm, but he doesn't, and he wishes he could just feel warm.

He just wishes he could feel anything but what he feels when he thinks of Yamada not being here.

*

Yamada isn't entirely surprised that Nejire and Amajiki know when he has his free period, or that he always spends it in his classroom now that he has two wards that love to learn from a real teacher. He is a little surprised that they do, because even though it was clear to see Mirio was having a bit of trouble with a reminder of his quirklessness, unfortunately thanks to his ward, he didn't really think his best friends would come to him for help. He might be their teacher, but he kind of figured that Shouta would be the one they would go to if Ectoplasm didn't seem approachable.

But then he sees that all-too-familiar permission slip and realizes that the Big Three want a team-up, even if Suneater and Nejire-chan are a little late to the game.

"Yamada-sensei, we know that Mirio has already gotten permission to stay with Shinsou while he's sick, but we think it would be easier to care for him if we were there too," Amajiki says, and even if Yamada knows who he's trying to talk about when he says 'care for him,' he's not entirely convinced that Shinsou is the only person he's concerned about.

"Eri!" Nejire calls, as distractible as ever when she spots the five year old who is very insistent about learning English today and no sign language whatsoever. "Why aren't you staying home with Shin-Shin? Don'tcha know it's way more fun to stay home instead of going to school?"

Eri seemed to already have an idea about what was going to happen once Yamada signed those permission slips, and she didn't seem too happy about home becoming a place where the Big Three and Shinsou were, when school wasn't. "School is really fun, Neji! And it's really important to go if you're gonna be a good hero! You've got to go to school tomorrow so you get to be a good hero!"

Miss 'Why Do We Gotta Learn a WHOLE Language, Mic-Sensei' herself seemed a little chided, her enthusiasm falling just a bit while she tried to protest that she was a good hero, a really good hero, a super good hero who just needed to take make-up exams sometimes. Yamada had no worries about Amajiki, the poor soul who probably carried Mirio and Nejire through the school subjects that they clued into a lot less easily than their Heroics classes. And Amajiki's subtle hints that he would find it easier to keep Nejire and Mirio to task if he was also there on their days off didn't come off as too subtle when he slid the permission slips a little higher on Yamada's desk.

Yamada understood that all too well. While Shirakumo was a complete disaster at most subjects, Shouta had been a particularly stubborn case. Shirakumo would try to laugh off a genuine inability to grasp certain things, while Shouta would flippantly write them off. 'I just need to pass, it's fine,' Shouta would say when Yamada covered exactly 70% of the material for their upcoming exam. Shouta even marked off his stopping point a few times when he was feeling particularly surly about his personal training time getting gutted for exam weeks.

"Well, it's only a few months before graduation when you herolets will really be kicked out of the nest, so if you think you're up for it, I can't really stop you now," Yamada says, signing off on his line before he notices that Shouta's is strangely absent. Particularly odd, considering his third year Hero Ethics class was right before his free period. "What's with Eraserhead's missing autograph? Didn't want to wake him up from a nap or something?"

Amajiki wilts a bit, as though standing in front of all those empty desks at the front of the room seemed to cause a flashback to a time when they were full of his peers, while he stares at the permission slips pensively. "Aizawa-sensei would prefer if we watched Shinsou on separate days.... That's fine, but...."

Yamada rolled his eyes before signing off for his stubborn and ungrateful husband. Watching over a sick kid was enough of a favor, and more than enough to pay it back in kind by hosting a little hang-out in their dorm. Even if it would be nice to have some extra hands on deck if Mirio decided to get back to his studies, he's sure that Principal Nezu isn't doing anything horrible to Shinsou like Shouta is worried about.

And he's decently sure that the 'leisure time' thing is harmless. Shinsou can be a little vague, but he can use his phone to call for help if he needs it. Yamada is halfway sure he doesn't need to be rescued.

But he'll probably find it a lot easier to breathe once he makes sure of that. "We've got plenty of snacks and food that you can help yourselves to, but if you want anything in particular, I can whip it up for you guys! I really appreciate you doing this, and I know Shinsou will feel a lot better with someone he knows and trusts there to watch over him."

Amajiki nods, still a little unsure of something, but Yamada isn't sure he likes what he thinks it is. "Mirio said that this illness could be related to his quirk. Can he still use it?"

There's just something in his tone, something in Amajiki's stare and the way it holds like it does when he's taking something seriously, that Yamada instinctively bristles at. Even if he works hard to make sure that doesn't come to the surface. "Nope! It seems like all systems are offline for that little reboot, not that the poor kid probably feels like using it. He's feeling pretty miserable with the puking, the horrible fever, all the other cruddy stuff going on. Nope, I think my little brainwasher is all out of the washing, and I hope you weren't thinking of getting a demonstration for some weird reason."

It still boils beneath the surface and probably comes out enough to make Amajiki notice, judging by that subtle flinch. Yamada should care, but he doesn't, not when he can't convince himself that Amajiki didn't mean what he's convinced he meant.

The participants in the raid were just told Shinsou could control people by talking to them, but he imagines that Mirio clued them into a few more specifics. He doesn't like thinking about it, but Mirio might have given them an update after that night that Shinsou tried to use his quirk to run away. That Shinsou could control one person, and had been trying to get a second under his control, but couldn't.

And that three people being there would be enough to mitigate that.

Nejire blows a raspberry at Amajiki, pouting with her arms wrapped around Eri to hold her close. “Tamaki doesn’t have enough brain to wash! He’s just asking dumb-dumb questions.”

To his credit, Amajiki manages to shoot a glare in return instead of just taking that insult on the chin, but that bravado is completely lost when he looks back at Yamada. “I didn’t mean any offense by that, I was just curious. It’s better to be prepared, especially when Mirio...seems to mean a lot to Shinsou....”

Yamada isn’t entirely sure what Tamaki really means, but he trusts that it’s nothing too serious. As much as Mirio does mean to Shinsou - and he means a whole lot, considering how often Shinsou will open up to him in a rough spot when Yamada can’t even get his foot through the door - Shinsou means a lot to Mirio too. He knows that Mirio wouldn’t just stand by if Amajiki were suspicious of Shinsou just because of the quirk he was born with, not with how worried he had been when he learned that Shinsou thought it was villainous. Or how devastated he was when he found out that Shinsou’s mutism might be related to thinking of his quirk that way.

Yamada doesn’t like thinking about it, but he knows that even some of the herolets in Shinsou’s inner circle have had some pretty awful thoughts about Shinsou’s quirk. If his theory about this big sick is right, and Shinsou does come out of it with his quirk in a more stable spot, he doesn’t want to hear a single word about anyone taking that as bad news.

Shinsou knows more about what a villain looks like than even the pro heroes on staff, and Yamada won’t tolerate anyone comparing his kid to that sort of person.

“Let me know if you run into any trouble with Ectoplasm! He might have made you think he’s the reigning King of Karaoke, but trust me, no one wants to see me challenge him for the title,” Yamada says with a grin that he usually wears when he plays the villain in training scenarios, one that definitely rattles Nejire with a reminder of her first year more than Amajiki. But Amajiki looks rattled enough without a memory to look back on, and that’s enough for him.

For now.

*

Aizawa expected many things. Some were less rational than others. He anticipated coming back to a dorm that had been completely refurnished to suit what he’s seen of Principal Nezu’s personal living conditions, slowly returning to normal with the aid of a few robots. He found it more likely that Shinsou would be asleep, but was also prepared to find him shaking with terror if Principal Nezu stumbled upon a particularly sore wound that might have interested him too much to stop pecking at.

But he didn’t expect to see this.

Hizashi is frozen in place, and he knows that doesn’t bode well for him. He knows the fear that paralyzes him might thaw at the worst time, and he’s tempted to steal his phone to keep him from doing what he knows he wants to, a desire so strong that it only makes the terror worsen.

Principal Nezu’s mouth drops open, but Aizawa doesn’t believe for a second that he had lost track of time. That Principal Nezu would allow himself to be seen like this if he didn’t will it, that he would be unaware what the sight of that outfit was doing to him, especially knowing that it had to be tailor-made for the animal principal. That he must have prepared it, and that he must have been planning something like this for a while.

He doesn't want to think about that implication. That Principal Nezu prepared this. That he went to the effort of making it, and he's had it in his possession for some undetermined amount of time. Possibly years.

"I believe we have reached the end of our time together, Shinsou. It was quite an enjoyable day on my part," Principal Nezu says, pulling the capture scarf replica from around his neck, but the memory of it taints an otherwise benign black jumpsuit. Even if it would be odd enough to see the animal principal without his usual suit and tie, this is haunting for another reason. "I believe there is a ritual to report the day's events to the primary caregivers in this kind of scenario. Yamada?"

Aizawa hands Eri off to his husband to keep his hands occupied and far away from his phone, and though he doesn't have words to convey his intentions, Principal Nezu follows him out of the dorm with his usual clothing laid across his arm.

He knows he should say something, that Principal Nezu probably wants him to slip up and address it, but he refuses. He has never felt closer to death than this moment. "There were no emergencies that went unreported. Shinsou took his medicine and drank plenty of water without any reminder, though lunch was a bit more difficult, and honestly lacking. I've already forwarded the results of most of my examinations, but there were a few things that I hadn't mentioned yet."

Aizawa can't ask outright what Principal Nezu means by that. He knows if he says anything, it will be the wrong thing, he'll be asking why the hell Principal Nezu has an Eraserhead cosplay on hand, so he just nods. He hopes whatever Principal Nezu has to say, that it's quick to say, and Aizawa can end this horror and try to repress it to the best of his abilities.

"Shinsou has a disturbing propensity not to question things," Principal Nezu says with a flick of his paw gesturing to his outfit, and Aizawa didn't need a reminder that he was wearing it. "Knowing about his feverish bouts of delirium, I was curious whether he could be convinced that you had been affected by a quirk that would change your appearance to one like mine, but he didn't make a single comment on the change. Even when I tried to prompt him, he seemed to easily accept that I was in fact you, and that he had simply imagined that you were a human this entire time."

Aizawa finds his stomach turning even if the rest of him feels paralyzed. He knew that Principal Nezu would do something like this, he would take advantage of Shinsou's weakness to mentally scar him, as if the scars he already carried weren't enough. He feels the need to lash out against this like a boiling heat under his skin, but he can't force himself to move or answer to it. This is still Principal Nezu, and he can still do nothing against him.

"There are many reasons why Shinsou's inability to communicate is a problem, but this poses an entirely new threat," Principal Nezu says, folding his hands behind his back and disturbingly enough, seems honestly concerned. "His previous history only compounds that issue. There's no way to know what Shinsou truly thinks about his new environment at UA. In the best case scenario, I would hope that he's made no ill-suited assumptions, but I find myself quite concerned. I can only hope that he would feel more comfortable with you or Yamada if he felt unsafe here."

Only himself and Hizashi knew that what Principal Nezu feared had already come to fruition. That Shinsou had been convinced that he had been sold instead of being designated as a ward, and that he would be killed if he wasn't useful to the investigation. He's not sure if Shinsou would come to himself or Hizashi if something like that rose up again, if Shinsou didn't already have a concern that he was hiding, but he's not sure how to explain absolutely everything that is new to Shinsou, or where to even begin. "Thank you for letting me know that, and for taking the time to watch Shinsou today. As grateful as I am, Togata offered to watch him tomorrow, and I think that it helps him to spend time with the wards to take his mind off of certain things."

Principal Nezu seemed to genuinely brighten at that, tilting his head a bit farther than usual. "It was no trouble on my part, though I had realized throughout the day that there are certain aspects of care that I would be ill-equipped for. I'm sure that Togata is far better suited to it, but the offer still stands if it's needed again."

Aizawa returns the wave from Principal Nezu, watching him turn around and leave, and though he's reassured that Shinsou didn't seem to be visibly suffering, he will never allow Principal Nezu to be alone with either of his wards again.

*

27 feels too weak, and it's too hard to hide things. He knows that the face mask would help, especially with this near smile that pulls when Yamada asks how things went while his eyes are asking why the Rat Boss looked like that. He nearly laughs when he answers, 'Joke. Rat Boss tried to trick. Trick Rat Boss.'

He's just too happy that Yamada and Eri are home, even though Eri still seems mad at him. But he knows how to make it up to her. She was excited to watch movies with him and he wants to do that. Even if it'll be hard to stay awake, especially with how warm and comfortable the sleeping bag is, he can take it off and give it to her if it becomes a problem. It's his for the week, Aizawa said so himself.

Yamada goes to the kitchen to start making a snack or something, frowning at the bento box before he starts making something else. Eri walks up to him, her hands on his knees, and he can still see that she's unsettled by something.

"How wa-" 27 turns away when the cough comes too suddenly to stop it, the hand curled around his mouth starts to feel so much colder on his face. He must be more exhausted than he knew, or more reassured to see Eri because his head swims, but he pulls himself back up to look at her. "School?"

It's weird that she hasn't told him. She tells Aizawa or Yamada everything that they miss out on when they're away, but she doesn't look like she wants to tell him. "Okay. Everyone wants to see you, and big brother Mirio is worried about you."

27 can't hide the frown either, not when he knows he should look at the chat so that he doesn't have to see him face to face. He doesn't want Mirio to worry, even if he's sure he's not worried, he's just unsettled enough to seem that way to Eri. "Sorry. I'll get better soon. I know you don't like it either."

Eri doesn't answer that, but she pulls herself to sit beside him on the couch, too still before she notices that the fishes' bowl has been changed. "Fishie and Fishio's home is gone!"

27 nods, zipping himself up a little more when he starts to feel colder. "It was too small. Rat Bear did it. This is better for them."

27 feels his eyes falling shut, but he tries to fight it. He needs to watch movies with Eri, he needs to spend time with her because she wants that. She's mad about something, probably him, and he needs to stop that and make it better. He just has to.

He feels cold fingers on his forehead, colder than the sticky thing, and he knows he should open his eyes more but he can't, his head is starting to hurt too much. "You okay in there?"

Yamada sounds worried, and maybe he should be. This feels bad, so cold, the headache keeps building behind his eyes and it's building too fast, it's not like his quirk but he knows he has risks. Things 10 told him, things he's supposed to avoid but he hasn't done any of them. He shouldn't pass out but

*

Aizawa had thought Hizashi was being ridiculous, that it was wishful thinking. The same way that Nemuri seemed to think that Shinsou's illness was related to him feeling 'safe,' it was outlandish to think that a near-inevitable sickness was due to Shinsou's quirk.

But given how it couldn't be more poorly timed, he should have been prepared to be wrong about it.

Hizashi is kneeling beside Shinsou's bed, his fingers brushing against his sweaty temple while he keeps glancing between his phone and the unconscious teenager, until he notices Aizawa's presence at the door. He knows the tension in that smile too much to trust the teasing words that follow. "So, Shinsou's a little allergic to Eri right now."

Toshinori's text that reminded him that someone needed to take over 1-A's dorm shifts made him bristle at first, but at least there will be some use to the assignment. "And it's settling down with you?"

Hizashi nods, looking back at Shinsou when the teenager turns his head to the side with a pained whine. The sweat means the fever is breaking, and if the fever means what Hizashi thinks it does, then his quirk is settling without a target to reach for.

It's not good enough for The Commission, but it's good enough for Aizawa. If they try to challenge whether Hizashi is fit to be Shinsou's caretaker, this is a good indication that they will fail. It's a good sign that Shinsou's quirk truly can't affect Hizashi due to his hearing loss. "His fever falls with you, but Shinsou didn't have any issue with Principal Nezu. It might just be with Eri, or other people that Shinsou has used his quirk on."

Hizashi sighs, dropping his head to the mattress. "I don't want to risk it, Shou. I know that Mirio is going to be fine, but I just..."

Hizashi doesn't need to finish that sentence. Aizawa can see it too clearly in the way that his husband looks at Shinsou now, the fingers brushing away sweat and jumping away as though he forgets that he's touching Shinsou. He's given up on trying to convince Hizashi not to cross that line, even if he knows it will only hurt worse when they're faced with the inevitable.

And he's past due for a check-in to see if the inevitable is approaching soon. He knows that Shinsou Ui's extradition was approved, but he has no idea where Sansa and Naomasa are with their other leads, and he knows it's unlike him to not know.

He's been finding it too easy to forget about the investigation when Shinsou seems more like a fixture in their dorm than a temporary assignment. "I have to cover Toshinori's dorm shifts. That can keep Eri away from Shinsou."

He doesn't like being away from his husband, already accustomed to falling asleep beside him during the week within a month of being taken off of his patrols. He knows that Hizashi doesn't like it either with that grimace, but it pulls too quickly into concern when Shinsou makes another sound of discomfort, and Hizashi sighs. “I think he already misses her. This is rough enough stuff, but I hope it blows over quick.”

Aizawa wants that too, but for different reasons. He wants Shinsou well, he wants to protect him in any way that he can, and too often he’s found that he can’t. He didn’t imagine any of this when Hizashi took on Shinsou’s wardship, even when he tried to prepare for the worst.

He hears it again, even if it could be mistaken for a sigh. He wants Shinsou to stop uttering that number when he sleeps, when he’s feverish and delirious.

He doesn’t want to know who ‘10’ is, or why Shinsou is so afraid of them. Why Shinsou pleaded with them to believe that he could ‘work.’

He’s refused to look at it this long, but he knows that he has to. There’s little that Aizawa can do to protect Shinsou, but he can protect him like this. He can use every source of information he has to end the investigation before The Commission finds another way to meddle in it.

Aizawa takes the reviews that Shiori gave him when he packs for himself and Eri to go to the 1-A dorm that night, including the reviews about the ‘jobs’ that ‘27’ did.

Chapter End Notes

1-A Groupchat Usernames:

Will Die in 6 Days for Uttering the Forbidden Name - Kaminari Denki (Who called Aizawa "Zawa-sensei")

Pinkie Pie - Ashido Mina

2 Fast 2b Furious > A Cop - Iida Tenya

Eri’s New Mom > Yaoyorozu - Yaoyorozu Momo

RIP Shinsou, You Were Never Here Anyway > Nyansou - Shinsou Hitoshi

Flex These Arms Tape - Sero Hanta

Kwing Expwosion Muwrder :3 - Bakugo Katsuki

Banished to Sensei’s Shadow Realm - Midoriya Izuku (Who can't train with his quirk until he sees a quirk specialist after Aizawa couldn't cancel his quirk at the Midterm exam)

Everything Floats Down Here - Uraraka Ochako

Froptimus Prime - Asui Tsuyu

Wed Wiot :3 - Kirishima Eijirou

Dark Thots - Tokoyami Fumikage

I’m Ji-Ji Now, Forever TT_TT - Ojirou Masharao

Put Your Hands Down - Jirou Kyouka

Silent but Deadly - Shouji Mezo

Sprakan Ze Deutch - Aoyama Yuga

Mama Mirio

Chapter Summary

Aizawa brings himself to go through the reviews written for '27,' then finds an unlikely visitor to the Safe Room. Eri is still conflicted about her feelings towards Twenny, and finds a council of siblings created by the hero students. 27 wants to prove that he's not sick, that he doesn't need to be watched by Mirio today.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: Vague reference to how Shinsou's quirk could be used for sexual assault in the review that begins with '27 is getting some flak here', cough syrup abuse (Don't do what Shinsou does, kiddos!), vomiting

Previously on Wards of UA: Shinsou's first job at The Miasma was for Honzo when he was 6 years old (In Wards), where Shinsou was beaten within an inch of his life to force a police officer to tell Honzo the information he wanted. Midoriya's Black Whip quirk can't be cancelled by Aizawa's Erasure, and Aizawa has forbidden Midoriya from using his quirk until he sees a quirk specialist to get an explanation, as Aizawa doesn't know about One For All. Eri gets emotionally volatile after using her quirk, and she sees it as the only time that she truly gets angry with Shinsou. Eri requires 'horn tricks' where Shinsou flicks her horn to loosen the built up mucus when her horn grows to a certain length. The first time Shinsou made tamago, he didn't use enough sugar and Eri commented on the lack of sweetness, and Aizawa didn't tell him that it's easier to roll the tamago with a rectangular pan and allowed him to use a circular one. Yamada, while concussed, was moved to tears when Mirio made lunch in Chapter 51. Mirio has a ritual of ordering a black coffee with five sugar packets barely mixed in as a way to mourn Sir Nighteye when he feels particularly overwhelmed, as that was Sir Nighteye's favorite coffee order. Eri calls Shinsou "Twenny," while Nejire calls him "Shin-Shin." Shinsou is Yamada's ward because The Commission of Wardship Affairs believes that Shinsou's quirk wouldn't work on him, because he is deaf, and it's a requirement for heroes to be unaffected by their wards' quirks, but as Shinsou is selectively mute, they have not tested it. Mirio gave Shinsou a specially enlarged Gengar plushie, big enough that when Shinsou hugs it, he looks like a little kid holding a plushie too big for him (Fan art of that in the notes!). Mirio called Yamada 'Dad' to encourage Eri to call him that after discovering she wanted to, but was too shy to do it, but has been putting more consideration into how he feels about Yamada after that.

It's not surprising that Eri wants to see Yaoyorozu as soon as they arrive to the 1-A dorm, and Aizawa doesn't feel the need to protest. He trusts that his students can take care of Eri, and if there are any problems, he can be aware of them through the surveillance cameras.

He watches them while he calls Naomasa, but he's not paying attention to the cameras at all.

They were able to gather 25 named organizations from the reviews on that ‘Villain Yelp’ website that Shiori gave him, from ‘127’s’ reviews. Naomasa and Sansa have been able to meet with some low-level members of those organizations, some higher ones that are imprisoned. No one has talked yet, and Naomasa is as hopeful about that possibility as Aizawa is. Miasma’s ability to silence any loose ends is apparently well-known, and the way they operate is well-hidden.

Numbers that are rented are delivered to the location where their ‘jobs’ are performed. There’s no mention of a central location that any of the reviewers visited, and the locations of the reviewers themselves isn’t an indication of where they operate. They don’t know where Miasma is.

When Shinsou was compelled to answer under Jun’s quirk, he said that Numbers were gathered in four ways - volunteers, debtors, orphans, ‘unwanted.’

He can’t imagine anyone ‘volunteering’ to enter Miasma’s fold, given that they’ve never recovered a body or a survivor without extensive scarring. They’ve never encountered a Number who came to regret that choice and exited freely, and Shinsou’s reluctance to speak about Miasma isn’t just to keep himself from being taken from Eri. As much as there were things that occurred at the 8 Precepts that were too nightmarish to speak about, worse seemed to occur at Miasma.

Furokage Itsuki was a debtor, he was a drug addict as a teenager and ran up an impressive debt that Miasma offered to cover if he performed their ‘jobs.’ The specifics were kept secret, Furokage Itsuki was instructed to be prepared to be away from his family and friends, to say goodbye, until his older sister Mizuki covered the debt with her life, becoming ‘50.’

Aizawa knows that ‘orphans’ implies that Miasma may have a hand in Family Services to pick up runaways or difficult children - children that society may have given up on and wouldn’t miss. He knows that Shinsou wasn’t one of them. The Ashidos and Kirishimas remembered Shinsou Ui to be ‘struggling’ as a single mother, even after 12 years had gone by, but Family Services has no record of a complaint or call.

Ashido said that Shinsou was sold. Shinsou told her and Midoriya that the night he tried to escape UA. Shinsou was sold by his mother when he was four years old, and he believed it was due to his quirk. A quirk that Miasma would undoubtedly find valuable for their criminal endeavors, a quirk that Shinsou believed drove his mother insane.

Aizawa doesn’t know if Shinsou Ui is insane. He knows he should be there tomorrow to see for himself, to set eyes on the woman who set all of this into motion for Shinsou 12 years ago. Shinsou’s mother was the first person who placed a price on that child who was sold or ‘rented’ too many times since. But Aizawa knows he won’t do it.

Naomasa doesn’t ask because he assumes, but he assumes wrong. Aizawa won’t be at the station when Shinsou Ui is questioned for her connection to Miasma. He won’t force himself to look at her when he knows it will change the way he looks at Shinsou.

The Nomus. The other side of Miasma’s operation, and the focus of The Commission’s attention into this organization.

There hasn’t been a Nomu sighting since the attack on Endeavor, but that attack was disturbing enough for the general public. Careful editing obscured the full horror of the situation - the creature thought and planned and spoke, it was living when previous Nomus were dead. The corpse of the Nomu that attacked Endeavor was recovered, and identified in some ways. The majority of its DNA belonged to an underground fighter who had been arrested for that lifestyle a few times. The corpse has four tattoos - one tribal symbol on its shoulder, and three numbers. 383, 332, and 3144.

Three Numbers, one fighter, but six quirks were demonstrated in that fight. Only the specialists examining the corpse can know what that means, but Aizawa doubts that there's another organization working in tandem with Miasma to supply the parts for Nomus. There was a mention of Miasma silencing their competitors near the end of 127's reviews, a complaint that it was hard enough to rent specialized talent like that in the first place, and Miasma made it harder in order to monopolize the demand. And beginning two years ago, they seemed reluctant to meet that demand anyway.

Aizawa doesn't want to read the reviews in his hand, but he doesn't want to hand them over to Naomasa blindly. Despite what he heard Shinsou say, Shinsou isn't '27.' Even if Shinsou believes that, Aizawa never will.

It's hard enough to look at the scars. It's hard enough to imagine the wounds they once were. In the back of his mind, Aizawa knows he wouldn't know half of what he does if he relied on Shinsou to admit it, to tell him, and it feels wrong to know it despite that.

But he needs to know for the investigation. For Shinsou as well. He can't turn a blind eye to what Shinsou has gone through when he needs to be a caretaker to him. They live together, Aizawa has tried to help him through nightmares and through panic without knowing what caused those nightmares or panic in the first place. He knows half of the horror, and he needs to know more.

He immediately hates that he has to learn it from those that created that horror in the first place.

'27: DAMAGED GOODS WARNING! First off, this one is a fucking baby. They gave us a freaking preschooler for crying out loud. Boss still made it work, but if you see this one come up in the future? Get the discount, because Boss had to make it work the hard way. Not gonna work for interrogations like they tell you it will, Miasma's a pack of liars.'

Aizawa looks up from the file only to see Eri cooking with Yaoyorozu and Sato, and looks away with nausea boiling in his stomach. He knows what Shinsou looked like at four years old, even if he doesn't know what 'damaged goods' means. But he can imagine. The scars on his stomach that are like the ones on his arms, but unfathomably more disturbing.

Aizawa forces himself to read the rest, to keep his mind from wandering to thoughts that are too gruesome.

He knows he could skim, to just pick out names, but he absorbs it all. The dates at the ends of those messages stick out to him the most. Shinsou was 6 years old when the first review was created, but there's a three year gap between that and the next one. Aizawa hopes there was a three year gap for Shinsou, even if he doubts that he should.

'Damaged goods warning? Ain't that bad. Creepy as hell, but 27 did the job he was supposed to. Freaked out the comp, got a better deal out of it.'

'27 - stupid as shit. Can't think under pressure, nearly got us busted. Don't rely on this one.'

'27 is fucking hilarious. Think that big bad mask is holding something big under there? NOPE! Kid has a stutter. The fuckheads that tried to get to the boss still got got, but you can't take this kid seriously when he can't even talk right.'

'27 is getting some flak here, and I've got to say, it's not really deserved. Kid is pretty spookable, but he did the job pretty good. Didn't even think about the last half of the plan, but he had it covered. And DAMN, what I'd do for that quirk and a room full of supermodels, you know what I mean?'

'27 is trash. Get 58, get 34, don't waste your money. We got a refund but we'll never get that opportunity again.'

Aizawa didn't want to know if Shinsou was good at his 'jobs,' but he didn't want to know if he was bad at them either. He knows the implications behind renting muscle like Miasma does, and he's seen shades of it in organizations who keep hired hands in less than willing conditions. He's never seen an organization this deep, this black, without a single survivor that made it out alive except for Shinsou.

When an organization places a price on a human life, when they derive their funds from renting out muscle, they have an incentive to keep the profit rolling in. He knows it gets worse as it goes on, the worst trafficking ring he's ever uncovered had been in operation for 12 years by that point, and the warehouse where the victims were housed looked more like a cattle corral than any place for humans to live. Isolation was always at play, dehumanization tactics came later, but punishment came somewhere in the middle and seemed to evolve the longer it was left to fester.

Aizawa doesn't want to imagine the wounds that Shinsou's scars were, but he imagines that he always knew why they were there.

He has three names, and he sends them to Naomasa with only a sentence to explain where he got them from. He knows that he should turn these reviews over so that they can be catalogued into the other investigation files. He knows that it's policy to turn them in as soon as he receives them.

He'll hand these reviews over in person, because he doesn't want to keep them. Irrationally, he wants to get rid of everything he has in his office that's related to the investigation, to hand the entirety of it to Naomasa and merely wait until Naomasa has news about a raid.

He doesn't want to peel back the scars to see wounds anymore, he wants to take all of it away for Shinsou. He wants Shinsou to be Shinsou, as though the past 12 years never happened to him at all.

Aizawa can't do that, so he works with what he has. He has a child in his care that was taught that bad things will happen to him if he doesn't produce profit for his captors, a child that has probably learned horrifying consequences to being sick or injured. He has a child that is sick, that isn't coping with that well, and his usual outlet for comfort in Eri is being taken from him because Eri makes him more ill.

He doesn't know how to approach that situation at all, how to make it any easier, and he's utterly distracted from it when he sees Midoriya knocking on the Safe Room door.

"Aizawa-sensei? I need to talk to you about my quirk...."

*

Eri doesn't know why, but her tummy still feels sick about Twenny.

She can still eat a lot of tasty cinnamon rolls though. Momo and Sa-Sa made a whole bunch, and Sa-Sa joked that they're all for her, but the other heroes still come down to eat them. Eri doesn't know if she's really sharing them, but she would even if she was asked.

"Eri, I need your help!" Ocha says when she's done being mad at Ugo, even though she still looks really mad when she looks at Eri. "Shinsou liked my soup better, right? Or at least Ojiro's! He definitely didn't like Bakugo's soup at all, right?"

Eri's tummy does a big twist when Ocha says that, and she feels itchy and weird and really mad that she does. “Twenny didn’t eat any soup ‘cause he’s dumb. You shouldn’t make soup for him, Ocha, he’s not gonna eat it ‘cause he’s dumb!”

A lot of heroes look at her really weird, a lot like Mirio did. They look at her like she said something really mean, and maybe she did, but she doesn’t know why. Her quirk hasn’t been bad for a long time, and only her quirk makes her mean, but Twenny made her quirk work a couple times with his quirk, so maybe he’s doing that again to make her mean. Because Twenny is dumb.

Ugo tries to do a horn trick on Eri when he flicks her horn, and a lot of heroes get really mad and yell at him for that, but Ugo is kind of like Yama because he can stop hearing things sometimes. “The fuck is with you and Shitsou? Yeah, he’s fucking dumb, but you’re not supposed to know that yet.”

Eri gets really itchy and her tummy gets really flippy when Ugo says that, and she even feels her face getting really hot. “Twenny’s not dumb, Ugo! You can’t say that!”

Eri’s not supposed to yell so big except with Yama, but she feels like she can’t yell enough. Ugo looks like she yelled a whole lot, but she still feels flippy and itchy and mad.

But Tsu-Tsu puts a hand on Ugo’s shoulder to make him go back before Eri does another big mad, and she shakes her head. “Bakugo, you shouldn’t get involved in this as an only child, kero. You can’t relate.”

Eri really hopes that Tsu-Tsu can ‘relate.’ She wants to stop feeling so sick and so itchy and somad at Twenny, even though she still thinks he’s really dumb. But a lot of heroes are supposed to be able to relate to her, and they all talk about how they can help. Iida, Haga, Shoji, and Todo are all supposed to be able to relate to her, even though Todo doesn’t really look like he wants to.

All the heroes that can relate to her look at each other, until Tsu-Tsu just sighs. “Eri, was there something specific that Shinsou did to make you mad, kero?”

Eri kicks her feet a few times to help think. She can’t really think of why Twenny is dumb. He tried to hide that he was sick, and that was kind of dumb, and he likes to do dumb things without her sometimes, and that’s really dumb too. But she knows it’s kind of not.

Yama and Zawa do stuff without each other a whole lot, and it doesn’t make them flippy or itchy or mad. The heroes that hang out with each other all the time sometimes do stuff that isn’t together, and that doesn’t make them mad. And Izuku and his mom are away from each other a whole lot, but they’re never ever mad at each other because of that.

Eri just shakes her head, because Twenny just makes her mad now, and she doesn’t like it. She never felt mad like this before, she never ever got mad at Twenny like she really means it, except when her quirk was making her mad. And she really wants to stop feeling mad at Twenny because it makes her tummy flippy and her skin itchy, and it kind of makes her really scared.

Iida puts his hand under his chin, even though he starts moving it around when he talks. “That’s unfortunately common for sibling relationships. Even though I’ve always held my brother in high regard, there were times that I was angry at him for no apparent reason. It was quite frustrating, especially given how much I still cared for him during that time.”

“I’m not sure if I can really help,” Shoji says with his real mouth instead of his arm-mouths, because his arms are crossed like he’s a little cold. “I’m a lot older than Mizuno, so I’ve never felt that aggravated at her. There were only a few times when she was younger and really wanted my attention, but it was easy to remember that she was only acting that way because of her age.”

Tsu-Tsu tilts her head at Shoji, like he said something a little weird. “That’s exactly why you should weigh in, kero. I’m also the eldest, and that means that we can relate to how Shinsou feels, kero, especially because Mizuno is the same age as Eri. The others can relate to Eri as younger siblings, kero.”

Haga moves her hands, but Eri can’t really see what they’re doing since she’s not wearing her cute gloves. “Ah, but I’m, like, way younger than my brother, so I don’t really know him like that. I probably can’t help at all.”

“I’ve never had this problem either,” Todo says, and Eri kind of wishes that he did, because she thinks Todo would know exactly what to do to make it all better.

Eri kicks her feet again, because the heroes are supposed to help her with everything because she’s little, but they’re not really fixing it. “I don’t like being mad at Twenny. He’s dumb but I still like him. But I don’t.”

Tsu-Tsu hums like that’s okay, but it’s really not. Eri’s not supposed to get mad at Twenny because he’s her mom and because he’s always taken care of her. He’s always read her stories and combed her hair and played games with her, and he used to be really happy to do that stuff. But he’s not happy after they got rescued, and maybe that’s her fault. Maybe Twenny would have been happier if they didn’t live with heroes, because he doesn’t really like it sometimes.

“Siblings are very complicated, kero,” Tsu-Tsu says, and Eri hopes that she’s still right even if she’s not a younger sibling. “You always care about each other, even if you don’t always like each other. Sometimes you expect each other to know what you need without even talking about it, and that can cause problems, kero.”

Eri slaps her hands on the table, because Tsu-Tsu is really, really, really right! “That’s why Twenny’s dumb! He used to know everything and do everything right, but he’s not doing it here! He keeps doing stuff with Zawa and Yama and you guys and I don’t want him to!”

The heroes look like she said something kind of bad, or maybe because they know that they’re doing bad stuff by doing stuff with Twenny without her. But maybe they know that they’re not.

Eri just wants Twenny to like her again, but she can’t really make him like her when she’s being bad like this and being mad. It’s really ‘complicated,’ like Tsu-Tsu said, and she doesn’t want it to be.

She likes being at UA with all the heroes, but she doesn’t really like Twenny being away from her. She knows that Chisaki can’t take them back because he’s dead, and she doesn’t really want him to.

But she really wants Twenny to be like he was back then, and care about her all the time like he used to.

“You know, Shinsou still cares about you even when he’s doing other things,” Shoji says, kind of quiet because everyone else is quiet. “Mizuno also got angry when I was trying to study, or trying to do things that I enjoyed that she wouldn’t. I didn’t always want to spend time with my little sister, but I always cared about her.”

Eri just sighs, because that doesn’t really help at all. “Twenny always did. ”

Eri has to move her cinnamon rolls out of the way to cover up her head on the table, but she doesn’t want to look at all the heroes right now, and they’re not helping anyway.

Twenny always liked spending time with her. Always. Eri used to be a lot of fun to be around, and now she's not, and Twenny doesn't like her anymore. And maybe Twenny's not dumb, he just doesn't like her, but thinking about Twenny really not liking her makes her sad all the way to her toes, and it makes it hard to breathe when she really just wants to cry instead.

Eri looks up when she hears a lot of loud running, before the door to the stairs opens up at Zawa comes out looking kind of mad, and Izuku looks kind of worried behind him. But Zawa looks kind of worried when he looks at her. "Is something wrong, Eri?"

Eri shakes her head, because Zawa already told her to just tell Twenny to spend more time with her, and that didn't really work out. "I'm just tired."

Zawa looks around at all the heroes, before he sighs. "Can I trust that you can watch over Eri and not destroy the dorm?"

Iida does a big salute and promises that they can, and Zawa nods before he goes back to looking mad again. Izuku says that they'll be back, but he looks really worried about being gone, and he looks even more worried than Twenny used to when he said he was going to be gone for a trip outside.

Eri really hopes that Izuku's going to be okay, but she kind of forgets about that when Ocha and Momo and Ashi and Tsu-Tsu promise to do her hair and read her bedtime stories so she can sleep really good tonight.

And even if they don't read bedtime stories like Twenny does, they still make her feel warm and comfy like they're supposed to.

*

Aizawa already didn't feel guilty for interrupting Toshinori's recovery period for a cold, but when he picks the lock and finds Toshinori looking ill-rested but not sick, he realizes that he needed to believe he was sick.

Toshinori looks away from the computer screen with extensive bags under his eyes. He looks like he hasn't slept in a few days, but that's not enough to force the anger boiling under his skin to settle for any notion of sympathy or mercy. "Midoriya. Wait outside."

Aizawa slams the door behind him to reinforce that, and locks the door to enforce it, before he turns to face Toshinori and has to remind himself to breathe. He's not going to murder the Symbol of Peace on campus grounds, only four doors down from his own dorm room.

Even in the face of his rage, he's rational enough to know that he should do it where it won't be tracked back to him.

"Young Aizawa, what-" Aizawa bristles at the familiarity, when it's never been more ill-deserved.

"Your quirk," Aizawa grates out, and he struggles to call it anything but that. The quirk that the Symbol of Peace held, the quirk that was the Symbol of Peace in ways he knew before he even knew it. "One for All. You passed it down to a child."

Toshinori glances at the door, shock but not blame, and that's why he's still breathing. Why he thought he could hide this at all is beyond Aizawa, but if he thought he could be that familiar, to call him 'Young Aizawa,' to offer ill-suited advice or the odd compliment like an old retired pro before he even retired, he should have thought to tell Aizawa about this sooner.

“An untested, untried 14 year old. A child, not a hero. You put that on his shoulders and you knew what that would make him,” Aizawa growls, and he finds it hard not to blame Toshinori for illogical things. The attack at USJ, the League of Villains nigh-unending focus on his homeroom class. He nearly expelled a seedling of the Symbol of Peace, and he probably would have been better off if he did.

Toshinori folds his hands in his lap guiltily, but his eyes don't reflect that guilt at all. “I saw a great deal of potential in young Midoriya. I saw a hero, even if he was quirkless, or young. A successor was needed, and mine to choose. I've never regretted it.”

“You should have,” Aizawa says, even if he doesn't say that he should now. “What were you planning to do if I expelled him? Were you going to strong-arm another school into overlooking that? What do you plan to do if he dies? That kid out there is a kid, and we both know the villains he's going to face better than he does.”

Toshinori probably doesn't, because Aizawa has never forgotten the reason why his trademark is a smile. The bastard has a quirk that's never failed him, he's the Symbol of Peace for a reason, but Aizawa still can't believe that quirk now belongs to Midoriya after how many times it's failed him in worse ways than the usual ones. “I believe in young Midoriya, and I have reasons to. He's more than proven himself, and you can't tell me you don't see that.”

Aizawa sees near misses and strokes of pure, unadulterated luck. Miracles, and he doesn't trust in miracles. He wouldn't trust miracles with a child's life.

This is different from any other student. He's known that his students will face monsters, they will face death time and time again. But he knows that UA is a nest, they don't have to fly until they're prepared. They don't get that attention from villains until it's earned and so far it's always been met. But this is different. This feels like he's the only one who didn't know, and it feels like the League of Villains did.

“How long were you going to let this go on?” Aizawa asks, and he wonders why it went on this long at all. He's known about All for One from whispers and myths, from criminals that he's arrested before Naomasa ever told him that it was true. He understands that One for All shouldn't be known to villains, even if he doubts that it isn't. But he doesn't know if he's the only other hero who knows it too.

“I should have told you, young Aizawa. I know that very well now,” Toshinori admits, guilt finally settling in his eyes, and Aizawa shouldn't feel like he's properly scolded a student when he's talking to the former Symbol of Peace, but he does. “It wasn't from lack of trust, but... I'm very reluctant to let anyone know about this. About what it has meant for me.”

Aizawa has stood on far murkier ground than most pro heroes, and he knows that. He won't say that the fall of the Symbol of Peace didn't rattle him, because it did. But Aizawa could have known this from the beginning, and nothing would have changed for him. “One for All allowed Midoriya to gain another quirk. I can't cancel it anymore, like I can't cancel a Nomu's.”

Toshinori winces at the comparison, but Aizawa won't sugarcoat the reality of it when it's not necessary. His erasure quirk has only failed him twice, and the comparison has to be made because of that. “I don't believe it's like that at all, but... I've never experienced what young Midoriya has. I've never gained another quirk, or met the previous holders of One for All. And young Midoriya was able to do that under the influence of young Shinsou's quirk.”

“And that's not going to happen again,” Aizawa promises, more than incensed when he takes Toshinori's words as an implication that he won't tolerate. “I'm not going to allow my ward to be used like that, any more than I want the Problem Child running around with eight unstoppable quirks.”

Toshinori looks horrified, but likely not for the right reasons. It’s not an accusation against Toshinori, but it’s something that he needs to understand regardless. This is the reality that Aizawa will accept, and he won’t fathom using Shinsou for his quirk the same way Miasma and Chisaki did.

And he doesn’t want to imagine the teenager standing outside of Toshinori’s door running around with eight goddamn quirks while he’s Aizawa’s problem.

*

27 can’t be sick anymore.

He winces and nearly whines when he wakes up to a body of agony. Everything hurts from his eyes and head down to his feet, every joint protests movement and he just wants to collapse into the side of the bed that he rolls into, that feels colder.

He can’t. He can’t be sick anymore, because they think that Eri is making him sick. They think that his quirk is making him sick. They think that people need to watch him while he’s sick, and they think that Mirio should watch him today.

27. Can’t. Be sick.

He pulls himself out of his bed, stumbling while he does, but he stares at the closed door until he can remind himself. He can’t act like this when he opens that door, he has to prove that he’s not sick. He knows exactly how to prove it.

He gets dressed and doesn’t care about what he wears, everything feels too hot and uncomfortable. It takes too long to convince himself to turn the doorknob, it takes too long to comb his hair when his arms feel so weak and heavy, but he does it. He’s awake before Yamada, and it’s too tempting to let the exhaustion take hold over him again, but he refuses to.

He needs to prove that he’s not sick, and he can do that before Yamada wakes up.

He takes his medicine even if it’s a little too early, and he makes sure to take more cough medicine than he’s supposed to because it’s always been his most obvious tell. He takes off the cold compress and throws it away, convinces himself he won’t miss the cold relief, before he stares at the coffee tins and the coffee machine. It looked easier when Yamada or Aizawa used it, but he thinks he did it right. The coffee comes out really dark then really watery, but it smells right, so it should be.

Yamada always makes breakfast and lunch on a school day, but 27 hopes that he wakes up in time to make lunch. It’s too tempting to just make cereal, but he has to prove that he’s not sick anymore, so it can’t be that easy.

He starts making tamago again, because he remembers how to do it. He knows it should be sweeter, so he uses five spoonfuls of sugar when the recipe told him to use one. He hates stirring it so much when his arms are so weak and heavy, and he has to stop a few times, but he uses the pan that he was supposed to use the first time, and he thinks it turns out better. It still doesn’t look perfect, it’s loosely rolled and kind of thin, but he made it.

He’s making breakfast, so he’s not sick.

He starts peeling some oranges, but he completely forgets that he should make some rice until he hears Yamada's door open and hears him yawn. 27 knows it doesn't take long for Yamada to see that 27 isn't in his room and walk to the kitchen, but he feels like it's a lot longer with how straight he has to stand to make himself look like he's not sick.

"Good morning, little early bird," Yamada says, and it must be earlier than he thought because he's not even dressed as Present Mic yet. "Oh, feeling like some tamago? You could have woke me up, you know, that's really easy to whip up."

27 shakes his head, even if it makes his head swim. ' Not sick. Feel better. '

27 sees that Yamada doesn't look convinced with that raised eyebrow and falling smile, so he turns around to prove it. Yamada doesn't prefer any specific coffee mug like Aizawa does, but he picks the 'Saturday' one to make Yamada a cup of coffee. One spoonful of sugar, and then Yamada adds creamer before he adds coffee, which seems weird to 27-

He drops it.

27 doesn't know why he doesn't move to fix it immediately, staring at the bottle of creamer spilling out onto the floor. He doesn't know if it's because he can't believe he did something that stupid, that wasteful, or if he just doesn't think he can stand up after he bends down to clean it up, but he forces himself to crouch down and put the bottle upright, even if he loses his balance and has to catch himself.

Maybe he can make Yamada think he just slipped.

"Hey, I'll get this, don't worry about it, Shinsou," Yamada says, crouching down beside him with some paper towels but 27 just shakes his head. He wasn't supposed to drop it, he was supposed to make breakfast for Yamada, and Yamada was supposed to think he was better, and Yamada liked it so much when Mirio cooked for him and he wanted to see that. "Hey, it's really okay! It was just an accident, and I really appreciate the little breakfast setup here! It's really nice, Shou never-you're not in trouble, you know?"

Yamada is too close, and whenever he's too close it feels too easy to fall into him. 27 doesn't know why, but he thinks about it a lot, just letting his head fall into Yamada's back or his shoulder and just resting there. It's weird, and 27 is weird enough, but he doesn't want to do it because Yamada will know that he's sick and exhausted if he does.

Yamada already thinks that he's crying for some weird reason, and even if 27 is crying, it should be easier to hide. He wipes at the corner of his eye, and he tries to take the paper towels but his hands are acting weird again and he can't even move them halfway before his arm falls back.

27 just tries not to fall from where he's crouched, even if it's tempting to fall sideways into Yamada. It's stupid. He could knock Yamada over, and that's worse than spilling his creamer and making a mess, it's basically attacking him.

"Here, let's get you to the table and then I'll take care of this," Yamada says, pulling 27 up to stand with his hands under 27's arm, and his hand pats his shoulder while he walks and nearly drags 27 to the table. "And then we can have breakfast together, just us! I can't wait to see what my little chef whipped up!"

He 'whipped up' two things, it's not even breakfast. Just tamago and coffee, he didn't even finish the oranges. He was going to try to make it look nice, to slice up the tamago and lay it down so that the slices are half-stacked on each other, to put the orange slices in some pattern that he hadn't decided on yet. He wanted to make it look like Yamada made it, he wanted it to look nice even if it's pointless for food to look that way.

But he probably couldn't make it look as nice as Yamada makes it look. The slices of oranges are lined up in two circles, and the tamago slices form a smile. Yamada always gives him a mug that has a cat on it, and this one is waving its paw at him. Yamada always makes everything look nice, but 27 wanted to do it for once, and he fucked up. He couldn't even make breakfast.

He's not really hungry, but he'll eat before Yamada tells him to. He wants to see what Yamada thinks of the tamago, if he made it right this time.

Yamada already seems to think that it was made right, with how wide he's smiling and how happy he looks. "Shou told me the tamago you made last time was delicious! Can't wait to try it out myself, little listener!"

Yamada drinks his coffee, but 27 didn't even realize that he messed that up too. Yamada's eyes go a little too wide, like 27 spit in it or something, and he hopes that Yamada doesn't think that he did. He doesn't know what went wrong, but something did, even if it smelled right it didn't look right when it was dripping out.

"It's great!" Yamada says, smiling too wide, and 27 realized that he really didn't make it right. There are coffee grounds on Yamada's teeth. "And this tamago-" The roll starts to unravel at one of the places where it was rolled too loosely, and Yamada has to quickly put it in his mouth before it falls apart. And he chews it. For too long. Before he swallows. "Wow, that is tasty. It's kind of like a crepe, like a...tama-pe? Or a crep-o?"

27 lets his head fall on the table as he feels like everything that was keeping him upright falls out of him. He fucked up breakfast. He spilled the creamer, he didn't make anything right. He wouldn't be surprised if the oranges are bad just because he touched them.

Yamada should just throw it all away, he should throw him away too. He's so worthless, so useless, it's not even pathetic in a way that earns sympathy, it's beyond pathetic. He can't even lift his head anymore. "Okay, maybe that was pretty lame. I'll leave the clever names to you, little listener."

27 can't name anything. He'd probably mess that up too.

"Let's see, we've got a little time before Eri and Shou get back, and I don't think Mirio and the gang will mind if you catch a little more shut eye while they get here. It's almost time for your medicine-"

' T-O-O-K, ' 27 fingerspells, because he can do that without lifting his head. He doesn't think he should move it anymore, he's starting to feel dizzy even if he's not moving at all.

"Oh, let's try to get some food in you before we do that next time. Not super..." Yamada trails off, before he stands up and walks to the kitchen counter like something's wrong, like 27 messed up the kitchen counter somehow. "Did you use the little cup for the cough medicine? Like, the little one, not one of our cups..."

27 lets his head roll to the side so he can look at Yamada. He knows he should use the little plastic cup, and he always does it when someone is watching. But he hasn't been able to swallow against these coughing fits like he used to, and he didn't want anyone to know he was still sick at school. ' Yes. '

Yamada looks at the nearly empty bottle, and 27 realizes that he shouldn't have left that out. He realizes he probably shouldn't have drank all of that, it's medicine, and medicine is hard to get for a person like him. It's probably hard to get for Yamada, he probably messed up and became more troublesome for him.

'Maybe.' He took two cups before he just drank from the bottle.

Yamada's eyes get too wide, before he puts down the bottle and starts walking over to 27, pulling him up to sit by his shoulders. "Okay, we need to get some food into you pretty quick to soak some of that up, it shouldn't- Shinsou, I really need you to not do that, I probably shouldn't have- we're going to take over the medicine thing from now on, okay kiddo?"

27 messed up so bad, and he feels like Deidoro's quirk is too strong right now. His head is spinning and it looks like Yamada is dancing in a spinning room when he knows he's just walking to get his phone. 27 knows he should move his hand, to eat something like Yamada told him to, but his hand won't move at all now.

"Shinsou, I really need you to-" Yamada stops, but 27 doesn't know what he does, his eyes are blinking weird, one at a time and too heavy, too hard to open them. He hears Yamada walk closer, but it's muffled. "Okay, open up for me? Say 'ah'?"

27 opens his eyes to see Yamada with his mouth open, holding a pair of chopsticks with a slice of tamago between them. He wants to tell him he can't say 'ah,' he can't say anything, and if he could he'd probably ask why Yamada is trying to feed him like this. He's not Eri.

"Shou has done this a few times, so I really need you to eat a bit, just," Yamada's face pinches up, he looks at the chopsticks before he runs his finger and thumb over his mustache. "Shinsou, can you eat for me? I know it's...hard, and this is weird, but please?"

It's weird. As weird as everything is right now, how it spins and how it feels, opening his mouth for Yamada feels weird. But Yamada looks so relieved, he sighs, and when 27 chews the tamago he actually smiles like he's happy.

27 has to chew slowly, he forgets what he's doing when he blinks too long, but he eats a few of the tamago that Yamada feeds him. He loses count and then loses the ability to count, just staring at a spinning room while he tries to remember how to swallow. "Okay, so let's get you to bed to sleep it off, and not do this again. As fun as it is being sick-"

"N' sick," 27 mumbles, his voice cracking when he does and he can feel the cracks in his throat where it hurts so bad. Yamada almost lets him fall forward, but he catches him with a hand on his shoulder to keep him upright.

"No, we're still a little sick, kiddo. I know it's not fun, but," Yamada stops talking for some reason, but 27 can't open his eyes to see what it is. "You know nothing bad is going to happen, right? You're at UA, and we're going to take care of you. We're going to fix you up and make it all better, alright?"

27 still can't open his eyes when Yamada moves him, pulls an arm that feels too big inside his skin to drape over Yamada's shoulders. Yamada has to nearly drag him with a hand on his wrist and around his ribs, 27 loses his feet too much, but he just wants to fall apart. He wants to fall into Yamada like he's fusing with him, so Yamada won't leave.

But when Yamada puts him back in his bed and pulls the blankets over him, he can't make his arm move to stop him from leaving. "Just get some shut-eye, Shinsou. We'll take care of everything else, alright?"

There's a hand on his chest, and he wants to grab it, to keep him there, but there's a darkness behind his eyelids that swallows him first.

*

Yuuyu and Shizuo used to crack jokes about how Mirio was starting to look like a 'new parent' when Eri first came to UA.

He knows it really wasn't that bad. He did find it harder to get up in the morning, and he knew that the under-eye circles could get pretty bad at times when Aizawa had a lot of patrols and Neji and Tamaki didn't offer to watch Eri for a few nights. He might have felt a little frazzled at times, and that wasn't all Eri. It was just hard to adjust from using his quirk every day to not having a quirk in the first place. He felt like he had enough energy to fry a power grid one day, then he felt completely drained the next.

Yamada and Aizawa have started to get that 'new parent' look since Shinsou came to UA, but he never saw Yamada have as bad as he did this morning. Yamada already seemed to have enough energy to fry a power grid, but when he was running through the medicine schedule and giving a half-tour that really wasn't needed, he seemed like he could fry every power grid in Japan.

But it seemed like the Big Three wouldn't have anything to do for a while, since Shinsou decided to take a lot of cough medicine and probably wouldn't be anything but comatose for most of the day. That should be a good thing, to play hooky from school with nothing really to do, but that's definitely not what Mirio wanted.

As much as Nejire didn't want to study for her fundamental classes, and as much as Tamaki probably didn't want to make her, Mirio didn't want to go another day wondering if Shinsou was okay.

He's not going to say that Yamada and Aizawa don't have it covered with Shinsou, because he knows there's no one better to take care of him. But Mirio doesn't see a lot of Shinsou, and the things that he does see don't look pretty.

Seeing Shinsou worked into such a deserved panic before he had to see Chisaki, seeing Shinsou after he locked himself in his room while he was mourning that '50' person. Seeing Shinsou after that last interview that rattled him bad enough for him to be a suicide risk, having all those nightmares and then seeing him shaking so bad with Midoriya under his quirk's control, threatening to kill Midoriya so he could run away from UA.

Mirio knows that Yamada and Aizawa are better suited to take care of Shinsou than he is, but Mirio can't help but want to find a way to be there more. Sometimes, he just wants to stop by just to see how things are, even if he knows it'd probably be a bother for his teachers. Sometimes, he just wants to see Shinsou, but it's different from the way he wants to see Eri. He likes spending time with Eri when he feels a bad day coming on, but he feels like he needs to see Shinsou just to make sure he's okay.

Tamaki just shoots him a look when Mirio takes a lot of 'bathroom trips,' but Nejire just laughs at him. Sure, he has the fever monitoring app so he doesn't really need to check Shinsou's forehead with the back of his hand, but he kind of has to. He can't just sit around waiting for lunch when they're supposed to get Shinsou to eat and take his medicine.

He's kind of avoiding his phone too, because Bubble Girl has been texting him a lot.

It was nice to talk to her yesterday, despite how much he had been dreading it. After the presentation in homeroom, talking about how different quirks were vital to recon and support roles even if they weren't great at offense, she held him back and convinced him to show her to a good coffee shop.

It was nice, because he missed Bubble Girl. It was nice to tell those same inside jokes that no one else really knows. It was good to just see her and know that even if she's stressed out, she's doing okay. He knows he can always stop by the agency, and she made sure to tell him that.

He just doesn't feel ready for it. And it was kind of hard to tell her why.

It was harder to order a black coffee to go with five sugar packets, because he knew that she would know who it was for. He knew that she made that same order for years before he even came into the picture, and it was hard to let her see that.

He's not ready, and she saw that too. It was hard to admit it, but it's the truth. It probably worried her a lot, and it's clear with all the texting, but he's getting better at accepting truths like that and finding ways to deal with it. It's a lot easier to deal with it by finding something that doesn't make him feel so useless, to prove that even if he can't walk into the agency without breaking into tears when Sir Nighteye isn't there, he's still not useless. He's quirkless, but he's a hero. Heroes help, and that helps.

He doesn't really feel like sitting around studying Quirk Science is really helping anyone, so he's a little too excited when he hears a thud from Shinsou's room. He jumps up and nearly runs over there, and he makes it just in time to see Shinsou nearly falling out of the bed. "Whoops, not head-first! Let's try feet first next time!"

Shinsou just blinks at him, looking around the room while he lays him back on the bed. Shinsou is probably too messed up on the cough syrup to know where he is or who Mirio is, but when he looks at Nejire, he seems to think she's someone else. "Eri?"

Shinsou starts coughing, and Mirio starts rubbing his arm to hope it helps. Nejire's eyes widen, but she smiles with her hands clasped behind her back, waiting for Shinsou to realize that she's not Eri. But that doesn't seem to be happening when Shinsou settles down and just stares.

Tamaki tries to hide it, hiding in the hallway out of sight, but a snort comes out and makes Nejire whirl around to glare at him. They've kind of assumed that something like this was going on, just because Shinsou warmed up to Nejire in a kind of similar way. He pats her head and waves at her when she's throwing a fake fit, a lot like he does for Eri. Nejire might act like a five year old sometimes, but it's kind of a sore spot when someone calls her out on it.

And she definitely doesn't like that Shinsou is pretty much calling her a five year old without really meaning it. "Shin-Shin?"

Tamaki peeks in, but Mirio doesn't know what he looks so worried about. Mirio looks down at Shinsou to see if he's realizing where he is yet, but he starts to get worried when he sees Shinsou's face pinch up into tears. "Hey, Shinsou, what's wrong?"

Shinsou shakes his head, and Nejire drops to kneel beside the bed, stroking his purple hair before Mirio can stop and remind her not to. "Shin-Shin, what's wrong?"

"Forgot," Shinsou gasps, his voice sounds worse than it did at first and Mirio isn't sure if it's just because of the tears. "Wanted...y-you to, but..."

Mirio glances at Nejire, who still looks a lot like Eri for some reason. Sure, they both have long, light colored hair and big eyes, but Nejire definitely looks different in a lot of ways. In a lot of big ways, not that Mirio really looks at that. He only knows her cup size because she complains about it a lot, but he's not going to be that gross kind of guy who would look at a friend that way.

But it would probably help Shinsou out if he could spot those differences, before Nejire starts to combust.

Nejire acts the way she does, she likes acting cute and looking cute too. But she doesn't want to be treated like she's a child, no matter what way she acts, and sometimes she gets mad when people don't get that. But Nejire is wicked smart in a lot of ways that people don't expect, and in a sigh she seems to just shrug it off. "Shin-Shin, I'm not gonna forget about you. You were always there for me, you know?"

Shinsou sniffs hard, trying to settle down, but his eyes are fixed on Nejire right now. She just strokes his hair and smiles, in that gentle way that can't be anything but soothing, that seems so different from any fit or pout she's ever thrown when she feels a little needy.

"I really couldn't have grown up to be the person I am without you, Shin-Shin," Nejire says, trying to play into whatever state of mind Shinsou's mixed up in thanks to the cough syrup, and not-so-subtly trying to remind him that she is pretty grown up. Even if she's still 'Eri,' she at least wants to be an older Eri.

Shinsou makes a half-sigh, half-squeak kind of sound when he nods, but before Mirio can ask Tamaki to get him something to drink, his eyes shut and the medicine seems to knock him out again.

And then Tamaki can really start laughing, and Nejire can really whirl around and wail on him for it. But Mirio's not going to leave this room again.

Not when he sees Shinsou's fever starting to climb.

*

27 feels coldcoldcold, it hurts, he swims in the cold and the dark and the hurt but he just wants to come up from it.

He does, he hears voices and he tries to grasp at them, he feels like he can breathe when he hears them. He can't hear the words, he doesn't care about the words, he just wants the voices to keep coming. He wants to breathe.

There's something coldcoldcold under his arms, his neck and his head, it should hurt but it doesn't, he can't even feel it when he feels warm fingertips on his head. "Shinsou."

Is that his name? Can he breathe if he answers to it? Can he feel warm if he isn't 27, if he can pull out that piece of The Miasma from his skin?

He can't move, not in this sea of cold and pain, but he tries. He can't speak, not in his sea of cold and pain, but he tries. 27 can't answer, he knows it gets colder and darker for longer if he does, but Shinsou is supposed to. He wants to be Shinsou.

He tries. It's a whine, it's a crack in his throat that leaks fire through his mouth, it hurts burns hurts but he doesn't know if it's enough. He feels his breath catch again in his chest, he feels like he'll cough, he's not sure if he swallowed the bleach but it burns all the same.

He knew it would hurt, he knew that Bug would hurt him eventually, every time he messed up.

He's supposed to be silent, he's supposed to have a mask. He's supposed to obey or something badbadbad will happen.

There are points of warmth on his skin, on his face, dragging bliss with them. It feels so nice, it doesn't hurt. He's not afraid, he's afraid it will stop and he'll drown. "Shinsou, it'll be alright."

He wants to say 'I know.' He wants to say he believes that, he wants to make it real. He wants to say anything so that this bliss won't stop, this peace won't leave, he doesn't want to drown. He wants those voices not to stop. The words don't have to be words, he knows by the way that they're spoken that they're kind.

He can't open his eyes, but he can move his hand. He feels hothothot, like he's burning himself when he moves, he doesn't know where anything is in this dark, in this pain, but he knows one anchor and tries to grab it.

He has a hand under his hand, it's bigger, he knows it's strong. He knows what Rikiya's knuckles feel like, he knows 98's, but he knows this hand doesn't belong to either of them because even if it's big it feels soft. It brings bliss and he doesn't want it to stop, whines another crack in his throat when it does.

It keeps stroking, comfort and bliss, and he can open his eyes to blurs of color. A person, he can see that at least, he blinks to try to see but he only feels tears hot and flowing.

He feels hot, feels cold, feels tears down his back and on his hair but not under his arms where it feels cold, but he feels his breath catch in his throat and saliva behind his teeth before his stomach lurches. It feels too easy to twist to his side, and the sound that comes out of his mouth feels more solid than air, but it's not solid yet.

"Toilet, toilet!" someone calls, before they grab him under the arms and everything around him is a blur, he blinks with tile under his knees but his eyes squeeze tight before he can see the toilet that he grabs.

It's cold porcelain under his arms, fire through his throat and out of his mouth, warm bliss stroking his hair and that's where he wants to be as it goes on, as he feels like he drowns. His body lurches and heaves, shakes during and after, he wants it to end long before it does and once it does he wants it to end because his head has never hurt this bad. It splits and splinters, white agony, the hand tries to pull him up and a cracked sob escapes because it hurts.

He can't open his eyes because it's too bright, even behind his eyelids, but he knows what those hands want from him. A cup of water pressed to his lips, words tell him what to do but he barely hears them. He spits and wants to collapse, wants something cold enough to freeze him, but big hands hold him, try to make him sit up on his own, but he can't.

"Okay, let's get back to bed," he knows that voice, a name prickles in the back of his mind, but he doesn't need a name to trust it. Arms fold him up between them, under his back and under his knees, he should be able to hold his head up but he can't. He just hides his face in a chest to hide from the light.

He's sweating, sweating and shaking and weak, but when he's placed back on the bed, he whines without meaning to because he doesn't want the blankets over him again, he'll die. He'll get too hot and die.

But the person thinks it's something different, and it's better that way. They sit next to his legs and stroke his face, his hairline where the sweat gathers and runs. It's probably disgusting, but it feels nice and he doesn't want it to stop. "Uh, do you guys think you can-"

"Yup!" a shrill voice says, too loud, and Shinsou screws his eyes as tight as he can to try to block out the sound. "Mama Mirio doesn't have to worry about a thing, alright?"

The person huffs and 27 goes still. Mirio. Mirio was touching him, Mirio had to deal with him. Mirio saw him puking and had to deal with that. "I just don't..."

The girl giggles, and Mirio sighs.

"Don't make the tea too hot, he should probably drink it pretty quick," Mirio mumbles, and it sounds more muffled at the end, like he's covering his mouth to stop talking. The girl laughs loudly, and he hears another snort from further away, and even if he doesn't open his eyes, he feels like he's alone with Mirio.

He feels coldhot in another way, because he likes this. He likes what Mirio is doing, tracing those lines over his forehead that don't make sense, but he knows he doesn't deserve it. He doesn't know why Mirio is still doing it, he doesn't have to. He shouldn't, not after what 27 did. What he said.

27 opens his eyes but tries not to open them too much, he wants to see Mirio but he doesn't want Mirio to see him. But he does, that worried look gets replaced with a smile, and it's almost too bright to look at. "Feeling a little better?"

Mirio asks that a lot. 'Feeling better?' 'Feeling better now?' He might never believe it, but 27 will never do that again. He'll never say things like that. He just wishes that he didn't in the first place.

27 tries to sit up when Neji and Tamaki come back in, but barely rises from the bed before he falls back. He feels like he's shaking too much after that, feels like he's shaking like he should be cold, but he's not, he doesn't even know whether he's hot or cold until Mirio puts an arm under his back and pulls him up.

He feels too hot, feels like Mirio is too hot, and he doesn't want to feel like he's sweating from his eyes when he thinks about that.

"It's not too hot, Mama Mirio. I checked it myself," Neji says when she hands over the mug, and 27 wishes that he could just lift his hands when Mirio takes it.

"Thank you, Auntie Neji," Mirio jokes, but Neji preens, and 27 doesn't know what to feel about it. If Neji is an aunt now, if she's a big sister like she said she wanted to be so many times. He knows Mirio isn't a mother, it feels weird to just think about it like that. Mirio is the farthest thing from his mother and it feels wrong to put those two words so close together. "Just a few slow sips at first, don't want to upset your stomach again."

"I brought some electrolyte drinks too," Tamaki says, but 27 barely hears it. The mug pressed against his lips seems too loud.

He drinks, and it doesn't taste any better when the ginger tea is hot instead of cold. But he drinks it because Mirio told him to, and he drinks it exactly like he told him to. He feels like he drinks more than it looks like he did before Mirio trades Tamaki for an electrolyte drink, but 27 is recovered enough to take it from him.

He's just too tired to open it, or really hold it upright, and Mirio starts to laugh at that when he opens it for him. "This will really do the trick. It's a good thing Tamaki's prepared for everything!"

It really does, after a few drinks 27 can hold it himself, and he could probably move further away from Mirio but he doesn't. He knows he's stealing sympathy, stealing Mirio's warmth, but he can't even begin to feel guilty about it. Especially when he still feels cold.

Mirio is on his phone for a bit, but he puts it down and presses the back of his hand to Shinsou's forehead. "Doing better now, and that's good! Feeling a little more awake?"

Shinsou nods, his eyelids aren't heavy anymore. He doesn't want to move away from Mirio but he feels an itch under his skin to move, he feels like he's wasting away in this bed and he wants to leave it but he probably can't.

"Let's pull up a movie or something, it's a waste of time being sick if you're not watching a ton of TV in bed!" Mirio says, and it's a weird thing to say. 27 knows that being sick is a waste of time in different ways, it wastes other people's time and resources, it's expensive. But 27 isn't expensive, he's not sure what he is. What he's worth, but he doesn't want to ask. He doesn't think he'll like the answer, and sometimes wonders if the answer is more complicated now.

Mirio starts to get up, probably to get the TV because he looks like he could carry that big TV set into here easily, but Shinsou's hand moves when it shouldn't. It doesn't grab Mirio but it almost did, even if he didn't want those intentions, didn't communicate them. Even if he still means them, and Mirio seems to understand.

"On the laptop!" Mirio decides when he sits back down, and Neji hums when she skips over to the desk but she whines when Mirio takes it and settles himself and 27 against the wall.

"Mirio, you're hogging Shin-Shin!" Neji says with a stomp, and she's still too loud, and he's too grateful when Mirio pouts at her.

"Yup, I'm hogging Shinsou! We're going to watch some trash TV, so you guys can work on studying or something," Mirio says, and it's weird that he sounds too much like he's bragging. 27 has been a thing that people have, but no one has ever felt possessive over him like this. It's weird, and it's warm in his chest, almost warm enough to make him cough.

"It's almost time for lunch, so make sure he doesn't fall asleep," Tamaki says, and he drags Neji away with a tentacle from his arm when it looks like she was going to jump on top of Mirio to fight him for his spot.

"Yep, just gonna relax, but not too much," Mirio says, and he relaxes a lot. It's too easy to feel it with their arms pressed together in a place that's too warm.

He doesn't know why Mirio relaxes, why he should feel relaxed around 27. He knows what he did, and what he can do. He's seen Midoriya's eyes glazed over like that, he should be more aware of how dangerous 27 can be. Even if 27 can't be dangerous to him, he would never hurt Mirio or use his quirk on him, he has to know that he could. He can't trust that he wouldn't.

"Let's see, on Herotube... You like cats a lot, don'tcha?" Mirio says with a laugh, all the videos on the screen have pictures of cats like it will only show him what he's watched, instead of all the videos that he knows are on Herotube. "It's cute!"

It's not cute. Cats are cute. 27 doesn't look at cats the same way Eri does, he doesn't think that cats can protect anyone. They're just cute, with their wide eyes and soft toes, softer fur and unique personalities. Cats aren't like dogs, they'll never obey, and 27 envies that too much. They're impossible to fully tame and no one expects any different from them, unless they're wrong.

Chisaki would have never named him 'Cat,' but it would have been an honor if he did. If 27 could have been able to meet his eyes just once in that compound. If he could have stopped their walk to The Chair and took Eri's hand, if he could have taken her away and damned the consequences, forgotten fear. If he could have been a better person.

If 27 could have been brave like that, just once, he could probably find it easier to look at Mirio right now instead of only feeling the warmth of his arm, ignoring that the arm is his.

"Whenever I'm sick, I like to watch a lot of reality TV, like Divorce Court or Dr. Ozimandys. It's a little weird, especially because I know it's all fake, but it's kind of entertaining in a rot-your-brain-out kind of way," Mirio says while he types, and the pictures for those videos have dramatic titles. 'Wife Wants House, 100,000 Yen Monthl...', 'Man Believes Child Isn't His Because Quirk...'

27 stares at the videos, waiting for Mirio to pick one. He doesn't care about which one he picks, they all look interesting. Even if it's fake, these problems look so normal. He's a little curious whether the judge is really going to get that angry at the man who hasn't had sex with his wife in five years.

"You can pick whatever we watch! We can definitely watch some cute cat videos too," Mirio says, scrolling around the page too quick to really see anything, his voice strained like there's something he's trying to hide. "Even if it really sucks to be sick sometimes, it's nice to kind of get to be King for a Day, you know? You can watch whatever you want to watch or eat whatever you want to eat. There's a ton of popsicles in the fridge, too!"

He doesn't really care about what he watches, or what he eats, and he's never had a popsicle before but it sounds hard to eat with how weak he feels. Being 'King for a Day' sounds exhausting, and despite how much it sounds like Mirio wants him to pick something to do, there's only one thing 27 wants.

He wants to feel like Mirio has forgiven him. Even if things feel so normal, they don't. Even if he doesn't see Mirio's face change to the pain he saw that night, it's still there. He still made Mirio hurt like that, made him realize how stupid 27 is.

He wants to close his eyes and imagine it didn't happen. He wants to close his eyes and fall asleep so he doesn't think about it. But Mirio doesn't want him to, so he can't, even if his headache is a dull throb it's still enough of an excuse to blink slower and focus on the warmth on his arm.

"You know, I really hope that Yamada is right about your quirk," Mirio says, his voice not strained or enthusiastic, just quiet. Just quiet, and it's too loud because of that, 27 feels it in his bones like it stings. "It really sucks to get sick like this, but maybe if it's just because your quirk is getting sorted out, it'll be a good thing. Maybe, it'll kind of feel like things at UA are less scary, you know?"

It wouldn't be a good thing, it would make things more scary. Aizawa was already worried, he called Quirk Thief to evaluate how dangerous his quirk could be, if they needed to use a mask. If he could control Yamada, they would probably use one. It might be padded, but it might be worse. It might be more than a mask, his door might be locked, they might turn out the lights and forget to feed him. They might not forget.

"It's not like I'm scared or anything, without my quirk," Mirio says with a laugh, and it's ridiculous that he thought 27 would think that. "It's just that... It does feel a little... wobbly. Like I've got to run with a leg tied behind my back. And it's easy for me, because I know that Tamaki and Neji are always there, pretty much all the time, but..."

Maybe Mirio should forget about only using Eri's quirk if it's born from happiness. It's not happiness when 27 uses it, but it would work. Mirio wouldn't feel like this, he wouldn't feel wobbly or incomplete. He'd definitely forgive 27 then.

"You can tell me if you're scared, you know," Mirio says, his voice high and strained, unnatural. He hates it, hates the way he feels those words under his skin. "It's probably really hard to do that, when it's not easy, but I don't want it to feel hard for any other reason. You can always talk to me, and I can... kind of be a hero like that...."

The words under his skin make him feel like he needs to run, the warmth is cold now. He doesn't know what Mirio wants to hear, what will make his voice return to normal, what can pull this feeling out of him. 27 thinks about lies first but they fade in front of the truth, what 27 wants to ask about. He wants to know if Mirio really means that.

He tugs on a corner of the laptop and Mirio easily moves it to his lap. He only needs the search bar, he knows what he wants to say is short. He's just not sure how to say it.

'I don'

'I'm not'

'I don't want you to think I'm a bad person.'

27 curls his fingers after he types it, Mirio's silence makes him cold. He should stop talking, stop talking, the mask isn't enough anymore and he just needs to stop.

He was never good. Not for Bug, not for his clients, not for Chisaki, and even if he tries he's not good here. He doesn't even know what that means here, he wishes it were easier. If he could be ignored more, if he could be alone. He wouldn't feel cold because of silence.

"I don't think you're a bad person," Mirio says, but it's quiet. It's not really Mirio, and that makes him cold. "You were really scared, and I know that. I knew you were really mixed up that night, and I don't think you were thinking like yourself. I don't think it was you."

'It was.' His hands feel hot and cold after, red singes before it burns to ash. That was his quirk, Mirio has never seen it, but 27 can do that. If they want him to get his quirk back so bad, they have to understand that's what it means. He just needs an answer and he can do anything, sometimes they don't even remember what happened.

"Nope," Mirio says, and it's startling how normal that sounds, how easy it is to believe because of that. "I don't believe it for a second, because if it was you? I'm pretty sure you'd make Midoriya make you some coffee or something. Or steal Todoroki's secret cat. And I definitely don't think you'd leave Eri like that. Not unless you were really scared that something bad was going to happen."

27 curls his hands because it's so cold, cold in his bones because it's true. Mirio shouldn't know him like this but he does, and 27 doesn't doubt that. Probably not the part about making him coffee or stealing that demon cat, but he knows he wouldn't leave Eri. That he didn't want to, but he had to. He had to live.

"And I think that a lot of bad stuff has happened," Mirio says, turning his head and 27 knows he's looking at 50. He's never met her, 27 hasn't told her about that picture and what it means, but he thinks they'd be so similar that if they met they'd practically melt into one person. "But nothing bad is going to happen at UA. I wouldn't let it. I won't let anything bad happen to you from now on, Shinsou.... And it doesn't matter if you're a good or bad person."

It does. It's always mattered. Even if he wasn't a person, it mattered whether he was good or bad. Good at his job, bad at it, it mattered. It could cost him his life if he slipped up.

"But you're really an amazing person," Mirio says, his arm lifting away with its warmth only to come back warmer than before, around 27's shoulders and holding him close into a chest, almost too tight. "And I'm really glad that I get to be your friend."

Mirio...isn't really his friend.

Friends are strange here, friends are warm. Friends don't need things to be warm and that's odd, but Mirio isn't just warm. He's blisteringly hot, and 27 doesn't need to be this close to feel warm because of him. Being this close almost burns him, because Mirio isn't a friend.

Mirio is a hero, and he's more, he's things that 27 doesn't have words for and can't even describe. He's things that 27 doesn't want to describe because that would make them less powerful.

Mirio is powerful, in ways that 27 doesn't want him to lose. In ways that his quirk has nothing to do with. He was the light that came to the 8 Precepts for Eri, he was the man standing in that hallway staring down Chisaki, he was the red cape that 27 needed to remember.

Mirio is still warm, warm in a way that never grows cold, warm in a way that thaws his bones until his fingers feel too loose on the keyboard. 'This is weird, but can you call me Shinsou.'

"Shinsou," Mirio says, that light and normal way he talks, that half-laugh that he has when he's happy. "You don't want me to call you Shin-Shin?"

27 shakes his head. 'Not Shinny either. It's fine but Shinsou with you.'

Mirio pouts and sighs. "I get it, only girls can call you cute nicknames. Jeez, I see how it is, Shinsou."

Shinsou taps on a 'Cats Pouncing Into Boxes' compilation, shrugging, but he doesn't want to shrug off Mirio's arm, and he's glad Mirio knows that.

It's better if Mirio doesn't know what he means about the name either, because he doesn't want it to stop.

*

"Aw, it's so cu-" Mirio has to shush Nejire again because she was getting too loud, but she doesn't even pout because she's too busy taking pictures.

And it's kind of stupidly cute.

Shinsou actually ate a decent amount at lunch, and just a few more cat videos later, he was passed out on Mirio's shoulder. Nejire already heard about the story behind the Gengar, and wanted to have her own picture of Shinsou holding it, and figured it would be even better if he was cuddling with it while he was asleep.

That's when Nejire found out that Shinsou kind of has the cutest habit in the entire world. When he's asleep, he'll kind of grab onto anything.

Shinsou's arms are pretty stuffed with the Gengar and three cat plushies, but Nejire raided Eri's room and now Shinsou is surrounded. Unicorns, teddy bears, a whole lot of cats and Mirio only remembers buying half of those. Shinsou definitely can't move without disturbing them, but with how sick he is, he's definitely not moving when he sleeps.

Yamada got pretty worried when Mirio told him that they had to use ice packs under Shinsou's arms because his fever got that severe, but Mirio and Tamaki have been trading off who has their eyes glued to the phone. There hasn't been a bad spike like that since, but after seeing how fast it came on, they can't risk being unaware for even a second.

Nejire sighs and stomps her feet, and Mirio has to shush her again, beginning to not feel bad for the reason why she's so frustrated right now. "Why'd Yuu-Yuu have to get sick? It's so hard to pick who's cuter to take care of!"

"Yuuyu said she can take care of herself, and besides, we might need you if Shinsou starts missing Eri," Tamaki says, staring at the phone but he still manages to dodge most of Nejire's fake punches.

"Tama ki, I'm super sexy! I'm not like Eri at all! I'm super grown up and you know it, you big-big meanie!" Nejire gives Tamaki a punch that isn't quite so fake, before she huffs and settles with another stomp. "I'm gonna play nurse with Yuu-yuu and we're going to have a lot of fun, and you're not invited to help out!"

Nejire storms off, and Tamaki bravely waits until she's gone before he rolls her eyes. "Neji might want to play nurse, but I'm pretty sure Yuuyu wants to play 'doctor.' And the sooner they can sort that out, the better."

Mirio tries not to laugh, but he's kind of right. Yuuyu is pretty obvious, and Nejire is pretty oblivious, but she still manages to be really obvious. They'd really be a cute couple once someone makes the first move, and someone should probably make it soon. Especially with graduation coming up for them.

It'd really be a shame if no one said anything, and the world went on without it. Without anything being said. Without anyone even trying to risk it. But it would probably be really awkward, because they have a great thing, but what if they don't after that? And it's probably scary to even think about it when they have no idea what's going to happen after graduation. There's a chance things will fall apart anyway, since hero work is so demanding, and Osaka is so far away.

"Yeah, maybe they'll get it worked out," Mirio says, laughing a little too much when he does. He glances over at Shinsou and almost hopes that he wakes up, but all he sees is Shinsou pulling the plushies a little tighter and making another sigh-kind of squeak. It's kind of super cute.

Tamaki looks at Shinsou too before he looks at the phone, but he starts pulling at the point of his ear. That's always been a sign that he's worried about something. A really kind of cute sign, but he hates when Mirio calls it that.

"You've been kinda quiet today," Mirio says, sprawling out on the floor so he winds up a little closer. Tamaki huffs and looks away, because he hasn't really been quiet. Just...away. And that comes off as a little quiet.

He'd just kind of been hoping that he was wrong about the reason that Tamaki seems like he's away, but another glance at Shinsou makes him worry that he's not. "I felt like you wanted to talk to him, about stuff that we don't really know about. And stuff that Aizawa-sensei and Yamada-sensei aren't really telling you."

Mirio lifts himself up on his elbows, because he kind of didn't want to get into that again. Tamaki might be able to manifest anything he eats, plant or animal or otherwise in an emergency, but Mirio sometimes wonders if he was raised on a bulldog's milk. He might wilt in front of attention, but there's a side of Tamaki that just digs its heels in if there's something worth defending.

But Mirio doesn't want Tamaki to dig his heels in and start growling at Yamada and Aizawa.

"You know they really can't, and you know I don't really want to know," Mirio says, because he's said it before. He's not involved with the investigation and he knows he shouldn't be, and honestly? He doesn't want to be. He knows it's bad, and he doesn't want to see it. He thinks it might be better for Shinsou that he doesn't know, so he can see Shinsou as he is and not how he was. Not what he's been through.

But there are some things he probably should have known. Like how Shinsou had been sold.

He doesn't even know how to feel about it, if he can ever really feel how horrible it is. How it's somehow worse because Shinsou knew he had been sold, and how it's definitely worse that he didn't seem to think it was wrong. That it was normal. Something so horrifying that Mirio can't really grasp it is normal to Shinsou.

Eri had a different kind of normal, but it was easier to see. She could be happy about how things weren't 'normal' to her, like getting treats or getting plushies, or getting to play games with him. But he's known that Shinsou is scared, even at UA, and he knows that he won't talk about what scares him, and that's what scares Mirio.

If Shinsou thinks that being sold is normal, he doesn't have a clue what could scare him.

"Mic-sensei pretty much said you're his hero," Tamaki says, and even if he knows Mirio doesn't want to talk about this, he knows that he can still talk about it if he plays with his hair. Tamaki always messes up the gel, but he always fixes it before he leaves, and Mirio kind of likes feeling his long fingers on his scalp too much to complain if he didn't. "I think he sees the sun."

Mirio tilts his head away without meaning to, because he knows Tamaki isn't talking about The sun. "I think he's just warming up to me a little! He probably knows I'm a big dork, and maybe Eri's talked me up a little bit."

Mirio doesn't want to be 'The Sun' for anyone, and definitely not Shinsou. He's not some crazy impressive guy who deserves it. He just wants to be someone to talk to, someone that Shinsou feels like he can talk to. He thinks that 'Mirio' would be way better for Shinsou than 'The Sun.'

And Tamaki pretty much points out the reason why, when he sighs and looks at Shinsou again.

"It's harder to be like that in front of someone that you admire," Tamaki says, his hand resting almost in front of his mouth where it's propped under his chin. While Mirio's stomach does an interesting little flip when his ear catches on 'admire,' when he almost takes it as something other than their usual competitiveness and respect, which is just a little bit different from 'admire.' He doesn't ignore what Tamaki's talking about.

The first time Tamaki had an anxiety attack in front of Mirio, he tried to end their friendship. He ignored him for three days until Mirio brought back all of the video games he borrowed and almost broke down into tears begging to know what was wrong. 'Nothing' turned into 'I don't want you to' turned into ' Now you know I can't be a hero. '

They both cried, until Mirio reared back and headbutted his best friend.

He's still not sure why he picked headbutting. Tamaki definitely doesn't know, and definitely didn't at the time. But it just seemed so stupid once he stopped thinking about how awful Tamaki must have felt to think that way, because even when some things get to be too much for Tamaki, he's still definitely a hero. Mirio told him that as long as he wanted to be a hero, he could be one, and that his anxiety was just another part of his hero training. They could learn how to manage it just like learning to use their quirks.

And he was right. Tamaki is going to get his fully fledged hero license soon, even though he said he still wants to work with Fat Gum after graduation as a sidekick. He wants to get more experience, get more confidence.

Sometimes, that sounds like Tamaki is holding himself back, waiting for Mirio to get his quirk back so all three of them can open their own agency like they've planned since last year. He knows if that were the case, Tamaki wouldn't tell him, because he'd know that Mirio would convince him not to. But he knows that Tamaki knows Mirio is going to live in Mustafu, somehow, and Osaka is pretty far away. If Tamaki was holding himself back to be with Mirio, he wouldn't be moving so far away.

"You know, I think you should hang out with Shinsou more often. You kind of get that kind of stuff better," Mirio says, but he gets a lean away from him and a tug to his hair instead of that nervous hunch, which he marks down as an improvement.

"I'm not that inspiring," Tamaki answers, but it's stupid enough to make Mirio want to headbutt him again.

"You are, Tamaki. Not just with the anxiety stuff, you're the most inspiring guy I know. And you know, Shinsou won't make you eat any flowers to show him how they grow," Mirio teases, but it was so cute to see Eri's little science side, her eyes so big and Tamaki's face so red.

Tamaki's face is just a little bit red before he sighs, and tugs at Mirio's hair a little harder before he leans towards and over him, and Mirio would be surprised if his own face wasn't a little more colorful at that. It's kind of stupid, but these kind of things that were normal are starting to feel very not. "You're way better with them. With kids. And it's...really cool."

Mirio is only barely thinking of that pause, wondering what Tamaki was going to say, because he's thinking of things that he probably shouldn't when Tamaki is this close. Things like his lips, or his eyes, or his blush, or how his hair is hanging down and giving the impression that he's getting closer and-

"THE BIG THREE WHEN YOU'RE IN NEED!" Yamada shouts, and a door that Mirio hadn't even heard open shuts after that, startling him into sitting up and almost knocking into Tamaki's head as he does. Yamada must have run to the door, grinning until his mouth drops open into a wider grin, despite the plushies that Mirio is starting to believe aren't falling to the ground as much as being shoved. "Looks like Nejire took some liberties."

Mirio looks to see Shinsou give up, collapsing face-first into the Gengar, his arm hanging off the bed next to a row of disturbed plushies. "She did, and she has pictures."

Yamada returns his thumbs up, but Mirio isn't totally surprised by the pitiful attempt to protest, what could have been a moody whine comes out as a painful and hoarse growl. But Yamada makes his way over to kneel next to Shinsou anyway, patting his shoulder before he starts mouthing, 'Has he been doing that?'

Mirio nods, cupping a hand beside his mouth before he realizes it's not necessary, mouthing back,

‘Talked a little. But he was still messed up on the syrup.’

Yamada nods, not as happy and hopeful as Mirio can’t help to be, but it is kind of hard to smile when you’re looking at a poor sick kid like Shinsou. “Well, tell Nejire that even if she doesn’t need the extra credit this late in the game, she kind of owes me after what she did to the studio. Because I need those pictures, and I won’t let her graduate until she sends them to me.”

“Will do!” Mirio agrees, and he’s sure that Nejire won’t have any problems with that. Even if she’ll try to pretend that she does. “Did 1-C give you too much trouble again?”

Yamada sighs, and Mirio already figured that was the case. “Three troubles, so they struck out and I dismissed them. I’ve really got to talk to Principal Nezu because this has to be my last year doing that class. But! That means that you guys are free to bounce, spend your babysitting money however you-”

“I don’t-” Mirio tries to say, because even if he hasn’t figured out the whole after-graduation-living-situation, he’s sure that he could buy a small house after Yamada forced him to take that check from him.

“You do, and there’s some hazard pay for the stomach upset in here too,” Yamada says, taking Mirio’s hand to force him to take the cash, before he hands two more wads to Tamaki. “I know it’s not fun, but I really do appreciate you guys doing this. And I appreciate Ectoplasm for not wringing my neck too. I really don’t know how me and Shou could have gotten this far without you guys.”

There’s another kind of flip, but it feels heavier when Yamada says that. When Mirio feels like he has to remind Tamaki that they’re supposed to be heading for the door now that Yamada is back to take over. “It’s really no problem, and really, anytime you need me is fine! I’m totally cool with skipping school, you know!”

“And we all know how much Mirio means to Eri and Shinsou,” Tamaki says, a hand on Mirio’s shoulder but his eyes are a little too focused on Yamada. Mirio can practically hear the bulldog growling, and he really didn’t want to.

“Of course! This is a Lemillion fan household, through and through,” Yamada says, and it’s hard to keep the smile on his face when Mirio hears that. It’s not a bad day, but it still stings a little inside, and tends to sting more as winter break and graduation loom closer. “You know you guys can stop by whenever you want, I can trust the Big Three to be a bit more responsible than those first year herolets.”

Mirio and Tamaki both tell Shinsou bye, but Mirio doesn’t think he’ll get more than that wave that was more like a hand rising and falling back down. Shinsou is wiped out, and hopefully this bug will get kicked soon.

Yamada walks them to the door, even if Mirio is pretty sure he doesn’t want to since Shinsou is feeling so bad, but he stops Mirio before he starts saying his goodbyes. “You know, things really have been crazy lately, and Midterms were crazy too, but you guys really can come whenever you want. You’ve got my number and all, and I’d never say no, you know?”

Mirio isn’t sure if he should take that ‘never say no’ at face value, but he’s tempted to. If something rough was going on with Shinsou, maybe it would help if he could try to be there during instead of just after. “Of course! Things have been crazy, but that just means me and Eri have a lot of catching up to do! Maybe that could free you guys up for a date night or something!”

Yamada laughs, a bit too long in a way that’s a little depressing, reminding Mirio that five jobs probably doesn't leave a lot of room for date nights.

“Can you imagine trying to spruce Shou up into something that's ‘date night’ material? Kiddo, I lost that fight a long time ago. I'm just happy to have some family nights.” Yamada almost wilts like Tamaki does when he rubs the back of his neck, before he shrugs. “And, you know. You guys are invited to those too. Like my mother used to say, ‘If you come to this house, you're family.’”

Mirio feels like wilting at that, just to try to be smaller so he can understand the big thing that Yamada was talking about. Something that seemed too big to take on at first, but every text from Yamada that he answers as soon as he gets it seems to make it shrink a little more. Even if it makes all the texts from his father that he still barely answers seem bigger.

Yamada's dorm has always felt more ‘homey’ to Mirio than his own, and maybe a little more than Tamaki's which was basically his second home, and maybe there was a reason for that. Maybe it was something that he shouldn't run away from.

“We should do that,” Mirio says, and even if he says ‘we,’ he almost forgets that Tamaki is there until he feels a familiar hand on the back of his arm. “But I have to warn you, Tamaki is kind of a beast at Scrabble with all the Latin names for plants and stuff that he knows.”

Yamada just grins that kind of menacing smile that Mirio doesn't blame Tamaki for shrinking away from. “Oh. The Emperor of Scrabble is up for a challenge, little herolet.”

And there are so many reasons Mirio would love to see that go down, but it would probably take a lot of convincing for Tamaki to work up the courage to meet that challenge. Probably half as much courage as Mirio would need to show up if Nejire wasn't there.

If that ‘Family Night’ felt more like bringing his crush over to meet his dad.

Boiling The Frog

Chapter Summary

With Shouta and Eri away on dorm duty at 1-A's dorm, Yamada looks forward to a nice night in to take care of Shinsou, who seems pretty miserable with how sick he is at this point.

One of the one of the worst parts about a fever is when it breaks.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: Forced retraumatization

Previously on Wards of UA: In the last chapter, the Big Three were watching Shinsou during the school day, and Amajiki and Mirio were in Shinsou's room as his fever had spiked severely in a matter of minutes on their watch. Shinsou sometimes refuses to eat, sometimes out of paranoia that what he's supposed to eat is poisoned, and it took several hours for Yamada and Aizawa to convince Shinsou to eat a bowl of soup on the first day that they learned Shinsou was sick. Shinsou has asked Mirio to call him 'Shinsou' instead of a nickname like Nejire or Eri do, because he wants to think of himself as 'Shinsou' instead of '27.' Shinsou has been wishing Yamada would stay home to take care of him, and Yamada has wanted to do that as well, but as Ectoplasm is the member of staff that is able to create a clone and cover his classes and has so far refused to do that, he's been unable to stay home. Chronostasis would torture Shinsou by forcing him into a bath treated with bleach and dunk him under by his hair. Chronostasis would also call Shinsou a 'Good Dog' while he used the bleach torture. Shinsou thinks of meeting 50 in a 'field of sunshine' if they could ever meet again now that she's dead, and gave Yamada the sign name 'Sunshine da,' which translates to 'Sunshine field' when taking the meaning of the name 'Yamada' which means 'rice field.' Another one of Shinsou's triggers related to the bleach torture is having his hair touched. Toshinori is also a member of staff who could take over Yamada's classes, but Toshinori had been faking a cold so that he could research previous holders of OFA, after Aizawa forbid Midoriya from training with his quirk until he saw a quirk specialist after Black Whip manifested at the Joint Training Exam. As Aizawa now knows about OFA, he's allowing Midoriya to train without seeing a quirk specialist. Yamada has promised Shinsou that he will stay at UA after the investigation, and is seriously considering adopting Shinsou, but Aizawa is not convinced of that course of action at all. Kayama (AKA Midnight) is an experienced wardship hero who has given advice to Yamada and Aizawa before concerning Shinsou.

Yamada is starting to think there was a reason that Amajiki and Mirio were camped out in Shinsou's room.

“Whatcha need, Shinsou?” Yamada asks while he rounds the counter to stop the teenager dragging himself off the couch for the hundredth time. It took about 20 kitchen visits for Yamada to give up on the ‘bed’ part of ‘bedrest,’ but he’s starting to see the appeal of changing it from ‘couch rest’ to ‘sleeping bag rest’ just so he can zip him up and tear off the zipper tab.

Shinsou lifts his head but doesn’t quite meet his eyes, before he settles himself back on the couch in a huff. Shinsou definitely wants something, or maybe the fever is just making him feel a little restless, but Yamada would appreciate it if that energy could go towards finishing that smoothie.

Chiyo wasn’t happy to adjust the medicine schedule for Shinsou drinking several doses of cough medicine at once, but it was about time for a dose of the fever reducer, and Shinsou needed to have a full stomach to do that. Since the vomiting has gotten a little more frequent, Yamada is hoping having a more liquid diet might help the next upset go a little easier on Shinsou.

Yamada puts aside the papers he’s supposed to be grading when he glances at his phone to see that Shinsou’s fever is starting to slip into the red a little. He doesn’t need an ice pack under the arm yet, but that wicked fever spikes fast, and he doesn’t want to be caught unaware, so he walks over to put the back of his hand on a sweaty, hot forehead until it seems to inspire another wracking cough.

Yamada gets the smoothie and Shinsou shakes his head, nearly making the hero roll his eyes. “Shinsou, I really need you to drink just this much. Then we can take that fever reducer.” Shinsou turns on his side to look at the smoothie, but he doesn’t move to take it from Yamada, who is past the point of looking down on bribery. “C’mon kiddo, what do you want for it? A pair of my glasses? Make me wear that Existing Amplifier shirt again?”

Shinsou just sighs, and for all that coughing and how hoarse he sounds, it’s odd that his chest has sounded completely clear this entire time. No snotty noses either. ‘Head hurt.’

Yamada runs his hand over Shinsou’s forehead again, and the cold compress still feels cold to him. “The fever reducer is going to help with that, but we need about five good sips of this smoothie to get to that.”

He tries to hand the smoothie over again, and gets a curled lip in response. He knows Shinsou likes this orange and banana blend, he said he liked it when he first started drinking it. Either this is some moodiness on the part of a sick and miserable teenager, or that next stomach upset might be telling him to stop filling up before it just spews out. Or it’s looking a little poisoned now, after half an hour has gone by since he last sipped on it.

“Want me to drink some?” A shake says ‘No.’ “Feeling some tummy troubles?” A glare and a head shake says ‘No, stop talking.’ “Okay, so it’s starting to look like we’re back to the soup thing. What can I do to make those five good sips go down a little easier?”

Shinsou looks up at the ceiling before he frowns, and Yamada knows there has to be something. As much as he knows that there needs to be something, something that he can get pretty quick to keep that fever from climbing higher, he knows that Shinsou wants something that he keeps trying to get up to get. ‘Say S-H-I-N-S-O-U 5 times. For 1.’

Yamada absolutely, does not care that it doesn’t make sense. That little sip is the easiest thing in the world to get right now. “Shinsou, Shinsou, Shinsou, Shinsou, Shinsou.” Yamada handed over the smoothie, expecting a little smirk or a bit of smugness, but he just gets one good sip out of it before Shinsou hands it back. “And for sip number two?”

Shinsou gives the smoothie a withering look. As much as his little demand was easy to meet, it still seemed like drinking this smoothie was a monumental task. ‘3 times.’

But maybe it was getting a little easier. “Shinsou, Shinsou, Shinsou,” Yamada says, handing the smoothie back for another sip. He shoots a glance at his phone to see that number still red, but it hasn’t gotten any higher. As simple as this was, it was getting a little tedious. “What about for two sips in a row? What do you want for that?”

Shinsou shoots him a miserable look, collapsing back on the arm of the couch. Yamada almost takes it back when it seems to be taking Shinsou longer to respond, but a glance at the kitchen and Shinsou’s arms moving to cross over his chest seems to promise that he’ll actually get to know what Shinsou has been wanting to get for hours. ‘Chopstick.’

It almost sounds ridiculous to Yamada, until he realizes it. Shinsou likes to take things from events that mean something to him, for control or to keep a memory of it. Yamada has never caught him doing it, didn’t have a clue that he did until Bakugo found the stash under his bed. But because he’s been trying to keep Shinsou on the couch so he can rest, he hasn’t been able to take that chopstick. A souvenir that he wants, maybe from making breakfast this morning. Maybe from when Yamada pretty much had to spoon feed him before he passed out after taking so much cough medicine.

It was honestly a little weird to feed a kid as old as Shinsou, but not as weird as he thought it would be. It also felt nice in a weird way, thinking that Shinsou might not have been cared for like this as much as he should have, and that Yamada could fill that void for him.

But when he hands the chopstick over and sees Shinsou take two sips of smoothie as promised, he just hopes that it isn’t ‘control’ over that moment. That maybe, Shinsou could feel a little bit of the same way too. “One more, just need one more sip. Anything you want, little listener!”

Shinsou doesn’t hand back the smoothie, but he looks at it for a while, glancing up at Yamada from time to time. As easy as his little requests were to fulfill, he wouldn’t mind if Shinsou wanted to give up on this game either. But when Shinsou honestly asked for so little, he had to admit that this game was fun to play for Yamada too, in a way. ‘Stay.’

Shinsou doesn’t look at him when he sign-whispers ‘Tomorrow,’ and afterwards he drinks the smoothie anyway. And as much as Yamada has dedicated himself to nearly torturing Ectoplasm today to try to fulfill that little request already, he only has another reason to redouble his efforts. “Well, a promise is a promise. I’m going to get to work on making that happen, little listener, so you can spend all day tomorrow getting pestered by your favorite Existing Amplifier!”

Shinsou takes his medicine with no complaint, but winces once he settles back down on the couch, despite Yamada trying to turn down the lights and offering the chilled eyemask that Shinsou refuses. Yamada only makes it halfway back to the kitchen table where he intends to send some rather unprofessional emails and texts on his mission to stay home tomorrow, but sees a very exhausted teenager start to drag himself off the couch to follow.

“Okay, let’s start on that pestering right now so you can be sure to get sick of it,” Yamada says, even if he can’t pull the grin off his face when he thinks of something ridiculous. Maybe this whiny, moody teenager was pulling some toddler antics to get attention, as much as he was trying to get that chopstick for his collection. Running away from the couch ‘time out’ just to get scolded, which was exactly what he wanted in the first place.

Shinsou shakes his head again at the offer of pulling up some videos on his laptop or turning on the TV, and with the headache, that’s pretty understandable. But as much as Yamada didn’t want to make any calls so Shinsou wouldn’t overhear some things that might come across as threats - and they were - he didn’t want him to peek over and see those things in texts.

Yamada sits down next to the couch, phone in one hand but the other is propped up on the armrest next to the sullen, miserable kid's head. It might be a little reckless, because he knows that Shinsou is making progress but not totally there on the 'touching' thing, but he thinks it might be worth a shot anyway. "There's this tapping thing that my mom used to do when I felt this cruddy, but stop me if it's not helping. Just close your eyes, and we'll see if this helps."

Shinsou does close his eyes, even if he opens them as soon as Yamada's fingertips start dancing on his forehead. It's hard to tell what the right pressure is, whether it's too soft or too hard, and it always feels better with his mom because she has longer fingernails. But when Yamada moves over to his temples, Shinsou sighs and the tension seems to flow out of him, melting into the couch.

Yamada can't help the pull in his chest, thinking that Shinsou might actually like this.

Shinsou has reasons to not like being touched. There are scars that were wounds all over him, and there are far more wounds that didn't scar that Yamada is sure are still there. It's easy to forget, even when it's written right on Shinsou's face with those symmetrical scars from a mask, but Shinsou has known far more pain from other people than he's ever known love or care. And being touched makes him vulnerable, it makes flinching an inherent response.

But Shinsou is trying, and it looks like he's trusting more and more. Yamada knows that shoulders are safe as long as he's gentle, and it seems like Shinsou might tolerate a hair treatment as long as it's his idea. He knows that it takes time to fight something instinctive, something that Shinsou has known for years or his entire life, and he's terrified to set back even this much. To give Shinsou a reason to stop reaching out like this.

He wants Shinsou to trust him, even if he knows it's hard. Even if he knows he really doesn't know how hard it is, he can't imagine it because he's not Shinsou and because he doesn't know half of what he's been through. But the purple haired teenager on his couch with a flushed face and frown from a headache is trusting him this far, even if Yamada still can't bring himself to ask how far that trust goes.

'Sunshine da' can mean a lot of things, and the things that Yamada wants them to mean also mean a lot of trust. A lot of love, even if Yamada still thinks that he's already ready to give it.

Shinsou's eyes screw up tighter, a flare up from that headache hitting him hard, and it seems to just be building as his face twists in pain, a hoarse whimper making it worse. Yamada puts a hand to cover his eyes without thinking about it, just knowing how bad it can get for Shouta, but Shinsou's hands coming up to press hard at his temples seems to indicate that it's getting worse. His skin growing paler as he starts holding his breath pulls at Yamada's chest in a different way, in a harder one. "Shinsou, it's okay."

Yamada whispers that, even if he knows it doesn't do any good, he just feels like saying that might do something, but it doesn't. He doesn't need to hear the thermometer app chiming at him to remind him how serious this is.

"Okay, I'm getting the stronger reducer, stay here," Yamada says, pulling himself away in a panic that almost makes him forget what to do. He grabs the ice packs too because it spikes fast, that chime is the warning that it's bad but there's another that he doesn't want to hear that means it's worse.

He pours the liquid fever reducer with shaking hands that he has to convince not to shake when he slides an arm under Shinsou's shoulders to lift him up. He mutters as softly as he can that Shinsou needs to drink it, watching Shinsou's hands cover his eyes with curled fingers, his legs twisting and thrashing, but he drinks it between pained whines. A migraine this bad worries him, he knows that might be a hospital trip in itself if it doesn't calm down, but he puts the ice packs under Shinsou's arms, having to pull his tensed arms away from him at the elbow to do that.

Yamada runs a hand over Shinsou's forehead even if he knows it doesn't help, but the sight of this kid twisting in pain is too much to deal with without a distraction, without the illusion of helping him. He wants to pull the kid into his arms, hold him too tight to thrash around like that'd help at all, and hates this useless tension that pulls tighter the longer it goes on. Shinsou doesn't act like this, the sob when he turns to press his face into the cushion and curl into himself before he thrashes away from it breaks Yamada's heart to hear it.

The chime that he hears between Shinsou's loud, broken gasps nearly makes his heart stop completely.

"Shinsou, it's okay," Yamada mutters, even if this is really, really not. He slides his arms under Shinsou's shoulders and knees to lift him off the couch, knowing he's in no state to walk himself to where they're going. Yamada hates that with every gasp and whine that goes quiet, he hopes that Shinsou might pass out. It's surprising that he hasn't, yet, but Yamada doesn't look down to see if Shinsou looks like he has any idea where he is right now.

He wants that flashing number on Shinsou's monitoring bracelet to go down more than anything, but he'll settle for Shinsou being so out of it that he doesn't remember this.

With Shinsou's fever so severe, he should have been taken to a hospital, but Chiyo wrote a treatment plan that included some of the steps that would have been taken by medical professionals. The ice packs under Shinsou's arms can lower his fever through his femoral arteries, it should cool down his temperature quicker than anything, but it's not working this time. If that number doesn't budge in five minutes, if they can't disperse the heat building up, Shinsou will be at a greater risk of brain damage.

Yamada can't afford to just wait for those five minutes, so he sets Shinsou on the bathroom floor, leaning against the wall, before he starts pulling at the hem of Shinsou's hoodie. Maybe direct contact can do the trick, maybe he won't have to take that last step.

Shinsou's hands fall from his head to clench on the bottom of his hoodie, pulling it down as hard as he can with his shaking arms. He shakes his head, eyes still unfocused and glassy, and that's what Yamada didn't want to see. He didn't want Shinsou to be delirious but still think he knew where he was, where he absolutely wasn't anymore.

But those hiccuping whimpers, the pure terror forcing Shinsou to move and fight despite the pain, gives Yamada a deeper level of hatred for that bastard Chronostasis, even if he hated him plenty before this. He's just never seen what he did to Shinsou like this before, forced to realize that the bleach torture meant that Shinsou's clothes were taken off. He wants to run right over to Tartarus to make that bastard pay for it, but he can't let the rage or pain even break over his face or voice in front of Shinsou. "Shinsou, look at me. It's Yamada, you're at UA. I need to take your shirt off and put these ice packs under your arms."

Yamada tugs, and he knows he could overpower Shinsou with the way his elbows buckle, but a garbled whine that sounds like 'No' stops him. It nearly breaks him because he can't do this to Shinsou. He's done enough already, standing by while The Commission put him in the same room as Chisaki, not even being there when they used a quirk to force him to talk.

He can't do something like this to Shinsou, to force him to relive that pain while he's still so vulnerable. Even if not doing it will kill him. "We'll take it off together, okay? You hold on, and I'll lift. Just the shirt, okay? I'm only going to take off the shirt."

Shinsou's fingers twist, and he curls into himself, but he doesn't fight or argue. Yamada lifts the hoodie over Shinsou's head and works his arms through the sleeves, then puts the ice packs under his arms to earn a hiss.

"Hold that, okay? Hold it tight," Yamada says, holding Shinsou's arms to his chest himself, and he stares at the phone that he dropped on the floor. He just needs a blip in the right direction, just a sign, just an excuse if he's honest. Shinsou's head falling forward onto his shoulder precedes a tenth of a degree in the wrong direction, and Yamada feels himself drenched in a numb chill.

God fucking dammit, it's not enough.

"Okay. Shinsou, it's okay," Yamada whispers, working off of a plan from his worst nightmares. He tries not to move Shinsou when he leans to pull the internal stopper in the bathtub into place, and the shudder that he feels run through Shinsou when he starts the water reminds him how he has to make it different. He doesn't even know how to make it different, he only knows pieces of what Chronostasis did, but he knows enough to throw three bath bombs and an entire open bottle of bubble bath mix into the bathtub in hopes that he can prove it's different enough. That at least it won't smell anything like bleach.

Shinsou is shaking. Hiccupping sobs that he can't see from where the kid has his face pressed to Yamada's shoulder, tells him it's not enough. He runs a hand down Shinsou's back to an expected flinch, but he swallows the guilt at that, how useless he feels because there's nothing else he can do.

He can't make that number go down.

He pulls away to pull Shinsou up to look at him with a hand on his forehead. The apparent agony on his face, in his tears, is hard enough to look at without seeing Shinsou biting his lips with too wide eyes, trying to hide it.

"Shinsou, I need you to tell me how to make it different," Yamada says, because he knows this isn't enough. Shinsou is hurting, he hates that he has to hurt him like this, and he almost wishes that Shinsou could pass out so he wouldn't remember it. That he wouldn't really be there for it. "You can smell the bath bombs, it's not-it's not there, you're at UA. Should I talk? Will that help if you can hear my voice?"

There's a long blink where Shinsou droops, his eyes close, but Yamada feels a hand trying to pull at his shirt. He sees Shinsou's eyes open to slide in and out of focus, knows that Shinsou is in no place to answer him, but then he hears it in the hoarse whine that escapes Shinsou's throat. "Talk."

"Okay, I'm going to keep talking. You know my voice, right? All whiny and annoying, everyone loves it, and I can talk for hours. I get paid to do that, you know? At school, on the radio, I just get paid to blabber on and on about everything," Yamada says, even if the words catch in his throat when he looks at the phone one last time, for one last chance, before he turns off the water and takes Shinsou into his arms again. "So, we're going in, I'm going to put you in the water and it's going to be just a little cold, keep those ice packs under your arms for me."

One pack slips out and falls into the water. Shinsou turns his face into his chest and his shaking hand holds tight to the collar of Yamada's shirt, and there are so many reasons he doesn't want to set Shinsou down, but knowing how scared he is and how weak he is despite the fight makes it harder.

"That's okay, I'll get that in just a bit. Just going to set you down. I think there's a lot of cherry blossom scents, I didn't check them, I just threw them in." Shinsou tries to kick away when he feels the water on his back, but Yamada lets his arms get soaked while he slowly lowers Shinsou into the tub. “It’s really floral, I honestly don’t know how many smells we have working here. Maybe you can help me pick them out.”

Shinsou clings to the collar of his shirt, shaking his head. His legs are in the tub and Yamada knows he’s only holding himself up by where he’s clinging to Yamada, despite how weak he is. He knows that if Shinsou had an ounce of strength left in him, he’d fight this, he’d probably fight Yamada to escape, and Yamada wouldn’t blame him. Another gasping sob rends Yamada’s heart to pieces, before he moves his arm up to Shinsou’s shoulders and leans himself over the tub to take the choice from Shinsou’s hands.

When the water reaches Shinsou’s shoulders, the hands holding the collar of his shirt fly to Yamada’s hand resting on the tub. The tear filled eyes are too wide, too clear right now, and a silent plea in those hands holding him down with what little strength Shinsou has rips him apart for a different reason. “Yeah, I’m not moving this hand. You’re in control, I’m not going to-not going to touch you after I let go. And I’m letting go, okay?”

The bottom half of Shinsou’s face bobs under the surface for a moment, but before the water reaches his nose, Shinsou pulls himself up. Yamada doesn’t really know if he can hold himself above the water, knows that he probably shouldn’t have filled the tub that far, but he refuses to look away from those violet eyes still unblinking, refuses to offer anything but a shaky smile. He hopes it looks calm, it looks confident. It looks like a hero’s smile even if it’s not.

“Okay, we’re in,” Yamada says, pulling his hand to rest beside the other, then tucking it under when it seems like Shinsou can’t move his hands to trap them both. “You’re doing good-” Shinsou shakes his head, a whine bubbling in his throat and his face pinches from one pitch of terror to a deeper one. “Okay, I’ve got it. Not going to say that. We’re here, okay? We’re doing- we’re going to take some deep breaths. Smell how it’s- how it smells. There’s cherry blossom, right? A bunch of flowers, like we’re just in a field of flowers.”

Shinsou’s hair floats in the water like a purple halo, disturbed every time that he tries to pull himself up, and tries to fight it. He’s too weak for it, and Yamada knows he should have a hand under his back to keep him above the water, but he doesn’t want that hand to feel like it’s reaching for his hair. “S...su....”

Shinsou’s voice is so hoarse, it’s hardly more than an exhale, but Yamada knows how to read lips even if they barely move. “A field of sunshine, right,” Yamada says, and nearly collapses with the weight of that. Knowing that Shinsou knows where he is, that he knows who Yamada is. He still doesn’t know what that name means to him, or if he’ll still have it after this. “It’s a really nice picture, isn’t it? A field of sunshine, feeling that warm and that bright. Maybe a field of sunflowers. We could go to one of those places that are just fields full of flowers, take a lot of pictures there. We’ll take pictures, and we’ll go places. Even if the world seems small at UA, I promise it’s bigger. I promise I’ll show you.”

The fingers on top of his hands tighten and Shinsou’s jaw clenches as his eyes close tight. Yamada knows he’s in pain, and he’s terrified, and it only makes it more terrifying because he can’t see.

“There’s a lot you haven’t seen, and I’m going to show you all of it. Like Disney World, like-like everything. Cat cafes, I’m pretty sure you’ve never been to a cat cafe. A whole gaggle of cats in one place, and you can pet as many as you want. Shou used to go to them all the time, we just haven’t had a lot of time lately. We’ll have all the time in the world when this is over, and I promise-I promise you’re staying. You’re going to be here for it, and it’s going to be so much better, okay?”

Yamada has to look at the monitoring bracelet when Shinsou's face breaks in another pained gasp. This severe migraine, this unbreaking fever, he knows that the kid needs a hospital but they've tried to kill him in a hospital, right after the raid. After everything that Shinsou has gone through, he can't let him die.

"Look, Shinsou," Yamada says, and Shinsou hiccups another gasp and twists his legs. His eyes are still closed, Yamada knows he's in pain and he probably barely knows where he is through the pain and the fever. "I need you to tilt back your head. Like this, get your forehead wet. It-it'll help."

Yamada doesn't know if it will, if getting Shinsou's head wet will lower this fever. He just can't sit there and watch that number still screaming at him, can't feel this tension like a rubber band pulled too tight. This is so fucking dangerous and there's not a thing the fucking Voice Hero himself can do about it.

"Shinsou," Yamada says, and Shinsou opens his eyes, but barely. Tears still streaming out of the corners of his eyes, but they seem focused. "Just tilt back your head like this, I promise it's different. I promise nothing is going to happen, I promise, okay? I promise."

Shinsou just stares, teeth gritted tight and bared, watching Yamada tilt his head back and he doesn't want to make Shinsou tilt his head back into the water. He doesn't want to move his hands from where Shinsou is holding them down. He remembers the way the clumps of bleach damaged hair were knotted together in the back, that someone had grabbed Shinsou's hair in a fist to pull him under. He knows there's probably a reason that Shinsou hasn't sunk into the water that far, even if he's shaking from the effort of holding himself upright.

"It's different, I promise it's different. I promise- I promise you that I hate this, I don't want..." Yamada sucks in a breath, he knows he can't stop talking, he has to talk for Shinsou. "I want to keep you safe, kiddo. I want to take care of you, I want to make it different for you. I want to show you everything, so please. Just trust me. Trust 'Sunshine da.'"

The fingers on his hands curl tighter, fingernails biting into the back of Yamada's knuckles, but Shinsou does it. Slowly, he watches the kid shakily tilt back his head, eyes wide and locked on Yamada, and once the water reaches his hairline he snaps back up. But Yamada hopes it's enough, he hopes.

"Great, that's perfect, that's go- great. You did it, that helped. It's going to be okay, Shinsou," Yamada says, and he wants nothing more than to cover Shinsou's hands with one of his own, to hold the kid in this way if nothing else, but he can't afford to take away that illusion of control. He looks down to see just a degree changing in the right direction, and he breathes out a heavy sigh of relief. "It's going to be okay."

"Te..." Shinsou's voice is just a hoarse whisper, but Yamada looks to see his eyes roll into the back of his head before his body relaxes too much. Yamada doesn't even think before his hand is in the water, holding Shinsou's head up by the back of his skull, but he adjusts his grip to the back of his neck quickly.

"Shinsou, it's going to be alright," Yamada whispers, more for his own sake at this point because he knows Shinsou can't hear him. He feels the panic rising when the number on his bracelet does, and stupidly looks away because he just can't see this. "Shinsou, everything is over. You got out, you got out of Miasma and you got out of the 8 Precepts. You never should have had to go through all of that, but you did, don't fucking- you're going to beat this. Whatever happened, whatever is going on with your quirk. You're going to- you're going to tell me about it, okay? We're going to get through this."

He sees Shinsou's teeth baring again before a hoarse scream breaks through, the water spilling while his legs kick and thrash. Shinsou's eyes close tighter, his hands moving to hold onto his temples while his arms shake violently with the effort.

"That's okay, you can scream, you can shout, it's okay, just don't- don't fucking go, okay? It's okay, I promise it's okay," Yamada says, his thumb tracing circles on Shinsou's scalp that he wishes could fucking help. The monitor bracelet is screaming in an alarm, Shinsou's screams are completely silent, just hoarse breaths that drag out too long. "We're going to be okay, it's okay, we're going to be okay-"

Yamada doesn't even hear Shouta come in, just feels a hand on his shoulder before he looks up to see his husband's panicked expression. Despite what Recovery Girl said, that using Erasure could result in the same thing that this fever would, it could give Shinsou brain damage, he just wants this pain to stop.

And it does.

Shinsou's arms drop to the sides of the tub, his breathing too quick but the lines on his face are easing as the pain seems to recede. The shaking returns, but it seems more like Shinsou is too worn out to shake, more like twitches that still afterwards.

Shinsou's head turns to the side, and Yamada catches the side of his face to keep him from slipping under the water, his eyes moving under his eyelids. Yamada looks at his phone with the monitoring bracelet out of sight, seeing red drop to orange in a blink.

Shinsou lets out a breathy gasp that sounds like 'Ten,' his eyes still unfocused. Yamada waits, staring at the phone, before he realizes he can't just leave Shinsou in the bathtub in case the fever spikes again. He needs fluids, he needs so much care and they can't fucking give him half of it, but he needs Shinsou to pull through regardless. He needs to give him the best shot at that.

"Eraserhead, help me with the IV," Recovery Girl says, and Yamada didn't hear her come through the door either but he's so fucking grateful. "Present Mic, we need to get him out of there. Dry him off, bring him to his bedroom. We can't risk that fever slipping lower than his body can handle."

Yamada gets soaked as he pulls the teenager out of the bathtub, realizing he hadn't even set out a towel until Shouta hands him one. He pulls the remaining ice pack from under Shinsou's arm and throws it into the tub, leaning the kid against his chest while he works the towel gently over his hair and back. "See? We got through that, let's not have another one. Just going to dry you off, put you back into bed. Just relax, Shinsou, we'll take care of you."

He doesn't bother with Shinsou's soaked pants and doesn't care about the water dripping on the carpet. He still holds Shinsou close to his chest when he sits on the bed, Shouta taking over the change of clothes before Recovery Girl inserts an IV into Shinsou's arm. Once Recovery Girl is done, she looks up at Shinsou with a worried pinch between her eyebrows. "Is he conscious?"

"Te..." Shinsou breathes out with a gasp, and Yamada can see his eyes are open, fixed on Recovery Girl, but he still doesn't seem to have the strength to hold himself up. "Hel... Ten...."

"Looking a little more alive," Yamada says, something that he thought was funny before he said it. He finds himself brushing a hand over Shinsou's hair before he realizes it, pulling away hoping that Shinsou didn't realize it either. "What do we need to do, Chiyo? I forgot- yeah, I can't really remember right now."

Shouta's hand on his shoulder reminds him to breathe, and he needed one. He feels like breaking apart at the seams, but he needs Shouta's steady presence to keep him from that. Chiyo probably sees that, because she just tells him instead of reprimanding him. "Fluids, and rest. He's in no state for an evaluation, but the fever is beginning to break again. If it climbs again, I'm calling an ambulance, and there's not a thing you can do to stop me."

Yamada can't find the strength to fight her on that, even if the fear coils deeper inside his gut. He just hopes it doesn't, knows that it shouldn't be anything like this if Shinsou was developing his quirk again after Rewind messed it up. Developing Emitter quirks could have fevers but not ones this dangerous. "Okay, IV is doing some fluids. Don't think we're in any state to start running off the couch again, right listener?"

Yamada lifts Shinsou up to settle him on the bed, trying to be careful of the IV, but a hand catching the collar of his shirt stops him from pulling away. Clear violet eyes are staring at him, even if that mouth only offers shaking pants.

"And, of course, constant supervision," Chiyo adds, raising an eyebrow with a half smile. "I think I and Shinsou both would rest easier knowing that you were at his side, Yamada."

And Yamada really can't argue with that, especially with a bit of inspiration taking hold. "Yep, doctor's orders, I definitely can't afford to be away from this little listener for even a second! Not until this nasty fever works itself out, right?"

Yamada pulls the blankets around Shinsou and sits down before he takes the hand from his shirt, putting it on Shinsou's chest just to pat it reassuringly, a promise that he's going to keep with or without Chiyo's help.

"And since it's doctor's orders and all, maybe you can help me work things out with Ectoplasm so I can stay home with Shinsou tomorrow? And the day after, just until we get this bug kicked, right?" Yamada asks, and while he's reassured by a pinched frown that would become a very irritated sigh and perhaps even a tirade about how Ectoplasm was being an unreasonable little shit who sucked at karaoke, but Shouta surprises him.

"Toshinori is better, and he can take over your classes. I'll work things out with him," Shouta says, but that hand curling around the back of his neck says something else. "Thank you for keeping an eye on Shinsou's fever readings, Chiyo."

Chiyo definitely catches something that she's not happy about, but she directs a withering look at the IV before she turns to leave. "I'll still be watching the readings, and I will call an ambulance immediately if necessary."

While Shouta walks Chiyo to the door, Yamada fights the urge to run a hand over Shinsou's hair again, settling for pulling off the wet cold compress on his forehead before resting a hand on the teenager's chest. "See? You're going to have to deal with me all day tomorrow, and every day until we get this fever kicked. So you might as well catch up on some rest, because you'll definitely need it to put up with me."

Shinsou sighs, his eyelids getting heavier, but he still seems to fight sleep. "Stay."

Yamada smiles, even if that word was little more than air the way it was spoken. Even if Shinsou has spoken to him before in bouts of delirium or panic, he can't help but hope that this one means even more than that. "Of course I'm going to stay. I'll be right here when you wake up, and you're going to be waking up here for a long time. We're both going to stay, right here."

He knows it doesn't really make sense the way he says it, but he doubts that Shinsou hears half of it before he falls asleep. Shouta comes back into the room with a stern look that might imply he did hear some of that, but Yamada's not going to listen to any of that right now.

"Toshinori's fine now, is he?" Yamada asks, careful not to get too loud, and he finds it harder to do that when he sees Shouta glance to the side with that hand curling behind his head again. "He got over that cold pretty quick."

"He was trying to figure out the complications with the Problem Child's quirk," Shouta says, but there's a lot he's not saying with that, and Yamada knows he can't really hear any of it. Not when he could have been home all day today if Toshinori wasn't trying to play hooky. "I'll take care of that. Is there anything else you need?"

Yamada doesn't care if it embarrasses a blush onto Shouta's face, but he puckers his lips in invitation for something that he definitely needs right now. A kiss from his husband, strong hands framing his face and making him melt in a way that almost makes him forget about the unconscious teenager in the room. Yamada sighs when he presses his forehead against Shouta's. "I miss you."

Shouta's nod, his fingers stroking into his hairline is enough of an answer that he does too. "Eri is becoming part of the Class 1-A pack. I think it helps her to not miss Shinsou, but.... hopefully nothing bad will happen from it."

Yamada can't help but laugh, just imagining what could happen if a gaggle of herolets were left to raise a 5 year old child. Sure, he could trust that Yaoyorozu and Iida would keep things from getting too out of line, but he's sure that Eri has already been floated by Uraraka as many times as she's asked to be. "I hope we kick this soon. Have my family back under one roof."

Shouta pulls away a bit with a sigh, but Yamada shoots him a look not to say anything. He already knows what Shouta wants to say, but he's not going to hear it right now. He doesn't have the strength to get into it. "I'll bring the electrolyte drinks, and your phone. I needed to get more things for Eri to wear."

"Shou," Yamada says, worry twisting in his gut when he tries not to say it. "The things in the closet are already matched, and please don't drag out that-

Shouta's wide-eyed false innocence is warped by his grin, and despite how Yamada feels pretty much handcuffed to Shinsou to make sure he's there for him every second, he wants to bolt to prevent a tragedy.

"Shou, if you dress her up in that cat vomit again I will file for a divorce. I will know about it, and I don't want to hear anything about it happening. I trust you. I trust my husband, the love of my life and the stars in my sky, to not do this to me," Yamada says, and he knows that he's laying it on a little thick, but it's necessary. Shouta's propensity for being a little shit would go unchecked if he didn't stoop to begging.

That grin pulls a little wider when Shouta leaves, and while Yamada feels torn for a second, it's only a second.

Shinsou asked him to stay, and Yamada won't leave his side.

*

27 looks in the mirror and doesn't see himself. Chisaki stares back at him with his own eyes, purple irises and white pupils that only get bigger, only distort more of that face the more he stares. He hears the mask click open, only to click shut before he can stretch his jaw. "Stealing," his voice and Chisaki's voice, blended and echoing in this room. "Stealing my voice."

He and Chisaki reach out their hands towards the mirror, and 27 feels that familiar pressure, that familiar tug when Chisaki grabs his mask. He looks and he stares at Chisaki, holding him by the mask, those white gloves forming a second one. "Stop stealing," Chisaki tells him, those words almost melting after they're spoken, his voice too strange. Too neutral, too slow.

27 pulls away from it, and he feels the mask crack and break around his face. As soon as he's free, he doesn't spare another glance at Chisaki, he turns on his heel and runs. Eri is here, Eri has to be here, he has to get to Eri.

He's running through corridors without doors, gray concrete stretching forever, shadows pitch black in every corner. He hears Midoriya's quirk nearby, like he's chasing him, or circling him. Trying to find him but he can't.

He turns down a hallway and sees her, sees her turned to the side wearing a hat she shouldn't have. One she stole. "Shinsou."

His mother looks at him with his eyes, still and waiting for him to approach. She's wearing 50's hat, that wide and floppy brimmed hat that she wore when she was free, she shouldn't have that hat. She stole it from 50.

His mother smiles at him like she knows that he knows, that she can see the anger on his face. "Shinsou."

He runs towards her, sure that she'll disappear into smoke as soon as he gets close, but she doesn't. She's standing still, just staring at him with half-lidded eyes and a frozen smile. He gets close enough that her smile gets distorted, it twists feral and dark for a moment before she steps back.

There's a knife in her side, weeping blood over her white dress. Over bandages on her arms and legs that she doesn't need. His mother just smiles at him, raises a hand like she'll slap him. "You're angry."

He stares at the knife, the blood, the blood on his hands, fear blacker than tar sinks deeper than bone into him as he shakes his head, backing away. "I'm not."

Her smile fades when she steps forward, his eyes almost bulging out of her head for a moment. "You're angry."

"I'm not!" he screams, afraid. Afraid, small, cold, dark. Bug will hear. He's not allowed to talk, not here, even if he doesn't have the mask he can't talk they'll put him back. Back for days, back for years, he doesn't know, he can't count that high. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5...

He's in the Red Room, and he can't bear to look at the walls, he feels that color tacky on his back, Bug didn't clean up before she put him on the table. 10 leans over him, goldfish circling around his head, swimming and playing with the sparse white hairs there. 10 frowns, his eyes watery, and 27 realizes he doesn't have the mask on. He knows what that means.

"I can work. 10, tell them I can do it, I'm not sick, I'll be better in time for the job, I can still do it-"

"Shinsou, it's okay," 50 says, standing on the other side of the table, eyes lowered and focused on the restraints that she's putting over him. "It's just a bad dream."

“You’re not here,” 27 says, shaking his head, everything shaking, he feels like he’ll rattle off the table even if he’s restrained. “You’re not here, you won’t be here, why aren’t you here?!” His own voice scares him, echoing off the walls even redder than they are. “You’re not here, 50! I’m out and you’re not-”

50 leans over him, too close, and all he can see is the blackness of her pupils. “Shhh. It’s just a bad dream kid.” Her voice drops lower, impossibly low until he feels it inside his skin.

His mother spins on her heels, her white dress flaring out around her knees. She keeps dancing, swaying, while she holds up Nemoto’s mask like she’s pretending to dance with him. When she stops, she holds it up to her face, looking at him through it, her voice too high pitched. “You’re angry, aren’t you?”

He feels the answer pulling up through his throat, forced to by Nemoto’s Confession quirk, feels that terrifying red feeling bubbling through his body. He pulls at the restraints before he even thinks to, glaring at the goldfish swimming around 10’s frightened face that grows more warped, more like it’s melting into wrinkles and sloughed off skin. Those fish, those goldfish, circling around but never his. Even if he catches them, even if he eats them, they’re not his, not his, not his.

He can’t even steal them, and his mother laughs.

27 gasps when he wakes up, sees Yamada’s face too close to his before he tries to twist away from him, nearly falling off the bed until a hand catches his arm. “Whoa, whoa, just a bad dream. Just breathe, kiddo, just a bad dream.”

27 closes his eyes, realizing he doesn’t have the strength to pull himself back onto the bed properly before Yamada does it for him. When Yamada tries to pull the blanket back over him, a whine slips out before he can help it, because he feels too hot. He’ll die if he has that blanket over him.

“Yeah, you’re right, we should probably start hitting these drinks again. Get some fluids back into you,” Yamada says, dragging him to sit up against the wall at the head of his bed before he reaches over to grab one of the bottles on the bedside table. He never really noticed how strong Yamada was, but he can move him around like he weighs nothing. “Orange Crush! A blast of citrus flavor. Kind of sounds like an up and coming hero, like if Sugar Rush just ran on orange juice.”

27 takes a drink once Yamada hands it to him, but his throat feels like it’s being stabbed when he swallows. Even if he knows he should drink it, he wants to find a way to avoid it. ‘S-H-I-N-S-O-U.’

Yamada gives him an odd look, but he does it. “Shinsou. You want me to say your name for every drink? Because I can do that, that’s pretty easy!” Shinsou shakes his head, he doesn’t want to drink this. “You feeling alright?”

27 leans back, because he hates that question. He doesn’t want to pay attention to his body right now, taking inventory of all the ways it’s betraying him, hurting him. He feels weak, there’s a dull ache everywhere and he’s covered in sweat either wet or drying. His skin feels weird too, like there’s an oily sheen underneath the sweat, completely different from the way his skin would feel painfully stripped and raw after a bleach bath. ‘Throat hurts. Head little.’

A cough starts and stops, coming out closer to a sneeze. He just wants the coughing to stop, he hates it the most. Or maybe he hates his sore throat, or the headache, or how he can’t be hot or cold. He just HATES this.

Yamada pokes at the bottom of the bottle in 27’s hands, and 27 can’t hide the half-hearted glare.

Yamada offers to get him a different flavor, reminds him that he needs to drink and get fluids and all of the things that 27 already knows. But he doesn't understand because 27 doesn't understand it. He just doesn't want to.

But Yamada plays a frightening game sometimes, and he straightens up with a wide smile. "Shinsou."

Shinsou rolls his eyes, but he drinks it. It should work. His throat flares again but it's a little weaker, not that it matters. He's not concerned with the fluids working back into his throat as much as he is with this name working under his skin. He wants it to stick eventually.

"Shinsou."

27 glares at his arm when it doesn't work, when that name starts sounding more foreign. He doesn't want it to be, and it's not because he wants to be that name for anyone else. He's never had a problem answering to it, he's learned how to have other names.

But he wants to be this name.

Shinsou Hitoshi might have a bad mother, a mother who sold him, and he might have scars and training that came after the fact. Shinsou Hitoshi might have PTSD, he might be broken, he might be troublesome to other people.

But Shinsou Hitoshi is forgiven. Shinsou Hitoshi has a place in this world that he doesn't have to fight to have. Shinsou Hitoshi doesn't have to do things to earn it, Shinsou Hitoshi doesn't have to worry about losing it.

Shinsou Hitoshi gets to stay here, at UA. He gets to see things that he's never seen before. Even if the things he's seen don't leave him, the memories stick to his skin and crawl inside at times, Shinsou Hitoshi is clean. He's unmarked in all the ways that matter, not tainted or weighted down by his crimes.

"Hey, Shinsou," Yamada says, pulling himself to sit closer with a leg crossing his thigh, and that closeness reminds Shinsou to take a drink. Yamada looks nervous for some reason. "Is the name thing... about the tattoo?"

It takes 27 a moment to realize what he means, and when he does he feels it like a tremble inside himself. That tattoo that's still hidden under the black band isn't all that '27' is, he was 27 before he got the tattoo. He had to answer to that name before he could leave that first cell, before he could leave that timeless dark and the cold inside of it. He had to answer to that name so that people would talk to him, even if they usually didn't.

"It takes time, you know? Shinsou," Yamada says that name like an afterthought, the wince behind his glasses when he looks away tells 27 that he feels out of his depth. He probably is, because the 'it takes time' seems to be what he says when he doesn't have anything useful to offer. Time is so odd here, sometimes it stretches beyond 27's imagining, even farther than it's ever felt at The Miasma or the 8 Precepts, and then sometimes it feels unbearably short. He never really knows how much time he has, and he's not sure if he wants to know either.

Time has new names here. When 27 first woke up, Yamada asked him a lot of questions, and only some of them that 27 could answer. He knows the year and the prime minister of Japan now, but he doesn't know if that makes any difference for him. Yamada seemed content that he knew most of the answers, even if it took him some time to decide on the first one. 'Shinsou Hitoshi.'

Shinsou Hitoshi is his name. He'll make it his name. He just doesn't know how to do that any quicker. "Want to talk about that dream, Shinsou?"

Shinsou shakes his head, not because he doesn't want to talk about it. It just felt so odd, so oddly melty. Just remembering it makes his head feel dizzy, and he doesn't want to feel dizzy anymore. 'Just weird. Not nightmare.'

Yamada nods, even if it doesn't seem like he believes him. He pulls his hair behind his head into a ponytail before he lets his hands drop, looking at the door before he looks at 27. "Sometimes, you talk about this 'Ten' person when you're kind of out of it. Were they...a good person? Kind of like 50?"

27 catches himself before he shakes his head, because 10 wasn't like 50. But 10 is a good person, and Yamada should probably know that. 'Good. Healer. Fever quirk. That's why. Don't hurt him.'

He feels more like he's thinking about a dream, the more he thinks about it. The investigation wants to find The Miasma and stop them, and it's ridiculous to think that they will. 27 has no idea how to find them, he's never tried to pay attention to street signs when he was taken to a job and he's never had the opportunity to see them when he was taken back by Boss' quirk. If they find them, if the heroes perform another raid, he doesn't even know if 10 will still be there. If he's even alive. But 10 is the one Number who shouldn't get hurt in that raid.

It's ridiculous to think that far, when it stretches 27's time here too long and too short. It's better if The Miasma is never found, if they just have to keep 27 to keep trying. If he never has to test what Yamada said, he just gets to live here anyway. He doesn't think that UA feels small.

"We try not to hurt anyone on those operations, but we'll definitely save 10," Yamada says, and it sounds like a promise. 27 doesn't know what he'll feel if Yamada has the opportunity to keep it. "Take another drink for me, Shinsou?"

Shinsou feels childish when he pouts, but he does it. He winces when his throat burns, and Yamada stands up saying that he'll get him a popsicle, but 27 feels even more childish when he grabs the hem of his shirt.

He doesn't care about popsicles, but he doesn't want Yamada to leave. Yamada could swat his hand away or scold him for that, but he doesn't. He just smiles. "Yeah, no popsicles. I'm not going anywhere, Shinsou."

Shinsou frowns when he realizes it, but with the way Yamada is looking around, he knows that he's bored. He wants to leave. He's a flight risk if Shinsou doesn't stop him, and when he finishes the bottle of that weird juice, he can see it in Yamada's smile.

"Yeah, now we can get back to relaxing, catch up on some more sleep. Maybe we can get you so well rested, it'll be hard to recognize you." He knows Yamada is talking about the dark bruising under his eyes, and he would look weird if he didn't have it, but he's sure he always will.

And he knows that if he hooks his arm around Yamada's and leans back against where Yamada's forearm is under his back, he can trap Yamada. Eliminate the flight risk.

Yamada just blinks at him, glancing at where he's pinned, but Shinsou tries to stare him down and make the threat realer than it is. He might be weak, but he's always been weaker than his opponents, and he knows how to work with that. Gravity and leverage are two things that no one can fight. "You want me to lay down with you?"

Shinsou considers it for a moment. He wants Yamada to stay, and needs to trust that he will, and he can't trust that Yamada won't leave as soon as 27 falls asleep. But while leverage works against him pretty well in this pin, he might be able to make a better one.

Shinsou nods, and pulls his arm away so Yamada can take his back, and watches as Yamada lays down beside him. "Hopefully I don't fall asleep too, there's a few things I need to get ready for Toshinori-"

27 is almost trapped by the blankets around his waist, especially with Yamada laying on top of them, but even if Yamada was trying to pin him down with that he's no match for him. 27 puts his chest half on Yamada's and reaches out to hook Yamada's free arm into the bend of 27's elbow. Yamada can't get up now, even if he has the strength to lift up 27 he doesn't have the leverage to fight against the weight on top of him, not when he can't lean on that elbow.

"Shinsou?" Yamada sounds confused, but Shinsou can't see if he is. The downside of this pin is that his face is pretty much smothered by the pillow above Yamada's shoulder. "You know, I'm a-okay with some cuddling, but this is a little...."

27 huffs, but can't respond to that. It's not cuddling, it's a tactical pin. Eliminating the flight risk. Keeping Yamada next to him. Forcefully.

"I can work with it," Yamada sighs, relaxing into the hold but 27 knows not to trust it. It could be a feint, just to make him lower his guard. The arm underneath 27's body moves out, but instead of shoving him off, he feels it wrap around his torso so that his hand can stroke up and down his back. "This okay?"

It takes a moment for 27 to nod, but he does when it feels like Yamada will stop. It doesn't just feel okay, it feels nice. 27 isn't sure how to make Yamada keep doing that, but he's sure that the next time he uses his quirk on someone, he's going to make them do that.

27 realizes what Yamada is trying to do once it starts working. 27 used to do it for Eri when she had trouble going to sleep. He would stroke her back or her arms or her hair, have her rest closer to his chest so she could hear his heartbeat. He's never experienced the effects of it himself, this 'soothing' method. It's too powerful, and 27 has to keep moving his head or his free arm to keep himself from falling asleep from it.

The fingers that were dragging up and down his back pull away, and 27 pulls his head up despite the strain in his neck. He doesn't know how to make Yamada go back to doing that, but he has to figure it out. He has to make him.

"You sure it's okay? You don't have to-" 27 collapses back to the pillow in a huff, an irritated whine boiling out before he can stop himself. Maybe it's ridiculous, but it doesn't feel ridiculous. It really won't make him explode if Yamada stops but he feels like it will. "Okay, got it. I like back rubs too, just wanted to check."

27 huffs and moves down, frustrated with the pillow on his face. He has to lay on Yamada's shoulder with his head turned to face him, because looking the opposite way might break his neck. Yamada looks at him out of the corner of his eye and smiles, his tiny mustache looks weird in the glow of the string lights.

"This is kind of nice, you know? Just, it's not a weird thing. Eri has very clear preferences on who she cuddles with, and Shouta will never admit it, but he gets clingy when he's tired but not too tired. He has this cute little growl when I stop playing with his hair," Yamada says, and 27 can't decide whether he wants him to keep talking. He likes listening to Yamada talk, likes listening to his voice, but he's trying to stay awake so he can enjoy this. "How about this? You can tell me where to move my hand and if I should stop. Like I'm one of those claw machines and you're moving the controls."

27 has heard about those claw machines even if he's never seen one, and it seems like an odd way of describing exactly how his quirk works, even if it's far simpler. 27's free hand is trapped underneath him and that arm feels too weak to be useful besides, but he moves the arm that's trapping Yamada's so that his hand rests on the pillow, and points up.

Yamada's hand moves up to stroke along his spine, between his shoulderblades, and Shinsou feels like it's almost painful and sharp at first, before the tension starts to drag out. He's not sure when was the last time he relaxed like this, but he hears a pop as he breathes out, relying on the pin to hold Yamada in place because he doesn't think he has the strength to move his arms anymore. And he doesn't think he minds that.

He feels boneless, relaxed, but that only makes him more aware of the strain in his neck. He's aware of the pain in his throat when he swallows, considering. He tries to remind himself that this much feels nice, but it's making him unbearably selfish, and it builds until the ache in his neck is all he can feel. He points up again.

Yamada's fingers drag over the back of his neck a few times, featherlight touches before his hand stops and his fingers rest at the base of it. His thumb and a finger press in with building tension, but he hardly has to press at all to get that first loud pop. Those fingers start rubbing in hard circles, and 27 loses the ability to move completely. His shoulders have never relaxed this much, he's completely useless at this point. He couldn't open his eyes if he tried, feels like he's goo and bones wrapped inside of skin instead of a tool. Instead of a person, even.

The tension building in his neck makes him flick his finger up, even if it seems like too much of an effort to move it. Yamada is pinching but it doesn't hurt, there are so many ways he could hurt him or kill him or paralyze him right now, but Shinsou can't even remember them all, barely remembers that they're there. Yamada's fingers spread and drag from behind Shinsou's ears, pulling back to the back of his neck before pushing out again, and Shinsou nearly sees white because it feels so nice. It feels like he's massaging his brain.

There's something weird at the top of his head, he can't figure out if it's stinging or itching, but it's annoying. He thinks if he could touch it, he could figure it out, but he can't move his arms at this point. He points up, even if it feels exhausting just to move a finger, to break this hazy spell cast over him. But he has to try to move his head up when Yamada doesn't move.

"Sure?" Yamada says, quiet and choked for some reason, and Shinsou tries to nod, settles for a grunt instead. Yamada's fingers brush over the back of his hair at first, not really touching him and not touching that weird sensation at the top of his head, but then his fingers comb through his hair so gently that it almost tickles. Eventually, Yamada's fingertips brush his scalp, and that weird sensation evaporates in a sigh that he can't fight.

Shinsou can't open his eyes and he can't move, he doesn't want to disturb this at all but when Yamada stops, he can't stop from tilting his head to chase after him. Move his head if Yamada won't move his fingers.

Yamada breathes out in a weird, stilted way, like he snorts or tries to laugh, but he starts combing through his hair again, and Shinsou tries not to get irritated when he thinks he'll stop again, that he'll have to keep reminding him. The minutes drag on, time that doesn't really exist, and he's starting to forget the rest of his body that isn't lit up by that feeling of Yamada's fingertips.

He feels like he's in that crossing point before sleep, on nights that he's not sure if he will because he didn't sleep the night before. When he feels that transition acutely, but it's different. It's not a worry that he won't sleep, because he knows he can't fight this haze or comfort, he just worries that it will stop. It's ridiculous, but he wants Yamada to keep doing this even when he's asleep, even if he won't feel it.

It's ridiculous, but Shinsou moves his head just a bit closer to Yamada's chest. He can hear his heartbeat, a steady rhythm but it doesn't sound like he thought it would. There's almost a weird 'gush' kind of noise, like he can hear the blood more than he can hear the heart that's pulling it around.

This soothing technique was used by mothers, intended for infants. It's a bonding exercise. His mother.

His mother might have done this. He didn't have a quirk as a baby. He could have.

It's not familiar.

But it's nice.

*

Yamada drops his phone on his face twice, finding it hard to get a good angle with Shinsou's elbow still trapping his arm, but he finally gets a good picture. Or several. He's just not really sure if this is going to happen again.

He sends one of the better ones to Kayama, not entirely sure if it's a good idea to send one of his hand in Shinsou's hair. She knows the situation, they've told almost everyone who comes in contact with Shinsou about it. He's a little worried about what she'll say about this entire situation, but he definitely needs her advice on it.

Kayamaaa: AWWW!!!! Congrats! It's a beautiful baby boy!

Hizashi: I kno ur jokin BUT HE DOES THE HEAD BOP

Hizashi: THE SHOU BOP THE LITT E CAT BOP I CAN'T

Kayamaaa: Hizashi. Tell me the truth.

Kayamaaa: If u n Shouta had a lil assbaby back in high school I NEED TO KNOW

Hizashi: MY ASS WOULD REMEMBER BUT PLS HELP

Hizashi: Is this ok???? Hes asleep but he does the growl also HELP HE DOES THE GROWL

Hizashi: But he his fever got that bad we had to do the bath. It was really bad then he kidn of did this?

Hizashi: Also I cant move im kinda trapped rn. Not just cuz this is cute but im legit kinda pinned down rn

Hizashi: I need to use the lil hero's room 2

Kayamaaa: Hizashi. STOP. It sounds like he's in control, so if he feels safe enough, let him. Good phys contact so important with him. So b very trapped.

Kayamaaa: But if u need me to com over with a bottle 2 help out... ;) I won't peek Hizashiiii: I kno u dont need 2 u perv. I can hold it.

Kayamaaa: I noticed Eri hasnt been home. Shinsou's prolly a codependent sleeper. Sleeps better w someone there. And #same.

Hizashiiii: Hes been sleeping ok I think but maybe. And u need 2 put yen in the old ppl jar, u old hag. No hashtags 4 u.

Kayamaaa: Im gonna beat u 2 death with a brick nside a tube sock n steal Shinsou's cuddles. U dont deserve them. DONT CALL ME AN OLD HAG U NASALLY BITCH

Hizashiiii: #hagtag

Shinsou pulled the arm pinning his a bit closer to himself, sighing afterwards. Despite himself, the pressure building below his gut told him to try to pull his arm away, so that he could possibly drag himself away from Shinsou with an elbow to lean on. But as soon as he tried, Shinsou's hand pulled down and grabbed his arm, a quiet whine reprimanding him for trying.

Yamada sighed, running a hand over Shinsou's hair soothingly, even though he knew it would only start up those sleepy growls again. His arm was tired, he had so much to do to get his lesson plans ready for Toshinori, and he'd do anything at this point to take a quick trip to the bathroom.

But the hand on his arm starts relaxing with another quiet sigh, and Yamada looks down on Shinsou's sleeping face. It's a reminder that he wouldn't trade this for the world.

TodoBroki's Secrets

Chapter Summary

27 feels a lot better, but it's hard to prove that to Yamada. Two students fleeing from the 1-A dorm give him an opportunity to test whether his odd quirk sickness is resolved so Eri can come back, but one of them has a startling revelation for him.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warning: Vague discussion of child abuse, Trauma spill

Previously on Wards of UA: Shinsou fell asleep while pinning Yamada down, and Yamada needed to pee before he fell asleep. Some emitter quirks have higher base temperatures, and Shinsou's actual base temperature is still a mystery as his has fluctuated so much since he was rescued from the 8 Precepts. Eri causes Shinsou's fever to worsen, which is why she has not been at the dorm, and won't be allowed to return until Shinsou is definitely over his illness. Shinsou has been trying to think of himself as 'Shinsou Hitoshi' instead of 27. Eri's nickname for Bakugo is 'Ugo.' Aizawa recently learned the truth behind Midoriya's quirk, and had banned him from training with his quirk until he saw a quirk specialist after he manifested Black Whip at the Joint Training Exam and he couldn't cancel his quirk. Todoroki has had a cat that he adopted off the street in his dorm for a few months, named Soba. Shinsou learned about Todoroki buying an expensive All Might figure on the group chat, and Bakugo responded to the picture evidence of that with 'YOU SUCKED HIS ICYHOT DICK FOR THAT ALL MIGHT FIGURE.' Shinsou has also noticed the similarity between Midoriya and All Might since their first meeting, but has seen several times on the chat that Midoriya is All Might's son. When Shinsou was discovered to be sick, Todoroki walked with him to Recovery Girl's office and asked Shinsou if he was a villain, to which Shinsou answered that he was a criminal. Shinsou has hated Soba ever since meeting the cat in a ventilation shaft where he tried to rescue it from the robots in the vents, but was severely scratched and bitten from his efforts. The night that Shinsou tried to escape UA, he placed Midoriya under his brainwash, which Midoriya broke out of by breaking two of his fingers. When Shinsou first arrived to UA, he was convinced that the hero students only wanted to befriend him to get information about The Miasma to tell Aizawa.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

27 felt better than he had in what felt like weeks when he woke up, even if it was confusing to wake up on top of Yamada. He didn't have time to consider whether it was weird to sleep on top of him, or if he should try to keep Yamada pinned down so he could, because Yamada just smiled and told him 'Good morning,' before pulling away and almost running down the hall for some reason.

Maybe it was weird, but he didn't care. He rolls into the side that Yamada was sleeping on, but finds himself feeling like he had actually rested. The soreness in his limbs, the heaviness that had been weighing him down - all of that seemed like it was gone. His throat still hurt, but it was just a pinch when he swallowed, and his head didn't hurt in the slightest.

He chases away the soreness in his throat with one of the drinks left on the table, and it's gone with half of the bottle. He feels completely better. He's really not sick anymore.

He tells Yamada so when he comes back, and Yamada looks at his phone before he puts a hand to his forehead, a worried pinch becoming a wide grin. "Yeah, I definitely like that number a lot better, but we're still running a little hot. Or hot for me, we're still not totally sure about you. But I'm really glad you're feeling better!"

'Better' means he can sit at the kitchen counter, but it doesn't mean he can help Yamada cook. 'Better' also doesn't mean that Eri can come back yet, and that's the most irritating part.

Now that he can feel something other than too hot or too cold, something other than exhaustion or pain, he feels it like an itch under his skin. He knows Eri is fine, that she's been with Aizawa and probably has all of the hero students catering to her every whim. She probably doesn't miss him, she has no reason to, and he doubts that Yamada could have kept her away if she were upset about it.

But he misses her. He just needs to see her, to make sure she hasn't grown into something almost unrecognizable. She grows too fast, and he doesn't want to miss it. He goes back to his room for his phone, but he starts typing while he walks back to the counter.

QUARANTINED ASS BITCH: Send me a picture of Eri.

Uggs 4 Lyfe: FUCK NO. THE LITTLE PIPSQUEAK IS OURS NOW YOU DEAD ASS BITCH

Horn Sis 4 Lyfe: SHINNYYYYYY omg we did a makeover nite! Look how cyute Eri is!!!!

Horn Sis 4 Lyfe: Tap to download 22KB

Big Sis Tsu Senses ACTIVATE: Don't send him a picture of her right now.

QUARANTINED ASS BITCH changed their username to Shinsou Hitoshi

Moonie Squad yo: KAMINARI DONT

Sailor Uranus??? I guess????: hahaha yea let's not

Yeeting the baby with them arms ;) : Don't worry, Shinsou, we have taken it upon ourselves to make sure that Eri's stay at the dorm is as enjoyable as possible!

Yeeting the baby with them arms ;) changed their username to Iida Tenya

Shinsou Hitoshi: She looks cute. What are you doing to her right now

Sailor Uranus??? I guess????: AHAHAHAHA LET'S NOT GUYS

Apple Dispensary: Eri has taken command of us all. She is safe and enjoying herself. Do not inquire further.

Moonie Squad yo: BAKUGO PLS DONT I DONT WANT TO DIE

Shinsou Hitoshi: what. are. you. doing. to. her.

Also yeetin a baby: We're watching movies! Don't worry about it Shinbro!!!! Are you feeling any better? Being sick sux :(

Bunny Dispensary: She's having fun!

Bunny Dispensary: Tap to download 22KB

27 stood up and started walking towards the door, but Yamada stopped him. And he didn't understand even when he showed him the picture, starting to coo over it like it was cute. Eri, grinning with paper wings taped to her back floating above the 1-A common room wasn't 'cute.'

It was dangerous. "Aw, the little angel of 1-A! Don't worry, Shinsou, Shou's got it covered and Uraraka has great control over her quirk. She can lift 2 tons, so she wouldn't drop a little bean like Eri!"

Shinsou knew it would be too hard to overpower Yamada right now and make a break for it, so he huffed and placed his hopes on getting his message across on this chat. But if they didn't listen, he'd make them.

Sailor Uranus??? I guess????: KODA NO

Moonie Squad yo: KIRISHIMA I NEED YOU

Apple Dispensary: I believe that Uraraka may require Kirishima's presence more than you.

Shinsou Hitoshi: Put. Her. Down. Floaty can't see this but tell her if she doesn't put Eri down, I will skin the toebeans off of her fingers.

Sugar Hypin' 5 Year Olds: Toebea

Sailor Uranus??? I guess????: wait was that what happened during training?? You saw Uraraka's fingers and thought they were Elsa Cosplay on Point: You won't. You're not a monster. You can't hurt her toebeans.

Shinsou Hitoshi: Try me.

but im sailor jupiter :(changed Shinsou Hitoshi's username to Uncoolest Mom

Tuxedo Mask: We put down pillows.

Tuxedo Mask: Tap to download 22KB

They did put down pillows. All the cushions from the couches were on the floor beneath Eri, but he could see her crossed arms and pouting from the top of the picture. Floaty's nervous expression was in the center, and while he wanted her to be aware of the risks, he didn't want her to be rattled to the point that she might lose concentration. The other heroes frowning at him through the phone disapprovingly didn't matter, they just had to understand.

Uncoolest Mom: Put her down. I don't want her to get hurt. I'm not being unreasonable.

Moonie Squad yo: How did my mom get your phone???

Sugar Hypin' 5 Year Olds: Holy crap that is the mommest thing ever said

Uncoolest Mom: I don't have to be a mom to not want Eri to get hurt

Still Ji-Ji: Uraraka can hold her for hours, and it's really not going to hurt her if she falls on the pillows.

But im sailor jupiter :(: Yeah MOM, a couple of bumps r a-ok! Eri's really rubbery, falling on your head is just a part of growing up. Trust me ;)

Sailor Uranus??? I guess????: That explains a lot

Iida Tenya: We are entrusted with Eri's safety, and though there are some sentiments expressed here that might be worrying, they are not meant to be taken seriously. We are indeed taking good care of Eri and making sure that she won't be harmed.

Uncoolest Mom: You're right, Sparky. I was really rubbery as a kid. I was beaten almost every day and I turned out just fine. I definitely hope that Eri gets injured too, so she can grow up just like me.

Elsa Cosplay on Point: #twinsies

Moonie Squad yo: Right, I missed thi

Sailor Uranus??? I guess????: Wait back the fuck up???

Uggs 4 Lyfe: @everyone STFU

But im sailor jupiter :(: hey todobroki what do u meme?

Sugar Hypin' 5 Year Olds: But your dad is Endeavor???

Elsa Cosplay on Point: I know. #tragic but im sailor jupiter :(: todobroki dont hide ur pain in memes thats my thing open the door????

Uggs 4 Lyfe: @EVERYONE SHUT THE FUCK UP AND DONT FUCKING PULL SOME DUMB SHIT JUST LET HALFSIES BE FUCKING STUPID ALRIGHT

Also yeetin a baby: @Shinbro I'm really sorry that happened and it was messed up and ur def on the hug train just makin a stop by Todobroki's room

Uncoolest Mom: I don't want to be on the hug train

Big Sis Tsu Senses ACTIVATE: Todoroki, we should talk. I can make the others go away if you open the door.

Horn Sis 4 Lyfe: @Shinny i kno this is bad 2 ask but u kno any hitmen???

Uncoolest Mom: Yes. Starting at 200000 yen for a nobody, you can't afford them.

Uggs 4 Lyfe: IM CALLING SHITSEI ON YOUR ASSES BECAUSE YOU CAN'T FUCKING LISTEN YOU DUMBFUCKS GET THE FUCK AWAY FROM HIS DOOR AND STOP BEING SUCH FUCKI

27 curled a hand around the back of his neck, staring at the phone but not really reading the messages. Todo was unnervingly similar to him.

The mother that poured scalding water on his face. The beatings. Maybe he shouldn't have mentioned that, but Sparky talking about how 'rubbery' Eri was made the anger boil quick from red to black. Eri wasn't rubbery, she's been through enough and she should have a normal childhood now. A childhood that wasn't full of pain.

Todo didn't have a normal childhood either. Todo very clearly wasn't normal either, and that should have been 27's first clue. He should have pieced it out sooner, should have sensed it somehow.

Todo still wasn't opening the door, and 27 can't help but worry about that.

*

Midoriya held his forearm with a wince one too many times, and Aizawa rolled his eyes when he called an end to it, despite the protests. "You're straining your muscles to force your quirk. I've told you not to do that."

Aizawa shoots a glare at the person who told him to do that, someone who should know to teach the difference between building a body to compliment a quirk and building the quirk itself. Someone who apparently didn't know how to use their own quirk before they passed it down to a quirkless child. "But I think I almost--"

Aizawa sighs, tipping back his head just to feel the sweat from his hair meet with the back of his neck. Sparring with the Problem Child was exercise that he needed, that the Problem Child needed to focus this 'Black Whip' quirk that he spawned. "Save it for your Heroics class. Now that we know Black Whip isn't permeable, you can train with your quirk as long as I'm supervising."

The Problem Child has only conjured up two small whisps at most, nothing like the mass that he created during the Joint Training Exam. But the capture scarf could restrain them, and that was going to have to be enough.

It would be better if he could strengthen his Erasure quirk, but he wasn't young. He already went through training and examinations to discover the full potential of his quirk, and while he could cancel multiple targets' quirks, he couldn't cancel multiple quirks in one target.

And he doubts that if it were a possibility for him before, that he would still be able to achieve it after what USJ did to him.

Midoriya walks over to the bench to check his phone, and Aizawa finds himself a bit too alert after the sparring session to overlook the loss of color in his face. But before he asks, one of the doors to Gym Gamma swings open forcefully, Bakugo having kicked it open. Aizawa watches as rage stutters to scowling confusion. "Oi, Sensei figure out how to cut off One for All yet?"

Aizawa glares at Toshinori, and has to remind himself, again, that he can't murder the former Symbol of Peace on campus grounds. But Bakugo knew. Bakugo, who had been kidnapped by the League of Villains, knew about One for All, and that's beginning to look more suspicious as the realization of that settles in. "Toshinori. I need a list of every one of my students who know about this. Immediately."

"Is Todoroki okay?" Midoriya asks, still clutching his phone, and Aizawa would appreciate it if his student's worry was an exaggeration. But he knows it's not, not if Bakugo came here because he was concerned.

“He blabbed about the Endeavor shit, now he’s freezing the door because everyone’s up their own asses about it,” Bakugo answers, and once Aizawa works out what he means, he finds himself disturbed by how many secrets Bakugo was privy to. Only the necessary members of staff knew about his concerns about Endeavor, and Toshinori wasn’t one of them.

He wishes he could feel spiteful about that. “What do you mean by that, young Bakugo? Is there something wrong with Endeavor-”

“I’ll tell you when I feel it’s appropriate for you to know,” Aizawa interrupts, still finding it within himself to be a bit spiteful, while he starts to gather his things from the bench. “How much did he disclose?”

Bakugo scoffs, glaring at the floor and unwilling to answer, and if he found himself disappointed by the appearance of Aizawa’s inaction, he would have to ignore it. Aizawa has fielded too many offers for the Number 2 hero to visit his homeroom in a special presentation, offers that turned into requests, that turned into near threats. The appearance of inaction might be the only thing keeping Todoroki enrolled at UA.

“It’s vague, but,” Midoriya says, looking at his phone with a pinched worry up to Aizawa with wide eyes, seemingly also surprised that he knew. “Just, that he was beaten. The training.”

‘Just’ means that Midoriya also knows more about the situation than Aizawa expected he did, but he should have adjusted those expectations given how much time the two students spend together. ‘Training’ like that was a mere suspicion on Aizawa’s part, something he was unsure of when he saw the way Todoroki would react at times during hand to hand combat drills. Subtle enough that it was just a suspicion. “I feel like I’m repeating myself, but those concerns are supposed to be reported to a trusted adult. Me, specifically.”

Midoriya looks down at his phone with that same dog kicked expression that he’s grown to hate, due to how ineffective it seems to be at showing whether the Problem Child would do better next time. “He really didn’t want me to. It’s Endeavor, so-”

“This is UA,” Aizawa says, and he leaves that up to interpretation. Principal Nezu won’t stake the reputation of the most prestigious hero academy in Japan against the current Number One Hero, but that same hero wouldn’t have the same difficulty reaching out to Todoroki if UA wasn’t so prestigious. Untouchable, even.

He’s well aware that there are times that the rules bend for the greater good, and he’s facilitated that happening in his hero work often enough. But he aches for the day that Endeavor falls a bit farther from grace, and real hero work can take place.

For now, he has to manage a crisis of 16 heroes in training who likely wanted to crowd Todoroki into shutting down, or kill the Number One Hero in Japan. And he’d rather risk the latter.

*

Aizawa was able to threaten his students away from Todoroki’s door, but the door was still frozen. He allowed Midoriya to remain in hopes of coaxing his student out, but after no response, he was forced to use a tactic from his own ward’s book.

As much as Hizashi might joke, he doesn’t have to climb into many ventilation systems in his hero work. It’s happened often enough that he’s familiar with how to map out the twists and bends, but when he reaches the vent in the center of Todoroki’s ceiling, he sees that he’s not the only one that Shinsou inspired.

Todoroki is only halfway inside the vent, stable enough that he seems to be standing on a pillar of ice inside his room. He's wearing a backpack and casual clothes, but those clothes aren't appropriate for the winter's chill outside. If he were running away, he should have at least taken the time to prepare for it properly.

If he were simply going to sit inside the ventilation system to decompress like Shinsou does, that unfortunately wouldn't be happening. "Principal Nezu is going to replace your door with one that can melt ice. No student should be able to lock out their teacher."

The silent, blank expression that answers him is too familiar. Too much like Shinsou's, and he's grateful when Todoroki glances away and whispers, "Sorry."

Aizawa sighs, his knees and back complaining about the cramped quarters. "We'll talk in your room."

Todoroki slips through the opening, and Aizawa follows with a leg braced against the remaining ice pillar to slide down it, then watches as Todoroki starts melting it. The door is ignored, even if the Problem Child's pleading is still audible on the other side of it.

"Midoriya told me that you admitted something on the chat before all of this happened," Aizawa says, reading the rising stiffness in his student's shoulders, the way that the flames he's using flick higher for a moment. "I don't need to know what it is, even if I suspect you won't surprise me. If you need to get away from your peers, you can come to the Safe Room. That's always an option if it's necessary."

The flames die out and Todoroki's hand falls, leaving a meter of ice left. Not that it would save the carpet from any damage if it was melted naturally, and he expects that even Todoroki knew that. That he needed a distraction from this conversation. "I would rather not see Eri right now. It's fine."

Aizawa is beginning to hate that phrase, 'it's fine.' But the mention of Eri, her age catching in Aizawa's mind, makes him hate Endeavor even more. "You're well aware that this room is going to be their target. And you seem somewhat prepared to leave it anyway."

He sees the backpack bulge outward, surprisingly noiselessly, and stops wondering where Todoroki's cat is. He overlooked putting on a jacket or scarf, but made sure to pack his cat to run away. "I'll have to clear the air eventually. I didn't mean to..."

Todoroki might think that having his back turned to Aizawa would mean he's hiding what he feels, but that shaking fist at his side betrays him. "Pick your target. Midoriya or me. It's better to approach at a distance with this."

Todoroki needs time to process what he did, and he had somewhat of the right strategy in trying to escape the dorm. But it was Aizawa's job to help him form better ones. "Midoriya. If that's fine. He already knows to wear gloves at this point."

Aizawa is going to overlook a lot of things with that statement, like how he's still not a trusted adult that his students will approach with issues, or what the hell he means by gloves. "There's a window on the 6th floor, it's the easiest escape route. I'll cover you from behind."

Todoroki turns to look at him, his eyes slightly narrowed, and Aizawa doesn't think it's due to his own pointed gaze at the jackets hanging in the closet. "How...much do you know?"

It's a question that's difficult to answer. He has suspicions and nothing proven, and the appearance of inaction might be as painful as the knowledge itself. If Todoroki feels betrayed that Aizawa knew in the first place, when he never said a word about it. “I know that something is wrong. And I trust that you’ll tell me more when you’re comfortable with that.”

He knows the flinches. He knows that Todoroki can’t see as well out of his left eye, but better than he should have if it was treated naturally. He knows that implies that a quirk healer was called to do as much as they could for the eye, to preserve the sight of a potential hero but do nothing for a wound that became a scar. He personally knows the difference between correspondence course education and isolation, and that Todoroki’s struggles to relate or at times imitate his peers isn’t entirely due to his homeschooling.

He knows that he’s always known enough to do more, and he knows even better the fine line that he has to walk to give Todoroki a safe haven at UA.

Todoroki sucks in his bottom lip, for a moment looks close to tears before he breathes out. He knows that Todoroki knows more, but he’s not ready to tell him. Not after this, not when it’s fresh.

But he hopes that Todoroki tells him.

*

Midoriya doesn’t say anything, and Todoroki doesn’t either. Sometimes they walk like this, just walking around campus or going on a run together, but it’s different. It’s never really this quiet.

It makes him feel like he should walk slower, and he keeps pulling on the gloves that Todoroki insists that he wears. Maybe it’s a little weird, but Todoroki always asks him to wear gloves to protect his hands whenever he feels like he’s getting ‘too involved with him.’ And even if it’s weird, he’d gladly do it for a friend.

“Soba is getting cold,” Todoroki says quietly, already walking towards a bench, and Midoriya follows. He hasn’t heard the cat complain, but after they sit down and Todoroki unzips the backpack, he’s not surprised to see the cream colored cat shaking a little, eagerly rubbing itself into Todoroki’s left hand.

He knows they can’t stay outside walking around like this, because Soba is with them. Maybe it’s a little weird that Todoroki still wanted to bring Soba, but Midoriya really doesn’t mind, especially when Soba lets him scratch his chin in search of warmth. “I can ask Kacchan if things have settled down yet. He kind of knows too, I guess. I didn’t tell him, though.”

“I didn’t either,” Todoroki says, his eyes almost closed while he stares at Soba. ““But that’s why his explosions are so big. They are full of secrets.””

Midoriya laughs, despite himself. He feels guilty because he knows that Todoroki doesn’t really want anyone to know about his father. But he rehearsed the lines from that American movie for hours with Kaminari, and now he can say it pretty much perfectly. He can see just from pulling up LNE that Kacchan already sent him a message saying that he’ll tell him when things have settled down. But he also sees a message from Shinsou on their own chat.

Brainwashio: Tell him I’ll like that stupid cat if he opens the door.

Shinsou didn’t respond to any of the messages that Midoriya has already sent him, asking him if he was okay after he tried to run away that night, asking him about his quirk, if he really thought he was quirkless. If he really considered what being quirkless would mean if he was. But Todoroki hums when he looks over, like he doesn’t really see those messages either.

“Ask him if we can come over,” Todoroki says, catching Soba’s paws when he tries to jump out of the bag. “He needs to make good on that oath.”

Midoriya opens his mouth to say that’s probably not going to happen, especially because Shinsou was sick, and because he probably didn’t mean it. But he thinks that Todoroki was really just saying what he didn’t mean, in a way that still meant what he was asking for.

Todoroki probably just wanted to talk to Shinsou, to find someone who could relate. And luckily, Shinsou wanted to talk to them too.

*

Yamada looks surprised when he comes out of the hallway to find Izuku and Todo standing in the living room, but if he didn’t want to be surprised, he shouldn’t have taken so long in the shower. “Hey, we have visitors! I definitely knew that beforehand!” ‘Let me answer door please.’

27 tries to pull his irritation back into something more useful, more convincing while Midoriya stumbles through a long apology. ‘Need to talk to Todo. Important.’

Yamada keeps antagonizing Midoriya by rambling about how he was in the shower and might have burst out in the nude to protect his home and ward, while he signs to 27. ‘Problem child too?’

27 nods. ‘They’re boyfriends. Package deal.’ Yamada jerks his head around to stare at 27, drawing attention to their conversation and to possibly bring it out in the open if he argued against it, and 27 sighs. ‘Quirked Problem Child. If no problems, not sick. Eri can come back.’

Yamada nods stiffly, agreeing but not happy with it. But he acts oddly nervous around the hero students when he addresses them again. “Well, it’s kind of late for a school night, but at least your teachers know where you are! I guess we can host a little friend sesh for a while before sending you two back to the dorm to get some shut eye. There’s plenty of snacks in the fridge, and a lot of soup that you’re welcome to!”

Shinsou doesn’t need soup anymore, but he’s sure that Yamada is going to make him eat all of it. From what he saw in the refrigerator, he’s going to be sick of soup long before he finishes it. Hopefully, he can get the hero students to eat a lot of it to save himself some trouble.

27 decides to guide them to his room, because they both seemed nervous around Yamada, Izuku especially. And after they get there and get the same speech about leaving the door open from Yamada, Izuku asks about it. “I hope we didn’t make any trouble, I saw that Mic-sensei signed ‘Please’ but I don’t know many of the other signs-”

“It’s-s,” 27 grits his teeth, glaring while he pulls out his phone. The mask was still open, but that was happening for some reason. The stuttering, and he didn’t want to deal with it. “It’s fi-ine. He di-idn’t want you here, Pro-blem Child.”

Izuku’s smile is completely hollow, his laugh barely that. “Oh. I didn’t know that Mic-sensei called me that too. But he’s okay with it?”

Shinsou rolls his eyes, sitting on the bed to claim it while Todo took the computer chair, holding his backpack in his lap. “You’re bo-oyfriends, so yes.”

Izuku chokes, bending over himself like he’s been punched, and Shinsou makes a note of that weakness. “We’re not-what- Why do you think that-”

“We’re not like this,” Todo says, holding up one of his pinkie fingers. “We’re more like this.” He makes a V with his fingers, like he's seen a lot of hero students do. It seems like a lot of students were trading sexual favors for expensive gifts then.

Even Mirio.

"Yeah, we're just friends! We're good friends, and we're both hero students, but we're not-" Izuku keeps looking between Todo and Shinsou, and the speed at which he moves his head seems to be picking up while Shinsou types.

"You-u sucked his di-ick for tha-at All Might figure," 27 explains, hoping that Izuku could elaborate on that. If this was a common occurrence at UA, he'd definitely need to be more careful about who he allows Eri to be with and look up to. He's pretty sure Momo has done that gesture too.

"I really didn't! I was just showing it to Todoroki and he bought it and I didn't even ask because I wouldn't and-and," Izuku's face is disturbingly red, his arms fanning the air before he knots his hands into fists, looking irritated. "Did Kacchan tell you that?! He really shouldn't-"

"What else do you know?" Todo asks with his hands folded under his chin, over the backpack. "People have a lot of secrets, and you seem to know a lot of them."

It's hard to know what's a secret at UA, but this one probably is to anyone outside of Class 1-A. "Izuku-u is All Might's so-on."

Todoroki hums and nods, while Izuku stares at him looking betrayed and a bit frustrated. "He's really not! Why-wait." Izuku blinks a few times while the shock begins to fade, before he tilts his head with wide eyes. "Shinsou, do you believe everything that's on the chat? Because the stuff that's on there is just a joke, or just... It's really not true."

27 glares to hide the tar black feeling curling in his gut. How was he supposed to know truth from exaggeration here? He hasn't been at UA long enough to tell the difference, but that doesn't make him stupid like Deku seems to think.

"Midoriya guards that secret well, but I trust you don't have any bad intentions knowing it," Todo says, staring at his backpack when it starts to bulge oddly. "Even if you're a criminal."

27 rolls his eyes at that, irritation boiling under his skin. He should just talk to Midoriya, maybe even use his quirk on him to prove that he was over that weird quirk-sickness. He just wanted Eri to come back to where she was safe, back to him, and he didn't really want to deal with these hero students. "But you're really not a criminal, Shinsou. Even though Todoroki said that you said that, you had a really bad fever at the time-"

"I'm not," Shinsou says, quick enough that he doesn't have time to stutter, two words in one forceful gasp, forcing them past his teeth so they don't have time to catch. "What-"

A cough cuts him off, but it's short. Even then he hates it.

But he hates what IcyHot drags out of his bag more. "That's good. I didn't really believe it at the time, but I'm glad that Soba isn't going to be associated with any unpleasant people."

The demon makes a very uncute, shrill and not squeaky 'Mew' when Halfsies pulls it out from the backpack. He sets that fiend loose on his floor, and 27 watches as it starts winding itself around Temperate Extreme's ankles.

This wasn't part of the deal.

“You know, Shinsou,” Deku says, his hands pulled behind his back like he knows what danger he’s in now that creature has been set loose. “Soba has different colored toebeans on each side. The side where he has a blue eye has pink toebeans, and the yellow side has brown ones. And the pink ones are really cute.”

27 doesn’t want to test that. He doesn’t. He doesn’t care if Deku is lying, and he doesn’t care if that cat blinks at him affectionately. Or if it jumps on the bed to bob its head at him.

He doesn’t care about its toebeans. The demon isn’t cute. He tried to save the stupid thing from the robots and it wouldn’t even let him pet it afterwards. After he saved its life.

The demon opens its mouth and nothing comes out, and it’s stupid enough that he holds out his hand for it to sniff. Stupid thing was mute sometimes, and it’s stupid. It’s too stupid to hate.

The cat nibbles at his fingers gently, not at all the way it dug its fangs into his hand in that vent, before it makes a circle to rub its side against his hand. Scent marking 27, owning him. Stupid thing can’t own him.

But when he tries to pet it - or shove it off, he hadn’t decided yet - it rolls onto its side to start scent marking his bed. And it has divided toebeans it’s really too cute.

“See?” Deku asks, because he knows too much. It’s unnerving. “Soba really isn’t that bad! He’s gotten really friendly since he started living in Todoroki’s room, and I think maybe he really wasn’t really feral at first. Maybe he used to have a home but some bad things happened to make him scared-”

“Eat the soup,” 27 commands, even if he knows he can’t force his quirk over Deku like he can with Eri. He’s tried. “I’m not sick anymore. I don’t need it.”

“Maybe Ochako can come over and help you with that,” Deku says, crouching down to start petting the cat’s fuzzy soft cheeks. “Her allowance is kind of tight this month, and it’s... Sometimes, she doesn’t go to the dorm meals if she thinks it’s for her. I’m kind of running out of ideas.”

“As long as she doesn’t float Eri,” Shinsou agrees. He didn’t want Floaty to go hungry, even if it sounded stupid that she wasn’t eating out of pride. Even if he didn’t have a lot of room to talk about that.

“Wear these,” Todo says, holding out a pair of thick leather gloves like the ones that Izuku was wearing. “I’ve been reckless until this point, but if you’re getting involved with me, you need to protect your hands.”

27 tries to stare at him hard enough to make him make sense, and Izuku starts muttering. “Uh, Todoroki thinks that when people get involved with him, their hands get hurt. It really wasn’t his fault at the Sports festival-”

27 hums while he takes them, just to see if he can. To see if the mask is open with Todo too. “Same.”

It was open.

He’s been able to talk to Ashi and Eri, because he used his quirk on them. After using it on Izuku and Bakugo, he was able to talk to them too. Yamada thought that this illness had something to do with his quirk, that it was wrong and it was. Mirio thought that when he got better, he might be able to talk normally.

He's never used his quirk on Todo.

"That wasn't your fault either, though!" Izuku says, waving his hands around. "I didn't even know that my fingers were going to move under your quirk, and Recovery Girl said it was okay! I didn't mess up my tendons any worse, which is really...really good."

Shinsou puts on the gloves, covering his scarred hands. The gloves matched the ones on Izuku's scarred hands. The scar on Todo's face doesn't match the ones on his at all, but somehow, they were more similar. "I didn't want to say any of that, that night. It's irritating."

Todo doesn't blink, and 27 wonders if he was also taught to do that to unsettle people. Look creepy behind a mask, intimidate by looking unhinged. If he had to compensate for a small and unintimidating body by doing that. "I've never been an older brother, but if Aizawa-sensei adopts me, I would try to be a good one for you and Eri."

27 truly has nothing to say to that. He knows that Eri likes Todo, and they probably would get along well if he were also adopted. But 27 is not going to be adopted by Aizawa or Yamada. He's just going to stay, hopefully. As long as he's careful not to mess that up.

Todo sighs, eyes almost closing as he stares at his left hand. "No, I'm past the point of running away. My fate was already decided. I have to keep moving forward, even when it's difficult." He looks up at 27 and nods. "You're moving forward as well."

He's not sure what he means by that, if he knows that he's trying to work a new name under his skin, for himself. Trying to be Shinsou Hitoshi, whatever that means, and what he wants it to mean might be moving forward. Even if the past still clings to him. "N-not a lot of criminals will take on a pro. And it's expensiv-ve. Use his credit card."

Todo looks down again, folding his hands together. "One of them already tried. I'm happy that they didn't succeed. I still have use for him."

27 is surprised Todo can say something like that, and mean it. Take something like that and appreciate it the same way that he does for the training he went through at The Miasma. If Bug didn't beat him into the ground almost every day, he probably wouldn't have survived as often as he did in those matches at the 8 Precepts. Chisaki would have gotten tired of repairing him.

"This isn't the reason why we're friends, but friends don't keep secrets from each other," Todo says, threading his fingers together in his lap loosely. "My father wanted me to become friends with you to find out your secrets. To find out where the Nomus are coming from."

27 breathes out, still numb to what IcyHot was saying. He was sure that the hero students wanted to know about The Miasma, but to know it was true? That it was him? Just him, judging by Izuku's shocked stare and breathless, "What?"

"He said that Aizawa-sensei isn't handling the investigation the right way, but I think he is. I think it would be best if you could keep your secrets until you want to share them," Todoroki says, even if his eyes narrow. "Your secrets might be dangerous, but they're yours."

They're not. They're not his anymore. Aizawa has The Miasma's name, and he said that was enough. He hasn't checked to see if it's enough, if they're getting close, but he doesn't want to. He doesn't want to know if he'll lose this.

"Shinsou, you..." Izuku stops and stares, and 27 has to force his fists to relax. Force himself to breathe, because he doesn't want Izuku to see this. He doesn't want anyone to know when they already knew too much. “Aizawa-sensei... is investigating the Nomus... and you-”

“Well!” Yamada shouts, walking down the hall to hold up his phone with an annoyed expression. “I just got off the phone with- oh Soba! How’s my little Sobarista doing?”

“He’s well,” Todo answers, standing up to lift the cat into his backpack and zip it up. “We should be leaving. It’s late.”

“Just stole the words out of my mouth! I just got off the phone with Eraserhead, he said to say that the coast is clear, but I don’t know what that’s all about,” Yamada says, sounding too much like Current Radio right now, even more than he usually did when he was talking to the hero students. “But feel free to make a little Soba delivery every now and then, bringing a little cat cafe to our dorm!”

Izuku stands up with a smile and a wave he clearly doesn’t mean, and he doubts it convinces Yamada either. He forgets about the gloves until he hears Yamada shut the door on the hero students after they leave, pulling them off quickly. They’re not going into the stash.

Izuku knows. Todo knows. They know about The Miasma.

Aizawa wasn’t handling the investigation the right way, whatever that means. It probably means he’s not making progress, as much as he thought. It means that they’ll want more information from him, and he doesn’t have it. He doesn’t know what that means, if he stays, if he has to leave, if he loses this. This one place that feels safe, that has 50, that has Eri, he can’t fucking lose this!

His mouth drops open when Yamada comes back in, but he doesn’t know what to say, how to ask, if he can ask, if he could even tell if Yamada is lying. He doesn’t want Yamada to lie to him.

Yamada’s face falls into pity, and he realizes that he didn’t want him to tell the truth either, if it’s that truth. “Shinsou, it’s alright. It’s- it might not be your quirk, and it’s fine if you can’t talk to me. We can always talk in sign-”

‘Stay,’ 27 signs, even if he has to force his hands to move, has to ignore the breath caught in his chest. ‘Stay. Investigation. Stay.’

Yamada’s eyebrows draw together tighter, and he moves to sit on the bed beside 27, a hand on his shoulder. “Shinsou, you’re staying. You don’t have to worry about that, okay? You don’t even have to think about it, and... Don’t worry about what Todoroki said. Endeavor shouldn’t even know about it, but he doesn’t know anything about what Shou’s doing. You don’t have any reason to worry about the investigation anymore.”

27 wants to believe those words. He wants to believe, he wants to be safe. He doesn’t know if Aizawa can keep him safe, if there’s someone above him, and he knows that there is. There’s someone in charge of Aizawa and they can decide that he’s not doing enough, and there’s nothing that 27 can do.

He doesn’t know what Nomus are, just that Aizawa thinks that The Miasma is connected with them. He doesn’t know where The Miasma is, he’s useless, he only had a name and he lost it, he can’t lose his name now.

He can’t lose Shinsou Hitoshi.

“Shinsou,” Yamada says, his hand moving from one shoulder to the other, his arm braced around his back again. 27 looks at him, tries to find something in his bright green eyes to hold on to, even if it’s a lie. This buzzing under his skin doesn’t feel anything like Bug’s quirk but it might as well with how horrible it feels. “You’re staying here. I’m not going to let anyone take you away, or hurt you. You’re safe.”

Shinsou has to relax his hands from fists, has to breathe out the buzzing. Has to believe what Yamada says, even if he knows it’s not that simple. There are a million ways of losing this, and he won’t risk any of them. ‘Stay.’

He won’t risk letting Yamada know that he doesn’t have to ask that with his hands anymore.

*

Todoroki didn’t know what school was like before UA.

He had odd expectations of it because of that. He overheard a few things when he was able to sneak into his older’s siblings living quarters, able to hide and pretend that he was closer to them than he was. School meant friends, meant homework and strict teachers. Fuyumi spent a lot of time talking about the things her friends liked in their bento boxes, which left Todoroki with the impression that he should study how to prepare one before the first day at UA.

The first day was overwhelming. The first month was, really. The well-worn floors of his home, places that seemed suffocating in the weeks after his father informed him that he was accepted to UA, felt like welcome relief after school. Quiet, after so many loud voices. Calm, after so many loud people.

UA offered the best training, the best pedigree, the best reputation. Nothing but the best for the next number one hero.

Todoroki grew to hate that number, ‘one.’ After spending so much time as ‘one,’ the ‘one’ child that would succeed, the ‘one’ child that was different from the ‘four.’ From the family.

Being ‘one’ was intolerable when he was surrounded everyday by others, noisy others. Distracting, weak others. Until it wasn’t.

Midoriya made ‘one’ into ‘two.’ ‘Two’ into ‘four.’ ‘Four’ into ‘seven.’ ‘Seven’ into ‘nineteen.’

In some ways, he’s still ‘one.’ But those ways feel like they’re melting, slowly. Like ice.

He melted too quickly this time, he felt the heat of it. He wants to take it back but he can’t. It’s too loud because of that.

These halls are never quiet, they’re not well worn. There’s a newness everywhere, in every corner, and it’s still surprising. As much as he’s learned to prepare, he’s not prepared sometimes. But he’s learned that it’s better not to act surprised, not act like he’s in pain. Ice and fire aren’t surprised, aren’t in pain, and that’s what he’s always been to his father, an offering to them. He’s learned to hide it, to a degree, even if it’s different here.

Aizawa-sensei was the one thing that he expected from UA. A strict teacher. Strict in different ways, better ways. Far kinder ways than his peers seem to perceive it.

It’s reassuring that not everything is the same.

When he knocks on the door to the Safe Room, he feels the numbness that used to scare him. When he would encase himself with ice sometimes, overusing his quirk, chasing the memory of his mother’s chilled skin, chasing away the feeling of flames and sweat, he would get scared of that numbness because he was afraid that he wouldn’t be able to feel those things anymore. He wouldn't feel his mother, he would be left to the flames but they'd break him.

Aizawa-sensei opens the door, and the numbness breaks instead.

*

Body Disposal: Ok, whats the money sitch lookin like?

Taser: I found two more aunts who owe me birthday money!!! Like, im p sure theyre related to me this time!

Taping up the body bag: eBay is not looking good. THE NEONGEN REBOOT IS AROUND THE CORNER THE HYPE SHOULD GET MY MERCH WAY MORE BIDS

Hug Train choo choo: 25000 yen so far! Maybe we can just glitterbomb him everyday instead tho?

Dark Deeds: It bears a reminder that what is spoken plainly is uncovered quickly.

A Cop: WE. CANNOT. HIRE. A. MURDERER. TO. ATTACK. A. PRO. HERO. THIS IS EXTREMELY CRIMINAL BEHAVIOR AND I WILL HAVE TO REPORT IT TO AIZAWA-SENSEI IF IT PERSISTS

Mixing a Murder Tape: Stain who? Running off to rescue Bakugo what?

KING EXPLOSION ~MURDER~: I DIDN'T FUCKING ASK FOR THAT. FUCKING FOUR EYES SPEWS ALL THIS SHIT BUT HE BREAKS THE FUCKING LAW ALL THE FUCKING TIME HE FUCKING LOVES IT

Hack His Life BB: Endeavies having some problems with his fanpage now and forever, and all the spam in his inbox whoooooops Body Disposal: bless u my sweet hackerina but whats the deal with bitcoin? Can we get a lot of money off that???

Hack His Life BB: We're gonna need bitcoin anyway :)

Cement Hookup (thnx daddy): Some guys from my dad's company started a business to send animal poop to ppl's houses we just need the address but we can get the year subscription for like 20000 yen!

Body Disposal: WAIT bring Koda back in we can get him on the poop supplies and get a discount!!!

Taser: nah honestly im kinda digging the murder thing, we can't do poop mail if hes dead

LAME ASS MORAL BITCH: Guys. This is crazy. We're heroes, we're not going to kill anyone. We need to leave it to the authorities.

LAME ASS MORAL BITCH: But I have family in the country who can help with the poop mail supply.

Body Disposal: YESSSSSSS OJIRO GETTING REDEEMED UP IN THIS BITCH

Sweet prince we got u fam: My family situation is complicated. I wasn't thinking clearly at the time that I sent that message, and I didn't think that you would realize what I was saying. I know that sounds odd. My father is not a good person, and I don't forgive him for that. I never will. But I will lose opportunities to become a great hero if he dies, and the world might need him right now.

Sweet prince we got u fam: I appreciate the plans to kill him. I appreciate that you care. I don't want to talk about my personal history.

Sweet prince we got u fam: But I prefer poop mail over glitterbombs. He's not #fabulous.

Body Disposal: We got u fam but also UR GETTING SO MANY HUGS PREPARE URSELF

A Cop: Just so that we are all aware of the best way to move forward, would you like us to ignore what we know, knowing that it wasn't intended to be known to us?

Sweet prince we got u fam: Yes. After the poop mail is done. ~ Forget ~

Taser: but im still down for murder. Just hmu, he hurt u n he dies.

Sweet prince we got u fam: #dark!Kaminari unlocked

Taser: fu k TODOROKI IM SO PROUD IM CRY I CANT

Taser: IM THE MOST DOWN FOR MURDER RN WHERE'S THAT FLAME BOI LIGHTNING BEATS FIRE ELEMENTS BIOTTTCH

Also getting hugs: When I get my quirk back, I can make him do anything. Remember that.

Sweet prince we got u fam: I will. #friendsou #hitoshi

Also getting hugs: #don't

Also getting hugs changed their username to Shinsou Hitoshi

Chapter End Notes

1-A Groupchat Usernames -

QUARANTINED ASS BITCH > Shinsou Hitoshi > Uncoolest Mom > Also getting hugs : Shinsou Hitoshi (27)

Uggs 4 Lyfe > KING EXPLOSION ~MURDER~ : Bakugo Katsuki

Horn Sis 4 Lyfe > Body Disposal : Ashido Mina

Big Sis Tsu Senses ACTIVATE : Asui Tsuyu

Moonie Squad yo > Taping up the body bag : Sero Hanta

Sailor Uranus??? I guess???? > Mixing a Murder Tape : Jirou Kyouka

Yeeting the baby with them arms ;) > Iida Tenya > A Cop : Iida Tenya

Apple Dispensary > Dark Deeds : Tokoyami Fumikage

Also yeetin a baby > Hug Train choo choo : Kirishima Eijirou

Bunny Dispensary : Koda Koji

Sugar Hypin' 5 Year Olds : Sato Rikido

Elsa Cosplay on Point > Sweet prince we got u fam : Todoroki Shouto

Tuxedo Mask : Shouji Mezo

Still Ji-Ji > LAME ASS MORAL BITCH : Ojiro Masharao

But im sailor jupiter :(> Taser : Kaminari Denki

Hack His Life BB : Hagakure Tooru

Cement Hookup (thnx daddy) : Uraraka Ochako

Happiness is Precious

Chapter Summary

Eri is allowed to come back to the dorm, now that Shinsou appears to be over his illness. But that homecoming comes with a reminder that was startling for Shinsou and Yamada to realize. And a fruitless interrogation continues.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: Intentionally causing flashbacks, Animal death (SPOILERS: it's temporary)

Thank you guys so much for these benchmarks I've passed since the last update! Over 1000 kudos and 25k hits! I really, REALLY want to drop a bonus chapter to commemorate that, but I've kind of fallen behind on my lead with only 7 chapters right now, so I'll be holding off on that for now. But look forward to some bonus updates in the future!

Previously on Wards of UA: Shinsou has been staying home from school while he was sick, and though he feels better, Yamada finally arranged to stay home with him today. Shinsou tried to make coffee himself for the first time and forgot the filter, which led to a lot of coffee grounds in Yamada's teeth. Shinsou recently discovered that he could talk to people he hasn't used his quirk on, leading him to believe that he's no longer selectively mute, but still intends to hide that from Yamada and Aizawa. Shinsou believes he was sold by his mother because of his quirk. One of Shinsou's triggers is someone touching his hair, especially from behind due to Hari grabbing him by the back of his head during the bleach bath torture. Baths are also a trigger, more sensitive now due to the bath Shinsou had to take to lower his fever recently. Eri and Aizawa have been living at the 1-A dorm to cover Toshinori's dorm shifts during the week, because Shinsou's fever would worsen with Eri around. Eri has been feeling angry towards Shinsou after their 'logical ruse' where they pretended that Shinsou couldn't talk to her, because he was trying to hide the fact that he was sick. Shinsou received a picture on the group chat of Uraraka floating Eri, and tried to make the floating stop, but the 1-A students put pillows on the ground as a compromise. Eri's nickname for Bakugo is 'Ugo.' When Principal Nezu watched Shinsou while he was sick, he exchanged the fish bowl that Eri and Shinsou's pet goldfish had been living in for a larger aquarium more suited to their health. Beanie is Eri's science project, a beansprout she's been growing in her windowsill. 'Fishio' is the name that Shinsou gave his pet goldfish, but he internally refers to it as 'Ten' after a Number at the Miasma that he was close to, who promised to take him to a festival when he was a child. Shinsou Ui has been extradited to Japan after Ashido submitted a witness statement that Shinsou claimed he was sold by his mother, which he told Ashido and Midoriya on the night that he tried to escape UA.

Shinsou tries not to think of it. He distracts himself with Yamada, and it's nice that Yamada still stays at the dorm today. It's nice that Yamada still checks his temperature, still worries over him, even if he makes him eat soup. Even though he wanted to cook with Yamada, Yamada at least shows him how to make coffee the right way when he asks.

He tries not to think about it, even when they're watching American movies without subtitles, and they have to pause sometimes so he can ask what a word means. It would be easier to ask without signing it.

He can't lose this.

Yamada said that he doesn't have to worry about the investigation anymore. He's free from the police, the interviews, he's as free from The Miasma as he'll ever be. He knows why Yamada wants him to believe that, he wants him to think that he's staying. To believe it. He trusts that.

He can't trust that Yamada is right. Someone else might take over the investigation, like Endeavor. Whatever connection The Miasma has with Nomus, they shouldn't have gotten involved because it's attracting a lot of attention from the heroes. Boss probably knows that. Boss probably hates that he's not dead yet, that 127 failed to kill him.

It's been a month since he came to UA. If Boss wanted to kill him here, he's finding it hard to get someone to do the job. It might actually be impossible. He might actually be safe.

But he could lose it, in a million different ways. There are some that would be more painful than the others.

He doesn't want Yamada to look anything like his mother. He doesn't want him to know that he can talk, that the mask is open, that his words could come because they'd be dangerous. Maybe they would use a mask, but maybe they wouldn't.

Maybe it would kill him just to see them looking at him like that. To feel cold under their stare, to see that distrust. Fear, even.

He doesn't know if what he remembers about his childhood before he was sold is right. He might have had a warm place before he got his quirk. He might have had a warm mother. He might have lost too much to his quirk already, he lost time that he can't get back, but he has to keep what he has. Silence is easy enough to keep at this point.

He gets irritated with Yamada when he keeps stopping while he buzzes the hair on the back of his neck short again. He knows it's odd, but it's fine. Yamada is nothing like Hari, especially when he talks. Hari wouldn't talk like that, or cut his hair just because he asked. Just because he liked the feeling of short hair made soft by its length.

It's fine, until Yamada mentions that he should take a shower. The oiliness from all the soaps Yamada used in that cold bath sticks to his skin and his hair, and he's sure that the sweat sticky where it's not oily isn't pleasant. He hasn't felt this unclean since he was bought by Chisaki and given access to bathe everyday, but just looking at the shower makes his blood freeze. Just standing in a bathtub is too much.

Yamada offers to stay, to talk, but he seems more comfortable when he offers to play music on the laptop for him. 27 is more comfortable with that too.

He listens to the music, translating the words when they're in English. He tried to learn English to help Eri escape, but something about it interested him. Different words for the same things, it seemed like something from one of his books. A hint of a far off land, something that made the world impossibly bigger than it was. Bigger than it seemed.

He keeps adjusting the water so that it's hotter, so he can scrub the oil and sweat from his skin. He washes his hair twice before it starts to feel almost brittle again, feel like it did after the first bleach bath, and he lets the spray rinse it out after that so he doesn't have to touch it.

The world is impossibly big. His mother had been living in another country, a far off land, but she might not be there now. The detective said that 'they had her,' and Aizawa said that she was alive. That's all he knows. There's a pull in his gut that wants to know more, but he ignores it.

Yamada says that UA feels small, but it's not. It's normal, and he's spent too long in his small room at The Miasma, in the too big spaces outside on jobs and trips outside of the 8 Precepts. He can still see the sky, the same sky outside, but it doesn't feel like it will swallow him whole and crush him. It just feels like it's there, like it has a different name. Like it always has, but he just didn't know it.

There's droplets of water on the tile wall, and he traces them with a finger before he writes it. '27.' It's different from the way Memory wrote it on his skin with the tattoo machine, a burn that dragged on and on, slowly. That name lives inside his skin, under the black band that Nemoto put there, even more slowly.

He drags his hand over that name, like Nemoto did to his skin. It's still there, but that doesn't matter.

He writes 'Shinsou Hitoshi.' It's not a name that settles easily into his skin. It's more complicated, longer, harder to write. Shinsou Hitoshi was sold by his mother, lost things in that dark room that stretched further than time or the world could ever be. Shinsou Hitoshi was buried beneath 27, beneath Dog, and Shinsou Hitoshi became more complicated because of that.

Shinsou Hitoshi was the first name he was given, when he was born to his mother. He had it before he had his quirk, probably before he had clothes. When he was born into this world and had no idea what would happen to him afterwards. When he probably screamed because it was terrifying, so disturbingly new to be born into this world.

Shinsou Hitoshi is a name that he wants. He wants to go back to that birth, but that's unreasonable. He wants to go back to it a different way, to be without scars or tattoos, but that's even more unreasonable.

He wants to feel that way, though.

Yamada mentions it when he checks his phone, when a bright smile works over his face. "Looks like we'll get our first snow soon! Definitely looking forward to those crazy snowball fights now that we can't escape it after class. Has Eri ever seen snow before?"

It snowed once while he was on a trip to the bookstore, and he tried to bring some of it back to her. He smiled stupidly behind the mask at the snowflakes catching on his hair, kept bending down to grab more of it from the street because it kept melting in his hand. He was sure that he could still make it in time.

He shakes his head, because it melted before he got back to the room, and a wet, cold hand was no way to explain snow to her. But he smiles, because it's different here. He wants to show her that feeling, that snow.

He wants to feel that feeling, 'snow.' He knows there are probably better words for that, but it's not the same.

He wants to feel the snow with Eri.

*

Eri has to hug Ashi really tight so she stops crying after Zawa's last class. "Ashi, it's okay! You can come over and hang out with Twenny now that he's better!"

Ashi gets really happy when she hears that, and her tears stop really quick before Zawa walks over with a big sigh. "It's Wednesday." Zawa is really, really sleepy because he doesn't get to sleep at the heroes' dorm, so he stops talking long enough for Kami to say 'My dudes' really loud. "Shinsou will be at the dorm this weekend, if not at school tomorrow. Don't come to my dorm for anything. Tell Toshinori if someone is dying."

It's okay even if Ashi can't come over, because Zawa is probably going to sleep for a really long time, and Eri can sleep on top of him. And that means that if Twenny starts making her weird or mad, she can kind of get away from him.

Eri liked being with the heroes all the time, and they helped her feel better, like they always do. Sometimes, she still missed Twenny really bad, but sometimes just thinking about him made her flippy and itchy and mad. But she's going to try really hard not to do that, because Zawa said that Twenny is really happy that she gets to go back to their dorm today, since he's not sick.

She made a really good picture for Twenny, and she has a lot of games they can play, and she really wants to be really happy with him again, even if she's worried that she won't. Maybe looking at Twenny will make her remember that he's dumb sometimes and makes her mad, and that he's not a cool mom because he made the heroes put down pillows when she was flying.

But she tries to smile really really big when they get to the door so maybe he won't, because she misses the not-dumb Twenny.

And Twenny looks really happy and not dumb, and that makes her miss him even more. "Twenny!"

Twenny picks her up when she runs at him and squeezes her really tight, and she squeezes him back super tight too. Kiri said she's getting really strong and she's got big muscles, even if she can't really see them like she can see Kiri's and the other heroes. "I really missed you," Twenny says, and it's only a little dumb because his voice makes her want to cry a little. "How-" Twenny makes a really weird sneezy sound, and it blows her hair when he does it. "Was school? And spending time with the heroes?"

Eri has to put her head on Twenny's shoulder to hug him really tight and get all the big happy feelings inside her out. Twenny was talking normal! He was asking her questions normal instead of talking weird, so he really was all better! "It was really really fun! We did a lot of really fun stuff, like flying and making pictures and doing girl's nights and watching all of Sailor Moon! And Ugo gave me lots of secret piggy back rides down the stairs really fast, but you can't tell anyone about it because it's a secret!"

"Yes, it's definitely a secret," Zawa says, because he already knows about stuff before she tells him. Especially when it happens at the heroes' dorm, since he watches all the TVs in the Safe Room.

“Don’t let him-” Twenny starts to get kind of mad, before he blows all of his big mad out and it makes her hair blow again. “Don’t let him run too fast when he does that.”

Eri leans back to put her hands on Twenny’s face, and she smiles so big that she has to make him smile too. He’s trying to be a cool mom, and that makes her really happy. “You can do it too, Twenny! I bet you can run really really fast down the stairs, and I’ll hold you really really tight too! And it’ll be even better than when Ugo does it!”

Twenny looks really surprised that she thinks that, and then he starts pinching at her horn and looking at it. It starts to make Eri a little mad because she doesn’t really like Twenny poking her horn sometimes, but then he smiles really really big. “You really must have been happy. Your horn grew.”

Eri feels her own eyes get really big, before she really has to kick all of the happy out. “Twenny, it works! It really works! I can fix Mirio by being happy!”

Zawa and Yama get closer to see, and Eri is sure that her horn must be growing a whole lot because she feels really happy. She puts a hand on it to feel it grow, because it’s got to grow super big right now, but she just feels like it’s getting a little warm, and not growing at all!

“Shou, I can’t believe you didn’t notice!” Yama says really play-mad at Zawa, and she feels like he shouldn’t get play-mad because it’s not really working.

“It’s small,” Zawa says, but he says it really quiet, kind of like he talks when he talks about important stuff. “It’s very hard to notice, but it is growing. That will be better in the long run.” Eri knows that Zawa is super tired because he even fell asleep in his older hero classes, not just the Class 1-A classes where he usually sleeps. But he smiles really big for her, even though he’s tired, so she knows that he means it. “I’m really glad, Eri.”

Yama gets glad in really loud ways sometimes, and he uses his super long arms to squeeze everyone into a hug. “We’ve got a happy meter running, and I can’t wait to see it fill up!”

After Yama’s big hug, Eri has to work hard on finding ways to be happy, and she’s really happy that she’s back at the dorm with everyone being so happy. Even though Zawa really has to go to sleep, Eri knows he’s really happy about that because he likes sleeping so much, and it makes her happy to know that he’s happy.

Yama is really happy that she’s back in the dorm, and it’s always easy to see that Yama’s happy, because he always smiles at everything, since he’s happy all the time. And he seems super happy about tucking Zawa in so he can sleep good.

Twenny is super happy that she’s back, and he’s really happy about her horn too, but when she gives him the picture she made of him, he’s so happy that he cries, but he promises that it’s because he’s happy.

She worked really hard to make his hair floofy and purple, and that he has a big smile that’s so big it even moves the marks on his face. And she drew a lot of cats, the same kind of cats that Twenny taught her to draw a long time ago, in a bunch of different colors. He’s so happy that he wants to put it on his wall right by his bed, right now, and knowing that he liked it makes her super happy.

Eri likes when everyone is super happy, because it makes her super duper happy. She wants to know if even Fishio and Fishie are so happy that they’re smiling with their little fish mouths, because if they were, she’s sure that her quirk would be ready to fix Mirio’s quirk.

But Fishio and Fishie are being really weird, because Fishie is sleeping on top of the water, and Fishio is moving around really slow, like he's too tired to move his fins around. "Twenny! Fishio and Fishie are really tired, but Mr. Nezu didn't give them a bed in their big house!"

Twenny walks into the room and looks at their fish, and he looks really scared, and she really doesn't like it. "Hey, Eri?"

Eri's really worried, and she hopes Twenny can fix it. "Are Fishie and Fishio okay?"

Eri feels kind of dizzy all of a sudden, and her head kind of hurts, but when she puts her hand to her head to try to feel where it feels dizzy, her hand is wet.

"Are you okay?" Twenny asks, and he sounds like he's not worried anymore, even if he still looks a little worried when she looks at him. "You might be tired too. Fishie and Fishio were just tired, but now they're fine. We can get them a bed to sleep in."

Eri does kind of feel tired, but she's glad Fishio and Fishie aren't tired anymore. They're both swimming around really happy, and she tries to smile at them but it feels kind of twitchy. "Can you read me a story in my room?"

She really wants to hear Twenny read the story about the color clown, but she knows Twenny doesn't really like reading books that they used to read before they got rescued. He looks like he's going to tell her no, but then Yama comes in with Beanie, but Beanie looks really tired and brown because he's 'wilting.'

"Yama! Beanie's wilting! We gotta call Momo!" Eri runs over to Yama, even if she really doesn't want to tell Momo. Even if Momo is really smart and knows how to fix Beanie, she doesn't want her to know that she didn't water him while she was away with the heroes.

"It's okay, little bean! I've had plenty of wilty little Beanies before I grew a green thumb, and we just need to give him a little coffee to help him perk up!" Yama says when he pats her head, and he starts making coffee to help Beanie perk up.

It makes her happy to know that Yama can fix Beanie, even though she's not sure where his green thumb is. The thumbs on his hands aren't green, but maybe he has another thumb hiding somewhere. "I'm really sorry I didn't water you, Beanie. I'm gonna make my thumb turn green too so you never have to get wilty again."

"It's okay, Eri! The big dumb-dumb loud guy forgot about me, but he's gonna give me some coffee to make up for it," Yama says for Beanie, but his voice doesn't get the same way that Mirio's does when he talks for Beanie.

"Let's pick out a story, Eri," Twenny says, and even if Eri wanted to make sure Beanie perked up really good, she still really wanted to cuddle next to Twenny on her super soft bed even more.

But she gets kind of mad when she starts falling asleep, because Twenny makes the color clown's splishes really splishy this time, and she wanted to hear them instead of falling asleep.

*

27 knows he doesn't have a lot of time, that this much is reckless enough, but he doesn't know what to do.

Eri's fish is dead. Ten doesn't look like he's far off from it either. The fish that Eri got from Shichi-Go-San are dead or dying, her first childhood pet is dead.

He didn't feed her fish. His weird quirk sickness drove her away, made her stay away from the dorm to keep her away from him because she made it worse. His quirk killed her fish.

And he still used it on her.

At the very least, he can shield her from it while she's under his quirk. He knows he could do more, he could fix this and she wouldn't even know, but he can't.

Her horn was small, but it was growing. Not from pain. For the first time in her life, her horn wasn't growing because of pain or fear, but from happiness. Both she and Mirio wanted that, wanted to use her quirk when it accumulated happiness to Rewind him until he had his quirk again. It would take a long time for that to happen, especially with how slowly it was growing, and if he did that, he would taint all of that happiness. He would use it up and replace it with something else, he'd steal her happiness.

He nearly loses control of his quirk when Yamada walks in, and he's not sure if he should have let it go. Yamada's face falls, disappointment, maybe he thinks that 27 is still sick but he has to realize that it's worse. 'Fish dead.'

Yamada's mouth drops open before he covers it with his hand, as horrified as 27 is. Maybe just as guilty. Maybe that guilt was what made him slip up.

'Can fix.' 27 knows that they know he can do that. Yamada knows he can control Eri's quirk, and that it's never really been necessary for her to build up or control her quirk to bring Mirio's quirk back. He didn't want them to know at first, he knows how dangerous it is that he can do that. Even Chisaki didn't want to use it when he found out, Chisaki swore he would take 27 back to The Miasma if he did. The results weren't good enough for him anyway, they were wrong somehow.

Yamada looks unsure, looking to the side like he wants to look away from the sight of Eri under his quirk, her arms hanging loose at her sides and her eyes turned white. "It might be better to have that talk with her. A fish floating off to the farm is a part of growing up, unfortunately. Even if it was my fault."

'She knows about death. Doesn't need talk,' 27 signs. He knows from his books that in a normal childhood, it's better for children to learn about death from a pet rather than a person, that pets are supposed to be less consequential and damaging. But Eri knows what death is, Chisaki told her enough times that she killed people, even if 27 tried to tell her that he was lying. Even if he knows he might not have been. 'Eri likes fish. Happy.'

Yamada pulls a frown, he's not happy with the plan, but he's not happy with the alternative either. But one of them has to lose to the other. "How does it work? You're... you're not going to get hurt, right?"

27 shakes his head. It's not going to hurt him. Physically, at least. 'Push into mind. Hard to explain.' He's glad that he doesn't have to explain, because Yamada gives him a small nod, still unsure, and walks closer.

He knows Yamada has never seen Eri's quirk, so he's probably curious. He probably needs to know because Eri still can't control it, and she came to UA for that reason, she became a ward because of that. But he'd rather Yamada not watch, because there's a chance that 27 might mess up. He knows how to do it one way, but it's worth a shot to try it another.

He can barely feel it, but he does. Even if he needed her to answer him to pull the string of his quirk, he can still feel what she feels, completely unlike any other control he has over others. She's worried, the prickle of it is muted under his skin, but he closes his eyes and tries to dig up something better to push against the control, and into her mind. Into her horn.

Happiness. What makes him happy?

He's happy that Eri isn't mad at him, he's happy that she's happy and safe. He was so happy that she finally gave him a picture, a piece of herself that she hasn't given him in months. She drew pictures for all of the heroes, but hasn't given him a single one since they were rescued, and even if he doesn't have the pictures from before the rescue anymore, he has that. He knows what he looks like in her eyes now, and it's different. He's not wearing a mask, and the scars on his face weren't colored red like they're bleeding. He was so happy.

He feels the tug afterwards, he knows that the push was pulled through, but when he looks he sees what he expected. That barely-there difference in her horn. Happiness is too precious, it will take too long to build it up, but it will be worth it for Mirio's sake. Eri won't have to suffer for him at least.

And at least she doesn't suffer like this. She doesn't remember it if he releases his control instead of having it break.

He can give some of that happiness back to her afterwards, at least.

He breathes out and closes his eyes, trying to pick one from the many. The first time it happened, he forgot himself while they were walking to The Chair. He remembered walking behind Bug to the Red Room, so much so that the hallways seemed to change because of that. Instead of focusing on Eri, focusing on the pain she was giving him when she was thinking of what happened in The Chair, he was trying to hide his own fear so Bug wouldn't see it. Thinking that she'd lash out, grab him by the back of his shirt to hurry him along, tell him that Cherry and Blossom didn't want to wait too long.

He can almost hear her voice, hear those words that he'd fear the most. Cherry and Blossom, pain pain pain trying to get them to stop, stop them from moving, burrowing deeper, might kill him. Little shit, her voice was so shrill that time he accidentally kicked one of the holes that the bugs came out of during training. She threw him to the ground, pinned him down, hitting him hard enough for him to realize that she'd been holding a lot back before then, she wasn't holding back and she could kill him. She would kill him, the client was going to kill him he couldn't make that policeman talk, but he didn't want his friends to die-

"Shinsou?" Yamada's voice cuts through that terror, but he still feels it on the edges, in how tightly he's holding himself even if he knows that only makes it hurt worse. He looks at Eri, and her horn is glowing, the wisps of green fire contained. Her eyes still blank.

He finds himself loosening his jaw, out of habit. Not because he needs to, but he's always had to before he placed a command or a question. "Reach out and touch the fish on the surface."

Eri does, and he hopes that this part is the same. The difference between controlling Eri and anyone else seems smaller now, but he used to be able to control her with just a thought. He has no idea how to tell her what to do, how to put it to words. He can think it, or imagine it, and that's much easier than he can say it.

Luckily, he doesn't need to. The green wisps surround Fishie, and start to lick towards Ten too. The clock rewinds for them both, Ten darts away as soon as he's able and Fishie thrashes with renewed life before he darts to the bottom of the tank too. He pulls the flames back, he settles Eri's quirk bit by bit. He imagines the fire burning off instead of just burning, invisible smoke as she lets it go.

Once her horn shrinks, he focuses on building it again. He hopes it won't hurt, but he knows that it might. He has to find 'happiness' again.

He's happy that the fish are okay. Eri won't see death here, she can be protected like a child should be. More than any child should be, because he wasn't able to protect her before.

He's happy that Yamada and Aizawa will always protect her. He's happy that they're there for her. He's happy that they'll protect them both, that they'll both be safe now, that he's actually free.

He looks up and has to breathe out at what he sees. Her horn almost grew too much at that thought, the overwhelming emotion still caught in his chest. The Miasma might not be gone, but they can't touch him now. Not with Aizawa and Yamada, not at UA.

"That is pretty cool," Yamada says, running a hand through his hair while the other pokes at the aquarium. "Controlling her quirk like that, it's... It really goes to show how close you two are."

He knows it's dangerous. A thought stabs in his chest and almost makes 27 forget himself, he almost opens his mouth to say it, to make sure Yamada isn't afraid of it. But he knows that saying it might make Yamada afraid anyway. 'Dislike. Don't want to use Eri's quirk. But don't want her to be sad.'

Yamada's smile tugs to the side, almost like a flinch, a nervous reaction he can't hide. "I get it, I just mean that it's kind of cool. Sharing your emotions and all. And it looks like you were pumping up the happy meter too?"

It sounds more embarrassing when Yamada puts it like that, but Shinsou nods. And the grin that answers him is enough to break his concentration on his quirk.

Eri stumbles forward, and he knew beforehand that it would take a lot out of her, but he hopes that he manages to hide it. Yamada forgot about that bean sprout Eri had until after he dropped the control, but luckily he knows how to fix that. Apparently coffee works on plants to bring them back from near death.

When Eri is settled next to his side, sleeping comfortably and pinning him down with the arm underneath her, he puts down the book and tries to fight the haze of sleep himself. Her soft breaths, her warmth, all that is distracting and it's more distracting because she's been gone the past few days. Her effect on him is heavier because of that.

It's still so odd, that all of this is okay. Using his quirk without permission, sleeping when he wants to, having time to rest when he's sick and having people that take care of him when he's ill. Those things don't happen to Numbers, they wouldn't happen to Dog.

Those things happen to people, to Shinsou Hitoshi.

It's easier to work that name under his skin the more he thinks about that.

*

Naomasa breathes in, before he opens the door to try again. It might be a relief that Eraserhead didn't want to be here, that he wouldn't be breathing fire down his neck when this situation was difficult enough.

"Mrs. Shinsou," he says, and he sees her head snap up and her eyes narrow at that. Yes, he's heard her say that her name is ‘Eloane Paro,’ and yes, he’s called her that, but niceties aren’t getting them anywhere. He might play a more subtle ‘Bad Cop’ than Sansa, but he’s not opposed to calling him in if he doesn’t have something tonight. “Let’s try this again. 12 years ago, on August 13th, you called the police to say that your son didn’t return from school-”

Mrs. Shinsou sighs, wringing her hands as she drops her head. “He was kidnapped, I don’t know-how many times do you want me to-”

“The school marked him as absent that day, on the 13th. Records show that they called you to ask if he was sick, but you didn’t return a single call.” It was difficult to get these ‘records,’ the fuzzy recollection from a retired secretary that Sansa had to spend four hours with to get this much. The local police truly should have done this much work themselves, or kept better records. “You never called them back, either-”

“I was at work, or I was...drunk,” Mrs. Shinsou barks out a nervous laugh at that, the tremor working back into her hands before she starts wringing them again. Naomasa knows he’s either getting to a breaking point or a breakdown, but with the time allotted to him, he’ll have to risk it.

“Did you have a drinking problem when you had Hitoshi?” Naomasa asks, pulling on this singular emotional reaction that seemed to be outside of stress from the extradition or repeated interviews. “Were you an unfit mother?”

Mrs. Shinsou’s knuckles turn white, but she still won’t look at him. He can see despite the way her head is angled downwards that she’s biting her lips together, and no matter what she says, he knows it would be honest if she said it. He’s offered understanding, compassion, just a chance to look at the facts or to release this dark secret that she’s held onto for years, and nothing has worked. She knows that he knows when she’s lying at this point, but she keeps lying.

“You must have thought that it would have been better for him,” Naomasa says, earning another flinch for his efforts. Digging into that deluded mindset, selling a child because it would be better than living with an alcoholic. “Or maybe you just needed the money-”

“Je veux un avocat,” Mrs. Shinsou bites out, and even though it’s French, he knows both the meaning and that it’s honest.

“You have the right to retain a lawyer at your own expense,” Naomasa repeats, almost second-nature to him after repeating those rights before every interview he’s ever performed. “But, as your bank account in France was depleted and you didn’t have cash on hand when you were arrested, you don’t have the funds to retain a lawyer. I’ve allowed you to make those calls anyway. Officer Sansa and myself have helped you with that. The only thing that will make this any easier for you is if you just tell me what happened. In your own words, what happened on August 13th? What happened that led to the disappearance of your son?”

He gets silence, and he lets it drag on. He watches as the tension works to a pitch then fades, the pressure builds before he thinks she might talk, but it becomes apparent that she just becomes used to it.

Shoving his chair into the table after he gets up isn’t entirely an act of frustration, it’s honest frustration. They only have days to work with, and they can’t afford to have Shinsou Ui relaxing a single second of it.

Sansa is already standing by the door with a folder in hand. Naomasa honestly didn’t want to go with that. They have no idea if this Miasma might have helped Shinsou Ui escape the authorities in France, but the fact that she’s still alive seems to suggest that they’re not involved.

Sansa walks in, and Naomasa walks to the one-way mirror, observing not just to use his quirk. This might rattle something loose, especially with Sansa presenting it.

Sansa drags the chair out gently, lays the folder on the table long enough for it to raise suspicion. Shinsou Ui's head lifts just enough to stare at it, and that's exactly what they both want. "You know, I've actually met your son. Played cards with him a few times, he's a smart kid. He really likes cats."

There's a flinch that almost looks like a dry heave, Shinsou Ui's mouth opens the same way but as expected, nothing comes out. If it's not a misremembered script that she read to those that were investigating or covering the kidnapping, details so obviously wrong that she doesn't try to explain why they were wrong when they're pointed out, it's silence.

"Now that kid, I bet he loves cats," Sansa says, opening the folder to the first picture, the one of Shinsou Hitoshi at age 4. "He even likes heroes that are cat-themed. You probably got him that Kawaii Kawaii Pussycats lunchbox, right?"

Shinsou Ui whispers a quiet 'Yes,' but a pinch in Naomasa's right arm tells him she's lying.

"So, you know that kid, but here's the kid that I know." Sansa flips the picture over to reveal the one underneath, and Shinsou Ui looks away with a hand over her mouth. "That's the same kid. That's your son, Shinsou Hitoshi. Your son has been through hell. I don't even know everything he's been through, but what I do know absolutely sickens me. And he's still your son underneath those-"

"Je veux un avocat!" Shinsou Ui screams before she slaps a hand on the table, trying to rock it back and forth to possibly topple it over, but it's bolted to the ground. "Je veux un avocat!"

"You're not getting a lawyer until we get answers," Sansa growls. "Who put those scars on that kid? Who dunked him in bleach until his hair turned out like that? I know the answers to those questions." They don't know the answer to half of those questions, but Sansa says it confidently enough that she might feel the pressure closing in on her. "But what I want to know is who put him in that position? What kind of unfit mother would sell her own son?"

Shinsou Ui starts shaking her head, slowly at first until she looks at Sansa, still shaking. "Kidnappé. Il a été kidnappé-"

Sansa doesn't need to know French, or feel the pinch in his arm to know she was lying.

Pursuit of Normalcy

Chapter Summary

Shinsou Hitoshi tries to be normal, but his circumstances are anything but. Sansa, Ashido, and Yamada all three have different plans for him, but what 27 wants is far different from anything on offer to him.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: Flashback to Chisaki

Previously on Wards of UA: Shinsou has been wearing a fever monitoring bracelet linked to Yamada's phone while he's been sick, because his fever can spike dangerously and quickly. After the events of TodoBroki's Secrets, Shinsou has been placed on the "Hug Train," even though he doesn't want to be there. Principal Nezu looked through Shinsou's placement exams when he was babysitting Shinsou, and determined that Shinsou learns best by hearing lectures through another exam. Quirk Thief AKA Monoma was under the impression that Shinsou was being dosed with high levels of quirk suppressants when he was asked to copy both Shinsou and Eri's quirks by Aizawa and Yamada, before Shinsou got sick. Monoma promised Yamada that he and the entirety of 1-B would learn enough JSL to be conversationally fluent after Yamada mentioned that Shinsou might be lonely and need a friend. Shinsou believes he can speak freely now, and has spoken to Todoroki even though previously, he was only able to speak to people that he had Brainwashed, and he doesn't want Izuku or anyone else to realize that he can talk. Shinsou Ui is being held in Tsukauchi and Sansa's custody at the police station for 72 hours for questioning, and she's been repeating the phrase "I want a lawyer" in French. Ashido knew Shinsou when he was 4 years old, and met the original Mocha, Shinsou's stuffed cat. In Wards, Yamada has a sidekick who helps him on his radio show, named Byte Sound. Yamada's sign name for Shinsou is 'Shin Amaze.'

Shinsou Hitoshi likes cats, but he likes them with a normal appreciation, so he wears a striped long-sleeve shirt with just a cat faced pocket on his chest. Shinsou Hitoshi might have scars, and might be used to wearing a mask, but he's only going to wear it for a few days because he's been sick. Even if he's not contagious, not according to Yamada, he still wears the purple and pink galaxy face mask that Eri picks out.

He wavers for a bit, but he decides that Shinsou Hitoshi definitely likes drinking coffee in the morning. Even after he's been sick. Yamada finally takes off the bracelet after checking his temperature with the thermometer, and seems a little confused with the number he sees, but Yamada gives him a cup of coffee, even if he was sure that he shouldn't. That's fine, because Shinsou Hitoshi can eat a full breakfast just fine to make up for it.

Shinsou Hitoshi goes to school, and that's something that he's never really appreciated the right way until now. People go to school, normal people go to school. Maybe 27 has missed a lot of school since he came to UA, but from now on it can be different. From now on, he can be Shinsou Hitoshi.

He starts to regret that Shinsou Hitoshi goes to school when he sees every head turn to face him and stare, how much attention Shinsou Hitoshi gets, but he's hopeful that it won't be like this all the time. Once Shinsou Hitoshi becomes a more familiar face in class again, they won't act like this.

Ashi will probably never stop, but he'll have to get used to that.

"Shinny," Ashi calls out, her hand stretched out and she looks angry before he notices the way she's holding her desk with her other hand, like she's trying to restrain her body from jumping away from it. "I need to hold your hand. Really tight. Because I need to hug you."

Shinsou Hitoshi is fine with hugs. From Ashi, at least. He shrugs and lifts his arms just a bit away from his chest in invitation. Ashi's eyes widen in an almost predatory way, and if he didn't know what killing intent looked like so well, he would almost mistake it in her eyes, but she jumps up to nearly crush the wind out of him.

She really shouldn't be strong enough to lift him off the ground and swing him around like this, but he's grateful that Aizawa calls the end of it by telling everyone to take their seats before it makes him too dizzy. But from the sound of feet rushing back to their desks, even if he doesn't catch who they belonged to, he appreciates that for a different reason.

Aizawa protected him again, it seems.

Aizawa still seemed tired this morning, even if he wasn't as exhausted as he was yesterday after going without sleep for nearly three days. Once again, he's deciding to leave Class 1-A to their own devices while he zips himself into his sleeping bag, but even though Eri seems to want Momo to help her with her science workbook instead of asking him, he won't be bored in this class.

There's a workbook, a pair of headphones attached to a tiny black device, and a piece of paper that explains where all of it came from. 'After looking through your placement exams, I thought it best to start off with a History objective. Yamada has the materials to cover the rest of your curriculum, and will let me know if it needs any adjustment. :3'

He's not sure when the robots looked through those exams, or why they were working with Yamada, but he knows that's a face that the robots make. There are instructions for this portable USB reader, including how to switch out the USBs that are pre-loaded with lectures to accompany the workbook. It's recommended to listen to the lecture first, then try the quizzes in the workbook. Even if he's oddly tempted to see what the workbook says, he'll follow those instructions.

It's like going to school normally. Listening to a teacher speak, then answering questions. He's never been able to do that, but now Shinsou Hitoshi can.

Or he could, if he didn't have to deal with all of these bothersome people.

"Oi," Bakugo grunts before he kicks his desk, even if he should be sitting at his own. Shinsou didn't notice before, but he's wearing a white face mask. "I told you not to run around with the fucking plague. You better be over that shit if you're at school again."

Shinsou Hitoshi might have been able to antagonize with his smirk if he wasn't wearing a face mask, but at least he can antagonize in a different way. "Tic tac toe twinsies."

He knows that Bakugo hates Todo for some reason, and Todo said that on the chat. He knows that Bakugo would be especially angry that he's implying that they're familiar like that, just because they're both wearing face masks.

But apparently, that's not the reason Bakugo's eyebrow starts and stops twitching, before he stiffens.

"Hashtag," Bakugo grates out, before the rest explodes in a scream. "It's called a 'hashtag,' don't fucking act like that Icyhot bastard, spouting shit off that you don't even know-"

Todo covers Bakugo's mouth from behind him, pulling him into his shoulder, and nods at 27. "It's difficult, but I will try to be a good sempai to you. The Meme Study Group meets tonight in Sero's room."

27 appreciates that Todo drags Bakugo away, at least, but he hates that he'll probably have to endure that study group. Normal people knew 'memes,' and he didn't. It really shouldn't feel much different from not knowing what normal people did academically, but it does. But that doesn't matter. He just needs to learn it in that study group.

He needs to learn a lot of things, but since UA is a school, he's probably in the right place to do that.

Ashi forces him to say it, when she walks up pouting once homeroom ends. "Shinny, you don't have to study during study period. No one does! Just come hang out with me like Eri gets to! Or talk to me on the chat!"

Eri looks up at him like she hopes that he would, as though she still has worries that he can make friends here, and that much is ridiculous enough to make him smile. But his reasons not to might be ridiculous enough to make him laugh, and he tries to hide it while he rubs the back of his neck. "I like studying at school. It...makes me feel like I'm really going to school with you, Ashi. Like I could have if...things were normal."

Ashi straightens, becoming too quiet before her hands clap together in front of her chest, and he reaches out to hold Eri's shoulder to shield her from the fear of that familiar noise. But Ashi doesn't notice that at all. "Shinny. We're going to give you the most normal school day in the entire history of ever!"

He already knows they won't.

*

Shinsou thought that things would settle down once he escaped from Class 1-A, from all of the paper airplanes with notes inside that had been tossed in his direction, or the paper hat that Bakugo defended by saying it would probably be normal for him to be bullied. He thought that he might be able to make some real progress on this workbook, but it seemed he was forgetting about someone.

"I'm glad that you were able to take some time off for that medication to be adjusted," Quirk Thief says, trying to wear that more neutral and less crazy face, and that probably allowed him to slip from that Kendo person's detection. Kendo is also distracted by Eri wanting to show her the results of the science experiment that she did with Momo, that prism shaped crystal that bends light into rainbows. "I hope you don't mind if I-"

27 grabs Quirk Thief's covered wrist, and keeps his grip tight enough that he can't slide forward to touch him despite that. Despite the warning glare he levels, Quirk Thief tries, and that less crazy face starts to slip a bit while he chuckles.

“Shinsou, I truly would rest easier if I could know for certain-”

27 isn't stupid enough to forget he has two hands, he grabs the other wrist without even having to break his stare. Now that Quirk Thief is out of options, out of free hands and the ones he has can't reach for his skin even when he strains his wrists to try. He sees Quirk Thief's eyebrow start twitching.

“Shinsou. Let me try to copy your quirk. Please.” The strain is becoming more apparent in Quirk Thief as he devolves into begging. 27 has never seen a neurosis like this being directed at him, even if Eri has to deal with more pleasant versions of it from Class 1-A. Those hero students' excitable and eager attempts to win her favor are far easier to endure than this.

Wait. Did Class 1-A do that to him too-

He sees what Quirk Thief is trying to do, and rears back to meet it. If Quirk Thief was going to resort to headbutting him, 27 was at least going to do some damage. He was at least going to enjoy it.

There's a blinding thunk when their skulls meet, and he manages to knock Quirk Thief back, earning a hiss. He imagines if Quirk Thief needs to concentrate to steal his quirk, then his concentration was broken at the same second that he could have stolen it.

He hopes so, at least. The spot where their heads met right below his hairline shouldn't be more than a bruise, but he will test his luck if Quirk Thief keeps pushing.

“MO-NO-MA!” Kendo and Yamada almost sound like they've rehearsed, and it seems like Yamada is very content to let Kendo deal out a finishing blow to the back of Quirk Thief's head, bending him back over the desk.

27 isn't surprised that he still tried to take advantage of that by trying to yank one of his arms from 27's grasp, but he's surprised that Kendo was able to pull him away despite his grip not loosening.

“Monoma, sit,” Kendo barks out like she's ordering a dog around, and even if Chisaki and Hari used that same tone on him before, it was very rarely for that order. More like ‘kneel,’ or ‘take Eri back to the room.’ Or ‘Do you want to die?’

It was hard to know if he answered that one right, sometimes. Harder to know if he answered honestly. But the answer was always the same. Forcing himself not to flinch when that hand hovering came closer, grinding his teeth to hold in the pain. Forgetting it in a blink, that queasy sensation of Repair working under his skin and stitching his parts together again.

“Shinsou? Are you alright?” Kendo asks, and like a blink she's in front of him, her hands in a half sign. He doesn't want to know what her face looks like, but before her hands drop, he thinks she was signing a formal ‘Sorry.’

‘Fine,’ 27 signs, feeling the urge to run away from her stare before he forgets it can be useful, and seeing Quirk Thief's false guilt on his face reminds him of it. ‘Need help. M-O-N-O-M-A. Bully me.’

As loudly as Quirk Thief might protest, the furrow 27 works between his eyebrows when he stares at the desk in front of him is probably louder to Kendo, and if she's anything like Class 1-A, this will be taken care of quickly. “We'll take care of that, Shinsou. I'm really sorry, on behalf of all of Class 1-B, but it won't happen again.”

He truly doesn't expect much with that saccharine tone, but when he raises his head to at least enjoy another blow to Quirk Thief's skull, he sees two strikes in quick succession and notices the expressions on most of the Class B students. They look almost murderous.

27 is pretty sure he looks murderous too, when he can't concentrate on the lecture playing from his headphones every time he tries. He can't hear the words when they fade out, when he has to look up and around, when he can't hear because just being in this classroom is too loud. Not even Yamada is loud, this place is loud, loud enough to rattle his bones like Yamada's quirk probably could.

27 has to put the headphones down, but even when he watches Eri playing with her prism crystal, he can't force this buzzing from under his skin.

*

Aizawa doesn't know the specifics, only knows from Hizashi's wince when he picked up the wards to take them to his free period that something happened to cause Shinsou's oddly positive mood to sour into what it is now.

At first glance, Shinsou just seems frustrated with the lesson plan that Principal Nezu has designed for him, but the endless fidgeting with the headphones and glances around the room is familiar. Aizawa curls a hand around the back of his neck, because even though he knows the best course of action, he's not sure how to guide Shinsou towards it when he still seems intent on his studies.

Shinsou wants to appreciate a 'normal' school day, when his situation was anything but normal and he certainly wasn't at a normal school anyway.

Aizawa closes out his email where he had been scrolling through old memos as a way to distract himself from answering Naomasa's call, and stands up before tapping the cubicle that Shinsou was working at. When Shinsou takes off the headphones, Aizawa tilts his head towards the corner that works best for this and starts walking towards it, eventually followed.

There's a potted plant that Aizawa moves out of the way and replaces with a chair, though he usually just curls up inside his sleeping bag when he uses it. From this corner, the entire expanse of the teacher's lounge is visible, including the door that Shinsou's back had been turned to at that cubicle. There's also a window directly to the left, far enough away that the outside can also be surveyed. Aizawa sits on the floor underneath the window, catching quickly that Shinsou's curious stare was directed at him instead of his surroundings.

"It can help to be aware of your surroundings," Aizawa says, though that's not what Dr. Tenma or any of the research he's done would call it. He wouldn't call it what Shinsou seems to think it is either, fighting not to raise an eyebrow at what he signs. "Not as a bodyguard..."

Aizawa glances away when he recalls that Shinsou said that he worked as a 'bodyguard' at Miasma. It was something akin to what he suspected when he noticed how often Shinsou would check his surroundings or stare at new people in the beginning of the wardship, something that he thought was drilled into him. Now he finds himself feeling foolish for not connecting the dots when he always knew exactly what it was.

And he feels like it might be an apt comparison to make. "In a way, it might be. There's a part of your brain that is trying to protect you like a bodyguard would, trying to make you aware of your current surroundings. Perceiving it to be dangerous to not know what's around you. Taking some time with your back against the wall and everything in clear view can help sometimes."

Shinsou pulls himself a bit straighter in the chair, his hands folding before he signs again. ‘P-T-S-D.’

Aizawa nods, wavering before he admits more. “Hypervigilance. Maybe it’s made me into a more effective teacher.”

That was a poor joke that Hizashi made when he started perusing the wealth of troubling symptoms that Aizawa either didn’t have or stopped hiding. As nice as it would have been to be able to spot a student on their phone or close to pulling a reckless stunt during training, he’s far less perceptive in that state. Despite how much his body is screaming at him to know what’s around him, where this invisible threat will be coming from, he’s nearly blind to his environment because of it.

He notices that Shinsou presses himself a bit more firmly to the back of the chair as it goes on, glancing between the door and the window with little to survey in between. The fingers pressed too tightly together where they’re folded in his lap start to relax the more he looks out the window, perhaps distracted by some students cutting class or just the gray and dreary weather outside.

Eri looks up from her workbook with a frown before she approaches, shuffling from one foot to the other before her gaze settles on Aizawa. “Dad, it’s not Twenny’s fault that Monoma was being bad, so he shouldn’t get in time out.”

Shinsou huffs a cut-off laugh, raising a hand to tug at the corner of his face mask. “It’s a PTSD time out. I’m not in trouble.”

While Aizawa is grateful that it’s effective enough to settle Shinsou to this degree, his mind eventually works through another odd ‘Dad’ comment to catch on Monoma’s name. “Did Monoma do something to warrant putting him in time out?”

Eri nods with a pensive, if not irritated expression. “He headbutted Twenny, so Kendo had to chop him a lot, and I think he should get a lot of time outs and a lot of chops even if he kind of doesn’t have a dark face sometimes. He’s still got a really dark face a lot.”

Aizawa weighs whether it would be worth his effort to expel Monoma, knowing that Kan would force him to re-enroll him before the day was out and was certainly capable of doling out his own punishment, before he sees Shinsou pick at the mask again. ‘I head attack. Thought he would. Tried to steal quirk again.’

It made a bit more sense that there was some provocation behind the attack, especially when the attack took place during Hizashi’s class. And Hizashi might have let his own worries prevent him from stepping in when necessary just to see if Monoma could succeed, and get any information on the state of Shinsou’s quirk through that student. “I’m sure Hizashi will keep a better eye on him in the future, but try not to resort to violence with the students, especially Monoma. Half of Kendo’s job as Class 1-B’s president is to dole out physical violence on Monoma.”

Eri approves of that, nodding again, but her studies seem to be a bit boring when compared to the excitement of sitting in a corner between them. The three of them probably make an odd sight if anyone were to come into the teacher’s lounge other than Hizashi, who might still find it an odd sight even if he could clue in to the reason for it.

Aizawa will never be thankful for USJ, but knowing that the three of them were a bit closer because of that gives him a similar feeling to it.

Before the end of the day, Shinsou has to fend off a lot of invitations to do things with the hero students this weekend. Todo and Sparky are intent on making him go to that 'Meme Study Group', Ashi wants him to have a make-over night like Eri did, and Izuku still wants to show him more of those Legend of Zelda games, even if he knows that he's not as mute anymore.

He specifically doesn't want Izuku to realize how not mute he is, so he tells him that he's busy, even if that means he might have to endure some of the other activities offered to him to prove that he is.

The worst invitation came when Kirimson Shark and Floaty came into the teacher's lounge during lunch to invite him and Eri to eat with them in the lunchroom. Maybe it would be normal for Shinsou Hitoshi to want to eat in that lunchroom, to eat with people his own age, but he's fine with not being completely normal. It feels more normal to eat in the teacher's lounge, because that's what he does when he goes to school.

Maybe it's not normal to pay attention to a Hero Ethics class when he's not a hero student. Especially when he has a study plan from the Rat Boss to work on that requires listening to lectures with headphones. Maybe Shinsou Hitoshi shouldn't be interested in the class at all, shouldn't wonder what would have happened if one of these hero students really met him on one of his jobs when they were learning the signs that a member of an enemy group was there unwillingly.

Maybe Shinsou Hitoshi shouldn't find it funny that he would have matched absolutely every single one of those signs - pointed focus on the objective, easily rattled, ostracized from the rest of the group in subtle ways, not as passionate about the group's objective. If a hero showed up, 27 would have been focused on the job at hand - protect the client, complete their objective as quickly as possible if feasible or abandon them. With the stakes that dire - the razor thin line of disappointing Boss by failing the client or enraging him by getting caught - he would probably be going out of his mind, not just rattled. Honzo was the only client who ever did invite him closer to the inner circle on jobs, but not when the objective for that job was being performed. And he wouldn't have been able to preach about the superiority of swamp based mutants or anything else with the mask holding his jaw tight.

Maybe Shinsou Hitoshi shouldn't have preferences for which hero could have found him like that, but he does. Even if he knows it would have been hopeless, that Boss' quirk would have pulled him back regardless, he thinks that Mirio might have seen it better than the others.

Maybe that's just wishful thinking. If he wasn't sold to Chisaki, if he was still at The Miasma, then he would have wanted to meet Mirio just once. Even if it wouldn't have made any difference at the end.

Shinsou Hitoshi probably shouldn't feel so exhausted after a normal school day, and probably shouldn't be dreading the dorm shift tonight. He should probably find it easier to pick his poison when he's lived with the threat of being poisoned longer than he can remember, when he's lived under far less dire stakes than having to deal with any particular member of Class 1-A.

Shinsou Hitoshi probably shouldn't feel like all of those concerns disappear like smoke when Aizawa answers his phone and storms outside without saying a word.

*

Aizawa doesn't care what Sansa wants to say, and he doesn't care about that 'warning' that he gave on behalf of his ward. Shinsou is done with the investigation, he's not going to see a single piece of it if Aizawa can help it, and no matter what information Sansa has or how necessary it is to keep it confidential, it's not worth Shinsou seeing Sansa. At all.

He knows the kid remembers being force fed very well, and all the obstacles in getting him to eat while he was sick is just a reminder of how difficult this investigation has made it to convince Shinsou that he's safe.

Sansa at least didn't wear his uniform, but he seems to know that he's not getting into the teacher's dorm when he leans against the railing outside the doors. Aizawa exits and closes the door behind himself, making that clear, and he doesn't like how Sansa doesn't fight that, despite the cold. "You know how weird it is to have an important witness at the station and not have you skulking around the bullpen?"

Aizawa doesn't answer that, because he knows that if Sansa is inviting that kind of hands-on observation, then Sansa is in danger of inviting far too much of it. He'll personally break Shinsou Ui's fingers if Sansa is thinking of asking what Aizawa imagines he wants to ask.

Sansa sighs, crossing his arms and glancing back at his car. Aizawa wants him to go back to it and drive away already. "Yeah, I wouldn't either. Your priorities are different this time around."

"You've gotten nothing," Aizawa asks as a statement, as a barbed insult that he completely means. Sansa shakes it off too easily in that shrug, and he wants to mean it more because of that.

"Oh, I've learned how to say 'I want a lawyer' in French. Let me tell you, I've definitely got that one memorized," Sansa jokes, but that means more than what he says. They've pushed hard enough for her to shut down, and got absolutely nothing from that. "She's got some screws loose, but she's put together enough to make things hard. And we don't have much time to work with when we don't have anything concrete to charge her--"

"You're not using Shinsou," Aizawa says, because he knows that's exactly what Sansa wants. Probably what Naomasa wants, but he's smart enough to make Sansa play messenger. "If you can't make her talk, cut her loose and we can keep working on the reviews."

Sansa breathes out, watching the cloud from it slowly dissipate afterwards. Then he mutters quietly, not quite under his breath, "I sure as hell don't want to."

Aizawa finds it colder, to realize he wasn't entirely alone in that. He doesn't want Shinsou Ui to disappear into thin air, and he knows that if she is returned to French soil, she will. They might not catch her again, the woman who sold her own child will never face justice for that.

But he's more unwilling to allow Shinsou to face her. Rationally, he knows that if there's a single part of Shinsou Ui that isn't a monster, that would be the one thing that could rattle something out of her, to force her to see what she's done when it's plainly written on Shinsou's face with those scars.

But Shinsou Ui is enough of a monster. Shinsou has faced too many of them, and he needs peace now. He needs to be left out of the investigation.

"Not even with the one-way mirror?" Sansa asks, but he asks like he already knows the answer. "Hell, a video of the kid might--"

"Shinsou. Is done," Aizawa growls out, and he doesn't give a damn about what might be a rational compromise. The only thing that the investigation needs from Shinsou from now on is for him to stay alive and stay safe. That's less than what Aizawa wants for him, but at the least he will give him that. "If you can't get answers out of a suspect in due time, you cut them loose. You don't drag the victim in to make them talk."

Sansa tilts his head towards the car, nodding to himself. If he already knew it was useless, he could have saved himself the trip and not wasted Aizawa's time. "We'll let you know how that goes, then. Take care of the kids for us."

Aizawa knows that slight implication - that he's more focused on the children in his care than hovering over any lead in the investigation - is meant to be somewhat insulting. It's not.

It's what a designated hero is supposed to do. He's going to make this wardship a traditional one. Shinsou won't have to concern himself with the investigation anymore, and Aizawa will be able to focus on his wellbeing far easier because of that.

And apparently, he needs to focus on when he's being followed.

Shinsou is standing against the wall next to the door, and quickly makes it known how much he's overheard. 'Want to help. It's fine.'

Aizawa crosses his arms, finding it hard to argue against showing his disapproval when it needed to be known, even if Shinsou could take it harder than it was meant. "If you want to help the investigation, there are other ways to do that. Not this way."

He knows it's a mixture between cowardice and cruelty for him to turn away to start walking up the stairs, turning his back to Shinsou so that he doesn't see any response he has to that. He doesn't want there to be a response, and he'd rather his words be taken as a threat even if they weren't.

Shinsou was forced to meet with Chisaki. He was tricked into the influence of Jun's Confession quirk to make him talk. Even if Aizawa knows that on its face, Shinsou Ui might be the least threatening of any interview, he knows it's far more complicated beneath that.

Shinsou confirms it when he catches up to him before they reach the door. 'I want to see her.'

That was one of Aizawa's greatest concerns.

Shinsou has a deeply complicated history with his mother, even if that history at best spans four years of his life. He's had chronic nightmares about her 'rejecting' him, believed that his quirk drove her insane or to suicide. He knows that his mother sold him, and the only reason that Aizawa knows that or that Shinsou Ui is in Naomasa's custody right now is because he told that to Ashido.

And out of all the twisted reasoning Shinsou could have to mean that statement, could want to meet with his mother, one stands out as the most disturbing.

There's a possibility that Shinsou is seeking some kind of connection with his mother in this. A facsimile of a 'normal' relationship between mother and son, even if it begins in an interrogation room with the outward intention to force his mother to reveal how she came into contact with the organization she sold her son to. He's not sure if Shinsou is stable enough or grounded enough in his own reality not to slip into that kind of thinking, to take that meeting as an invitation for it when it's not.

Shinsou isn't an orphan, but he might be better off if he was. Aizawa eventually came around to that same reasoning for himself over the years. There are ways that it will be easier for Shinsou to 'orphan' himself from Shinsou Ui, given that at best she will end up behind bars and at worst she will disappear from society to avoid recapture. There are ways that it will be more difficult, if Shinsou never understands what she's done, or that it's even wrong.

Aizawa's hand rests on the doorknob, and he can hear Hizashi asking Eri where they are from the other side of it. Perhaps that leant him a sense of urgency to say something he completely didn't mean. “Give me a five page essay defending why that’s a good idea, and I’ll consider it.”

He’s never hated being a teacher more in his life.

*

27 only wanted to ask the hero students how to write an essay, but he didn’t even get a chance to open the chat before he saw a message from Ashi on their chat that derailed his plans completely.

He has no idea how to respond to it, this threat. True, he knew that it was a possibility that she wasn’t lying when she first mentioned it, but seeing the proof only makes the situation graver. Especially when he has no idea what she wants, even when it seems like she’s saying it plainly.

Ashi: Tap to download 22KB

Ashi: Shinny :) We’re having a sleepover :) If ur not there :) This gets leaked 2 the 1a chat :) Bring Moka n dress like a 5 year old :)

He knows she probably wants him to bring Mocha, and even if he doesn’t want to, he can hide Mocha in his bag and only reveal him in the most dire of circumstances. He knows he can endure whatever a ‘sleepover’ means, but he has no idea how to dress like a five year old. Even if he should, since he lives with Eri, who is a five year old, he doesn’t know the distinction that separates her from anyone else. Is he supposed to wear a dress like she usually does?

Yamada knocks on the open door, which seems unnecessary, and he’s still wearing the Present Mic costume since he’ll be leaving for his patrol soon. He might be one of the few people who certainly doesn’t dress like a five year old, but since he usually dresses Eri, maybe he’ll have some insight. ‘Need help. How do 5 year olds dress? Different?’

Yamada’s head tilts to the side, seeming utterly confused until he steps into the room with a hand cupped around his chin. “Uh, it depends a whole lot on who’s dressing the five year old. Is there something wrong with the clothes we have for Eri or....”

27 shakes his head, trying to figure out how to explain it and starting to regret that he asked at all. ‘Threatened. Need to dress like 5 year old. I don’t know meaning.’

Yamada’s confusion twists tighter in his pinched eyebrows before he frowns and becomes alarmingly serious. “Is someone bullying you into this? Let me- can I see that message really quick?”

27 knows it might be easier if he just said it, and he knows it was definitely a mistake to involve Yamada now that he’s taking the situation even more seriously than it is, and as something that it’s not. Ashi isn’t bullying him, she’s just threatening him into doing something that he didn’t really want to do. He was hoping that he could just avoid all of the hero students to work on that essay in the Safe Room, but he doesn’t want any of the hero students to see the picture that she has.

He turns the phone to face Yamada, hoping that he might just answer his question and see that it wasn’t bullying if it was from Ashi, but when he sees Yamada’s face turn from subtle anger to shock to the beginnings of that odd cooing expression he gives Eri when she dresses up in something cute, he realizes that he’s made the worst mistake of his life.

He pulls the phone back to see that it was displaying the picture in the chat now.

Yamada.

Had seen that picture.

He wants nothing more than for death to take him now. “Wait, Shinsou I just need to see that one more time-”

Yamada keeps begging, his voice pitching higher and more desperate as he keeps reaching for the phone, kept away from him as 27 holds it at arm's length. Yamada could still grab it, could still see that utterly embarrassing picture, something that 27 wishes didn't even exist even if it wasn't being used to threaten him, or torture him even more horribly now that Yamada had seen it.

He knows what Yamada does with pictures. He prints them out and puts them in books. For other people to see. To keep them as memories.

The thought of Yamada having this picture or showing it to anyone twists inside 27's gut and makes his face burn hot enough that even if his leather jacket has spikes on it, they look too inviting to impale his face on them. That plan seems like the only possibility of relief from this torment.

He probably looks odd, he's probably acting odd by pressing his face pretty much into Yamada's armpit but mostly into his chest, but even if Yamada has seen that he doesn't want him to see his face right now. Yamada's movement's still, and it's hard to tell but he seems to almost hold his breath for a moment, before he laughs quietly and drops his arms, one curling around the back of 27's shoulders.

“Okay, okay. You don't have to show me, Shinsou,” Yamada says, and that promise seems too good to be true even if it's believable enough for Shinsou to breathe a sigh of relief. “After all, that little herolet's definitely not in a position to turn down extra credit in my class.”

Shinsou glances up with a glare, not sure how much he means the instinctive thought of silencing them both, but he sees Yamada's stupid mustache and stupid tinted glasses and doubts it immediately. Yamada just smiles at him, and pats his shoulder.

“You don't have to go to that sleepover thing if you don't want to, but it does sound pretty fun! And you can always have Shou come by to pull a little rescue mission if you need it,” Yamada says, and Shinsou can't tell if he wants him to go to the sleepover or get rescued. “As for the dress code, I think you've already met it, but if you want to look over the top and ridiculous, I can send Shou in here to help out.”

27 shakes his head and pulls away. He's still not sure how a five year old is supposed to dress, and it seems even more convoluted now. Five year olds wore striped shirts and dresses? And even though Yamada seemed to dress Eri more often than Aizawa, he was better at it?

“Did Ashido want you to bring coffee to this shindig too? I'm not sure if we have time to grab some from the coffee shop, and we don't really have the stuff to make a mocha coffee,” Yamada rambles, and 27 realizes that he read the message too. Ashi didn't know how to spell Mocha, but Yamada assumed she was talking about coffee.

‘No. It's different,’ 27 signs, but he has no idea how to lie to Yamada if he presses further. He knows that Yamada knows he sleeps with Mocha, that he hasn't moved him from his bed since he came here. If it's weird, he hasn't said anything about it. Maybe five year olds are supposed to sleep with stuffed animals, but 27 isn't a child. But he's not going to put Mocha away either.

Yamada shrugs, even if he seems to want to ask, but 27 is glad that he doesn't. Maybe it's weird, but it feels weird when he thinks about telling Yamada about Mocha. He feels like it would both be fine and be horrible, in a way that feels too overwhelming to think about.

It's not the first time he's taken Mocha somewhere else, but it's the first time for this Mocha. The apprehension stings a bit when he thinks about that, but he knows this Mocha won't end up like the first one.

He won't let it.

*

Mayami really, truly tries with Present Mic.

Sure, she owes him a lot. She heard enough times during her enrollment at Ketsubutsu that her dream of working in the hero industry was going to be difficult to achieve. Her quirk isn't good for offense but she trained like hell to make her body into a weapon. She clawed her way to the top of her class in all of the academic courses and studied with the support department to compliment the very specific ways her quirk can be utilized. She hung up her first internship request rejection on her wall, and did the same for the next four. After graduation, she hung up the first ten agency rejections before they started to just pile up along with the unpaid bills on her coffee table. Present Mic was lucky number 29 who actually took her on, who said 'Nice to meet you' at first and repeated it in sign after she did.

She was honestly a little star struck for the first two weeks after that. Present Mic, a big name hero like that took her on, always signed to her and never asked why she doesn't just wear hearing aids when she's not in costume. She's pretty sure he doesn't even notice that she doesn't have ear canals.

The haze of hero worship faded fast after the first two 70 hour work weeks she pulled, and she quickly realized he didn't need it in the first place. Her first two jobs are as his sidekick and as his right hand on his radio show, but her most important job is to put a pin in the balloon that his ego can become if left unchecked. She has to bring him down sometimes, and that's just as important as bringing down a villain. She knows after seven long, long years that very few people can do what she does.

And she was pretty sure that after the two light weeks she'd had, knowing that Present Mic was spending all of that time with his little ward, she was going to be working very hard this weekend to make it up.

"Byte," Present Mic says with a sigh, looking up at the sky instead of the patrol route they're supposed to be walking. "I need your honest opinion. Is headbutting...a sign of affection? Maybe?"

There are times that Mayami wants to take off her headphones, not just because it's a stupid little 'Mini-Mic' gimmick that their manager keeps insisting on with an almost perverse obsession. She wants to make it very clear that she just doesn't want to hear whatever nonsense Present Mic is working through, that she just wants to cut in to hear when he's rambled himself back into cohesion because there are plenty of times that he can do it on his own.

This is not one of those times. No, she's really got to hear this one.

'Which goat kid?' Mayami signs, smirking when Present Mic seems to realize that there's so many ways to take that. Sure, that cute little Eri girl doesn't look like a baby goat apart from the horn, and while she doesn't know what the mystery ward looks like she doubts he has a mutant goat quirk. But it honestly wouldn't surprise her if Present Mic had taken up animal husbandry as a hobby and bought a couple of real baby goats instead.

“Shinsou,” Present Mic answers, his hands repeating that cute little sign name that he can’t help himself from signing whenever they talk about his ward. “So, I feel like I’m really getting closer to him. Being sick was not fun, and I know the kid was miserable, but we kind of...cuddled? And it was nice, he seemed okay with it, and today he kind of headbutted my chest because I was kind of bugging him, but it was...gentle, you know? He gently headbutted me, so maybe he likes me?”

Mayami can’t find the words to sign how sad Present Mic’s entire existence was to think that this kid for one didn’t like him after all the bragging she’s had to endure, and for two to think that headbutting was a substitute for hugging. She hopes that he caught on to all of that in the dry look she gives him.

Present Mic probably did, because now he was revving up into panic mode. “Look, I get it! I get it enough to know I don’t get it! Shinsou’s, you know, had it really rough and this whole thing is just new territory for him. It’s just really new to him, like - like he was raised on an island with no people around, you know? Not like one of our islands, he’s definitely never traveled outside of Japan so he was raised on an island, but-”

Mayami resorts to letting the air drag out of her lungs, ‘sighing’ which was something she had to learn how to do once she got access to specialized support equipment at Ketsubutsu. It still feels weird to do it, much like talking. “Hie likes yoh, dombass.”

Mic knows she doesn’t like talking, that even with the support equipment that allows her to use her quirk to hear herself, it never comes out right. He stops for a bit before he starts walking again, keeping himself at her pace instead of rushing ahead again. “I know he probably does. He at least likes me more than Shou, but uh.... What if I adopt him?”

Mayami turns to look at Mic fiddling with his headphones, pulling them half over his ears before he pulls them back. If he wants to put them on so he doesn’t hear a verbal response to that, he doesn’t have to worry because if she tried, she’d probably laugh. ‘You haven’t already?’

Instead of flustering, Mic drops his hands from the fidgeting and sighs, and that’s a big sign that teasing on her part should be a more serious question. “I can’t now, but... I want to? I can’t really say no to him when this whole thing has blown over, because it’s just.... I’m probably the first person in his life that he sees like this. And I see him like that. Even if things aren’t really like ‘this’ or ‘that’ and it’s... There’s so much this kid doesn’t know and what if I mess up? What if this headbutting thing isn’t good, maybe he was trying to tell me to piss off but I thought it was cute and-”

‘Stop,’ Mayami signs, nearly begs. ‘You’re a dad now. You’re going to ruin him for life. Shin Amaze will be ruined if I don’t meet him. Give him sane aunt.’

Mic stares at her in horror, and she’s beginning to think the horror might be from the last part. That’s bullshit, especially because she’s Mic’s sidekick and this wardship business was an extension of his hero work. It’s criminal that she hasn’t met the kid yet. “Byte. You know I love and respect you, so so so much. But you’re going to teach him bad things! Like not liking me, and trust me, he doesn’t need help with his attitude because the herolets are definitely getting him up to speed on the teenage moodiness!”

‘Rude,’ Mayami signs, but that’s not the half of it. Yeah, she gets that Mic probably took her on as a sympathy case. Her quirk means that she can hear electrical signals through skin contact, big whoop. Almost anyone could get a black belt in three different schools of martial arts if they tried hard enough, and that’s not enough to call yourself a hero or a sidekick.

She could have had it easier if she threw herself into the Support Equipment Department. She’s heard plenty of times that her quirk and her test scores would have made her a fantastic engineer, but she doesn't have the heart for it. Her heart has always been set on something else.

It's stupid, but she had a dream when she was a kid. 'The Silent Hero.'

She had to wait until she was 16 to learn how to talk, because she was born without ear drums or even an ear canal. Sure, there were a few times that she tried to make her own support equipment with microphones and splintered input cords stretched over as much skin as she could manage with conductive plating. But even then, she didn't want to use it to talk.

She's pretty sure that's a normal thing for people like her. Clearly not for Mic, he's deaf and you can't stop him from talking. But she's sure there are other people who find it just as unnatural as she does. People who might want to know that it's okay to go through life without having to learn to twist their mouths a certain way, how to expel that air so it comes out closer and closer to 'normal' talking.

Maybe those kinds of people would like to see that a hero doesn't have to talk to make it as a hero. That you don't have to change yourself in any way that you don't want to, and that it's possible that you really can be anything you want, regardless of what anyone else says you have to do to be 'normal.'

"Byte," Mic says with a sigh, and he doesn't have to make it so serious when he tells her that she needs to piss off. It's fine, she really wouldn't have gotten this far if he didn't take pity on her, so if he wants to keep his little ward all to himself, she doesn't really care. She just wanted to meet this kid and maybe give him a little less pressure on the 'talking' thing. As stressed as Mic has been about the kid not talking, she knows he's probably been trying to push the kid to talk and he shouldn't. "If I bring Shinsou to the studio... can you promise not to not act like I'm so lame?"

Mayami looks at Mic, who looks like he's going to cry because he really is that fucking lame.

"I get that we have a little back-and-forth thing, you think I suck, I think you're amazing, but my show is my little baby and I don't want Shinsou to think that I'm... I don't know, I'm clearly not the 'Master of my domain' thanks to Ooro and the damn contract quotas, but maybe he can start to think that 'Present Mic' is a little cooler than he is at school, you know?" Mic says, and he's so far gone at this point it's almost funny. 'Dad' wants to show off how important he is at his job, and he doesn't want any sassy little sidekick taking the wind out of his sails and embarrassing him in front of his 'son.'

"Wow, Present Mic! Su coohl! Yur a music god!" Mayami starts gushing in English, holding her hands to a face that isn't blushing, but Mic's is. "Ohnly a music god could war such tight pants! Do youh use butter to--"

"Byte, we've been over this! They're tailored and comfortable," Mic interrupts, even if he's clearly lying about the second part. After that disaster demolition job they had a few years back, she knows he can only stand to wear his leather pants for 12 hours before they start chafing. "You don't have to act like that, because it's so weird, but just... Don't make him think I'm lame?"

Mayami signs a universal 'Okay,' and maybe she'll hold up her end of that bargain. But she can't wait to get her hands on that mysterious little ward who absolutely already knows how lame Mic is.

A Child's Sleepover

Chapter Summary

27 goes to his first sleepover, and finds it disappointing. Aizawa and Eri make plans to go on a mission together, and Aizawa receives Shinsou's essay as to why he should be allowed to see his mother.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: Original Mocha's death mention, 50 mention

Previously on Wards of UA: Ashido sent Shinsou a picture Shinsou is embarrassed of, and threatened to send it to the 1-A chat if he didn't 'dress like a 5 year old, bring Mocha' and go to a sleepover she's holding. After Ashido gave her witness statement concerning Shinsou telling her that his mother sold him, she went to Build-A-Bear with Aizawa to get a lumpy orange bear made, which she named 'Rupert' after a teddy bear she had when she was younger and friends with Shinsou. Shinsou can talk to Ashido, Midoriya, and Bakugo as he had Brainwashed Ashido when they were children, and Brainwashed Midoriya and Bakugo when he tried to escape UA, but he believes he's overcome his selective mutism. The 1-A students came together and agreed that Aizawa would probably make Shinsou write essays if he had to discipline him, and Midoriya and Todoroki visited Shinsou's dorm without asking permission a few chapters ago, and Present Mic wasn't happy about the visit. 'The guy with the cat head' AKA Sansa, did not make a good impression on Ashido as he asked Aizawa to let Shinsou keep talking in 'Cat Fight,' even though Shinsou had just been slammed on the floor by his hair by Ojio. Todoroki told Shinsou that his father, Endeavor, asked Todoroki to befriend Shinsou in order to bypass Aizawa and get information about The Miasma. Shinsou was shown a video of Ashido's 4th birthday where he was invited. Aizawa and Eri had been living at the 1-A dorm while Shinsou was sick, and while Aizawa had been spending a lot of time with Midoriya, that meant that Eri had been in 1-A's care during that time. Eri got a Reverse Uno card from Kaminari after Kaminari explained that nothing bad can happen to someone no matter what they say, as long as they're holding it, which Eri took very seriously. Eri has been struggling with Shinsou not spending as much time with her as he used to, and in a previous discussion with Shoji, Shoji explained that he has a little sister Eri's age that he doesn't spend time with but still cares for. Shinsou's avoidance for asking direct questions has been noticed early on by 1-A. Shinsou has been 'coughing' in the middle of asking questions since he got over his illness. Shinsou intermittently has issues with his right hand, which would shake noticeably when he first arrived at UA, but has not given him as many issues after he found out that Chisaki was dead, but may still act up when he's under stress. Yamada made oatmeal that Shinsou was able to customize and realize that he could have had good tasting oatmeal instead of the bland oatmeal he ate for most of his life. Aizawa attempted to make Shinsou a mocha coffee with milk and chocolate syrup, which would taste more like coffee ice cream with chocolate syrup on top, but Aizawa never told Shinsou that it was a mocha. Bakugo has not only been disappointed in Aizawa and Yamada's ability to care for Shinsou, but has also learned that Aizawa has limited medical guardianship over 1-A students. Aizawa has been trying to get Shinsou an appointment with a Quirk Specialist, and now is waiting for The Commission of Wardship Affairs to approve it. Shinsou's laptop has a keylogger, and Aizawa and Naomasa can see anything he types on it. Aizawa instructed Ashido, Sero, Kirishima, and Kaminari to copy The Japanese Penal Code multiple times after they drugged Bakugo and accidentally Shinsou with benadryl in Tooth Fairy. Aizawa knows that Shinsou still thinks of himself as 27, and that he was sold by his mother. Shiori, Aizawa's informant, gave Aizawa reviews from a Villain Yelp website where Miasma Numbers were mentioned, and from that Aizawa found criminal groups that contracted Numbers.

27 imagined that Ashi had been confident in her threats, but apparently he was wrong. When they get to the Class 1-A dorm, she's standing in the common room with a tight smile and a lumpy orange teddy bear in her arms, waiting for him to succumb to what she wants.

He's still not sure if he's dressed like a 5 year old, and maybe 5 year olds didn't wear face masks. He's not sure if Ashi is dressed like a 5 year old either. She's wearing an odd jumpsuit that covers her feet, and has a hood that looks like a snail's face. And more disturbingly, she's not the only one who's dressed differently.

Kirimson Shark is wearing shorts and a loose T-shirt, and also has a teddy bear in his hands. Izuku is probably lucky that All Might isn't here, since he's wearing a jumpsuit that looks a lot like Ashi's though it's styled to look more like All Might's hero costume with disturbing yellow bunny ears at the top of the hood to look like his hair. But he still looks nervous as though All Might could walk through the door and see him like this.

Bakugo looks the same, and 27 is far too relieved by that. But Zappy is holding a Pikachu stuffed animal a bit too tightly, staring at him too pleadingly. "Shinsou, can you brainwash me really quick so I can go to the sleepover too? We've got so much to cover with memes, there's so much I need to teach you-"

"Nope!" Ashi commands, holding a hand in front of Sparky's face. "Only people that Shinny can talk to are invited to the sleepover!"

"Curfew is still enforced on the weekend," Aizawa says, crossing his arms. "You can't be in the common areas after 10:30, and mixed-sex gatherings in the dorm rooms have to be broken up after 10."

Ashi pouts, but that really isn't going to convince Aizawa, and she knows it. "Sensei, Shinny's never had a sleepover before! And you can't make him have a sleepover with Midoriya or Kirishima or Bakugo!"

"I agree," Aizawa says, and while that brings a spark of light back to Ashi's eyes, Shinsou knows that it will be short-lived. "Which is why Shinsou will be returning to the Safe Room at 9:55. You have three hours."

Shinsou looks at Eri to see where she will go. Maybe she wasn't invited to this 'sleepover' event, but she never has to be invited to anything that the hero students do because she's always welcomed. It's supposed to be like a '5 year old's sleepover' anyway, and he's pretty sure this is just a convoluted way to invite her to it.

But Eri follows Aizawa after he turns to start walking up the stairs, and clings to Aizawa's sleeves without even telling him goodbye. He doesn't know why, but it leaves him cold enough to be unable to tell her that he'll be back.

She must still be mad at him, and he doesn't know how to fix it. If he can fix it, or if this will just drag on and become their new 'normal.'

He hates it.

"Shinny!" Ashi says before she takes both of his hands, swinging them back and forth. "We're gonna cram a whole night of fun into just three hours! I've got snacks in my room, and movies, and no one else is invited!"

Even if she's still smiling, still swinging his hands, her voice drops to something colder and more serious.

"You brought it, right?" Ashi asks in an oddly grave way, a way that almost makes him not want to answer. But he does with a nod, even if he's less willing to bring Mocha out of his bag now. "Great! Let's get this show on the road, guys!"

There's no road, just walking up the stairs to Ashi's floor while Kirimson Shark and Izuku talk about sleepovers that they had as kids, and Zappy follows behind all of them still pleading for 27 to brainwash him so he can join.

He doesn't have to brainwash him to talk to him, and he doesn't want Zappy to know that. Bakugo apparently doesn't want to do this either as he tries to make a break for his own floor once they stop on Ashi's, but Kirimson Shark grabs him to stop him. "C'mon Bakubro, this is gonna be fun--"

"This is stupid as shit! Shitsou isn't fucking five, this is some fucked up kinky bullshit and it's fucking disgusting--"

"Kacchan," Izuku says, adopting that fearsomely cold tone that Ashi uses sometimes. "Wasn't that sleepover that we had when you turned three really fun--"

"Fuck you," Bakugo growls, killing intent clear in his narrowed eyes, but Izuku smiles like he doesn't see it. Or he doesn't fear it.

27 would be lying if he said he didn't fear the same thing that Bakugo did. 'Obey. There's hope.'

He's not sure if Bakugo understands that sign, but he swallows and nods. He's being blackmailed into this too, probably with the same kind of threats that Ashi holds over him.

He doesn't remember anything about the picture that she sent him, he doesn't remember being a part of it. Even if he's changed a lot since it was taken, he doesn't have that much unscarred skin left anymore, he doesn't want the Class 1-A chat to see him like that.

He doesn't know if Izuku has a picture of Bakugo as a shirtless toddler, smeared with finger paint that turned brownish purple where it wasn't streaks of blue, red, green and yellow. Judging by how that younger Ashi was smiling proudly next to him, the only paint marking her skin on her hands, he thinks she was trying to paint him purple so that they could match. She was born with pink hair and skin, so it must have made sense to make his skin purple to match his hair.

It should be ridiculous, when he's so far removed from that moment in time, but he just doesn't want anyone to see that picture.

Ashi's room is small, maybe smaller than his, and there's blankets strewn everywhere along with different movies and snacks and drinks half-organized on a small table. She also has pink string lights along her wall, and a few tiny potted cacti on her desk. He wonders if she names them too, like Eri named her little plant 'Beanie.' "We've got yogu-milk and popcorn and chips and candy, and ice cream downstairs for later! This is going to be the best 5 year old's sleepover ever!"

"And you can talk to me, right Shinbro?" Kirimson Shark asks, oddly nervously while he runs a hand through his oddly deflated hair. "I can't remember if you used your quirk on me when we were in school together, but-"

"I can," 27 answers, even if he's not sure if he did either. It doesn't matter anymore, but he doesn't want them to know that. At least with Kirishima, there's a reason that wouldn't raise suspicion. "I need to know how to write an essay after this."

He doesn't know why, but all four of the hero students look at him somewhat suspiciously after that. Ashi looks more shocked with her widened eyes, Bakugo more angry with his narrowed eyes, and Izuku and Kirishima look somewhere in the middle. "Oh. Did you get in trouble with Present Mic-sensei after Todoroki and I-"

"Who the fuck did you kill?" Bakugo asks, and he seems oddly content with the idea that 27 did kill someone as he opens one of the cans on the table. "If Shitsei's actually giving you some essay bullshit as punishment, you must have seriously fucked up."

"I didn't," 27 answers, even if he's not sure now. If the essay was a punishment, it was a bizarre form of one. And he wasn't intending to do something worth punishment. Maybe it was out of line to offer his help, maybe it could be seen as insulting, but it just seemed so easy if he just had to be seen by his mother to help the investigation. "The police want me to see my mom, and I told him that was fine. He wants me to write an essay to explain why I want to do that."

The hero students look like that was a mistake, and maybe he should be more cautious. He's getting oddly comfortable here, but he shouldn't forget how tenuous his position is now. If Aizawa was right and he wasn't useful to the investigation anymore, he should just keep his head down and enjoy what he has. He shouldn't make any bold moves like that and give him a reason to move him away or get rid of him.

Kirishima sits down on Ashi's bed and looks at the teddy bear he has, lifting up one of its arms. "Uh, yeah, maybe Sensei's right about not doing that. It probably wouldn't be good for you, you know, Shinbro?"

"Yep! Sensei's got the right idea, not those police officer guys," Ashi agrees, shuffling through the movies that she has on the table. "Like, that guy with the cat head kind of seemed like a jerk, and your mom's a total jerk, you know? Oh! Have you seen Howl's Moving Castle?"

"She's probably not," 27 argues, snapping as the tension does. He doesn't know what his mother is, he doesn't even remember and what he remembers might not be true. He can't piece out dreams from reality from that time, and he just wants to know. "It doesn't matter if she is, she's not Chisaki. It's the easiest way to help the investigation."

"Fuck that," Bakugo growls. "It's not your job to find those assholes, and Shitsei doesn't fucking want your help anyway. Fuck that and fuck your mom for getting you mixed up with that shit in the first place-"

"Um, Todoroki," Izuku says, wincing a bit after he does. "Todoroki really didn't mean to make you worry, Shinsou. If Aizawa-sensei says it's not necessary, you really shouldn't worry about it. That probably means that he doesn't need help finding those people-"

“The fuck does IcyHot have to do with-”

“I want to,” Shinsou says, loud enough to cut through Bakugo’s prying and make his intentions known. This wasn’t what he wanted to admit, but he has to admit it. It’s not just for the investigation. “Eri is fine, and Ashido is fine. But I need to know if my quirk drove my mother crazy.”

He needs to know if it’s her fault or his.

If she isn’t crazy, if she wasn’t hurt like that, then she sold him for no reason. She’s just a bad mother, and he can accept it more easily. The Miasma, the 8 Precepts, everything that happened to him to keep him underground and apart from everyone else who had a normal childhood was a result of his mother being a bad person, and himself being unfortunate enough to be born from her. He would have never had a warm mother, a warm childhood in the first place, and he can be more grateful for what he has now.

If it’s his fault and his quirk that drove her crazy, he can accept that too. He caused everything, his crimes and his violence didn’t start at The Miasma but started earlier. His mother was his first victim, and she rightly guided him to the place that he would have ended up anyway. The Miasma trained him because he was meant to be a villain with his quirk.

Maybe he’s not a villain, because he doesn’t want to be. He doesn’t know what he should be, when that question spans out more answers than he can even name. He’s never known what the future will hold for him to this degree, he’s never been less settled into his space because the threat of death seems to be missing now. Aizawa and Yamada won’t kill him, and The Miasma might not be able to touch him here.

He doesn’t know what the future holds, but somehow that makes him look to the past. He just wants to know the answers there, so he can know where he stands in one place. He wants to know where he started from.

He wants to know who he is, and that starts with his mother. His mother, who named him ‘Shinsou Hitoshi.’

“An essay starts with a thesis statement, then supporting paragraphs to back up-” Izuku starts to explain, before Bakugo and Ashi yell to cut him off.

“Don’t fucking help him with that shit, Deku-”

“We’re having a sleepover!” Ashi yells, holding her lumpy teddy bear out in front of Izuku’s face. “We’re watching cartoons, we’re eating candy, and we’re not doing school work! We’re going to have fun!”

27 sighs. “I just need help with-”

Ashido’s eyes cut to him, and he regrets inviting her attention when she’s so incensed about this. Especially when he knows what she’s going to demand before she says it. “Mocha.”

27 glances around the room, and his eyes settle on Kirishima’s teddy bear. Izuku and Bakugo don’t have a stuffed animal, but Kirishima and Ashido do. He knows it’s normal for five year olds to have stuffed animals because Eri does, but they do too. It might not be weird that he has Mocha, but it’s probably still weird that he wants to hide him.

It’s probably weird that he still thinks of the first Mocha, in a way that makes it difficult to remember that this one isn’t that same plushie. They look so similar, soft gray plush and smooth black eyes, even if they're not the same. One has sat safely on his bed this entire time, has only made a trip to the vents once and was placed in his stash box a few times. The other was taken with him to The Miasma, hidden under his mattress unless he needed to feel his fur or show him to 50. The other was touched by 50, held by her too. Burned to ash in his room after he was discovered.

He finds himself staring at Bakugo's hands when he lifts the flap of his messenger bag to reveal Mocha's face for Ashi, who squeals in delight. "Mocha! Now Mocha and Rupert can be friends again!"

Ashi holds out her teddy bear again, and 27 remembers enough about that video that she showed him that it's not really 'Rupert.' Either Ashi outgrew that Rupert or she melted him with her quirk one too many times, and that Rupert was discarded and replaced. Maybe there's some sadness in that, how disposable the body was but the name was kept for another.

Maybe there's some comfort in keeping the same name. Despite how much time changed things, there's a part of it that lingered on and was able to be here for this.

Ashi manipulates Rupert's arms to give Mocha a hug once Shinsou lifts him fully out of the bag. He doesn't make Mocha hug Rupert back. It seems a bit weird to enforce whether Mocha will actually be friends with Rupert, even if he knows that Mocha is a stuffed animal and doesn't have opinions on it. Ashi doesn't seem to mind it.

Bakugo does, and whatever he was going to say about it is cut off by Izuku adopting that cold tone again. "Mr. Explosion Ma-"

"FUCK OFF," Bakugo screams, setting off a few explosions towards Izuku but they wouldn't reach him even if Kirishima didn't tackle the green haired hero to protect him. "Don't fucking bring that baby shit up, Deku! I'll fucking kill you and tear that fucking raggedy ass creepy fucking All Might plushie to fucking pieces you fucking-"

"Midoriya," Ashi calls in a saccharine sing-song tone, but that might be even more fearsome than her usual way of threatening people. "You said you didn't have a plushie to bring to the sleepover."

"It's at home!" Izuku argues, waving his hands back and forth to calm Ashi down when he should still be concerned by the sparks from Bakugo's hands, even with Kirishima still acting as a human shield. "But I'm pretty sure Mr. Explosion Man is-"

Bakugo screeches and Kirishima barely hardens himself in time, but for some reason Ashi seems fine with excusing Bakugo from this odd requirement when she smiles back at him. "Let's pick a movie that Mocha will like! I think Mocha likes cat movies, right?"

Shinsou is pretty sure Mocha doesn't have opinions on movies, since this one has seen so few of them. The first Mocha probably liked watching Kawaii Kawaii Pussycats as much as he did, but probably hated playing the part of Tiger when he was pretending to be Mandalay and needed someone to fight the villains that weren't stopping after he told them to with his mind.

It's funny, if that memory is true. It still seems like something he might have made up, just because it fits too well.

If he was using Mocha to play out a scenario where he had a telepathy quirk he wanted, and Mocha hated it and got hurt when he twisted him around to fight the invisible villains. If that was really just him preparing to use the quirk that he was really going to have, controlling and hurting Mocha with his will and commands.

The explosions and arguing fade in waves after Ashi starts the first movie, but 27 isn't paying much attention to it. Between the plushie in his hands that he's still stupidly concerned about, and the task he still needs Izuku's help with, this movie doesn't interest him much at all.

He needs to do well on that essay to know if his quirk hurt his mother.

*

Aizawa was afraid of this. While he was trying to get to the bottom of the Problem Child's new quirk, spawned by a quirk he had no idea about, he had left Eri in Class 1-A's care a bit too much. He regrets it. He regrets it immensely.

"Hmph!" Eri kicked the pillow beneath her feet again, but he was sure that the coloring book that she was working on wasn't the cause of her frustration. "Zawa, we're having so much fun in here! Twenny's really dumb for not being here, because we're having so much fun."

Aizawa fights an intense urge to bury his face in his hands, settling for folding them under his chin. He didn't want Eri to pick up sarcasm this early, but given that she spends a great deal of time around teenagers, it was bound to happen. "I have a feeling that something is bothering you, and I won't be angry about whatever it is. You can use the Uno card if that would help you talk to me about it."

From the reflection of the computer screen, he sees Eri start to drop her head towards the coloring book, both legs kicking the pillow and laying there. Maybe this isn't the proper time to exercise 'Communicating Needs and Wants Clearly,' but he was hopeful that she might be a bit more forthcoming if the conversation seemed more like her idea.

And he sees when she rolls over to pull out the Reverse Uno card from her bag that she might still need a totem to make her feel more secure in this difficult conversation. She rolls off the cot and walks over to him, and holds the card out with a frighteningly irritated glare.

"I don't like Twenny not being here, Zawa! I know it's really bad, but I want Twenny to be here all the time and stop having friends if they're just going to do stuff by themselves!" Eri looks at the card with a pout that threatens tears, before she stomps and finds that she still has a bit of aggravation left in her. "It's not fair! They're having a little kid sleepover and I'm not invited! That's the worst, and they're heroes so they can't!"

Aizawa nods understandingly, finding a new layer to this irritation that he hadn't considered. "That might seem like they're trying to be cruel to you, but I think they're trying to give Shinsou a sleepover that he hadn't experienced when he was your age. I don't think they would turn you away if you wanted to ask to join them."

Eri starts bending the card back and forth, fidgeting with it while she considers what must be an unpleasant task, judging by the grimace on her face. "I don't want to. I just want Twenny to be here, 'cause he didn't even miss me."

Eri drops one of her hands holding the card and throws herself into his lap, and even though she needs a card to know that it's safe to speak her mind, he's reassured that she doesn't need any invitation for comfort when she knows a tearful fit will be coming on. Aizawa runs a hand over her hair, her face tucked against his chest, and he brushes her hair back when he hears the first sniff. "Shinsou did miss you. I understand that it's confusing now that he has other people that he likes to spend time with, but that doesn't mean that he cares for you any less."

"Li-ike Shoji?" Eri asks, wiping at her tears before she looks up at him. "M' not Twenny's little sister, but Shoji doesn't spend time with his little sister, and that's o-okay."

Aizawa tilts his head, something that he had decided against becoming an option again. Perhaps it would be a more direct method of modeling how the Shoji siblings didn't have to be so different from the two wards. "It is like that. When Shinsou comes back, you can talk to him about this directly. But there's also a mission that I think you'll be interested in taking to help me tomorrow. Unfortunately, I can't bring Shinsou because he doesn't have the skills this mission requires."

The 'skills' that he requires from Eri are entirely related to her age and appearance, and Aizawa finds himself a bit too grateful to seem a bit less out of place at the venue that the Shoji siblings were going to meet. An older man sitting alone in a playground full of children might attract a great deal of attention where it wasn't wanted, but with the presence of a 5 year old child, it will seem completely disarming.

And as much as a trip beyond the walls of UA might work to Eri's benefit, Aizawa had his own reasons for wanting to keep his presence to a minimum to accompany his student on a family visit. Namely, why that visit was so urgently requested by Mr. and Mrs. Shoji.

*

Kirishima super respects the way that Ashido operates. Like, he's never seen her get discouraged or give up on something she really wants to do, and that shows she has the manliest kind of fighting spirit that he's seen since Crimson Riot.

It also kind of put him off from being tight friends with her until UA. There's manly fighting spirit, and then there's bossiness, and Ashido can swing pretty hard both ways.

Shinsou seems to deal with it a little better though. He can also kind of rock the glittery purple nail polish too. "Ugh, purple or black, I still can't pick," Ashido whines, raking a hand through her nail polish bag.

Shinsou doesn't offer his opinion, just like he didn't when Ashido decided on his nail color. It's not just because Kirishima knows Bakugo will only let him have a turn painting his nails if it's black, but Kirishima kind of thinks it'd be cool if Ashido and Shinsou matched. "Dude, the last time you rocked that dark purple, it looked awesome."

"True!" Ashido decides with a nod, and Kirishima swipes the black nail polish with his free hand. Bakugo glances up from his super manly work of painting Kirishima's nails a super manly maroon, but Kirishima knows he won't say anything unless Midoriya or Ashido notices.

Midoriya's been busy on his phone, and Kirishima's kind of hoping he's right about what he's doing. Midoriya is kind of a whiz about quirks, so he might be able to pull out a bunch of facts about whatever Shinsou is worried about with his quirk and prove him wrong about making his mom nuts.

Kirishima doesn't really know if Shinsou's mom is nuts either. He knows that Ashido knows something, and he knows that she had to go on this weird trip with Aizawa-sensei where they got some crepes because of it.

But it's not really cool that Shinsou thinks his quirk can hurt people. Even if it can, maybe he was wrong about worrying about it so much. Shinsou is a pretty chill guy, and it's really hard to imagine a guy who has a stuffed animal that has a name and everything would be the same kind of guy who would tell someone to jump off a bridge or something with his quirk.

Kirishima grins when Bakugo's finished with his nails, because Bakugo gets the lines so even and the finish is so manly. Bakugo rolls his eyes when Kirishima starts opening the black nail polish, but he lays out his hand with his eyes boring a hole through Midoriya, sure to snap if he notices.

It's nice, though. It's a little closer to the Bakubro he knew before all that messed up stuff in Kamino happened. The anger was always there, but sometimes it seems too brittle. Too easy to snap.

But this is nice.

"I don't know how to do this right," Shinsou mutters, kind of way too focused on Ashido's nails as he paints them. There's a couple of splotches on her cuticle, but it's super hard to get the lines even at first, and he knows Ashido's been through way worse. And everyone knows the deal with the 'I don't know's from Shinsou.

"I've got some Q-tips--"

"How do I do this," Bakugo growls, enunciating in a way that's a little not cool. "Like I fucking said, no one gives a shit if you ask questions or quirk anyone. Hell, dumbass acid wash wants you to quirk her ass again--"

"But, it's cool if you don't want to, Shinbro!" Kirishima cuts in, even if he knows that Bakugo's trying to do some Baku-good, he's kind of forgetting some stuff. "Like, no one's gonna be mad about any way you talk, you know?"

Bakugo huffs and rolls his eyes, but that's just because he's a little too manly to admit that he might have forgotten that. People with any kind of mutism problems shouldn't be pressured to talk and all, and it'd be super unmanly to make Shinsou stop talking.

Shinsou glances at him before he takes the Q-tip from Ashido to clean up the edges, but it's kind of hard to know what that look means with the face mask and everything. "I'm not going to quirk you, but how do I--"

Shinsou kind of... sneezes, or something. It's kind of hard to tell, but he might still be getting over being sick. At least Bakugo doesn't look like he'll say anything or leave, because he's super proactive about not getting sick, but that can kind of come off the wrong way. Especially with Shinsou, who had to live with a different kind of germophobe.

"Do this right?" Shinsou asks, and he switches which hand is holding the brush to his left one. He might be ambidextrous, and that is super manly and cool.

"You're doing it right, it just takes some practice to get it down," Ashido says, waving her fingers to kind of make it harder for Shinsou to start practicing. "Just do tiny little strokes and try to keep them even. Like that!"

"Ask another question," Bakugo says, the hand that Kirishima isn't working on flexes but it doesn't curl like he wants to use his quirk. But something is definitely bugging Bakubro about Shinsou.

"Why--" Shinsou sneezes again, but this time it sounds closer to a cough, and Kirishima can tell Bakubro didn't like that before he hisses.

"If you're doing that shit on purpose, fucking stop, it's annoying as shit--"

"It's probably not like that, Kacchan," Midoriya cuts in, looking up from his phone but luckily

Bakugo just pulls his hand under the table instead of swatting the nail polish out of Kirishima's hands. "It's, um...."

Shinsou is staring at Midoriya with his head tilted just a little bit, like he kind of wants to know too. Maybe it's not as weird to Shinsou to have a bunch of people talking about his problems right in front of him, since he has so many, but Midoriya clues into that it could have been rude just a little too late.

"Uh, some emitter quirk users can have Activation Phobia, and sometimes they can do things to prevent their quirk from activating subconsciously. Like coughing, or keeping one of their fingers curled if it's touch activated, or-"

"It's fine," Shinsou interrupts, turning back to Ashido's fingernails. "I don't need to use it."

It's hard to know what to really say to that, because Shinbro's right that he doesn't need to use it. He's safe at UA, and he kind of seems like he could defend himself pretty well without it. But his quirk is his and all, it's a part of Shinsou just like his hand, and Shinsou being so messed up about his quirk has to be hard for him to deal with.

"I need to learn how to do this for Eri," Shinsou says, and that is the manliest thing that Kirishima has ever heard from Shinbro. Even though the 1-A girls could and would paint Eri's nails any time, Shinbro is kind of the coolest kind of big brother to want to learn how to do that.

Or, he's kind of Eri's big brother?

Like, there's the whole joke about Shinsou being Eri's mom, and it kind of makes sense that Shinsou would be a little protective over Eri with what they had to go through. But even though Eri seems to like being at UA a little better than Shinsou sometimes, it's still really cool that Shinsou wants to help Eri be a normal little girl now.

That just means it's even more important for everyone to help Shinsou get to know what a normal childhood looks like, even if it's important enough that Shinsou gets to know it for himself.

*

This is like Yamada's oatmeal, but worse.

27 knows that he's different. He knows his childhood was odd in hundreds of different ways. Children are supposed to have birthdays to mark the years that pass by, and he didn't. Children are supposed to go to school and have friends, and he didn't. But the gravest injustice in his childhood is apparently the lack of sugar in his diet.

Ashi and Kirishima's method of dealing with that is honestly disgusting.

He's never had ice cream before. He didn't know which flavor to pick. He shouldn't have told them that.

The 'bowl' that they're using is actually a mixing bowl, with exactly two scoops of each of the seven flavors in the freezer. Then, they added a small portion of each candy topping to each flavor, and a drizzle of both chocolate and caramel from the bottles. Then whipped cream, which is quickly becoming his favorite part but he's sure if he tells the truth, it will disappoint them.

It tastes like pure sugar. There's almost no other flavor, there's nothing to really enjoy. He wonders why Stress Bake wants to be a hero if he has to eat this to use his quirk. He feels nauseous every time he looks at the 'bowl.'

But Kirishima and Ashi are both looking at him, and he doesn't think they've blinked once since they started. They're ignoring their own ice cream too, and it's melting. Maybe he could get some amount of vengeance on them if he forced them to wait until it's all melted, but that would mean that he's the only one suffering from this awful, staticy feeling. "Vanilla ice cream, pistachios, and chocolate." He's pretty sure that's what they put in the corner that he can stomach the best.

Kirishima and Ashi give each other a painful sounding high-five, and maybe that was the answer they were looking for the most. He knows it's not really a test, there's nothing that they really want from this. There's nothing to get from this, knowing what kind of ice cream he likes.

He tries another corner, the one he thought was the second kind of chocolate - fudge, which Izuku says is better and Bakugo thinks is trash - but it's not and all of this pain so far has been worth it. "No, this one. The coffee one is better."

He doesn't care if they see that he's pushing some of the candy toppings aside to really enjoy this corner of bliss. Why did they only give him two scoops of this one? It's coffee, but it's cold and soft. The sharp bitterness even makes his stomach stop twisting and trying to revolt, because there's nothing to revolt against.

Ashi sighs, slumping over the back of her chair, and even if he thought there wasn't a wrong answer, apparently the right one is. "Shinny, coffee ice cream is so gross! It's not sweet, so it's not supposed to be an ice cream flavor!"

"Dude, there's natto flavored ice cream. Anything can be a dope ice cream flavor," Kirishima argues, and Bakugo seems to retch with a hand over his mouth. Even Izuku seems to turn a bit greener. Maybe natto was a dish that he should avoid trying, especially in ice cream flavors.

"Coffee ice cream is fucking great, don't fucking listen to Shitty Hair because his tastebuds are all fucked up," Bakugo growls, and he's right on at least one count. "Fucking pineapple in pea soup!"

"It's like a little tropical zest and stuff," Kirishima explains, but that must be an old argument because Bakugo looks too defeated to fight it when he glares with his hands steeped over his nose. Kirishima seems to take it as an argument all the same. "Hey, you've got to try new flavors out, 'expand your palate' and stuff."

Shinsou gives a withering look to his bowl again. 'Trying out new flavors' can be excruciating. He thinks it's better to stick to what he knows is good, and be grateful that he has it. He knows that coffee is good, but maybe with a bit of the chocolate, it could taste like a mocha.

It's sweet, a bit too sweet, but it's somehow familiar. Not like the mochas that he had before the interviews, but it's similar, just more sweet and somehow diluted.

He sees a shadow that he can easily identify on the wall coming down the stairwell, and while his first instinct is to sit straighter, the one immediately following is to eat as much of this coffee ice cream as he can. He puts a huge spoonful in his mouth and instantly regrets it as an odd, lancing pain seems to connect the roof of his mouth to his brain somehow.

His eyes are screwed tight against it, making him blind to Aizawa's entrance though he can still hear the door open along with a long groan from Ashi. "Sensei, it's only-"

"10:45," Aizawa states, and more than the freezing pain in his head he feels a cold chill down his spine. He was supposed to go back to the room at 9:55. He was supposed to watch the time, and he did after the first movie, and he did it after he stole that book, but he hasn't since they came down to the kitchen. "You're breaking curfew, and this is your only warning. You won't receive a second one in 5 minutes.”

27 opens his eyes to see the hero students scramble. Ashi, Kirishima, and Izuku are dumping out their bowls into the sink while Bakugo puts up the ingredients at a slightly more relaxed pace. He starts barking at them not to use the garbage disposal because ‘You shits don’t know how to use it,’ and volunteers to do it himself.

Ashi turns away first to pounce on him, her arms too tight around his shoulders and pressing his face into her weird hood. “It was fun hanging out with you, Shinny! We’re gonna have a 6 year old’s birthday party next week!”

He’s not sure why he doesn’t want to answer that, why he just waves when Kirishima and Izuku tell him goodbye before they run up the stairs to follow Ashi’s lead. He doesn’t know why he wants to flinch when Bakugo tosses the spoons into the dishrack after he washes them, like that anger is directed at him, or why it would be a bad thing if it was.

But Bakugo seems more angry than usual since Aizawa came into the room.

“Family reunion, huh?” Bakugo growls under his breath, but he’s not talking to 27. 27 watches as he turns his head to look at Aizawa, how Aizawa glances at him and 27 looks away, the cold throbbing in his head fading. Bakugo is too damn nosy. “Look, I don’t know shit-”

“You don’t,” 27 utters, half under his breath but he means it even when Blasty turns to glare at him.

“But it’s pretty fucked up that no one’s told Shitsou that this fucking complex about his quirk driving his mom crazy is messed-”

“Can you-” 27 feels red, feels boiling heat in his coiled fists until he feels a cough bubbling out of his throat, coming out as a strained breath before it catches and comes out clearer the second time. Apparently, that makes Blasty mad too, and he flicks on the garbage disposal with a hiss.

“And you’re still not over that quirk illness bullshit because it’s all in your fucking head. You keep coughing when you ask questions, dipshit, probably because no one’s taken you to a real fucking doctor,” Blasty shoots a glare at Aizawa before he turns the garbage disposal off and the faucet in turn. “So, what’s Shitsou got to do to get that emergency medical decision bullshit from someone-”

“Bakugo,” Aizawa interrupts sternly, his arms crossed and feet a bit farther apart. 27 doesn’t know if he’ll use the capture scarf first, if that’s the only thing he’ll use. He’s never seen one of the students talk to Aizawa like that but he’s never seen Bakugo’s fists shake like that either. “Thank you.”

Blasty is too fucking nosy. He storms off before the numb chill leaves 27 with the inclination to teach him to keep things to himself - especially about 27 and especially to Aizawa. But he still feels the clench of that anger in his fist when he goes to dispose of his ice cream and he feels Aizawa’s stare boring into him.

“Your mother doesn’t have Mental Quirk Abuse Syndrome,” Aizawa says, and he’s said it before. 27 knows it’s a possibility, his quirk might not have driven her insane. But he doesn’t know, and he’s not sure if Aizawa does either. If he’s lied to him about this too. “A quirk specialist will be able to tell you whether that’s even a risk with your quirk. I should have that appointment in less than a month.”

27 watches the mirky water fill higher, the globs of ice cream melting and ribbons of whipped cream with it. He flips the switch that Blasty did and the garbage disposal whirs to life, grinding all the candy stuck at the bottom until it's something that can be disposed of. He rinses the sink clean before he turns it off, a flare of numb irritation lancing through him when he turns around to find Aizawa still staring at him. Like there's any part of that 27 is supposed to answer to.

Apparently, there is. "Is that why you wanted to see your mother?"

27 shakes his head. That's not all of it. He wants to know why it happened - why it really happened. Was he really that monstrous to his own mother that she had to get rid of him? Or was it only for the money?

Was there something that he could have done differently, to grow up normally? To grow up with Ashi, to have sleepovers and eat ice cream and have pets? What did he really do to her?

What can she do for him, after all these years? That's what he really wants to know, in a way that he doubts he should tell Aizawa. Even if Aizawa knows about it now.

27 knows how names work, and he's tried to make it work himself. He's tried to drive that name under his skin but it won't stick, not in any usual way. He knows it's because it's an unusual name for him now.

Everyone at UA can call him 'Shinsou,' and it won't matter. UA came after the fact, after the raid and after everything, but if Shinsou wants to keep this name, he has to go to the beginning of it.

To the person who gave him that name.

*

Between spells of typing, Shinsou looks at either his phone or a book that he seems to have borrowed, but Aizawa has barely been able to look away from his phone.

Essays need to be a regular occurrence. Weekly at least.

Aizawa knows that Naomasa will be reading the same thing that he is, the still building list of reasons why Shinsou should not see his mother under any circumstances. The keylogger likely builds that list even more clearly, the things that Shinsou types then tries to omit with the backspace key are still recorded here.

Aizawa tries to give no indication that he knows exactly what is in that essay when Shinsou turns the laptop around to face him. Aizawa finds that task easier because even though Eri was asleep when Shinsou began his task, at some point she woke up and rearranged herself.

She's laying on top of Shinsou's back, one arm curled under her head but the other and both of her legs are dangling off of him. It can't be comfortable to sleep like that, and it probably wasn't comfortable for Shinsou to continue working on his essay while trying not to disturb her. But Shinsou doesn't look like he'll move her, curling his arms under his own head and Aizawa worries that they might both sleep like that, despite any aches they'll wake up to in the morning.

Aizawa pulls the laptop to sit on his knees, reading the slightly more censored version of what he's read. Shinsou's lack of education is easy to miss with his vocabulary, but the essay structure is a bit messy, if easily overlooked. He also wonders if one of his students gave him a crash course in essay writing, as the finished product is double spaced where he would be able to add his own comments if it were printed out. And he's tempted to do just that if Naomasa tries to overlook this.

'There are several reasons I should meet with my mother. There are several reasons you should want me to. There's no reason that you should not allow it.'

He had even more reasons not to.

He can't see the title of the book, but he recognizes the maroon cover and golden stripe on the spine from when he gave it to Ashido to copy by hand. Shinsou still believes that the actions that he took before the rescue are prosecutable, and he took the time to add up the toll of his supposed crimes. He believes he would be sentenced to 112 years in prison and 2,300,000 yen in fines, and that helping the investigation is a way to 'repay his debt to society.'

But that isn't all. He knows that one of his students, possibly Bakugo, was sending him information that he cherry-picked and cited in his second argument, to argue that he needs to see his mother to know whether his quirk affected her. Research indicates that most mental quirks are too weak to cause that kind of strain until well after they're fully developed, but Shinsou presents those same studies with an emphasis on 'most.' He includes all the ways he would be able to tell at a glance whether she had it, all of the symptoms laid out in a way that tells Aizawa he's already imagined the meeting taking place in hundreds of different ways.

And then there's a reason that's more disturbing than the one he first imagined. Shinsou doesn't want to meet his mother to form a bond with her. He wants her to rename him.

'I wasn't allowed to leave the first room I was taken to until I answered to 27 as my name. It will be my name until my mother takes that back, when she calls me 'Shinsou Hitoshi.' '

'I want to be Shinsou Hitoshi, not 27. I want to know whether my mother was hurt by my quirk, and see that for myself. I want to help the investigation, and you want that too. Now that you know my reasons, there's no cause to stop me from seeing my mother, and for you and the police to get the information that you need from her.'

There's no mention of the sale. There's no mention of the price, and Aizawa is still selfishly grateful for that. Over two million yen and 112 years are difficult to see regardless, even if he knows there isn't a sane judge in the country that would pass down that sentence on a victim of child trafficking. It's unnerving only because Shinsou didn't include his math, how many times 'kidnapping' or 'assault' had been boiled down to legal terms that certainly didn't apply to Shinsou.

Shinsou is Shinsou, absolutely regardless of what name his mother would call him in a meeting that will never happen. "You're not responsible for anything that you've done until this point. You're not going to go to prison, or pay for your actions in any way."

Shinsou's gaze hardens at the laptop for a moment, but flicks up to meet Aizawa's eyes with a sickening plea behind it.

"A quirk specialist will determine whether Mental Quirk Abuse was ever a risk for your quirk or ever will be, in a far more definitive way," Aizawa reasons, even if it sounds all the more hollow with even more mounting reasons why The Commission of Wardship Affairs needed to sign a useless document to allow that.

Shinsou still stares, more pleading than disheartened, and it's difficult enough to put to words the reasons why he shouldn't trust his mother to rename him.

"Your name is Shinsou Hitoshi. The reasons why it doesn't... seem to be yours to you are complicated. There is no simple resolution for it, and not through your mother," Aizawa states, closing the laptop and watching Shinsou's violet eyes follow the motion, almost clouded in disappointment. “I’m glad that you were honest in this assignment, but that doesn’t change my decision.”

Aizawa places the laptop back in Shinsou’s bag, knowing that at 3 AM, the teenager was already going to miss a full night of sleep but he should try to recover a few hours. But he’s only slightly surprised that Shinsou doesn’t want to do that. ‘I want to see her.’

Aizawa nods, taking that request for what it was. A rare moment of Shinsou being forthright with what he wants, and asking for something far greater than a cup of coffee or a photograph of Eri. It’s a bold request, and one that isn’t going to be granted. “You’re done with the investigation.”

‘E-N-D-E-A-V-O-R,’ Shinsou signs, pausing afterwards as though that were a weighty explanation. It isn’t, Aizawa doesn’t think for a second that Shinsou was concerned about Endeavor’s health after the Nomu attack. Despite all the blame he seemed to take onto himself, he doesn’t think Shinsou would take on that. ‘Take investigation from you.’

That was an explanation, if an inexplicably formed one. “Why do you think that would happen?”

‘T-O-D-O-R-O-K-I told me. Meant to be spy,’ Shinsou signs, and if that was true, not that Shinsou would have much reason to lie that it was, that didn’t come up in his long discussion with his student. ‘Help investigation. Won’t leave.’

The Commission would place Shinsou in Endeavor’s custody over Aizawa and Hizashi’s dead bodies. And he doesn’t doubt that Principal Nezu would rally UA to become a fortress to stop that from even becoming a possibility. “Endeavor can’t take over the investigation, and he won’t be able to take you from UA. We have enough leads, and closing the case is just a matter of time. You don’t have to worry about the investigation.”

They have leads, so far useless but Aizawa reasons that’s only because he hasn’t been involved as much as he planned to be. Naomasa and Sansa have talked to incarcerated members of named groups who contracted Numbers, and while the possibility of lowering their sentences should have loosen some lips, it didn’t. Aizawa knows there are methods that can’t take place in prison cells, and at worst he knows that Shiori knows more than what she’s divulged so far.

Shinsou gave him the name. Unwillingly, but it was done, and Aizawa swore time and time again that it was all he needed to keep Shinsou safe. Words mean nothing, but nothing was as powerful as action, and he would prove that he would keep that promise.

But that wasn’t enough for Shinsou. ‘I don’t know what she looks like. Wrong,’ Shinsou signs, and though Aizawa can’t see it from behind the face mask that Shinsou still hasn’t taken off, he can imagine the slight frown that would match the small furrow between his eyebrows. ‘I don’t know what my mother looks like.’

That’s not a good argument for Shinsou to see her in person, when Aizawa could remedy that so easily. He turns back to the monitors and goes through the methods of getting access to the highly restricted investigation files, to pull up Shinsou Ui’s mug shot when she was first brought to the police station. He clicks on the photograph to enlarge it, and turns around to see if it had any impact on Shinsou.

He sees Shinsou’s hands fold together before he looks away, but there’s a strain behind his eyes in the way he focuses on the floor that makes Aizawa glance back at the photograph. His eyes catch on the white roots of her purple hair while his mind catches on a list of symptoms just repeated to him in that essay.

“Your mother is 40 years old. She’s old enough to have white hair naturally,” Aizawa says, even if he could go into greater detail with a list of reasons for premature graying. After Hizashi saw his first suspected gray, he quickly became an expert and passed that information along to Aizawa despite how unwilling he was to learn it. “You didn’t hurt her.”

‘I don’t know that. I want to know,’ Shinsou signs, still not looking away from the floor. His hands move sharp and irritated, but Aizawa knows this is far more complicated than a tantrum from a child being denied something they’ve asked for. But Shinsou still won’t get what he wants.

“I’ll ask Hanajima to do a thorough work-up on your mother while she’s in custody. A report from a licensed professional who can determine whether she has Mental Quirk Abuse Syndrome. And I’ll give you that report as soon as I get it,” Aizawa says, even if he knows that much is risky. What Hanajima could uncover about that woman’s mental state could still devastate Shinsou, but he knows that Shinsou trusts documents more than words. Something he can hold in his hands is proof.

The document going over Hizashi’s monthly stipend for Shinsou’s care was what convinced him that Aizawa didn’t own him after all.

He knows that promise is not enough for Shinsou, but it settles the conversation enough for now. Just like he expected, Shinsou curls his arms under his head and closes his eyes, choosing to sleep like that rather than disturb Eri to make both of them more comfortable.

It makes Shinsou look more like a pouting child, and maybe he is. But he’s a child in Aizawa’s care, and thus likely to be disappointed in the choices made to take care of him.

Aizawa still doesn’t know if Shinsou Ujima was ever a good caretaker for Shinsou, but it doesn’t matter. Aizawa is Shinsou’s caretaker now, and that might mean disappointing him for his own wellbeing.

Girl's Day

Chapter Summary

Aizawa and Eri go on a mission off-campus to escort Shoji to meet with his family. Eri makes a new friend, Aizawa has a revelation, and Shoji thinks about the impact he can have as a hero.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warning: Severe bullying among children, Body dysmorphia

Previously on Wards of UA: Eri dresses in long sleeves and leggings because the sight of her scars can make her distressed. Eri has begun calling Chisaki 'Fuck Chisaki' in order to overcome her fear of addressing him by name. Eri has been irritable at Shinsou at times. Shoji and Eri had been uncomfortable around each other, as Shoji avoided being around Eri because he was concerned that wearing a mask around her could make her afraid of him, and Eri picked up on that to assume that Shoji didn't like her, a dynamic that many people noticed. At Shichi-Go-San, a festival for young children, Shinsou made Aizawa and Yamada aware that Eri would try to hug anyone as short as her. Shoji wears a mask constantly because he's unnerved by his mouth not having lips, after being bullied in school for that. Eri will sometimes get distressed when she can't pronounce a word correctly, as Chisaki had clapped his hands or made loud noises when she misspoke in order to teach her to 'talk properly,' something that Shinsou tried to ease by reassuring her that it was a 'hard word to say.' Shinsou got upset and threatened Uraraka on the group chat when he learned that she was using her quirk to float Eri. Aizawa's 'Death Coffee' is extremely potent, and would aggravate underlying health conditions. Eri's horn has been growing from 'happiness,' which Mirio said he wanted her to learn to do because he didn't want to recover his quirk with her pain. Shinsou has been hiding that he feels he's able to talk and that he's no longer selectively mute. Shinsou has spoken to Mirio on very rare occasions before. Eri has pulled out a Reverse Uno card because Kaminari told her that anyone who holds it can't get in trouble for anything they say.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Eri's never had a mission with Zawa before, but she knows that Zawa's missions sometimes means he has to dress different. Yama told her she just had to dress cute, and he said that whenever she wanted to pick out clothes for herself, she could do that from now on after she asked, but it's kind of hard.

It's not easy to pick out clothes for her like it is for Twenny. She knows Twenny likes to wear long sleeves and cats, and she does too. But some of her clothes don't have long sleeves, or the pants are short so she has to wear other clothes underneath them.

Yama used to tell her that it was okay for her to get dressed alone, and Zawa did too, but Eri really kind of hates that. She can take baths alone if she has a whole lot of bubbles, but sometimes when she's getting dressed, she wants to talk to someone when she has to look at her legs or arms, where Fuck Chisaki made her ugly.

Yama was making sure that Zawa looked really cute for his mission, and that meant that Eri had to get dressed with Twenny's help, and she doesn't really like it.

"This looks cute," Twenny says, pulling on one of her pink overalls that she did think was cute before Twenny touched it with his sparkly hands. Ashido painted Twenny's nails while they were on a little kid's sleepover, and she even used the fingernail polish that Eri likes the most, so now Ashido isn't Eri's friend anymore.

Eri shakes her head, and pulls on her new favorite clothes so Twenny can get them for her. It's a blue and white stripy hoodie with little pom poms on strings, and when she's not wearing the hood on her head, it lays on her back and kind of feels like a cape, and she needs to wear a cape for her hero mission with Zawa. She needs to wear pants too, because heroes pretty much always wear pants, except for the Dragon Lady that visited her in the hospital.

Twenny also wants her to wear her favorite puffy pink jacket that makes her look like Thirteen because it's really cold outside, but even though Eri wants to not like it anymore, she can't. It's still her favorite.

"It's too bad you can't come too, Twenny," Eri says, even though she feels like it's kind of not. Twenny would just do dumb stuff if he went on the mission like hang out with other people, and Zawa says he doesn't have the 'skills' for it anyway. "You never get to leave UA, but I got to have fun going shopping with Yama and Zawa a lot."

It's kind of sad that she hasn't gotten to go shopping in a while, even though it's kind of scary sometimes. Especially when it was Yama, 'cause Yama always seemed kind of scary at first on their shopping trips, but after he took her to a nice place to eat, he seemed a little less scary. "I think you'll have more fun with Aizawa anyway."

Twenny talks in a kind of sad voice, but when Eri turns around, he looks like he's smiling. He's just being mean and sounding dumb and sad, but he's not really sad to be away from her. He used to always be sad about that, always. He sometimes used to look like he was going to cry if she was bad and already crying in The Chair, but he never does that now. He always seems happy to get to be away from her.

"And... Yamada wants to take me to his show for some reason tonight," Twenny says, kind of scratching the back of his neck, but his glittery nails still make Eri really mad. "I don't really want to, but he seemed excited about it."

Twenny is lying, and that's really bad.

Even when he says he doesn't want to, he smiles a little like he does. It's a really tiny smile, mostly just that he's not frowning, so he's really just lying to Eri and she hates it more than Twenny not going to the hero dorm with her tonight to do dumb stuff.

"You can't!" Eri knows it's bad to yell, and Twenny always used to tell her to be quiet, but he looks too surprised to tell her now, and that just makes her mad enough to stomp her feet. "You can't go! You're supposed to stay here!"

Twenny reaches out his hand to pat her head or tell her to be quiet, but she turns around and crosses her arms because she doesn't want him to. But she kind of does, really bad when he starts talking.

“I know, Eri. I’m not supposed to leave UA because of the investigation.”

Eri doesn’t know a whole lot about the investigation, but it sounds like a big mean monster. Twenny said the investigation made him do stuff away from Eri, and Yama said the investigation made Twenny have to talk to Fuck Chisaki. Eri kind of just wants the heroes to punch the investigation and make it go away so Twenny doesn’t have to do stuff, even if some of the stuff isn’t bad. But they’re not doing that.

“Yamada said it would be fine, but... I can tell him I don’t want to,” Twenny says, and he’s lying even more. He sounds really serious, and that means he’s really sad. He lied to Eri that he didn’t want to go, and he’s lying about it again. But this time it’s such a mean lie that it makes Eri kind of sad in her feet, like she’s standing on something cold. “I was worried about it anyway. The hero students have been kind of annoying, but we can do something fun together instead. Anything that you want to do.”

Eri has a lot of stuff she wants to do with Twenny. She wants to do everything with Twenny.

But she already knows that he’d rather be with the hero students, and he’s just lying to her again.

*

After the disaster that was the Summer Training Camp this year, hero course students who have their provisional licenses are only allowed to go off campus unescorted for a maximum of one hour. Aizawa is keenly aware that new rules like that are highly restrictive, and that makes his attendance at every rare family visit highly invasive. But if there’s one benefit to the requirement of living in the dorms, it’s that commuter students like Shoji are better rested and prepared for their studies without a two hour long train ride in the morning.

He noticed that Shoji was uncharacteristically withdrawn last night, going to his room at an early hour, but despite that he doesn’t look well rested today. “I apologize for taking up your time, Aizawa-sensei.”

“It’s fine,” Aizawa says with a wave. Shoji was one of many of his students who was more than entitled to his time. More than entitled to his current preoccupation with glaring down any other passengers on this bus who stared at him a bit too long. “It’s procedure now. I doubt that anything will require my attention, so Eri and I will be keeping out of your way.”

That would be the right thing to do, the least invasive course of action to take. But something prickles at the back of his neck and reminds him that eavesdropping on private conversations is a useful skill in a great deal of his hero work.

On the surface, he knows there’s nothing to really rattle his guard like this. Shoji has always been an exceptional student, there’s nothing that would hint at any trouble from his personal life. He might be uncomfortable because Aizawa’s attendance at this family visit is uncomfortable. He knows it could even be due to bringing Eri along, or excitement towards seeing his family for the first time in months that he’s misread.

But he couldn’t miss the slight strain in Mrs. Shoji’s voice when she asked if the visit could take place as soon as possible. In particular, he can’t forget that she asked if Shoji’s little sister Mizuno could come along twice.

He also can’t miss that this is the first time that Eri will be in somewhat close proximity to another little girl her age, and with Shinsou’s advice given at Shichi-Go-San, he knows that comes with a risk. After they exit the bus, he lets a purposeful distance build between them and his student before he reminds her. “There might be a lot of children your age at the playground, and a lot of fun things to do. Just remember our mission, and make sure that you can see me at all times.”

Eri nods, walking a bit closer to him with a swell of foot traffic and a particularly loud laugh from a group of teenagers passing by. She’s been a bit quiet since leaving campus, and hasn’t let go of his hand. UA is still more comfortable for her, but it doesn’t seem to be more serious than normal child-like nervousness in a new environment. “So you can see me too, and we can keep an eye on each other. And if I meet any new friends, I gotta give them a high five first.”

Aizawa nods, still finding another prickle of worry creeping under his skin. Eri’s first instinct when seeing someone her own size was apparently to give them a hug, and while he wasn’t ashamed of that, he was... worried.

Children can be cruel, and with her circumstances, she hasn’t learned that. She hasn’t learned proper social interaction with children her own age, because she’s never experienced it. And due to her circumstances, he didn’t want her to learn another layer of cruelty in this world, to have her reach out too boldly and be mocked for it.

He grew up as the weird kid, but he overcame any need to change that. He’s heard it all, that his clothes smelled weird, that he looked like a pirate with the eyepatch, that his mother didn’t love him because she packed his lunch in a brown paper bag instead of a bento box.

Children can be cruel. And painfully perceptive. Those words can strike true and they can hurt, and if a single one of those children hurts Eri he doesn’t know what he’ll do. What he’s truly capable of if it comes to that.

He knows it’s harder, because Eri isn’t ‘weird.’ Knowing her circumstances, she’s startlingly well-adjusted in some ways. But without knowing her circumstances, without the maturity to see past anything beyond the norm that small children somehow lack, she might come off odd and invite attention because of it.

Aizawa can tell by the way Eri’s grip loosens and she leans forward a bit when they come to the playground’s entrance that she’s already seen her first target. There’s a part of Aizawa that can see that as an opportunity, and there’s another that dreads what will happen if worse comes to worse.

Shoji’s smile is covered by his mask, but it’s unmistakable in his voice when he kneels to greet his younger sister with a hug. Mr. Shoji isn’t in attendance, but Mrs. Shoji is. His student favors his mother’s Dupli-Arm quirk more strongly, though her quirk gives her two fully formed arms with little webbing between them. Mizuno doesn’t have additional arms but there is webbing that hangs from beneath hers like a cape, seemingly blushing when it flushes to a bright pink with a pungent smell of roses seemingly coming from nowhere.

Shoji Mezo’s quirk was a blending of multiple appendages that could create additional sensory organs, but it seems that Shoji Mizuno’s quirk produced sensory events. It could change color and smells at least, and may even be influenced by her mood, which wasn’t uncommon in children that young who had little control over their quirks.

The members of the Shoji family that were here had many similarities - white hair, mutant based quirks, and while Mezo was the tallest, Mizuno also seemed tall for her age. But there’s one similarity that stands out to Aizawa.

All three of them are wearing clothes that cover their mouths.

Shoji can be startlingly mature for his age, and Aizawa had previously thought that his tendency to wear a mask might be the singular indication that he was a teenager. That he might be so invested in the benefits for stealth in his quirk that he would pay homage to a certain ‘ninja’ aesthetic. But Mrs. Shoji’s scarf hiding the bottom half of her face, and the ill-fitting white medical mask on Mizuno’s seems to indicate something different.

It’s especially telling because that white mask is ill-fitting. A small grin similar to Ectoplasm’s peeks out at the edges, molars that are exposed but might not be for any purposeful expression.

The mask being ill-fitting, presumably new, and the need for Mizuno to see her older brother, an obvious source of comfort, reminds Aizawa of what he already knows. That children can be cruel.

When his student turns around with his little sister in his arms to politely introduce them, Aizawa is reminded that some children aren’t cruel. Eri tugs her hands to her chest, pulling Aizawa’s with it, and she’s far too excited to let Shoji speak before she asks, “Are you an angel?”

Aizawa feels almost overwhelmed at that, what he knows are kind words that might be due to how little she’s experienced, how she doesn’t know to hate what doesn’t appear ‘normal’ because she hasn’t seen enough of ‘normal.’ She’s seen ‘angels’ because of the costume that Ms. Joke sent her, and to her the webbing that falls from Mizuno’s arms looks like wings. She doesn’t know that could be an odd question to ask, that it might be better to know Mizuno’s name before saying something that bold.

Mrs. Shoji looks shocked with widened eyes, and Mizuno’s webbing colors in a swirl that seems indecisive as to how to take that. But as coolly confident as ever, Mezo nods. “Yes. This is my little sister, Mizuno, and she’s definitely an angel.”

Eri beams, because she hasn’t truly learned playful dishonesty, and runs forward with a hand outstretched because at UA, she seems to have forgotten restraint or fear in some ways. “My name is Eri, and I really want to be friends with a real angel!”

Mizuno doesn’t seem to know how to take that, curling herself a bit closer to her older brother for a moment, and Aizawa nearly feels numb when he sees what he can of her expression look close to tears. If this little girl cries, he knows he can’t blame her, but he’s not sure what he can tell Eri to explain it.

But the confused mottling of her webbing only flashes blue for a moment before it becomes a vibrant yellow, the smell of sunflowers nearly overwhelming. “I-I wanna be friends with you too!”

Shoji sets his little sister down, and she runs towards Eri with the same determination, but ignores the still outstretched hand to greet her with what might honestly be a normal response for children that young. She hugs Eri tightly, even if she dwarfs her by nearly half a foot, and Eri only hesitates for a moment before she hugs her back.

His student ducks his head with what Aizawa knows is a grin, a nest of worries that called for this visit seemingly resolved without much help from him. But with three hours still arranged for, and the excited way Mizuno runs to her brother to take the new pair to the swings, Aizawa knows that this visit will go far more smoothly than he anticipated.

Especially when he has some slightly prying questions for Mrs. Shoji in regards to what his student’s early education was like.

*

Eri thinks that her horn is going to get so big and full of happiness today that it’s going to be even taller than Shozo.

There's so many things to do! She can swing on the swings and go up really high, and even though Shozo doesn't really want her to jump off, when she does she feels like she can fly! There's slides too that make her tummy kind of flippy in the middle of sliding down them, and there's a carousel that's a little scary because Shozo can make it spin around really fast!

Eri didn't really know what to do at first, but she has the best, greatest, most awesome, and coolest angel friend in the whole world to show her. And even though Zawa seems really busy talking to Mizzy and Shozo's mom, she knows he's gonna be okay, and she'll be okay because she has Shozo and he's a hero. "Mezo! Let's play hide and seek! Me and Eri want to be hiders first!"

Eri really doesn't know why Shozo didn't really like her at first, and she kind of hates it because Shozo is so fun. And his little sister is the best, and she knows so much stuff, and all of it's fun to do. Even when Shozo says stuff like 'Don't jump like that' or 'Don't leave the playground,' it's still really super duper fun! "Okay, I'll count to twenty, but remember not to leave the playground."

Mizzy grabs Eri's hand and already knows where to hide, so Eri runs to follow. She's never run so much in her entire life, and it makes her face really hot and her jacket feel kind of sticky, but Eri really really likes it.

Mizzy pulls her into a big circle-kind of thing with a lot of holes in it, and it's a little more dark but it has another slide in the middle. There's some box kind of places built around it that seem like good places to hide, and a princess tower in the middle that goes all the way to the top of the circle. Eri wants to run around all inside it, and maybe even climb that tower to climb on top of the circle. She could probably touch the sky if she was that tall!

But Mizzy reminds her that they're 'hidere,' so they've got to hide from Shozo, and they hide under the slide. The sand is really cold under Eri's hands, but she had to take off her mittens to really hold Zawa's hand and make sure it didn't get cold, and she really likes holding Mizzy's hand too much to put them back on.

Mizzy curls up really small, so Eri does too, and then Mizzy starts giggling so Eri does too. It's so fun to hide from Shozo! It might even be more fun than a logical ruse!

It gets so fun that it's almost scary, because they have to be quiet when Shozo walks by and tries to find them. He keeps saying that they must be really good hidere, because he can't find them, and Eri has to hold her hands over her mouth to keep from giggling at that. Shozo is a hero, there's nothing he can't do, so if he can't find them then they must be the best hidere in the whole world!

Eri accidentally giggles when Shozo sighs, and Mizzy does too, but it's a good thing he doesn't hear that because he walks away wondering if they're hiding under the carousel. That's really silly, because the carousel is only a little bit above the ground, so they'd have to be super little to fit under there.

But it's really nice that Mizzy is little, even if she's not as little as Eri. She's littler than any of Eri's other friends, and even though that means she can't pick her up or throw her in a game like the hero students, it's really nice in a way that makes Eri's tummy feel weird. It makes her feel like her tummy is full of flowers, and maybe it's because Mizzy smells like flowers a lot.

Mizzy peeks from behind the slide even though Shozo might see her, but then she pulls back around and giggles. "Mezo prolly gets confused with all the stuff he can hear and smell, 'cause sometimes he's really bad at this game."

Eri really doesn't want Shozo to be sad about being bad at this game, and she doesn't want him to be so bad that he can't find them. It's really fun, but it'd be really not so fun if he didn't find them, and they just sat here and waited for him to find them.

Mizzy gets to have a lot of fun, and she's really good at it. She knows how to play a lot of fun games with Shozo, but that kind of makes Eri sad.

Because Shozo is a hero, so he lives at UA, and he probably doesn't get to play these games with Mizzy a lot now. But maybe Eri can fix it. "If I ask Zawa, maybe you can get to come live with me at UA with Shozo! There's not a whole lot of places to play games, but we can play a lot of hide and seek because there's a lot of places there, and lots of places to hide!"

Mizzy doesn't really like that, and her wings change color to blue for a little, and the flower smell turns into something that doesn't really smell nice. "My mom said I can't, 'cause Mezo has to work hard at his school, and I gotta work hard at my school too. Even though... I really don't like going there."

Eri knows that UA is one of the best schools in the world, so she feels kind of sad that Mizzy can't go there. She feels really sad when she thinks that she might not get to show Mizzy what UA looks like at all, and she really wants to show her how awesome it is. "You're so good at having fun, so it's not fair that you don't have fun at school!"

Mizzy kind of gets really small, so Eri does too just in case they have to hide, but then she starts pulling at her mask like Twenny does when he's kind of scared. "Eri... I really like you, so if... you get kind of scared, I want you to just tell me, and not... be mean."

Mizzy's wings are really blue, but they're also kind of green, and Eri still doesn't know what it smells like but she knows it's not a nice smell like soaps smell like. Mizzy takes off her mask and looks at her kind of scared, but Eri doesn't know what she's scared about. "I'm not scared, Mizzy! You just got a whole lot of teeth! I used to have a whole lot of teeth, but I lost this one."

Eri smiles really big and pokes at the hole where her tooth used to be, but when she does she feels a tiny hard thing that she scratches at. She must be getting her adult incisor soon, like Momo told her she would!

Mizzy doesn't look at her like the heroes do when she shows her lost tooth to them, but it's a little like Twenny looked when she first showed him. She puts her mask back on and looks around like she wants to find Shozo even though they're hiders, but then she sniffs like she has a runny nose. "Eri, maybe your eyes don't work right. Or maybe your nose doesn't. I'm... I'm really ugly and smelly, and you really... really sh-shouldn't be my...."

Eri frowns, because she knows all her stuff works right. She had to get looked over by a whole lot of doctors when she was in the hospital, and they all said that she was doing really good. It was kind of like saying that Fuck Chisaki should have made her messed up somehow, but he really didn't other than the ugly marks all over her. "I'm kind of ugly in places, and when my horn gets too big, it's really gross. But you're an angel, Mizzy! You're not ugly at all!"

"Ew! Someone's dog pooped really bad!" Some of the other kids that were running around the playground start running over, and they sound kind of scary and loud. Eri looks to see a bunch of boys that look kind of bigger than she is, maybe bigger than Mizzy, and they look kind of mean like Ugo looks sometimes. "EW! They're crawling around in dog poop!"

Mizzy hides her face in her legs and tries to hide her head, and her wings are so blue that they're almost black. Eri doesn't know why she's hiding like that, but that weird smell gets kind of bad.

“Don’t crawl around in dog poop! You gotta bury it!” One of those boys says before he raises up his hand, and a whole bunch of sand starts glowing before it hits Eri and gets all in her hair.

Eri stands up and gives them a mean look, because they’re acting really bad. They’re so bad that her tummy is flipping so much it feels bad, and her skin is so itchy that she has to make her hands into fists. “Don’t do that! You can’t use your quirk on civi-visilions!”

It’s a really hard word to say, even though Zawa says it really easy, and it just makes Eri madder that she can’t. And it really makes her mad when that boy just laughs even meaner than Ugo can sound sometimes. “Ci-vil-ians! Don’t say words that you can’t, you big baby!”

Zawa says that people who use their quirks to do bad stuff like crimes are villains, and Eri really really REALLY hates villains. She stomps her foot but she still feels too big with all the mad inside her. “Go away or I’m gonna call the heroes to stop you!”

Shozo is already running over, and Eri knows that he can beat up villains really good with all the fists he can make, but Eri feels too hot and too mad even with that stomp, so she takes a deep breath and does what Yama told her to do.

She yells. She yells and she yells out a lot of the big mad, but even though she knows it’s bad, she wishes she had Yama’s quirk to make the villains hurt instead of look at her like she’s doing something weird.

But a whole lot of people start running over, even Zawa, and even though Shozo could probably beat up those villain boys Zawa says it’s always good for heroes to have backup and for them to do a lot of different team ups.

And Eri really wants Zawa to team up with Shozo to beat up those villain boys. “Eri, are you alright?”

Zawa is holding her shoulder, but she looks and sees Shozo picking up Mizzy from under the slide. If Shozo is doing the rescue part, then Zawa is probably going to do the attack part, even though hero fights and raids usually start with the attack part first. “I’m okay, but those villains are really bad! They used their quirk to throw sand at us even though we’re civi-silians!”

“They threw sand at us!” One of those villain boys says, even though they look really scared of Zawa. They really should, because they were lying and that’s bad too, and even the adults coming over might beat them up with Zawa. “We were just playing and they threw sand at us for no reason-”

One of those adult ladies holds her nose and makes a weird face like when Kiri makes food or Other Yama gets his favorite cheese. “Ugh, that smell. Don’t tell me you boys found another dead animal.”

“Sensei,” Shozo says, and his voice sounds kind of weird like he’s worried. Eri looks to make sure Mizzy is okay, but her wings are really black from what she can see with all of Shozo’s arms in the way, like he’s trying to hide her. “Could you-”

Zawa makes his hair floaty and Mizzy’s wings stop being black, and even though the bad smell goes away Mizzy starts crying. “Mizzy! It’s okay, the heroes are here to beat up the villains!”

“I’m not here to beat up villains,” Zawa says, but his hair is still floaty like he’s going to, and his voice gets really growly and mean in a way that Eri really likes. “But I’d hope that these boys’ parents are here to lecture them against using their quirks to bully two girls that are younger than they are.”

One of those ladies pulls a boy’s ear like she’s gonna beat him up instead, but another lady just sighs. “We’re definitely going to have a talk about that. Even if someone is a little different-”

“This is the age of quirks. Everyone is different,” Zawa says, and his hair stops floating but he doesn’t really stop looking so mad. “There’s no place for that cruelty in this day and age.”

Zawa holds out his hand and Eri holds it so it doesn’t get cold, but she still gives the villains a really mean look before Zawa makes her walk away. She still wants to watch them get beat up, but she starts to forget about that because Mizzy is still really sad. Shozo seems kind of sad too, because he’s still holding her like he’s got to keep her warm and protect her.

And that makes Eri really mad, because it’s not fair! “Zawa, you should still beat them up! They threw sand at us and they were talking about poop, and they’re villains because they said I couldn’t say stuff right just like Fuck-”

“Eri,” Zawa says, really quick like Twenny does when he’s worried she’s gonna do something bad. “That’s... A mad word like that isn’t something that you should say when we’re not at UA. But I’m....”

Zawa has a really nice smile on his face, even before he looks to show it to her, and she knows that means he’s really happy.

“I’m very proud of you,” Zawa says, and even if he says that about a lot of stuff, like the doctor tests that used to scare her or pictures that she drew really good, this time it makes her feel really warm and kind of small in a good way. Kind of like it feels when she gets to cuddle with someone. “It might have been scary to face those villains today, but you did exactly what you should do and called for help.”

Eri nods, ‘cause she knows that part after all the times that Zawa told that to the hero students. “Cause Ugo said I shouldn’t punch anybody until he shows me how to do it right, ‘cause I might get hurt. I’m just supposed to yell really loud because I’m little and the heroes will come and save me, and save Mizzy too!”

Zawa nods ‘cause she got it right, but he rubs his eyes like maybe using his quirk hurt them. “Bakugo has some words of wisdom, but you shouldn’t punch anyone if it’s avoidable. And when there’s a need for that, I’ll teach you how to defend yourself. Bakugo... might be busy with his studies for a while.”

That’s kind of bad, ‘cause Ugo is a lot of fun sometimes, but heroes have to do a lot of stuff and Eri knows that means she can’t hang out with them when they do that. It’s really fun to live at UA with a whole lot of heroes, but it’s not really fun when they’re all too busy being heroes to hang out with her.

Zawa stops too far away when Shozo goes to talk to his mom, even when Eri tugs on his hand because his mom looks kind of upset. Eri knows that Mizzy is still really sad because she’s crying, and when Mizzy yells ‘No!’ it sounds so sad that Eri feels like she’s going to cry.

Zawa’s head gets really itchy ‘cause he scratches it a lot, but then he sighs like he’s only a little mad like some of the heroes make him. “Eri, I need you to wait right here. It’s very important to our mission that I speak to Mrs. Shoji privately.”

Eri nods, ‘cause Zawa sometimes has to talk about stuff she’s not supposed to know, and lets go of his hand. She gets kind of bored of standing and kicks around the grass so she doesn't peek over, but she really really wants to because Mizzy is sad. But she knows that Zawa is a hero, so he's gonna make her feel better.

But she looks up and sees Zawa walking back with a kind of smile, and Mizzy looks like she's not as sad 'cause she's wiping away her tears. Even Shozo isn't protecting her with all of his arms, just the two big ones. Zawa crouches down with a really nice smile, and he says something that makes Eri smile so big she can feel it in her toes. "The Shojis are going to visit UA for a bit, and it would help if you could show Mizuno around."

Eri can't stop from hopping like Ko-Ko's bunnies, because even though Mizzy's sad, she knows all of her hero friends can make it all better!

*

Shoji knows that Mizuno can get overwhelmed easily. When she was younger, a sharp downturn in her mood would precede the tantrum, which would give in too easily to exhaustion. She's not entirely shy, but there's only so much she can handle, and even if it wasn't his biggest concern, he was worried about that before she went to school. When she would have to deal with a lot of overwhelming things.

But if anything, Mizuno's mood has only lifted higher after all the antics his peers have pulled. Of course Sato would make two batches of cookies in 15 minutes, of course Koda would introduce his bunnies. Of course Uraraka would have to float Eri and Mizuno, so that they'd both be little angels giggling above the heads of Class 1-A.

He has more reasons to trust Uraraka than Shinsou does, but that only made the nervous pull in his gut all the more embarrassing when he watched that and had to bite back pleas to set them down.

He's a little protective of Mizuno, he has to be. He held her in his arms when she was born, and she was so small. He gets annoyed with her at times, when she can be a bit demanding with the games she wants to play and how insistent she is that he has to play them, now. But before he was even accepted to UA, as soon as he told her that he wanted to be, she's been his most devoted fan. She cheered at any brief sight of him at the Sports Festival, she packed him a snack for the Summer Training Camp. The granola bar was still in his pocket when he went to Kamino, and more than once he had to press his hand against it as a promise to return safely.

It's embarrassing, but it's almost too intimate to have her meet the rest of his peers. To somewhat share her like that. He was nervous the first time Tokoyami came to his house, but it wasn't because he's embarrassed of his little sister.

He loves her, a lot. He's loved her before she was even born, when she was just a promise that his mother couldn't stop smiling about, and a threat to the quality of birthday and Christmas presents he would receive. He's always known her, always needed to protect her.

He's always known that there are some ways he can't.

The teeth were bad enough for him, but when Mizuno turned 4 and revealed that her webbing wasn't just decorative, but wouldn't grow limbs or mouths like his quirk did. He worried. Her sour moods had a new threat to them, his family knew not to let it show even if it was almost painful for Shoji and his father with their enhanced senses. But he knew. He knew this would happen when she started school.

He hates that he isn't there, that he's not there for her to come home to. He knows his parents are trying, his mother is considering quirk suppressant therapy and his father is looking into a special program for children with less than becoming quirks. He knows that makes it seem like the rancid smell of her sadness is all that her quirk is, but school is quickly making it seem that way. He doesn't even know the first incident that probably started this spiral, but he knows the last.

Mizuno tried to cut off her webbing. And there were three little girls who were going to 'help.'

She's six years old, after only two years of school it's gotten this bad. He knew that most of his classmates tried to understand what they couldn't, that only people like himself, Tokoyami, and Koda could. Emitter quirks are still the majority, people introduce themselves with their quirks because it's not supposed to be obvious. People have changed in the last hundred years or so, but most look like they did before quirks evolved.

He's never met anyone who personally believed it, but he knows there are some people who look to the first person who had a quirk as a religious figure. That baby born with the first Glow quirk bestowed a gift upon humanity, showing what quirks are supposed to look like. People with mutant quirks, people who have quirks that change their appearance too much aren't just wrong, they're unholy.

It's a cult, he knows that. He knows it's a minority, that it shouldn't matter to him.

It does, now more than ever. Because that small minority doesn't just hate him, it hates his little sister too.

He's glad that there are people who don't see that, who see Mizuno as the angel that she is. He almost stopped breathing when he heard Eri say that, almost terrified that she somehow knew that was his little nickname for her. He knows that Mizuno is scared, that apart from the horn, Eri looks normal, and normal looks too much like her bullies. He knows that even his mom is worried, especially after that well-deserved meltdown at the playground.

But the pungent smell of sunflowers has only gotten stronger, and Eri giggles so much while Mizuno teaches her how to skip, which only sets Mizuno off too. He doesn't think Mizuno has ever been this giggly before, and there's just something about the sound of the pair going off like that that tugs at his chest. It's embarrassing but he doesn't want it to stop.

He knows it will. He knows that Aizawa-sensei probably had to pull some strings to allow an on-campus visit this suddenly. Mrs. Midoriya had to go through a very thorough background check, but his mother hasn't applied for a visit because she knows he's busy. And he knows that she's very busy too, and a two hour train ride can take up a lot of time.

There's an unreasonable part of him that wishes Eri were right, that Mizuno could live at UA, and a slightly more reasonable one that argues maybe these visits could happen more often.

*

There's a frown Aizawa can't quite guard when Mizuno suggests playing hide and seek, and absolutely all of his idiots cheer for it to happen. The entirety of the 1-A dorm is considered but quickly voted down when Eri suggests that UA has 'lots and lots' of places to hide. There's somewhat of a reason why Eri hasn't learned that game, because UA has lots of places to hide, and there are reasons why a traumatized little girl might start those games without letting anyone know.

At the very least, he knows that she doesn't have the propensity or capability to start hiding in ventilation shafts like Shinsou does on occasion. Yet.

Given the freezing temperatures outside, he nearly makes it a point to excuse Asui, but she excuses herself to fetch a self-warming jumpsuit that the Support Department wanted to test out. He still observes the organization of this game, and breathes easier knowing that it will be done in teams. Eri and Mizuno are the first to be paired off, and if anything, Eri's new friend will keep her from becoming irrecoverably lost on UA's massive campus. Not when the smell of sunflowers is that pungent, and unlikely to wane.

Mrs. Shoji seems a bit less relieved to leave Mizuno in Class 1-A's care on this sprawling campus, even when it includes her son, but she doesn't say anything about her discomfort. Aizawa finds himself making a cup of coffee in an abandoned dorm, one of his student's parents sitting at the table, and feels an odd and irrational strain to want to keep watch over the game as well. It's wholly irrational, knowing his students so well and knowing that there's nothing to worry him.

He tries to ignore it, and simply enjoy a measure of peace, even if he had to steal some of Bakugo's coffee just in case Mrs. Shoji had any heart conditions that would be aggravated by his usual blend.

"Your class is very kind towards Mizuno," Mrs. Shoji says, a smile hidden by her scarf that he can still see in the fondness in her eyes. "I imagined that with heroes being so important to children that they would be patient with her, but... I truly didn't expect her smile to return so quickly after that."

Aizawa nods, drinking to hide his amusement and biting back words about how there was nothing his idiots would like better than to excuse themselves from their weekend studies to play with a pair of young children. "It's not entirely a part of UA's curriculum, but I think with Eri, my class has recognized that. It's a given that they might not be available for this every time."

There's shock that almost makes Mrs. Shoji drop her coffee mug, and given that it was Iida's, he's glad that he won't have to replace it. "Oh, I wouldn't."

"The security guard should have a more permanent visitor's badge for yourself and your daughter when we leave. The request wasn't filed, but a second background check really isn't necessary given that there was one performed before your son's admittance," Aizawa says, a reason that could explain why Principal Nezu decided on that course of action before he even mentioned it, when he had only wanted to make him aware that today's visit would happen. "Of course, you would still have to call to request a visit, but... I'm very aware that the dorm requirement can cause a strain. It's unfortunate that it's necessary."

He hasn't been approached, but he would do the same for any of his students. Their families were vetted, he would somehow make the time to be an escort. Mrs. Midoriya insisted that her son was busy and was thriving with a bit of independence, but there was a badge for her waiting as well.

He's not going to wait to be approached with this situation. Not when he saw too keenly the strain, how much his student meant to his little sister. Not when that little sister clearly needed him. Not when he has more selfish reasons to make it available.

"I do appreciate that, and of course I wouldn't.... I do respect what UA has done to protect my son, and he truly has done well here," Mrs. Shoji says, tugging her scarf down just enough so that she can drink the coffee. Her exposed teeth seem much like Ectoplasm's, given that she didn't have to tip the mug back too far to keep the coffee from spilling between them. Possibly fused together like his.

Like his student's. Like Mizuno's. "Ectoplasm also teaches here," Aizawa mentions after she pulls up the scarf. He's still not sure if that's something he should offer, if it would be more prying than gathering the names of every elementary school his student attended and the class names, a list that he intends to build with it.

Mrs. Shoji waves her hand as if that's too great an offer, or a poor one. "I'm sure that he's busy, and he's not... exactly..."

Aizawa only barely keeps from rolling his eyes. "It's his hero persona. He's very different in person, and with children."

That hero persona had a tendency to slip out with the students, perhaps giving Mrs. Shoji a reason to still be under that impression even with her son enrolled in his math class. Ectoplasm was regarded by fans as being both part of a 'Horror Hero Group' and an 'Almost Villains Group.' Much like Gang Orca could borrow mafia aesthetics for intimidation and fan appeal, Ectoplasm could pretend to be a terrifying sadist, more highlighted with the mask that drew attention to his permanent smile.

If they only knew his favorite karaoke playlist, or how quickly he became Eri's main supplier of cat stickers after asking a few basic arithmetic questions to judge whether his tutorship might be needed. It wasn't needed, and neither Hizashi nor himself ever asked, but out of all of UA's staff who had quickly scrambled to be of some use to Eri in the beginning of her wardship, he was one of the most bold. But with only one maskless incident to prove it, Aizawa was sure he was one of the most blushy about it.

"I do appreciate that, but it's.... It's harder for Mizuno," Mrs. Shoji mutters, staring at the coffee in her hands. Aizawa knows, and knows there's nothing that he can do for that aspect of it. The Shoji family hadn't determined whether moods influencing Mizuno's quirk was a developmental challenge or a permanent feature. Various schools who had programs for children who struggled with their mutant quirk features might still have children too young to look away from an unpleasant odor. Small children could be like chickens in that way, able to cannibalize their own with the sight of a small wound they couldn't keep from pecking.

Eri could have shown her own wound, if the playground was instead a daycare or elementary school. Screaming like that, standing in a way a bit too much like his husband for him to entirely forget the sight, even if the sudden sound of Eri screaming bloody murder was enough to be unforgettable. The correct assumption that using a quirk on a civilian made the attacker a villain certainly made Aizawa realize that she paid a great deal of attention in his classes, but the vocabulary and passion behind it could make her seem odd too.

Neither of those two little girls could see each other's oddities, and their worlds could be made better for it.

"She has a friend with Eri," Aizawa says, still trying to hide a proud smile at the memory of that. He had been sure that if things turned rough on the playground, she would simply shut down, as that could be far more frightening than a nurse or too long a time alone in her room that used to cause the same trembling ball of frightened child. Instead, a bit of a bulldog came out in Mizuno's defense. "And to be blunt, my ward might appreciate companionship from someone her own age. It wouldn't have to be a commute for you either, if you're amenable to that."

He's not sure how he or Hizashi could manage a two hour train ride themselves, but they would manage. It would be irrational to place the burden solely on Mrs. Shoji.

Especially when he feels an incredibly irrational need to make sure Eri spends time with this little girl again. He's never really heard her giggle so much, even with Mirio.

"Oh, I'm sorry if this is an odd question," Mrs. Shoji says, pulling at her scarf a bit as she seems nervous. “But is Eri.... Mezo told me she was a ‘ward,’ but if that’s changed...”

“She’s a ward,” Aizawa corrects, tampering down on a sudden flare in his chest that thinks of when that could change. “With her circumstances, she’s legally a ward of UA, and I’m her designated guardian for that. That won’t change for quite some time. Years.”

‘Years’ sounds more like a reminder to himself. Even though Shinsou could control Eri’s quirk, possibly giving a hint to how it could be controlled by Eri, it would still take time to master given that the quirk needed to build up.

She would still be a ward for years.

“Oh,” Mrs. Shoji says, then laughs a bit, that odd nervousness melting away. “I’m sorry, I thought I heard you call her your daughter a few times.”

Aizawa forces himself to look at the coffee in his hands, swirling it around a few times. Still holding his breath tight in his chest, unable to force it to release. “I don’t sleep on the weekends. That’s why.”

He hasn’t slept since 1-A’s homeroom on Friday. He usually takes a nap around this time. He’s more tired because of that. He probably said something odd from that exhaustion.

Living at UA was temporary, and it was already having an effect on her. Even if 5 year olds did tend to have an affinity for heroes, they didn’t know the logistics and legal aspects quite so well. He doesn’t doubt that if Eri found another home, she would still be visited by every student she’s interacted with, fully fledged heroes dropping everything to spend a few hours playing tag or dress up.

If.

Aizawa switches the hand holding his coffee, using its warmth to fight off a bit of the chill still lingering. Hizashi is just getting to him, it’s logical that living with Eri in their situation could lead to that kind of thinking. Hizashi has thought about their plans to adopt more often than Aizawa has, Aizawa has always had to remind him that they had too many obligations in the way. Having 5 demanding jobs doesn’t leave time to be parents.

Eri needed stability, normalcy. When she attends school, someone needs to be there to get her ready in the morning, to make breakfast and pack a lunch when she’s too young to have that responsibility on her shoulders. Someone needs to monitor her studies, attend parent-teacher conferences. Make sure that her teachers understand that absolutely no child in that class would have the right to put her down or bully her. Someone needs to encourage her to smile, to express herself, to make her feel safe.

Eri feels safest at UA.

For now, she hasn’t experienced anything else.

Hizashi gets her ready for school, packs her meals. His patrols tended to end an hour before most schools start, time that he usually takes to patch up any injuries. He would still have time to walk her to school, keeping her safe from the petty villains who target small children during that walk. Given the variety of courses that UA offers and the capable teachers on staff still chafing to tutor her even after two months have gone by-

He’s tired. Just very tired.

That can make him irrationally emotional sometimes. He feels things too keenly inside a body that's too worn to not feel hollow enough for that. He feels things that he could have hidden nearly swell when he notices them, too often it's irritation or anger barely guarded, but since Eri came to UA.

It's been other things. No less warm than that seething and childish anger that rises if Hizashi wakes him up from a nap, but warm in kinder ways. Impossibly warm for it.

He still feels that warm and tender pride in his chest when he sees that all of his charges have returned, and Eri runs to him with chill-blushed cheeks that instinctively makes him want to find a scarf for her to wear. He knows that she's still having fun with Mizuno, evident by how she still hasn't let go of her hand, but she wants to give him a little report for the events that he's missed, like she always does.

His chest feels too warm when he thinks he wouldn't mind if those little reports never stop.

*

This was a stupid idea.

27 glances up from a coloring book that isn't his, to see that Mirio still isn't bothered. He should be. These were Eri's coloring books, even if she had two or three copies of the same books, they were hers. He would have never done this before the raid, he would have never thought to use Eri's things for his own entertainment.

And even if it's pointless, it's so unbearably selfish that it feels criminal, 27 has to admit that it's a little relaxing. Deciding what color should go in which space, concentrating to make sure that the crayon moves in the same direction with each stroke so that it comes out smoothly. Knowing that absolutely none of this matters.

It's still not really what 27 was trying to get from Mirio.

Aizawa was taking Eri on a trip off campus, and since Yamada had left for his patrol early, that meant that Mirio was watching him. That also seemed pointless, 27 could be left alone and not get into any trouble. He'd been left alone for most of his life before he met Eri. But 27 didn't try to argue, because he wanted to use Mirio.

Eri seems angry with him over some slight he hasn't figured out, but she gave him an opportunity to make it right at the hero dorm tonight. She hadn't said what she wanted to do, but he knows that Eri enjoys spending time with Mirio, and if he could do the same things Mirio does, then she could have fun with him, and this odd frigidity could blow over into nothing.

But Mirio said that he spends a lot of time coloring with Eri, and seemed too enthusiastic about doing it with 27 for him to stop him.

27 notices Mirio glancing up again, sure to tell him that he's doing a good job on coloring like it's an amazing feat, but then sees that his phone has a new notification from the group chat. That notification is quickly replaced by another, by a flood, and Shinsou is relieved to have a distraction and a reason to hopefully stop Mirio from saying anything.

UraRAWR: sHOJI UR LITTLE SISTER IS PERFECT Y WERE U HIDING HER IM

Dipsy: KODA. BUNNIES. S T A T

Blood Maroon is so Pretentious, it's RED: Im CRYING THIS IS SO CUTE

Frog Under The Kotatsu: @Shoji Be aware that Ochan is going to kidnap Mizuno. There's a reason that my siblings haven't visited....

Weeb Man Supreme: nononnO KODA DONT I CANT

SHUT UR FUCKING HOLE DEKU: THEY'RE FRIENDS!!!! THEY'RE FRIENDS ERI HAS A

Weeb Man Supreme: koda if u do this to me i'll die I CANT

Dark Thots: I'm coming down, don't startle Mizuno. She's a gentle soul.

Weeb Man Supreme: the inherent power of moe... it's too strong. I'm dead

A Cop (wee woo wee woo): @Bakugo Please remain in your room. We have a very young visitor, and Aizawa-sensei has advised me that drastic action will be taken if you don't heed this warning.

Meme Man Supreme: @Sero RIP but I'm different sHE CALLED HER

UraRAWR: AWWWWWWWWWWWWWWWW MY HEARTTTTTT

Blood Maroon is so Pretentious, it's RED: IM REALLY CRYING HELP

Celine Dion Twink: Je vais pleurer putain, elle l'a appelée un ange, mon cœur est fondu dans une flaque d'étincelles, je ne peux pas X__X*~

Put Your Hands DOWN: @Bakugo we have a murder to plan, im gettting deets

UraRAWR: SHE SCREAM FOR HEROES IM

Dark Thots: @Yaoyorozu I'm calling for aid. Todoroki has failed me.

Blood Maroon is so Pretentious, it's RED: TODOBROKI IT'S OKAY TO CRY IT'S MANLY TEARS DON'T LEAVE

SHUT UR FUCKING HOLE DEKU: @Everyone CALLING ALL HEROES but please don't swear Kacchan maybe you can stay in your room but WE'RE GOING TO CHEER MIZUNO UP!!!!

Weeb Man Supreme: @Shinsou prepare yourself. It's too cute. They're too powerful.

UraRAWR: !!!! SHINSOU ERI HAS A FRIEND YOU'VE GOT TO MEET HER THEY'RE SO CUUUUUUUUUUUUTEEE

SHUT UR FUCKING HOLE DEKU: Tap to download 22kb

SHUT UR FUCKING HOLE DEKU: This is for all of us, but

SHUT UR FUCKING HOLE DEKU: Okay im gonna cry but

SHUT UR FUCKING HOLE DEKU: Im so happy that we rescued Eri

UraRAWR: IZUKU IM GONNA TT_TT

Blood Maroon is so Pretentious, it's RED: DUDE I C A N ' T IM ALREADY CRYING

Frog Under The Kotatsu: Okay, I'm coming down. After I stop crying. Thanks Midoriya.

Shinsou couldn't trust that the face mask would hide his smile, covering it with his hand. The little girl standing next to Eri, their joined hands, Eri's smile was so wide. He's grateful that Izuku took a picture of this, to have a piece of that smile to keep. But he doesn't ignore the messages that come after it.

Eri having a friend. Eri meeting children her own age. He's never even fathomed that, as much as he's never imagined seeing it, he's never imagined something so normal for her. Being free from pain and fear was enough, imagining her dressed in colorful clothes to replace the bandages, he imagined her smile but never thought it could look like this.

He knows who deserves to see this, who wanted to see her smile too. He knows that Mirio might not even notice at first that Eri's horn has grown again too, he might not know that it's happiness now and that even if it grows more slowly, it doesn't seem to be less effective. The horn aches might begin soon, there's a chance this still won't work as well as they want it to, but when Shinsou turns over his phone to show Mirio, he knows Eri's horn is practically invisible to him at first.

Mirio brings his hands to cover his mouth, that same weepy, almost agonized look falling over him like it does over Yamada when Eri does something they recognize as cute. 27 hadn't noticed that he was holding his breath, but when Mirio's eyebrows drew too close, the agonized look becoming closer to agony, he remembers the messages.

The tears come for Mirio too.

27 starts to pull the phone away, but Mirio shakes his head, his face still too red. "No, I'm- m' fine, it's so cute." Mirio's voice breaks on the last word, each one coming more choked up and forced. One hand is waving to say that all of that should be ignored, but Mirio's other hand is wiping at his tears. "I'm so happy!"

There were heroes who paid a higher price for Eri's happiness.

27 knows that Mirio is happy, and knows that sometimes overwhelming happiness can come out in tears. He knows that Mirio doesn't want him to see him like this, that Mirio only smiles like that when he doesn't want to be seen any different way. It's stupid, after all the ways that Mirio has seen 27 in unflattering lights, that he would be embarrassed about a few tears. That he would ever doubt where they came from, because 27 was standing right there. 27 saw a part of Lemillion's last stand as a hero.

"Thank you," Shinsou says. It's a miracle that his voice didn't break as well, not with this tightness in his chest. When he means it more than what he says, he wants to thank Mirio for everything. When he wants to give him everything he can in return, if he can use his quirk with Eri's to help her restore his quirk, to give back something that was lost after so much was.

But the wideness of Mirio's eyes stops him.

He said it.

Mirio could tell them now, he could tell them that he wasn't mute. They could know, they could know now and he doesn't want to know what that looks like. He doesn't want Monoma to test it, he doesn't want to use his quirk on Yamada. He doesn't want to know what they'll see if they know, if they see him like that. What he'll lose, even if it's as small as the way everyone looks at him.

If that warmth becomes a sudden chill.

But Mirio bends towards the kotatsu with a watery huff, scrubbing at his face with both hands as he snorts a laugh. "Jeez, you're always saying stuff to make me feel better, Shinsou! I wish I wasn't such a mess that you had to, but..." Mirio looks up, a more honest smile on his face. More honest because the redness around his eyes is less sad than the strain of that fake smile. "Thanks for that."

Shinsou barely feels the relief, knowing that it would be stupid to trust it. He's slipped before, he was able to speak a few times, but this was dangerous. This time might be fine, but there might be a next one. He can't forget himself like that.

He can't forget the rest of those messages either. "We should probably make some snacks if Eri's friend is coming over! I feel like I should change, this is such a big thing! I hope Yamada still has some apple juice."

27 wants to change too. In ways that he can't, unless he finds a way to peel back the scars on his skin and become something that looks as normal as Eri does.

But he feels the skin around his face mask and wishes that the fabric stretched a bit wider.

*

This is the worst day of Eri's life.

She's trying really hard not to cry, and she holds Zawa's hand really tight even though she doesn't want to, because it kind of helps her not cry. Zawa said that Mizzy couldn't go to her house after Zawa frowned at his phone, and said that Mizzy and her mom had a long train ride to get to their home.

Mizzy looks like she wants to cry too, and she hugs Eri really tight. But Eri feels like crying even more when Mizzy hugs Shozo even tighter and doesn't want to let go. It's kind of bad, but Eri wishes that Mizzy hugged Eri just as much as Shozo.

"Come on sweetheart," Mizzy's mom says, rubbing Mizzy's back when she starts sniffing, and her wings start turning blue. "We'll be able to visit again, because Mr. Aizawa was kind enough to set that up for us."

"And you can call me when you get home," Shozo says, wiping away Mizzy's tears when she pulls away. "As soon as I get out of class from now on, I'm going to call you, okay? So you can tell me about your day, and I can tell you about all the things my classmates have gotten up to."

"A-And Eri-i?" Mizzy asks, and her voice is really sniffly and snotty. "A-And Chako?"

Shozo nods, laughing a little under his mask. "I'll tell you all about your new favorite hero, Uravity."

Mizzy shakes her head really hard, and makes her hands into fists at her sides like she's mad. "Tentacole's the coolest! Tentacole's still my favorite! You're still my favorite!"

Mizzy hugs Shozo again, and Shozo's face is kind of red where the mask isn't, and his voice comes out kind of shaky. "I'm happy that even if I can't make you float, Tentacole is... still cool."

"Tenta-cool," Mizzy says, and nods really fast. And when she looks at Eri, her eyes get kind of pinchy like she's smiling a whole lot under her mask. "I'm gonna miss you Eri, but we're gonna have a lot of fun next time! I'm gonna bring all my stuffed animals and we can have a tea party with all of my dress up stuff!"

Eri really wants to do that now, but Zawa wouldn't even let her show Mizzy her stuffed animals. But Eri tries to be good, and smile really really really good so Mizzy can still be happy and smell like flowers. "I'm gonna miss you too, but we're gonna have a lot of fun!"

Mizzy waves to Eri a lot, even when her mom takes her hand to take her away from the gate, and Eri keeps waving too. Even when Mizzy turns around, Eri still waves and wants her to turn back one more time to see it.

"Thank you again, sensei," Shozo says, and his face still looks kind of red when he says it. "Mizuno... really needed that. I can't thank you enough for this."

Zawa shakes his head, looking at the big gate with a hum kind of noise. "Children are inspired by heroes. It's important to recognize that at this stage in your studies. 'Tenta-cool' especially."

Shozo's eyes get kind of big, like he's surprised that Zawa knows his hero name, but Zawa knows all the heroes' names. Eri walks with Zawa and Shozo until Shozo goes to his dorm, and when he leaves it's really hard not to stomp when she walks with Zawa.

"Zawa, why couldn't Mizzy come to our house?" Eri asks, even if she kind of wants to use her Reverse card just in case Zawa gets mad, because she's asking about something that's kind of bad. She really wanted Mizzy to meet Twenny and play games with her, and maybe play so many games that Zawa would forget that she's supposed to leave.

"She could next time, but we weren't ready for a visit that suddenly," Zawa says, but he looks at his phone after he says that. "Mirio made snacks, and I'm sure he's excited to hear about your day."

Eri looks up really hard and wants to stomp her feet really big. Mirio could have met Mizzy too! Eri knows that Mizzy would have had so much fun with Mirio, and they could all laugh together and do all the fun things all at once today.

But when Zawa opens the door, Eri runs to Mirio, and as soon as she grabs his pants she remembers the big news. "Mirio! My quirk works when I'm happy! And my horn is super big now, because I had so much fun with Mizzy! Mizzy has to live at UA now, so I can fix your quirk super fast!"

Mirio smiles really big, but when he looks at Zawa he kind of laughs. "I'm really glad you had that much fun, Eri! I think Mizzy has to live with her parents, but that just means that when you get to spend time together, it's even more fun!"

Eri frowns, but she tries not to pout. She kind of thought that Mirio could make Zawa let Mizzy live at UA to fix his quirk really fast. Then she really has to try not to pout when she looks around, because Twenny's not there, and he might have gone to have fun with Yama without even telling her goodbye. "Where's Twenny?"

"He's probably getting dressed," Mirio says, and holds up a glass of apple juice and plate of apple bunnies to ask if she wants some, and Eri nods even though she ate a whole lot of cookies. "His friends told him that Mizzy might stop by, and he wanted to make sure he... looked nice for it."

Eri kicks her feet when she sits down at the table to eat her snacks with Mirio, because Twenny trying to look nice for Mizzy makes her tummy feel kind of slippery. Twenny doesn't have to look different for Mizzy, and he didn't get to meet her today anyway. "I wish Mizzy could eat apple bunnies with us."

Zawa sits down and it sounds like all the air goes out of him when he does, so Eri gives him a big apple bunny because he didn't eat any of the cookies. Zawa smiles at her really nice, and looks at it before he eats it. "I'm sure that you'll have plenty of ideas for the next time that Mizzy visits."

Eri has to kick her legs a lot to keep her from thinking about all the fun things they could be doing now. They could eat apple bunnies, and play with Mirio, and she doesn't even know if Mizzy likes apple bunnies yet. "But if Mizzy lived here, we could do fun things all the time. I can't even think of all the fun things we could do, 'cause we could just do everything, 'cause Mizzy's always fun."

"Absence makes the heart grow fonder," Mirio says, and makes his apple bunny do a little hop before he eats it. "If Mizzy was here all the time, then you might not even notice how fun it is when she's here. Even if it is kind of sad that she's not here to eat apple bunnies with us, you can be excited to eat them with her the next time you see her, and that'll make them taste even better!"

Eri doesn't really like that. She wants to be with Mizzy all the time, even if it's not as fun. Missing her feels so bad that she doesn't think the fun makes up for it.

Eri didn't like living at a compound, and she didn't like living with Fuck Chisaki. But she liked that she was always with Twenny, except when he had to leave. She hated it a whole lot to be alone, but he always brought her books to make up for it, and he would always smile under his mask really big, and hold her close when he got back.

She wanted Twenny more than she wanted the books, but she kind of misses how he would smile like that, and hug her so tight. She wants that so much that she doesn't even like her apple bunnies now, and she's gonna hug Twenny so tight that he has to remember how to do it right.

"I'm gonna talk to Twenny!" Eri says, and slides off her chair so she can run to his room. Even if Twenny's still getting dressed, she doesn't really care. Even though Twenny always got dressed by himself and she doesn't know what he looks like without clothes, he helped her get dressed and take baths a lot. It's not really fair, anyway.

Eri opens the door, and Twenny's not naked, he's wearing too many clothes. He's wearing a face mask even though he doesn't do that at home, and his hands have gloves too, even though he's not going outside. Twenny looks at her kind of surprised, but he wasn't changing his clothes, he was just sitting on his bed and looking at his phone. "Mirio said that your friend wasn't coming. I'm sorry about that."

Twenny says he's sorry a lot, and he's always sorry about stuff that isn't his fault. But he sounds really sad, like he already knows how awesome Mizzy is. "It's okay Twenny, you can meet Mizzy next time! She's super fun, and we played a lot of games together! Some villain boys tried to be mean to Mizzy, but I stopped them and yelled and Zawa and Shozo came to stop them, and Zawa said I'm only supposed to say 'Fuck' at UA, and Mizzy got to be here at UA too! She was right here and she almost came over, and-and she's an angel, Twenny! I got to be friends with a real angel!"

Twenny smiles, and it's the same way he used to smile when he got back from going outside. Eri can't help but run up to hug him too, and she hugs him so tight that he remembers how to hug her tight too. "I'm really happy about that, Eri. You deserve an angel for a friend."

Eri pulls away because her face feels really hot, and maybe it's because Twenny is wearing so many clothes, but she looks at Twenny's phone and sees a picture of her and Mizzy. "You got a picture of us?"

Twenny nods, and he smiles. "Yeah, Izuku sent it to the chat. You look really happy."

Eri is a little happier, even if Twenny didn't really get to meet Mizzy. At least he really knows that she's definitely an angel. "Mizzy has a whole lot of teeth, so she wears a mask kind of like you. Maybe she can get really cute ones to match with you too!"

Twenny tugs on his mask so it goes under his chin, and it's easier to see that he's trying to smile, but he doesn't really. "She shouldn't feel like she has to wear a mask, but... She could have any of mine, if she wants them. If she comes over. But it's fine if you two just want to play by yourselves if she does."

Eri pulls on Twenny's gloves, because he never wears gloves, and it's not cold enough to do that inside. And if his hands are still cold, she can hold them and still keep them warm, and she wants to do that. "I want you to play with us too! Mizzy's really nice, and she's not scary, Twenny! And I like Mizzy and I like you, so you're gonna like her too!"

Twenny smiles, and takes off his gloves for her, and she holds both his hands but they feel really warm and kind of sweaty. "I do like her, Eri. It's just..." Twenny stops talking, looking at his hands when he pulls them together, but Eri doesn't let them go. "I look a bit different. I can look scary to other people. It's fine if Mizzy is a little scared of me, and would rather spend time with you."

Eri looks at Twenny's hands and all the marks they have on them, like the marks he has on his face. Twenny's marks are cute, and hers are the only ones that are ugly, and she doesn't think that Mizzy would be scared of them. "Mizzy said she doesn't care about that. Mizzy's really fun and nice and she's gonna like you a whole lot, Twenny."

Twenny smiles, even if it looks a little sad, like he doesn't believe her. Twenny doesn't believe anything Eri says, and Eri really hates that, because she's right. Twenny just doesn't know that Mizzy is a super big angel.

When they were hiding in the bushes outside, Eri got kind of itchy under her hoodie, and had to scratch it. She didn't want her to, but Mizzy saw some of the ugly marks on her arm, and asked her what happened. Eri felt really cold, and felt like she couldn't say anything, even if she was at UA and could have said 'Fuck Chisaki' did it, but then Mizzy started pulling at her pants, and telling her there was a big scar on her knee that she got when she fell out of a tree, and it looks kind of like a star.

Mizzy is a super big angel, because she doesn't know that 'scars' can look ugly sometimes. They can look so ugly that they make people cry, like onion monsters. Eri likes a lot of things about Mizzy, but that's the thing that she likes the most.

"Twenny, are you still gonna go with Yama?" Eri asks, and her tummy gets a little flippy, but only a little. She stares at Twenny's sparkly nails that Ashi painted, and even though she thought they looked really dumb at first, she kind of likes them now. They make Twenny's hands look prettier.

Twenny shakes his head, and he hums like he's saying 'no.' "When he gets back, I'll tell him that I'm too scared to go out. He probably won't make me, and then we can play all the games you want together tonight."

Eri pinches at Twenny's hands, because he's talking like he's happy about that, but she knows he's really not. He's just lying to her again, and she wishes he didn't. "It's okay, Twenny. I got to have fun with Zawa, so you got to have fun with Yama or he'll be left out, and that's not fair."

Twenny kind of laughs at her really quiet, and holds her hands with his bigger ones. "It's really fine. I know Yamada wants me to go but I want to spend time with you. I know that I haven't lately."

Eri stares at her toes, because Twenny hasn't, even when he said he would. That made Eri really mad, because Twenny does a whole lot of stuff that makes her mad now, like lying and lying is really bad. But Eri shakes her head, because she wants Twenny to stop lying when they spend time together, and Mirio said it's a good thing to feel really bad and miss someone a lot. "Nope! You're gonna hang out with Yama on his show, and have a lot of fun! So much fun that you miss me a whole lot, so I can miss you too!"

Twenny looks at her really surprised, and maybe he doesn't know how it works either, but if Mirio says it works then it's gonna work.

"But I'm gonna pick your clothes to go, because you need to look cute on Yama's show! And whenever you go somewhere from now on, I'm gonna pick your clothes, and you can pick my clothes when I go somewhere! So it's fair, and so you can remember to miss me!" Eri says, and it's easy to not feel sad when Twenny's gonna have to remember to miss her.

She knows she's gonna miss Twenny, and it's gonna feel really bad because she's making him go, but she wants Twenny to tell her all about his fun trip with Yama, and maybe if he has a lot of fun, it'll be really easy to be happy that he was gone.

*

Tentacole is Tenta-cool.

Shoji can remember the first time that Mizuno said that, vividly. He had announced it that day at school to be met with polite claps. His mother said it was nice, his father said that it definitely had a ring to it. But Mizuno said that it was 'Tenta-cool.'

He knows it's mostly her age, and how he's her older brother. She seems starstruck by him as much as she gets irritated that he doesn't want to play a hundred rounds of tag. Aizawa didn't say it, but the timing is suspicious, and while he wants to go to his room to think about it, he finds himself walking to Tokoyami's.

When Tokoyami lets him in, it's easy to see that he wants to know why he was called to talk to Aizawa in the surveillance room, but Shoji welcomes himself to sit on Tokoyami's bed and pull down his mask. For some reason, he's wanted to see that more.

Given Tokoyami's quirk, it's hard to see when he's surprised, but he seems like he is. It's just the wideness of his eyes given that the beak can't smile or frown, and Tokoyami takes advantage of that a lot. He turns to sit on his desk to pretend that he isn't surprised, but he stares too long before he speaks. "How does it feel?"

"Horrible," Shoji answers. He doesn't need to see his mouth to know that it shouldn't be seen. He feels naked, even if he's been naked in the locker room and not felt half as ashamed. "I hate it."

He finds a hand wandering back to the mask pooled around his neck, but forces it back down. He wants, but he won't. This is the first time that anyone has seen him like this since elementary school, but Tokoyami might understand. "You don't have to force yourself," Tokoyami says, as if it's that easy. As if he hasn't told him to try this a million times, like he's wanted it more than he should. “If it makes you uncomfortable to not wear the mask, wear it. That’s never been the issue I’ve had.”

Shoji finds himself glaring, finds himself weak to the slightest suggestion and takes it, breathes easier through his blue spandex blend. “I don’t understand the issue. Aizawa-sensei seems to think it’s because of a few games in elementary school. He went down a list of people I haven’t thought about in years to tell me that they’re in trade schools or they didn’t go to high school. That doesn’t make me a better person just because I’m at UA.”

UA is a prestigious hero school, and he knows that. He knows he’s either the first or one of few from his hometown to attend. That doesn’t make him feel better than anyone, he doesn’t want to feel that kind of superiority. He just wants to save people and be a hero, and that doesn’t involve anyone but himself.

“It’s not like that,” Shoji says, finding his hand still wanting to pick at the edges of his mask, as though having his mouth revealed made him colder, makes him seek more coverage. “I just....hate it.”

He hates his mouth. He knows that’s odd to anyone but him, but he hates it. He knows he shouldn’t, people shouldn’t hate their own body parts, and he knows that especially after seeing Mizuno. He hated that she wore a mask too, almost more than he hated the sight of his mouth. He would stare at it in the mirror until nausea turned his stomach if he could convince her that it was safe not to wear one. Maybe Aizawa was trying to convince him to do that.

“But, children look up to heroes,” Shoji says, a piece that Aizawa-sensei said in parts, didn’t say in that surveillance room. “Children with mutant quirks could feel better about themselves if they had a hero that looked like them. The... mouth is a common one-”

“Shoji,” Tokoyami says, first sounding awestruck, but when Shoji turns his gaze from glaring at the floor, he sees a sigh, almost disappointed. “I’ve never seen you so rattled, my friend. It’s very clear that it isn’t an odd preference or a complex. I apologize for speaking in such a way, when I shouldn’t have pried.”

Tokoyami is the only person that Shoji trusts to pry. Tokoyami knows things that no one else does in 1-A, and even when Shoji doesn’t follow his advice at times, he still trusts it’s good. It’s just too difficult sometimes. “Mizuno wears a mask now. She’s not even bullied for that, she just... wants to be like me.”

That hurts. Of all the things that Mizuno could want to imitate, it hurts that she chose that one. It’s too painful for even himself to touch, but she wants to take on that wound. Even if he wasn’t a hero, even if he only wanted to protect his family, he’d do this to make her stop before it festered.

If it festered for him, it doesn’t matter. It’s what he has, and he can deal with it in easier ways than the ones he will take on. He’d rather be a coward, to look away just like he does when he brushes his teeth, but he won’t. He can’t anymore.

“I imagine that Mizuno admires your strength,” Tokoyami says, with a chuckle that reminds Shoji that her favorite game is to be tossed into the air over and over, something that Tokoyami was unfortunately a witness to. “I think that children want to imagine themselves in a stronger image, and I think that the diversity of heroes allows for that in a personalized way. But I think there’s a thin line between heroism and martyrdom, and martyrdom is rarely needed as much as it’s exercised.”

He’s not going to be a martyr if he just convinces himself that his mouth is a part of him. That’s not a struggle that people are supposed to have. It's not a fight, and if it is with him, then it's wrong.

"I think that it's far more worthwhile to have a different voice enter the fray. An honest one," Tokoyami says, folding his hands as he leans back, relaxed in a way that Shoji envies. The mask was only off for a minute at most and he still feels nauseated. "A voice that says that those sentiments are wrong, that they can cause wounds. But that voice isn't as strong if it's shaking like yours does."

The difference between martyrdom and heroism isn't dying for a cause, or dying for a good one. It's dying when it's not necessary, taking risks that could have been avoided. Heroes and martyrs both make powerful statements, a dead martyr's cause is stronger, but only if they're remembered for it.

Tokoyami is right about more things than Shoji tells him he is, and Shoji trusts him more than anyone else he knows. He knows that he could retort by bringing up the nightmares that Tokoyami brings on himself when he trains too much with Dark Shadow, but he won't. Not when he knows that Tokoyami is right.

It doesn't matter where the mask came from, it's his now. This nausea is his, and there's nothing he can do to remove it, except the things that he does.

Tentacole can still wear a mask, and be a hero. But his voice won't shake when he talks about the wrongs in the world that have to be righted, for future generations, and for Mizuno.

Chapter End Notes

1-A Chat Usernames:

UraRAWR - Uraraka Ochako

Dipsy - Ashido Mina

Blood Maroon is so Pretentious, it's RED - Kirishima Eijirou

Frog Under The Kotatsu - Asui Tsuyu

Weeb Man Supreme - Sero Hanta

SHUT UR FUCKING HOLE DEKU - Midoriya Izuku

Dark Thots - Tokoyami Fumikage

A Cop (wee woo wee woo) - Iida Tenya

Celine Dion Twink - Aoyama Yuga

Put Your Hands DOWN - Jirou Kyouka

Due to how the POVs lined worked out, it's left up to implication to figure out why Mizuno didn't go to visit Eri's dorm, or why Shinsou seemed guilty. But what happened off-screen was that Mirio noticed Shinsou 'dressing up' for Mizuno's visit by wearing gloves and a different mask, and let Aizawa know. Aizawa doesn't know if the sudden change without warning would have made Shinsou more anxious about the visit, but because of that, the visit was cancelled.

Come on The Radio!

Chapter Summary

Yamada brings Shinsou to the radio station to spend some quality time with his ward, and discovers a devastating mistake from his past. Shinsou asks Yamada to help him find closure, and Aizawa and Yamada have an important discussion about their wards.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: Brief mention of Bug, Shirakumo's death

Previously on Wards of UA: Eri created a rule that whenever Shinsou is apart from her, they get to pick each other's outfits so they remember to miss each other while they're gone. Shinsou's sign name for Yamada is 'Sunshine da', which Yamada wonders is a way to express how Shinsou might feel like Yamada is a father figure to him, but Shinsou means the literal translation 'field of sunshine,' which is a very meaningful image to him. In Chapter 2 before the raid, Shinsou mused about how improbable it was that no villains had ever attacked Present Mic's show given all the public information about it. After Todoroki's family situation came to light, Todoroki asked everyone to forget about it by using a '~forget~' spell in the chat. Shinsou believes he's no longer selectively mute, and he asked Aizawa to let him see his mother who is being held in police custody, but Aizawa refused him. Shinsou was reportedly kidnapped when he was 4, but soon after Shinsou arrived to UA, Eri told Aizawa that his mother 'gave' him away, though Aizawa later learned that Shinsou Ujima sold her son. Yamada's biological parents abandoned him at the hospital after he deafened them as an infant, which led to Yamada being placed in foster care and eventually adopted by his mothers. Yamada took care of Shinsou while he was sick, even to the point of feeding him at one point. In the previous chapter, Aizawa accidentally referred to Eri as his daughter and swished his coffee several times after it was brought up.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Sneaking out against direct orders from the police is supposed to be fun for a teenager like Shinsou. Especially for Shinsou, since he's been pretty much on house arrest since he came to UA.

But if there's one thing that Yamada has been afraid of with this little adventure, it's Shinsou not having the slightest bit of fun. And it's off to a great start on that.

Eri apparently decided to give her little 'blessing' on this outing with a big condition - that she gets to dress Shinsou up for it. That little habit had been waning at the edges, given that there were a few times that Eri doubled back to Shinsou's room to get him ready for the day but found he had dressed himself, but the look she picked today seemed just a little bit vengeful, if Yamada was being honest.

Another little shout-out to his show was nice with the black facemask that had his show's logo in bright green spraypaint. But that edgy piece didn't quite match the fuzzy purple sweater, and nothing matched with the dark green sweatpants. Eri might be a 5 year old, but she honestly dresses herself pretty well, leaving Yamada with nothing else to really place this blame on.

Shinsou didn't seem like he really noticed it at first, and he didn't take Yamada up on the offer to switch a few pieces out to look a bit more stylish. Yamada was well prepared for a bit of nerves when they got in the car, and he tried to set them at ease with a tried and true method of picking up a little sweet treat, since that always worked with Eri. But with Shinsou, it worked in the opposite way.

'No,' 'No,' 'Not hungry,' 'Don't want.' Shinsou was not making it easy to treat the kid, and Yamada finally just resolved himself to ordering something nice to be picked up by the ever-helpful swarm of station interns when they got there.

It wasn't until after they parked and started walking towards the building that it started to click into place. Yamada watched Shinsou picking at his face mask, running a hand through his hair. Eyes constantly looking around them, falling behind Yamada at times just to speed up, walking just a bit too close for how Shinsou usually does. Yamada felt the kid startle and almost stop in his tracks when he put an arm around his shoulders, pulling him a bit closer to say that closer was okay. Closer was perfectly safe, and Shinsou was safe here.

Yamada very purposefully tries to avoid thinking about how Shinsou's nerves at Shichi-Go-San, while still present, were nothing like this. He tries not to do the math for that, even though the answer is pretty clear. Eraserhead is a strong hero to Shinsou, perfectly able to protect him from any Miasma baddies, but Present Mic is just annoying.

That's a little bit of why he wanted to pull Shinsou into the radio station tonight. To see that 'Present Mic' isn't just a loudmouth dolt screaming at students if he's not screaming on the airwaves. Present Mic can be cool, Present Mic gets a lot more gushing calls that don't make it on the air. Whenever Shinsou feels like recognizing that and retiring the little 'Now Music' and 'Existing Amplifier' names, he'll be perfectly fine with it.

A bigger reason was that other little sign name that he hasn't seen since - 'Sunshine da.' It's been stuck in the back of Yamada's mind, pulling to the surface with every little touch that goes well, every little bit of trust that he can see building within his little ward. There's so much that sign language can't say, and repeated gestures can mean a lot. 'Stay. Stay. After investigation. Stay.'

Yamada wants to know what 'Stay' means for Shinsou, what he wants that to look like. If that's going to be the best for Shinsou, and even though Yamada doesn't want it to be anything else, can barely stand the thought of that, he knows this is a big part of it. Doing something fun, so normal, so very much what his darling yet embarrassing sidekick Byte Sound called it - bringing your kid to work day - could be a big sign of how things would go once the whole investigation was done with. If some fun times with 'Present Mic' could lead to a little more trust being built up between the two, that would be a very good sign.

Yamada isn't quite nervous about his little sidekick meeting Shinsou. He's not.

He wasn't until he saw her grin, a bit too sharp with a bit too much teeth, her eyes a bit too narrow. She promised she'd behave, but he's heard that before, and she didn't. He made the mistake of bringing her to a little spotlight interview only three times, and her catty little signs made it pretty hard not to laugh, leading to some great outtakes. When it wasn't live.

But Byte Sound gives Shinsou a wave, moving quickly to sign. 'Nice to meet you. I'm B-Y-T-E S-O-U-N-D. Tiny sound.'

Yamada tried really hard to convince her that even if the ‘Byte’ came from some computer mumbo-jumbo, it’d be a lot simpler and sleeker if she picked her hero sign name to be ‘Bite Sound.’ But like practically all the career advice he gives her, she didn’t take it, and while he eagerly awaits for a special little correction from the knock-off-hero-namer-extraordinaire, he doesn’t see it. ‘Nice to meet you. Tiny sound. I’m S-H-I-N-S-O-U H-I-T-O-S-H-I.’

Yamada sees that little wicked grin cross his sidekick’s face, and tries to stop it from spawning into any sasses that he knows his ward doesn’t need for inspiration. “Yep, this is my ward, Shinsou, and this is my lady behind the green curtain, Byte Sound. I don’t know what I’d do without her, and I know you two would have so much fun getting to chat, but it’s getting a little closer to airtime and I need to find some interns to pick up some take out. Do you think you can pick off a stray from the gaggle, Bytey?”

Yamada got one of those looks that rehashes the familiar argument of ‘I’m a sidekick, not an intern, and not an errand boy,’ but a pleading one in answer had Byte Sound huffing off down the hall. Yamada pulled Shinsou into his side of the sound box, flicking on the lights and realizing that Byte Sound had actually made it look a little more presentable, given that there’s usually a fine coating of snack debris from the prime time traffic reporter.

“Yep, so this is my studio, where I get to shout out the tunes and listen in for any callers. I think I’ve been put down for a little advice session, and that’s always pretty fun,” Yamada says, turning around to see that Shinsou was staring pretty hard at one of the more interesting decor pieces in his studio.

He has a little wall of fame for all the hero students he’s taken in for an internship over the years, with autographed pictures and everything. But there was one little herolet who made him move a few things around to be the centerpiece, with a frame and everything. Only, that frame wasn’t around her headshot.

“Oh Nejire-chan,” Yamada says, falling into his usual chair with his hands behind his head, taking in that glorious and unforgettable moment. “I just happened to mention that she might try taking her all-out blasts and putting a volume dial on it, and that was her attempt at a ‘1.’ I think it’s closer to her 20% now.”

The crater in his wall with interesting spiral cracks around it was memorialized with a tacky gold frame Yamada insisted on putting around it. Miss Hadou’s autographed picture was right in the center below it with plenty of ‘X’s and ‘O’s, and a handmade redeemable ticket to an exclusive on-air interview underneath that.

While he’s gained plenty of stories with every intern, the sight of Hadou staring and not entirely breathing with her arms stretched forward, and her quick and hurried explanations that she thought her spirals would be shorter was pretty unforgettable. Hadou was definitely not one for getting rattled, or for apologies, but he’s looking forward to cashing in her interview ticket to spotlight that story. It’ll definitely help with her post-grad hero ranking too, to be brought onto his very big and very popular stage.

Shinsou definitely sees the open seat next to him, but Yamada invites him to sit down with a little pat. He starts setting the few little details to rights, pulling up his chat programs on his laptop so he can communicate with Byte Sound and all the interns in one place. His station manager also has a chat window, even if he never uses it. Yamada has honestly never seen his station manager, only heard his voice on the phone on the rare occasion he wasn’t given a memo. But he imagines that his station manager looks like a Noir film villain stuck in the 1950’s, given that deep and abiding love of memos.

Yamada sees one such memo sliding under the door, but he doesn't stand up to see what it says. He knows it's probably a reminder that guests aren't allowed in the studio when there's a lounge area for that, but Yamada has ignored that every single time it gets brought up. He is successful in opening the door and snatching one of the radio station interns who delivered the memo, a lanky college kid who's been here long enough to lose the frazzled look. "Hey, want to make a whole lot of money and escape for about an hour doing it?"

Shinsou still doesn't pick anything, just shaking his head, but Yamada puts in an order for a couple of coffees and pastries, and three convenience store bento boxes. It's not a whole lot of food for 10,000 yen, but he's feeding a poor college kid along the way, so it's worth it.

Byte returns with one of the more skittish ones, a young girl who has only been at the station for a few months and hasn't gotten the steel spine implanted yet. Yamada signs to cut her loose, but he's tempted to send her on an errand to escape. His manager works closer with the new ones, and that tends to lead to more new ones not lasting. There's only so many memos that one person can take before they crack.

Yamada feels like he might crack while he's waiting for the intern on the food run to come back, because Shinsou is still palpably uncomfortable with this.

The kid sits completely straight in his chair, looks forward when he's not looking around and looking a lot at the door, with his hands folded in his lap. Neither Yamada's mumbling about the playlist tonight nor Byte Sound trying to spin up a sign name for him through the glass partition seem to be entering Shinsou's stratosphere.

Which is great. If Shinsou works himself up to the point of having a panic attack before his show even starts, that is a great sign that Yamada is truly capable of taking care of Shinsou long term. He's just the best dad if that happens, when his son can't stand to be in the same room with him for thirty minutes if it's an unfamiliar room.

There's a little button that Yamada doesn't use a lot, that Byte has only seen in action once. He presses it without a second of hesitation, making the audio equipment cut out completely and the glass partition fog up to the point that Byte couldn't read lips. He doesn't like that he has it, he doesn't know why it's installed in his studio, but he figures that it might make Shinsou a bit more comfortable to talk with him. "Hey, is everything okay? I know this probably isn't your idea of a fun Saturday night and all, and we can call it quits on the whole thing-"

Shinsou shakes his head, eyes going wide, and he raises his hands to sign before he lowers them a bit, almost bringing one to his neck before he makes another glance around. 'Want to. I like this. Not.'

Shinsou checks the door again, and maybe Yamada could make a show of locking it to convince Shinsou that a door could keep him safer than the top 100 ranked pro hero he's staring at.

'Villains attack show? Know location. Know time.' Yeah, Yamada guessed it, but it doesn't really sting any less.

"There were a few little bands of merry fellows trying to yank me off the air when I first started," Yamada says, trying to laugh and trying to resist the urge to spin around in his chair too much. "But talking for a couple hours doesn't really do what I think they were expecting - instead of finding me gasping for breath or losing my voice, this show primes my vocal cords like nothing else. I should honestly switch it around so I do my patrol after, but I'm not a huge fan of working all night if I can help it."

He used to do that, but one kid led to two, and that was a patrol shift he was glad to cut loose.

“And there’s a whole mess of alarms around the entire perimeter. We actually have a dedicated dispatcher at the local station because some people call me instead of the police for villain attacks and whatnot, and we have the equipment to trace down the odd threat. Byte has been my sidekick for seven years and we make a great team, and if it ever really came down to it, I’m pretty sure my boss would just unleash some eldritch horror from one of the supply closets and shut the whole thing down.” Yamada doesn’t poke his nose into any places he’s not supposed to be for a reason.

Shinsou looks a little relieved at that, but the subtle picking at the sleeve of his jacket doesn’t make Yamada wholly surprised that he’s not totally convinced. ‘Won’t get hurt. Because of me.’

Yamada stops his half-spins, realizing why the nerves really were so much worse this time. Shinsou wasn’t worried for himself, he wasn’t worried that Yamada wouldn’t be able to protect him. He was worried that since Miasma might be a little more pissed if they knew Shinsou was forced to name them, that Yamada would get hurt.

The kid really does care about him, a lot more than Yamada expects sometimes.

“Nope! I’ve been a pro hero for about ten years now, so I think I can handle any sort of mess that comes my way. I signed on to protect you in a lot of ways, Shinsou, and the people making that decision wouldn’t let me if I couldn’t do it,” Yamada says, and it’s more complicated than that, but in some ways, it’s more simple. “If someone came here to hurt you, the first thing I would do is press the panic button and call every hero in the area to respond. I’d make sure you were safe, and that means staying by your side. And since my quirk can be pretty powerful at long range, that means you’d have front row seats to see me blowing out their eardrums for trying to get anywhere close to you. That’s what these nifty headphones are for, you could watch the show but not get caught in the crossfire.”

He’s handed his headphones over to more kids than he likes to think about. Terrified, shaking children who have seen or heard too much of a cruel world, and need it to cut out for a bit in more ways than one. Kids who were caught in the path of a villain’s destruction, kids that were kidnapped. Kids that needed to be protected from his own quirk as much as the villain’s, and kids that have a shy grin when he works the headphones off their heads and thanks them for tuning in for his show.

Shinsou looks at them a bit warily, but he seems curious about how well they work. They work well, he can scream at his highest decibels and it’s completely silent inside those headphones, but Yamada doesn’t test it.

He thinks Shinsou might get better adjusted to this loud room if he could look at it properly, a little silence allowing the space of mind to do that.

It seems to work, because Shinsou only gives the room another lazy glance, and Yamada just rambles on about how he can’t hear anything now so he can see that it works. There’s a little smirk that he can only see the top half of with the face mask on, and he can see that Shinsou tries to hide it in other ways.

He glances away after he hands the headphones back, seeming to debate on signing it. ‘Like you. With headphones.’

Yamada nods, maybe a little swept away with how that’s Shinsou’s first thought on that. “Yup, a limited trial on being deaf. Some people find it more peaceful, especially when they first get hearing aids. My dear Bytey can hardly stand adding audio to the mix when she feels a certain way, and my mom especially hates it. But sometimes there are things that you miss out on, like my super awesome show that's going to start soon. And if you have any favorites or songs you kind of like, just let me know because I have just about every song in existence at my fingertips."

Yamada gets about three more memos before his food runner returns, and they're probably about how he's supposed to send a memo to request the use of the interns, how he's not supposed to press any buttons that he hasn't been given permission to, or the astrological report that always comes off more ominous than it should. His luck always seems to be 'Devastatingly poor' and his chances of a promotion are listed as 'Forbidden.'

Yamada thought he'd get quite a few more eyerolls than he does when he goes completely into character, but he thinks the hidden smirk comes out a lot more when he says something cheesy and looks over for Shinsou to disapprove. 'Present Mic' might never be cool, but he's not entirely meant to be. He's just supposed to be loud, and be loud in a way that's entertaining.

Yamada tries to imagine that when Shinsou's on his phone, he might be looking up a few songs or putting down notes to do that later. Yamada fully intends to ask about it on his next commercial break. But when that commercial break comes, he gets an oddly sour look from his ward, and a couple signs that don't make sense.

'You owe blood debt.'

*

Jirou has been hate-listening to 'Put Your Hands Up!' radio for about six years now.

She only called in twice to bash him, when she was younger and got a little more overwhelmed by the tasteful art of 'hate-listening.' She couldn't really hide the shaking in her voice, and the lady that answered asked if she needed emergency services to be dispatched, which just sent Jirou into a numb and furious state that had her screaming at the top of her lungs about how Present Mic was the biggest asshole in the world and doesn't deserve to call himself a hero.

Her parents hate it. Even her dad just wanted her to put the feelings into a song to make something more productive out of it, but the nice jam session that introduced her to the finer points of thrash metal couldn't persuade her to stop.

She knows it's not productive, especially when she tunes in when she's not particularly in the mood to hate-listen. Sometimes, she finds herself tapping her pencil, or finding that Present Mic actually found a single good song out of the four hours that he has for his show. That just makes it worse, because she almost feels sick when she does that. She hates the prick, and she can't forgive him, and anything he does that she doesn't hate just makes her feel like the bad guy.

She's not the bad guy, because she can put her feelings aside when it matters. She can try not to glare in his class, even though the first few weeks had her sweating and breaking pencils like Bakugo has somehow infected her. Even during her Spring Final, she wanted to run up and kick him in the teeth so bad. She could practically see his grossly oversized teeth popping out like a carnival game. But it was a test and it was her final grade for the semester. She's going to be the hero that knocks Present Mic off of his domination for hero-endorsed music merch, and that means doing well at UA, and not failing her first Final.

And if she had to pick a local hero who didn't know blues from jazz to intern with after the Sports Festival, that was fine. She might have giggled too much when she set Present Mic's internship offer on fire.

And they probably got on the air to start the whole thing, with that bump in rank in mind from the beginning.

Arson = Crime Brulee: @Friendsou Hitoshi, you're not at the study group. #no #stickers #for #you #coco

No head empty thoughts: @sero we r LEARNING and im PROUD and its still BEAUTIFUL in its own way.

Midobot: Counter for times @Midoriya has asked @Shinsou to check their chat +=1. Current counter == 53.

Hang the DJ: it's gonna break in three days

[illegible]

Wow SOMEONE has a life off of their phone: If you break my phone, I'm going to tell Eri that you did it, and it made me sad.

Ya Momo so cool that: Eri says hi, and that she hopes you and Yamada-sensei are having fun together.

Float On By: !!!! She wants a pic of you and Present Mic and Byte Sound and I DO TOOOOO!!!!
Gunhead still talks about Byte Sound, she's almost like his fave intern!!!

Jirou springs up once the realization hits her, that Shinsou was at Present Mic's radio show. It was weird that he wasn't with Aizawa or Eri, but a lot of weird stuff happens with him, and it's not worth getting worked up about it every time.

But if Shinsou was at Get Your Hands Up! Radio.

Hang The DJ: Shinsou. I will do. Literally ANYTHING you want. If you make Present Mic play Seken Sun's 'The One To Remember' album in full.

Wake Me Up When Spring Comes: Present Mic doesn't play a lot of indie bands. Let it go, Jirou. There's other radio stations to listen to.

Ya Momo so cool that: @Jirou I don't think this will work out the way you want it to.

No head empty thoughts: Jirouuuuuuuu nono nooooo ur not doing the hate listen thing just come up here and spend time with memes!!! I got some music memes for you!

Wow SOMEONE has a life off of their phone: Tap to download 22Kb

Wow SOMEONE has a life off of their phone: Yamada doesn't seem to do that. Is this a Morrissey thing?

Jirou only taps on the image to make sure Shinsou was at the radio station, and she doesn't know who would let him go out looking like that. But she's sure that the face mask with the 'Get Your Hands Up!' logo is all Present Mic's doing. He'll probably do something stupid like blast Shinsou's face on his Twitter account to brag about helping Shinsou to get another undeserved bump in rank, and completely forget that Shinsou is probably in a constant state of danger since he's a ward.

Hang the DJ: No, and remind me to give you a better playlist. But I'm serious, I will do l i t e r a l l y anything if you pull puppy dog eyes on Yamada and make it happen.

Arson = Crime Brulee: Heart eyes monster trucker.

No head empty thoughts: Were LEARNING SO GOOD Jirou please just END THIS MADNESS AND DO MEMES!!!

Wow SOMEONE has a life off of their phone: Does this have something to do with you hating Yamada

No head empty thoughts: Shinsou you sweet summer child u have NO IDEA wat ur gonna get into rn

Jirou closed the chat, trying not to roll her eyes. It probably wouldn't work out anyway, and she's not going to spill that story to Shinsou. She doesn't know him like that, and he seems weirdly attached to Present Mic. It's not like that's a bad thing, especially because it makes so much sense. Shinsou spends time with Bakugo of his own free will, so he probably has the worst taste in people.

Jirou doesn't even get to catch up on the new forum posts before she hears the footsteps from the stairwell, and notices Eri floating towards her right before Uraraka releases her quirk and Eri drops onto the couch cushions in front of her. "Hey, kiddo."

Eri looks a bit pouty at her for some reason. "Kyou, you gotta stop the madness and stop hating Yama! I really like Yama, and it makes me really sad!"

Jirou would believe that, if Ashido wasn't standing right there, nodding along after Eri spoke the words the Tik Tok fanatic spoonfed her. "Well, I'm sorry that makes you upset Eri, but Present Mic is a jerk, and until that changes, I'm not gonna change," Jirou says, but before she can turn back to her phone, she sees Eri's exaggerated pout change, softening into something that looks genuinely sad. "What's wrong?"

"Yama is nice," Eri says, wiggling one of her feet towards Jirou. "He likes music, and you like music too. And you're both heroes. You should be good friends, instead of being mad at Yama."

"Well," Jirou says, stretching her arms over her head. "I'm not really going to be friends with the guy who bashed the album my parents wrote for me so bad that my mom couldn't renew her record deal, and pretty much had to give up being a musician."

*

"Oh wow, she really must have gotten all the musical genes in that family," Yamada mutters to himself, still staring at the phone that 27 was holding out for him. 27 gives a pointed glance to the microphone, but Yamada throws up his hands when he catches it. "Look, Shinsou, I feel... kind of bad about that, I was definitely more harsh back in the early days, but that album. That album was bad."

27 just pulls away the phone and crosses his arms, because clearly, Yamada wasn't understanding this.

Yamada didn't just insult Amplifier 2.0, he insulted her family. 27 might not know what that means in some aspects, but this one seemed to be in line with what he would expect from an insulted yakuza family. Long Lobes was going to hold a grudge until either her family was avenged, or until peace could be reached, and it would be far better to settle the dispute before it devolved into war.

'Make peace. Blood debt is bad,' 27 signs, because even Chisaki stepped carefully along different mafias when he was forced to associate with them. Shie Hassaikai was a very old mafia from the peddler side, wars had been fought and peace ironed out multiple times, and oaths sworn hundreds of years ago still held weight, even in the face of the yakuza's extinction. Honzo wasn't a peddler, and could only claim to be a new gambling mafia because the gamblers were looser, but even he stepped carefully.

"Yeah, I get that... insulting Jirou's family like that is bad," Yamada says, but he says it with a wince that says he isn't going to make amends for it. "I wouldn't have said half the things I did if that album came out today, but I still wouldn't put my seal of approval on it. It's just... the composition was so off, the sampling selection was jarring, I don't know if it was an experimental piece into some weird new-wave dark-pop indie sound but it was just so bad. And that weird screeching sound laced through three songs could have been a statement if it wasn't"

27 glances at his phone when it starts buzzing, and turns it back to Yamada, only to see his face whiten.

"Oh. Oh yeah, yeah she's not happy," Yamada says, and while that was probably true, it wasn't the concession to make peace that 27 wanted to see.

No head empty thoughts: so yeah, Jirou's mom lost her record deal and everything but

No head empty thoughts: Jirou helped make the album too! She was a lil baby picking out songs and stuff and she SANG too!! And apparently PM hated her parts the worst, so like, its bad with her mom and everything but PM called JIROU OUT and PERSONALLY ATTACKED a baby, so like hes kind of a jerk? But I dont think anyone knows that part

Hang the DJ: now everyone DOES THANKS KAMINARI

Hang the DJ: @Shinsou just forget it, it's stupid. And if everyone else wants to do a whole ~Forget~ spell, that'd be great.

Arson = Crime Brulee: ~forget~

Sparkle Dion: Mon amie, I will listen to this album in your honor and swear vengeance upon those that wrong you. And creme brulee?? Would you like to make this with me, mon fougouex friend?

Sugar Might: I want in on this if it happens????

Arson = Crime Brulee: As long as it's not crime brulee, Iida will approve. So yes.

27 put his phone back into his pocket, because even if Jirou wanted him to forget too, he wasn't going to. She was obviously more upset about this than she would show, and would rather try to make it seem like she wasn't upset at all. She would act like she was perfectly fine with it, even if she wasn't, because there didn't seem to be an option to make things right that she could achieve herself.

'I want to hear that song,' 27 signs, and he knows he might have already won without saying it, because while Yamada is still wincing, the look in his green eyes seems defeated. 'My song request.'

He's never requested a song for Yamada to play, and that means that it carries more weight now. It's a tool made more powerful from disuse. He doesn't know what 'pulling puppy dog eyes' on Yamada would look like, but he knows that this is as effective as Eri pulling that expression on him. "Okay. If you... really want to do this, I can work it into my next set, and try to find some nice things to say about it. Maybe Kaminari's wrong about no one else knowing about that, I'll look up some fan forums and try to get more info."

'Thank you,' 27 signs, and tries not to think about other tools that could be more powerful from disuse. He knows from observing Chilli that it was, that speaking less often drew much more power and attention to his words. That Yamada might believe him more, cave more easily even if he was more likely to cave than Aizawa.

He feels a ghost of that familiar mask when he thinks about it.

Yamada would believe that 27 should meet with his mother if he said it, if he could bring himself to ask for it. Maybe it would be better not to ask for it outright, but to just say it. I want to meet my mother.

Writing that essay for Aizawa proved what he shouldn't say, that he shouldn't be honest with it. That he should say it in a way beyond questioning, to have no intentions to prove except for an honest want behind it.

27 can't even explain it, but he wants to meet his mother. She sold him, she's probably a victim of his quirk, she absolutely hates him no matter what her reasoning was to get away from him. If he wasn't sold, he wouldn't have had to meet Bug, or Chisaki, and so many things wouldn't have happened and made him into a completely different person.

He feels like he might know more about who that person would be if he met her. If he could just have that answer, he might feel more complete. More normal. He wants that.

He just has to convince Yamada of that, because Yamada will do almost anything that 27 wants.

*

Yeah, Yamada kind of blew it with that one.

He was younger when 'The One To Remember' came out, and it happened to fall right into the perfect storm when his manager insisted that he work it into his playlist. He wanted to just ignore it, ignore that the guitarist and second vocalist from one of his favorite bands had spun off into such a disastrous side project like Seken Suns. He was hyped before he pressed play on that exclusive pre-order, and kept desperately skipping around to find a gem hidden in that rough. And he couldn't.

It was worse than when Duely's swapped out their lead guitarist for that vocalist, because Yamada only fumed for a few days before he finally took a better look at that picture of her and nearly laughed. With how bad Shirakumo was crushing on Nemuri before he died, he knew that Shirakumo would do nothing but approve of the new line up of their favorite band. Shirakumo probably would have snatched up any merchandise that starred that new 'Jirou Mika.'

Yamada just wanted to like Seken Suns too much because of that, because he felt like he had to in order to let Shirakumo enjoy it too. He was still trying to 'live' for Shirakumo sometimes, because Shouta hadn't called him out on it yet. That album came out before the Great T-Shirt Debacle, when Yamada nearly went on a rampage because a moth had dared to fly into the very back of his closet and make a meal out of the last shirt Shirakumo loaned him, that he never had the chance to give back.

Shouta, the absolutely rigidly hypocritical love of his life, asked him to go to therapy after that. It worked wonders, honestly, for both of them, but in terms of the Seken Suns and by secondary casualty Duely's, it came a year too late.

Yamada heard he went viral after that rant when he was forced to play a song from 'The One To Remember' on his show, but Yamada couldn't bring himself to listen to that show recording. Even back then, he knew he had anger issues sometimes, and he used to try to chock it up to how little he let himself slip. He knew that he didn't want to hear the audio evidence of how there was something else inside him becoming a monster with his own voice. With his show of all things.

If he knew that it caused Duely's to break up or the Seken Suns project to devastate Jirou Mika's career, he probably would have tried to make amends earlier. But he ended up cutting all ties to anything regarding Duely's, feeling utterly betrayed that things would change over the course of six years. That the world would move on and change from what he thought Shirakumo would want it to be.

It might be close to the ten year anniversary of that rant, fittingly enough, but Yamada doesn't bring himself to check the dates on the forum posts to see if that's true. This isn't some PR stunt for his show, and he hates when his manager wheedles him into doing those things. It's far less genuine if it has anything to do with anniversaries, if it's just a coincidence of how time moves along in the world. The day is meaningless, because Yamada just feels bad about this.

And he doesn't want to go back to that day in the slightest, especially in the same room that he let himself be made into something he's not. So he tries to be as genuine and far from that anger as he can be when Byte counts down the green light.

"Listeners, Listeners! Lend me your ears, not that you haven't already! Tonight, we're having another special event that's becoming not so special, given that it's happened a lot and it will happen more often. I know a few dedicated listeners think they know the next song, and since it's not Open Mic Night, you should, but I've got a giant apology to make and this is the place to make it!" Yamada sees two memos shoved under his door already, and he wonders how on earth his manager can type so fast. "So, about ten years ago or so, there was a little band called Seken Suns who earned a whole lot of undeserved ire from me. I'm not sure how many of you are old enough to remember it, or how many of you want to remember it, but your friendly neighborhood DJ was not too friendly when he was talking down that debut album."

Yamada feels a numb horror when he sees his light go red, and comes as close as he's ever been to firing Byte Sound when he hears the audio clip come through. Mostly, he just wishes Shinsou was still wearing his noise cancelling headphones.

"Oh wow! Wow, listeners, music will take you places, and I feel like I've been transported to some hell daycare for demon babies! I GET experimental sounds, but unless that's supposed to be experimenting in torture - which these Seken Suns are VERY good at, believe me - actually, you don't HAVE to believe me, you heard it yourselves! I don't - I don't fucking GET it, I get A LOT of stuff but I DON'T get this. Let's try the third track - actually I've tried all these tracks and I can't get a single second of enjoyable audio, but let's just take this time to enjoy how far we can get from music for a while with these 'cool tunes.'"

Yamada doesn't even remember most of that show, but he definitely doesn't remember getting so worked up that he used his quirk. He can hear the squeal of it through the playback though, and every word he screamed ten years ago nearly makes him flinch.

He doesn't want to look at Shinsou right now, but he convinces himself that he has to. This was an angry side of him, a side that he's worked past for the most part, and Shinsou might be just as disturbed by it as he is. He knows that it's impossible for anyone to be more disturbed by it than Yamada is right now.

Shinsou looks back at him, his eyes a little wider, head tilting a bit to the side. He's surprised, which isn't shocking, but Yamada finds the lack of fear reassuring enough. Maybe Shinsou knows him well enough to know that the way he is now isn't a fragile facade holding that angry tantrum back, that he's a different person now than he was 10 years ago.

"Yeah, that's... That's not really your friendly DJ there," Yamada says, even if he fights not to duck his head too far to where the microphone won't pick up his voice. Byte is in his line of vision when he does raise his eyes from the soundboard, he sees a wince that pulls a bit more guiltily than other times he's had to remind her that their chat is open for these kinds of discussions about program planning for a reason. "That's a very loud, very angry jerk who thought he could define what music is, and thought he had the right to get angry about any artistic decisions that a musician makes, because he was a pretty entitled prick back then. I didn't know it, but that rant actually caused some devastation in the music world. The lead singer of Seken Suns pulled out of music entirely, and since Seken Suns was a side project to the band Duely's that she was a part of, they broke up too. Two bands blown to smithereens thanks to yours truly, and if that's not an act of villainy, learning the reasons why the album sounded like that definitely made me feel like one."

He honestly doesn't know how Jirou could stand to look at him, or do so well in his class if she had heard that rant in full.

"So, I found out today that Seken Suns was actually a family project. Jirou Mika, the amazing second vocalist and guitarist from one of my favorite bands, Duely's, started this project with her husband and composer Jirou Kyotoku, and their daughter who was six years old at the time. This family is amazingly talented, they did absolutely everything in house - lyrics, every instrument, recording and audio mixing. The album is called 'The One To Remember' because it was meant to be the debut of that daughter into the music world, because this family had no doubts that she would make a name for herself in the music industry, and this labor of love could be the embarrassing footnote in every interview she'd ever have, for years to come. And that is a parenting style I can get behind!" Yamada says, and he can't decide to count his blessings or hate the fact that he wasn't selected to meet the Jirou family before the dorms opened up.

He'd probably get a sucker punch to the face from one or both of them, but at least he'd know what he did wrong before now.

"The screeching that I complained about was a 6 year old having fun with professional autotuning. The samples that I hated were this little kid's favorite songs. The time signatures changing nine times on track three was this little kid trying to do an homage to Bohemian Rhapsody, and wow, I feel like a jerk just saying that! But it's worse, because 10 years later, I'm the airhead ranting and raving about how this amazing young woman had put on a show that knocked my socks off, and I find out it's that same kid. I went on that crazy rant about how much I hated the way 'The One To Remember' sounded, like I had any right to decide what good music should sound like, and if I just opened the little booklet that came with the special pre-order, I'd know exactly why it sounded like that. That album was a family coming together, to express and explore the meaning of music because music is always expanding in definition, and I just said 'Nope! I don't like it, it's trash, this is a personal attack on me because I don't like it!' What a jerk."

Yamada would like to say something a bit stronger and more accurate, but he knows there's a precious five year old tuning in. And even if that five year old has an F bomb in her arsenal, he's sure that Shinsou and Shouta will murder him if she learns any fun new words from his show.

"So, playing that album over again isn't enough to say sorry for that. I've done a little research online and found a lot of things I didn't notice before, a lot of things I didn't see 10 years ago because I was an angry twit when I was 22 years old, but older and wiser and all. It's enough that I want to personally and professionally apologize, incredibly sincerely to Mrs. Jirou Kyouka and her husband Jirou Kyotoku, but I really can't apologize enough to their daughter, who I'm not going to name because I know how some of you little listeners are, and I can't say enough how much I don't want to hear that you're going to go after an incredibly talented and incredibly wronged teenager," Yamada says, and finds himself glaring at the microphone just at the thought. "So, the next hour or so is going to be all of us becoming bigger people than we are, to look back at the things I've done wrong and to appreciate what can happen if you just look at a little booklet that was in your hands before you work yourself up into an unprofessional tizzy on a national stage. This is Seken Suns' first track, 'Intro!' And that's not an uninspired title, because the humming you hear is actually an homage to XX's 'Intro.'"

Yamada sits back and takes a long, well deserved drink of lemon water when he does. He didn't spare a second to plan out his thoughts, so he just ended up chunking them all out on the air. He's still not sure if he wants to talk about what Shinsou heard, how he can explain how young and dumb he was and convince him he's not that way now.

But he sees the phone sticking out at him, and he almost sputters some water up his nose because he was sure he passed the message along to Shouta to let Jirou know what he thought, thinking that she wouldn't want to hear his gushing in class and direct from the source where it might have been too embarrassing.

Hang the DJ: ...Present Mic was at the cultural concert???

My quirk, my weird quirk, and me: He was! His hero fan forum noted that his patrol route was taken over by Mr. Right that night!

Brololi: yo Tetsutestu said PM was trying to dance with Aizawa-sensei at the concert!!! He really thought you rocked!

Tik Tok on the Clock but: MARRIED. SO MARRIED. HOW DID WE NOT SEE IT????

Arson = Crime Brulee: They're not married. Aizawa-sensei doesn't have a ring, but Yamada-sensei has 10. Yamada-sensei has 10 partners, but not Aizawa-sensei. #we #do #not #see #it Yamada takes a minute to appreciate Todoroki's math on that, before he starts wondering how publically he can insist that Jirou's cultural festival concert was a blow out. He doesn't know whether Jirou wants to be a hero with a second job, and he wants to now more than ever, even if he knows that his students are still in training for their first job as heroes and probably shouldn't put too much thought into it. He hopes in the next round of internships, he can sit down and talk with her about that, even if he's not sure how to wrap up this apology face to face without making it too awkward.

But when Shinsou pulls back his phone, he doesn't seem to be able to look Yamada in the eye, even if his cheek is raised just a bit in a smile that doesn't seem to be a smirk. 'Thank you. Don't insult families.'

Yamada doesn't need to look to see his darling sidekick Byte Sound smelling blood in the water, and signing that little suggestion in greater detail. "Yeah, no, that was a big jerk move on my part. I don't... really act that way, and I shouldn't have at the time. I'm just sorry you had to see that, or hear it."

Shinsou shrugs, and while Yamada knows an angry voice like that is probably the least that Shinsou has suffered, he still shouldn't have heard it from Yamada. Yamada is supposed to be better than that, to show Shinsou the best side of himself. 'People act dumb when angry. Now Music dumb.' Yamada doesn't need to look at Byte to know that she's enjoying that sign name too much. 'But not horrible.'

Yamada will settle for not being horrible in Shinsou's eyes for right now. Especially when his ward is going to have to suffer through this little venture that he was so insistent on.

Yamada does feel bad for the things that he said, and the outcome that he didn't intend from it. But 'The One To Remember' is still not an enjoyable listen. Yamada finds he can only like it for the intentions behind it, and he finds himself looking at it like one of his student's essays instead of a piece of music that has something intangible behind it to make it work.

He still tries, though. He tries to connect to that ephemeral 'it' factor by closing his eyes and really, truly immersing himself in the sound. When that doesn't work, he tries humming along, and then tries singing, even if some of the lyrics that he knows had to have come from a 6 year old's hands make him grin too much when he serenades his ward.

Shinsou gives him a pretty dry look to make him stop, which Yamada puts down as a success in exploring the fun possibilities of being an embarrassing father. But before he gets too wrapped up in those possibilities, he sees Shinsou singing along out of the corner of his eye. Signing along to the lyrics.

Given that the current track was sampling an English song, Shinsou was translating two languages outside of his native Japanese without a second of hesitation. And Yamada didn't need any more excuses to be blown away by how Shinsou took to languages, given that he's seen the kid study from conversational JSL to fluent in a little over a month.

So, of course, Yamada has to join in.

There's a moment where Yamada thinks that this being the only way they could sing along right now might be sad, it might have been a jerk move to throw Shinsou's mutism in his face by singing to him before. But there's a part of Yamada that treasures this moment more, because even if he wasn't there when Shinsou was a kid learning to speak, he was there to teach him the signs and English words that he knows now. This is honestly something that he feels more connected with Shinsou through, that he treasures more for it.

And even if he knows Byte is recording their little show on her phone, she's under strict instructions to not let any of it go online. Yamada welcomes the day that he can give those Miasma goons what-for, but he's not going to put Shinsou in danger by linking his face to his show.

She's still going to send him the video of it under pain of termination, and he'll try not to save it under something embarrassing like 'Shinsou's first sing along song.'

"Thank you guys for coming out to listen to 'The One To Remember,' and I hope you'll remember this listen more fondly than the last one!" Yamada says once he gets that green light, and just looking at the clock reminds him that he's made a huge mess of his schedule with this move.

"We're a bit overdue on our Q&A sesh, but that just means that there's plenty of callers asking what the hell I'm thinking these days. And to that question, I can answer that I'm doing whatever the heck I want! I'm older and wiser, and my hair has only grown higher. If you don't like it, move along and don't make an a-a butt out of yourself on national airwaves. First caller, you're up and on the air with Present Mic, the Voice Hero himself, here to give you some advice even though I've definitely needed it sometimes."

There's a fumble of dead air, and that happens a lot, but Yamada hears a weird clicking noise that he only identifies after a familiar voice cuts through. "So, there's this guy that I've hated for a long time. Even when I don't have a reason to hate him, I hate him, and even when I know he's not that big of a jerk, it just... It pisses me off that he's not. Even if he apologized and all, it's still... messed up."

Jirou tends to click the ends of her earlobes together when she's pretty frustrated and peeved, and Yamada understands why that happened so much in the beginning of the year now, better than ever. "Well, obviously this guy would be a huge jerk if he's only apologizing because he wants to make you stop hating him. Your feelings are your own, you know, and sometimes they're the only things you have. Sometimes those feelings are a big indication that you're not ready for whatever the mind wants to do, and you've got to listen to those feelings and sit with them sometimes. Self care and all."

Yamada thought his therapist was the biggest idiot in the world when she suggested that he needed to take his cues before that anger slipped out of him. He was convinced there were no cues, it just happens like a quirk slip, but just like a quirk slip, it does have cues. He was pissed off that his manager was running his show, he was angry that Shirakumo was dead and he couldn't just ask if he thought Seken Suns' was trash too. He just barrelled through all of that instead of taking a step back to realize that he shouldn't be in that mess, and if he had gotten fired for sticking to his guns so early on in his radio show career, he could be in a better place or exactly the same one he's in now. He could have at least been a bit more honest running his show, and making it more of his show.

"So, this guy apologizing is completely irrelevant to you, in a way. If you don't want to forgive him, don't. If you want to come around to that, you can go at your feelings' pace with it. It's a sad fact that the world doesn't have enough honest apologies, and that the world doesn't apologize for being a rough place to be."

Yamada spent too long being angry that the world would never apologize for Shirakumo's death. That the universe at large wouldn't even send him a little note to say 'Sorry, that was kind of messed up.' The world would go on like it hadn't happened, like it didn't notice Shirakumo wasn't there, and being angry about that wasn't the right way to acknowledge that it hurt him. It was a long, awful process to sit with that hurt, but Yamada was so much better off after doing it.

"There are a lot of people that hurt and do hurtful things because of it, and it's worse because there are people who don't have that flimsy excuse and just hurt people because it's easier to do that. It's hard to tell the difference, but the only person you can ever really know and trust is yourself. So if everything inside you is still screaming that this guy is going to do nothing but piss you off, don't worry with him," Yamada says, even if he hates it.

Even if he wants nothing more than to sit down with Jirou and talk about her future, to have her headshot on his wall of fame, to endure the utter devastation when Byte Sound gets her hands on Jirou and they both make his life absolutely miserable.

But, given that Yamada is going to be Jirou's English teacher for the next two years, he does have to add, "But, for what it's worth, I am honestly, sincerely apologizing. I think you're an incredibly talented musician, and you're one of my favorite students. And it's because I've seen that, I know I deserve any icy shoulder I get, and I'm totally cool with however this plays out. There's a standing internship offer, but if that's not a stepping stone on your path to becoming the amazing hero I know you'll be, I totally get that."

Byte has a little habit of punishing any dead air that happens after the usual initial hesitation with her soundboard, and drum roll is completely unnecessary. But it's a tribute to her quirk that she could end that sound bite right before Jirou speaks up. "I heard interns get to destroy your studio, so I might take you up on that."

Byte Sound couldn't look any happier or excited if she tried, and Yamada knew he was purely, devastatingly fucked now. "Whoa, whoa, that was one time, so you only get one shot! This little studio is kind of a rental, so I don't need any expansions!" Yamada says, knowing that Jirou could turn his studio into an open floor plan if she went at it with both sets of speakers. "But, I might have a sledgehammer on reserve, and we can both autograph it afterwards. Capiche?"

"Pretty lame way of getting my autograph," Jirou says, with a tone that would serve her well if she did dip her toes into music after graduation. "But yeah. Capiche."

Yamada sees a new record of five memos fly under his door and ignores it. "Well, now that we've gotten the plans to destroy my studio ironed out - next caller, you're live and on the air with Present Mic, who might need to look into some advice on how to properly knock holes into walls."

Yamada both loves and hates Q&A's. At first, he was flattered by fans trying to get information about him direct from the source, and he loved going on about himself. But there's only so much he can say, and some fans dedicated to other heroes would try to get an insider scoop on those heroes through him. And sometimes there were some requests for personal advice he had no idea how to answer, and just fumbled his way through it.

Pretty much all of his Q&A's turn into advice panels at this point, and there's only so many times he can say 'I don't know, just do what feels right,' in an hour and a half. Shinsou raises an eyebrow at a few things Yamada isn't sure he should hear, because it's incredibly unfortunate that most relationship issues devolve into some kind of sex thing before the end. But while Yamada is excited about a lot of aspects of parenting, he's more than happy to postpone that kind of conversation until everything is finalized and all.

"Alright!" Yamada says, stretching his arms above his head and feeling like that coffee didn't do nearly enough for him for this show. "We have gotten our hands up until our hands just can't get higher, and it was kind of fun! Not the worst Saturday night on record?"

Shinsou rolls his eyes and shakes his head, and Yamada is starting to like earning those eye rolls a little too much, if he's honest. 'One more question. Can't call. I'm mute.'

Yamada spins around so he's facing Shinsou, and considers pulling up the smokescreen on Byte Sound before he checks and sees that she's already escaped her side to probably get a snack. "Well, I'm always on the air for you, little listener. Go ahead and ask away!"

Yamada knows it could be pretty much anything from Shinsou, but he's not surprised that despite the teasing beforehand, something makes Shinsou hesitate and duck his head, hand curling behind his neck.

Yamada gets a bit more worried when he notices Shinsou's jaw drop a little lower under the face mask, and that defeated kind of sigh follows it. Maybe he shouldn't have mentioned that bout of illness could have been due to his quirk, that it could have cleared things up for Shinsou. He shouldn't have made it sound like promises Yamada had no way of keeping.

But he sees Shinsou pull himself to sit a bit straighter, worryingly straight, before he looks him in the eye. 'I want to see my mother.'

There are two ways of signing 'mother' in JSL, and Yamada has never overlooked that Shinsou always uses the formal and distant one. He's never forgotten why that is. Even before he got confirmation from Eri on a suspicion he didn't want to believe, that Shinsou being distant from his mother was something his mother wanted, he knew this would be a difficult conversation to have.

Even if it's only gotten more complicated.

"So, I kind of get that," Yamada says, and he tries not to say it more than he means, what he's pretty sure it isn't thanks to Shouta cluing him in to a little essay project. "Shou told me that you wanted to do that, to help with the investigation and other things, but... part of the whole 'keeping you safe' thing is making sure that you don't get hurt in other ways, you know? And Shou and I both think that if you met with your mother right now, it might be kind of hurtful, you know?"

He gets an eye roll that he can't really appreciate, given how frustrated Shinsou looks before he throws his hands down and looks away. 'Didn't say right. Not like that. Just.'

Yamada knows Shinsou is probably running through every trick in the book to still get his way, and Yamada doesn't exactly like that it's his job to not let him get his way. But practically hearing the horror in Shouta's text messages about how Shinsou wanted his mother to rename him makes him pretty sure that this still shouldn't happen.

'I don't know mother. I want to know. I want to. Stop. Wondering.'

Yamada is pretty sure Shinsou couldn't have hit him any harder if he tried.

Yamada wants to brush that off, but the hesitation before every sign, the frustrated jerks and glares that finally ended with folded hands and a dedicated stare at the floor makes him think this is too much honesty for a kid trying to find the boundaries to his new circumstances. Yamada knows that sign language can be limited, but he feels too much of what Shinsou signed despite that.

Because he felt that too, a lot when he was Shinsou's age. "So, you know that my biological parents decided to, you know. Not do the parenting thing with me," Yamada says, and despite how much he loves his moms and his family and wouldn't trade them for the whole damn world, he still finds a tiny piece of himself still stinging about it. "One night, I got a call to my show, and the caller said they were my mother. She said that my parents were proud of me, that they made a mistake in giving me up, that she wanted to make things right now. I got a little fuzzy-headed about it, because it was so sudden, I didn't really know what to think about it. I took down her phone number, and a few hours later, I got another caller. And she said that she was my mom."

Shinsou's eyebrows furrow together confused, but he seems to piece it out faster than Yamada did, when he looks a bit horrified.

"I had an interview earlier that week where I talked about my biological parents giving me up for the first time. I don't know if those callers were trying to make me feel better, or if they thought they could wheedle some cash out of me if they were in desperate financial straits. I don't take calls like that anymore, anyone claiming to be my parents is a no-go. Especially because after that night, I really started to wonder why I was always wondering about them," Yamada says, and he almost feels stupid that it took him nearly 20 years of wondering to figure it out. "I didn't really want an apology, even if it would be nice. I kind of wanted to have a reason outside the obvious, but that doesn't really matter to me anymore. Even if I'll probably never know, and it's probably better for me that I don't know how they're doing or what they did, or what kind of people they really are. I stopped wondering because I realized I wouldn't really get what I wanted from them."

Yamada knows this will either make or break this entire night when he asks flat out, and he knows that Shinsou might not be ready to answer. He still thinks that it's better that he ask the question, because while Shouta might wish he completely lost contact with his own mother, he's never sat with the kind of wondering that Shinsou surely is.

"So, just hypothetically, if you did meet with your mom... What would you want from that?" Yamada asks, and he wants the answers to be so many different things. In a perfect world, he'd like Shinsou to realize that he doesn't need to meet with his mother, that he could have a family that wouldn't hurt him and one of those family members is staring him right in the face. But Yamada knows this isn't a perfect world, and this world has been cruel enough for Shinsou already. Despite how heavy the 'wondering' is, he wishes that Shinsou didn't have to deal with it on top of everything else he's been through.

Shinsou looks at his hands, and Yamada imagines if he wasn't wearing the face mask, he'd see the corner of Shinsou's mouth working up and down like it does when he's really thinking. The kid can translate through two languages in seconds, but Yamada is sure this question needs a lot more consideration before those feelings can be accurately translated in sign. 'To see her. Seeing enough. Just. C-L-O-S-U-R-E.'

Yamada imagines just seeing his mother would be a lot. To see a woman who took him from the world and put him underground, into the criminal underworld that Shinsou got lost in for 12 years. If Shinsou knows just as well as Yamada does that if Shinsou Ui doesn't crack in a few days and admit something more chargeable than Ashido's testimony, that seeing her in handcuffs at that police station might be the only way of getting that closure.

Shinsou Ui could run, she could disappear and never face what she did to Shinsou. She could leave one last torment for Shinsou to overcome through that, to leave the question hanging about who she is and why she did that. The worst part is that Yamada could never answer that question for Shinsou either.

"Well," Yamada says, even if he hesitates to go on. "Why don't we grab a bite to eat, and talk a little more about it? And if you still feel the same way, I think just seeing her is easy enough to do."

Yamada knows it's still not. He wishes Shinsou could just give up these feelings, but he knows it doesn't work like that. He wishes he didn't have any apprehension prickling under his skin when Shinsou looks so relieved, when he signs 'Thank you,' so genuinely. It's as much a kid wanting to be heard, to be acknowledged for his feelings and to have them considered, and a kid who probably has no idea what they could find themselves mixed up in.

"But I want you to know that this is only happening for you. Not the investigation, not-not with any of that stuff. We're just going to pop over to the police station and look through the window, no talking or anything," Yamada stipulates, because he doesn't want 'seeing' to come off as anything but that - seeing. Yamada will not give that woman a chance to see Shinsou with her own eyes when she doesn't fucking deserve to. When he is the amazing kid that he is despite her.

Shinsou nods, and if he's a bit put off by that, he hides it well. It's just a hesitation, and Yamada can't decide whether it's disappointment in Yamada trying to put his foot down or a bit of embarrassment when he decides to sign that. 'Thanks. Tuning in and listening.'

Yamada cannot stop the ugly and half-inappropriate snort from bursting out of him. "Lame! Do not use my catchphrases on me! You're gonna have me thinking you're a fan or something, if you keep with that."

Shinsou tosses in a 'Now Music' just to cover his tracks, but Yamada knows better.

He knows Shinsou is at least a fan of his show.

*

27 couldn't do it. He couldn't bring himself to lie to Yamada's face like that. To talk, to ask for what he wanted with that, to use it as a weapon.

It surprises him that what convinced him not to wasn't fear - he knew it would be a risk if Yamada knew he wasn't mute, and that even that simple sentence could be proof he didn't want to give. He just felt guilty, it felt too heavy.

He's so lucky it still worked.

He's not really lying to Yamada, in this at least. He wants to stop wondering about his mother. He wants answers, and he knows he might never get all of them. He doesn't know if Yamada was really able to stop wondering about his parents, if those questions ever really stop if they're not answered. Even now, he just has more of them - if she's at the police station, is she in the same room that he lived in? Does it feel different to her because of that, like she knows he used to be in that room? Should it? Would she even know who he was if she saw him?

He's seen three pictures of her - two from that article about her disappearance, and the one that Aizawa showed him. Pictures aren't enough, and at one point, he probably thought they would be. He just wants more, he wants to keep searching until he fills the void, until he finds the ground he can stand on. Until he knows everything that happened to him - everything. He doesn't know anything at this point, and the things he forgot when he was younger at The Miasma are probably best left forgotten. He knows Bug didn't treat him any more kindly then, and he's sure that he remembers every piece of 50's visits clearly. He wouldn't lose that.

Eri doesn't remember everything, and some things that she doesn't remember almost baffle him because it didn't happen so long ago. He knows that children forget their early childhood, those memories are lost except to the other people who were there, who were old enough to remember them.

He wonders what it was really like for him. He has things he's not sure of, feelings more than images, and fuzzy things that might not be real. It would be easier if he could just have those pictures, things he could hold in his hand and never forget. Even if it's embarrassing, he still saved that picture of himself smeared in fingerpaint that Ashido sent him. It's one thing, one picture, and he takes pictures of Eri in hopes that she'll always have more for when she's too old to remember this time in her life.

When they leave that studio room, Yamada puts his arm around his shoulders again. Shinsou doesn't want to admit it, but he breathes easier, even if the touch almost stings at first. He knows he's weird, he likes and hates it. He knows it feels nice but there are times that it doesn't.

Byte Sound smiles at him too much, and looks at him too often. He doesn't know what she intends with those looks or those smiles, whether she means her constant signing as mocking or accepting. What he wants it to be, when he's only pretending that he needs to use it. 'Your dad lame. Bully him for me.'

27 doesn't know what that means, why she signs it, or what she means by that. She's not Eri, she's older, she knows Yamada. She knows who he is. He doesn't know what she sees. Yamada isn't his- he can't be his-

Yamada's arm feels oddly tense around his shoulders, before Yamada sputters until he finds words. "Byte, you-you're- you're supposed to bully me, not my poor, defenseless ward! How dare you?!"

Yamada turns and makes a poor shield with his body, his other arm stretching across 27 but he can't step in front of him without taking his arm away from his shoulders. 27 is glad he doesn't, in more ways than one. But Byte Sound just ducks so that 27 can see her under Yamada's arm, and has a smaller grin. 'Don't do anything for anyone. Not even him. Especially him. Easier to bully him in sign.'

27 at least knows what she means by that. The way her eyes went a little wider, her expression more honest, tells him that she meant that more than what she said. That her signing was accepting his signing, in a way bigger than he first thought.

It makes him feel guiltier, because he doesn't need that reassurance. He wasn't broken because he couldn't talk. Because he could.

Yamada sighs after he shoos Byte Sound away, and even if he practically chased her off, he still asked her to be safe on the drive home. "Byte is a mess and I want to hate her, but I can't. I'm just glad she didn't corrupt you too much from the other side of the glass. That glass panel is for your own safety, believe me."

27 doesn't know what to say, because Byte Sound didn't seem that bad. The show wasn't bad either, even though Yamada seemed to hate it for some reason.

This was actually pretty nice. Until she said that.

It's just a weird thing to say, that Yamada was his father or something. He's not like Eri, he doesn't need a father. He never needed one, he has no idea what that even looks like. He doesn't need someone to read him books or take care of him or feed him or-

He's just lucky that Yamada hasn't gotten the wrong impression this far. He wants to stay at UA, but he knows he's not like Eri. Yamada and Aizawa will be Eri's fathers, he can just be there. Just like things are now. Maybe better. But not like that.

27 tries to drive it out of his mind when they reach the parking lot. It's dark, 27 has always worked in the dark so he knows who else works in the dark too. He sees Byte Sound walking further ahead, he thinks she might keep Yamada from getting hurt if they were attacked. 27 wouldn't be able to do much on his own, and he'd have to rely on her.

"Shinsou, I've really got to level with ya," Yamada says, and the serious way he's talking underneath that forced playful tone is absolutely terrifying right now, given what 27 had been thinking about in this silent walk. "I really, really need to know... what your little hero name would be for Byte Sound."

Yamada mumbles that last part, almost like he's embarrassed about it. 27 is almost embarrassed for him, because it's just stupid. It's just a thing that 27 does, what he's always done to people that he didn't have names for. He'd give them names, and they'd be stupid names, stupid and mocking names because he would keep them to himself. He'd always have that power over them, that chance to laugh at them behind a locked mask.

He doesn't know why Yamada asks about that so much, asks him to make up names even if he seems to hate the ones he gives him. He doesn't know why Yamada acts that way at all, why he wants to know what he thinks. No one has ever wanted to know about those stupid little things he thinks about.

27 doesn't know why, but he likes it. He never would have let anyone else know, and he knows that it's fine that Yamada does.

He knows the signs he could use, but they're not quite right. And it's short enough, he's just desperate enough, to think it would be fine.

"Edible Audio." 27 goes numb when he realizes it's not fine, he fucked up, this wasn't worth it, why the fuck would he say that-

"BYTE!" Yamada yells, and he probably uses a bit of his quirk to get that loud. Byte Sound doubles over like she'd been hit by it, then turns and probably glares, but it's too dark to see it. "You're EDIBLE AUDIO NOW!"

This time she does fold over, defeated and shaking her head. If she tried to sign to him after she pulled herself up, it's too dark to see it, and 27 is too grateful.

Too grateful for too many things. That Yamada doesn't say it, doesn't mention that he said it. That Yamada turns on the radio station and talks about the guy who takes over his studio for the early morning slot, and how his voice puts people to sleep with how slow and flat he talks.

He's grateful that Yamada didn't ask that terrifying question, whether 27 was thinking about what Byte Sound signed.

Because he still can't put it out of his head.

*

Yamada might not have slept a wink on his designated rest day, but he can't stop buzzing about it. He feels just a bit of his body crying out for sleep when his husband and Eri walk through the door, and though both of them seem a bit groggy this morning, he has coffee on hand for one and a cheerful smile for the other. "How was the--"

"Twenny!" Eri yells, perking up a bit too fast and definitely running too fast on those little legs to throw herself at Shinsou where he's trying to man the frying pan for breakfast. "I missed you and the heroes missed you and Zawa missed you too! Did you miss me?"

Shinsou abandoning his post to crouch down to Eri's level and pull her into a hug, one of those rare and carefree smiles on his face definitely answers that question. "I did. I had a lot of fun, but I wished you were there. Were... you still awake for Baby Shark?"

Eri nods, and that probably explains some weariness, which might also explain why Eri seems to be melting more into that hug with her eyelids looking a little heavier. "I was busy missing you."

Shinsou gets a guilty pull against that smile, and Yamada feels a tug of it too. But they both probably hope this makes up for it a little for a miserable little bean who couldn't sleep so well without her Twenny at her side. "Yamada and I sang it together for you, with our hands. I can teach you how--"

"Really?!" Eri asks, jolting a bit more awake at the possibilities. "I wanna learn! I wanna sing it together, all of us! And dance too! And-and it's okay if you go again. If you do that and you miss me a lot, and you still sing for me."

Yamada thinks that's a pretty big step for a little bean, to put her blessing on another night away from Shinsou when the one that happened last night was so miserable for her. And he can't chock all of it up to the magical power of 'Baby Shark.' "We'll make sure that happens! And I do mean all of that. It's a little hard to get the hand-singing down with the dancing, but I think we can do some choreography--"

"It's very difficult, but I'm sure Hizashi will work it out," Shouta says, taking a long sip from his coffee after sending a pleading look that practically prays for Eri to forget that little idea after a mid-morning nap. Unfortunately for Shouta, neither Eri or Yamada would give up on that little family plan.

After the show, Yamada ended up giving in when Shinsou still seemed uncomfortable grabbing something from a late-night diner, and had been worried that going home to an empty dorm might inspire the end of the night. But it didn't, and maybe Yamada should have been more responsible and insisted that Shinsou get some sleep, but the hours just ticked on at the kitchen counter, just talking and cooking and it was practically everything he wanted from that night.

He got Shinsou to laugh. He got Shinsou to talk, about how he likes fried eggs and foreign languages, how he's sure that this 'meme' thing is practically a cult and Yamada tries to reassure him that it's just good and weird fun between teenagers, but he's not sure if he explained it too well.

Shinsou talked about how Eri was when she was younger, the more that the night dragged on and morning dragged in. How that fascination with cats started young with her favorite books, how Eri used to try to make up games when she was too young to explain them. Things that Shinsou wishes he still had pieces of, memories that would last.

He got another look at that picture of Shinsou after begging and practically bribing him with some embarrassing pictures of himself. Even if Shinsou cattily signed that most pictures of Yamada were embarrassing, he knew that was just one of those rare moments that Shinsou remembered he was a teenager and entitled to sassing.

Shinsou signed that he didn't know why he was covered in fingerprint, but his guess about Ashido trying to make him purple sounds solid. Yamada almost wants to make some unprofessional calls to Ashido's parents to get more information about those playdates that must have happened, knowing that the way Ashido is now might not be entirely different from when she was 4, and Shinsou must have been entirely too maleable to her schemes back then.

The parent that would have more information about that, about how Shinsou was when he was a child, definitely wouldn't tell him. And if he did ever talk to her, he'd blow the roof off before she got a word out.

As much as Eri was definitely in a cuddly mood, deciding to perch on Shinsou's hip while he finished up the omurice, she still insisted that Shouta do his usual magic with the ketchup. Yamada is perfectly capable of drawing a cute cat, and he's sure that Shinsou is too, but this has apparently been a Shouta and Eri thing from day one, before any of them knew it would be.

Yamada is a bit too giddy to write his usual little 'love notes' on Shouta's, so he settles for a very accurate depiction of what his husband's eyes look like after a few too many nights without sleep. He gets a dry look that seems very appreciative of his efforts.

Yamada wanted to add a little 'Thanks for tuning in' message to Shinsou's omurice, after Eri declared that she was decorating Yamada's, but he sees a surprising little gesture that makes him almost swell with pride. 'Stop. Dislike. It's cold.'

Yamada agreed to Shinsou seeing his mother on one condition - that he learned to sign 'Stop.' Not that the kid didn't know the sign already, but he needed to practice setting up boundaries. Little things, even a tiny thing like saying no to the universally accepted ketchup on omurice was a big thing for Shinsou, and backing out of meeting his mother if he realized he wasn't ready was so much bigger.

Yamada doesn't want to see 'It's fine' unless it is fine, because Shinsou should know him well enough to know that it's safe to be honest with him.

Even if it's totally weird that he doesn't want ketchup on omurice.

After breakfast, it seemed like Eri's mind had caught on to the fact that they were all awake on a rare Sunday morning, and the math seemed to add up to so much more time to spend together. Her first pick was a movie, of course, but that was unfortunately her undoing. Still cuddled up on Shinsou's side, she barely made it through 10 minutes before passing out.

Shinsou himself seemed a little slow to realize it, a fond smile picking at the corner of his mouth when Yamada had to point it out. Shinsou's arm was still trapped around her, which made carrying her to her bed an easier venture, but Yamada wasn't entirely surprised that after 20 more minutes, Shinsou was unlikely to come back.

Two kids down for a nap, a groggy but surprisingly cuddly husband at his side, and a movie they no longer had to watch on a lazy Sunday afternoon. Yamada would love to just lay his head on Shouta's shoulder and enjoy it, but there was so much to talk about. "Shinsou talked to me."

Yamada can't help smiling so wide, even if Shouta looks at him in utter surprise.

"Two words. 'Edible Audio,' which is Byte Sound's new name. Two words, he wasn't really panicking and wasn't- Shou, it went great, and we talked so much-"

"That's good," Shouta says, too quickly and he takes a drink from that second cup of coffee a bit too quickly. Shouta probably already knows that a Grumpy Gus appearance would not be appreciated right now, but he insists. "It doesn't seem like Principal Nezu reported it to The Commission, but if they knew about-"

"Shou," Yamada whines, deciding to throw himself over his husband's lap as punishment for raining on yet another of his parades. "I know, the testing thing, gotta make sure my brain can't be washed like Midoriya's, but please just listen to me? I had a wonderful time with my ward last night and I'm going to talk your ear off about it, then you can tell me about your adventure with Eri because I haven't heard enough about it-" Yamada watches his husband swish his coffee, and that's always been a sign that there's some emotional upheaval he's trying to swish out of himself. "Shou. How was that little daddy daughter date?"

Shouta doesn't even flinch, doesn't even try to look away, and Yamada practically feels like he's falling through the couch and into cloud nine.

"Shou-?!"

"Hizashi!" Shouta hisses, leaning against the armrest of the couch a bit more to look down the hall, worried that little slip of near hysteria could break this little spell, this rare time where they can properly talk outside of their bedroom. He swishes again, and Yamada practically doesn't need him to say it at this point. "It was nice. She has a best friend now, Shoji's little sister Mizuno. They're good for each other, and Eri did well with being with someone her own age. We need to make sure they can do that again."

Hizashi heard about that - a lot of that over text messages. But that doesn't explain the coffee swishes.

"She correctly identified some boys as villains for using their quirks to attack others," Shouta says, and pauses, like that's some great revelation hidden in there.

"Shou, she doesn't just live at UA, a famous hero school, she lives with you, the guy who could practically write a college course on hero law and hero ethics, and that's not what I'm asking about." Yamada watches two more swishes and he wonders if Shouta will even say it before he starts drafting out the legal papers.

"Eri's situation won't change soon. Years, probably, given the nature of her quirk," Shouta says, because he might complain about Yamada taking too long to spit something out, but Mr. Rational needs to lay out all the logic before he dives into something as terrifying as emotions. "Things could change in that time."

Yamada knows there's a 'but,' and he leans a bit closer and feels like throttling it out of his ass of a husband.

"I wouldn't mind if this... stays the same."

Yamada spills some coffee, mostly on himself but a bit onto Shouta, but he lunges up and tries to kiss this oaf senseless because if he doesn't do something else with his mouth, he'll probably scream. "Yamada Eri-"

“We still need to-”

“Be aware... of the possibilities of Aizawa Eri,” Yamada says, and has to bury his face against Shouta’s newly wet shirt because he knew Shouta would blush, but he wasn’t ready to see it. “It’s not fair, we should do the family name thing all over again. I’ll even take the part after the hyphen, and I’ll put up with all of Nemuri’s teasing about it, because Aizawa-Yamada Eri does have a ring to it-”

“But-” Shouta tries to dump yet another gush of cold water over his parade, but Yamada is prepared this time, and makes him do something better with his mouth with another kiss.

“Yep, things change, she’s a little kid, she needs what’s best - but she thrives here and she loves us, and we’re ready, Shou.” Yamada sees fear in his husband’s eyes, and he’s been with the man long enough to know to take big things slow. So he’s forced to endure a little sprinkle when he sighs. “Another month-”

“A year,” Shouta counters, entirely too quickly, and that’s way too much.

“Her birthday-”

“A year,” Shouta insists, and if two insists happened, it usually had some fantastic logic behind it. “Adoption typically takes 18 months, and I know you’re going to involve your mother to hurry the process along. It will even out to 18 months if we wait a year.”

Yamada raises an eyebrow, not entirely surprised that Shouta would force them to wait a year and a half just because it was ‘typical,’ even though nothing about this was typical and it shouldn’t be for their darling and extraordinarily special daughter. But he was surprised that he would forget something in all of that math. “Nezu basically has legal custody, and he will have it done by the end of the day when we ask for it.”

Yamada almost laughs when Shouta tries to look surprised. “So. A year.”

He has to cover his face with his hands, because he can’t believe he almost bought it. “A year. Or sooner, if we agree to it. It’s not like Eri’s mom is standing in our way or anything.”

Shouta hums, drinking what’s left of his coffee, but if he wants to get up and change his shirt, that’s unfortunate. Yamada is entirely too comfortable laying on his husband, too tired to get up to any other antics in the bedroom, and not willing to move an inch from where he’s draped over Shouta’s chest, even when he tries to put the coffee mug down. “Other than Jirou, which Eri already told me about, how was it with Shinsou?”

Ah. Yamada remembers there’s something he probably should have filled Shouta in on first, and now that everything is so comfortable and peaceful, he definitely doesn’t want to ruin it. “I’m going to take him to see his mom.”

He feels Shouta go still under him, and maybe he regrets the timing but he still doesn’t regret his decision.

“Look, we talked about it - you and I talked about it, but I talked about it with him, and, you know. I get it. He wants closure, he wants to put the kaput on it and have something more final to look back on-”

“He knew he would get you to say yes,” Shouta growls, and Yamada probably should stop hiding his face in his husband’s hair, but he knows what he’d see. “I don’t know how he could-”

“He didn't know, beyond the- well, yeah I told him a little bit about it-”

“It’s not about that, he knew he would get you to say ‘yes’ because you never say ‘no’ to him,” Shouta argues, and he can feel him pulling away before Yamada finally lets go of him and sits up. He still doesn’t like that Shouta is glaring daggers at the wall, knowing too well that he’d rather be glaring at him. “You know what he wrote and what he said-”

“I know,” Yamada insists, because he hasn’t forgotten it. There’s a lot of messed up things inside his ward’s head, he knows that so much better now. He knows that the only real way to know about it is to talk to Shinsou, and he does.

Shouta’s little essay thing might have had merit, but just taking those things like ‘I want to help the investigation so Endeavor doesn’t take me away’ or ‘I want my mom to rename me’ is just scratching the surface of what Shinsou’s worried about. It’s just what he puts to words, but that isn’t what he’s feeling underneath.

“We’re going to look at her through the window, and that’s it. No talking, she’s not even going to know about it. I know that’s still going to stir up a lot of stuff, but we’re working on boundaries and communicating, and he’s going to tell me when it’s enough, alright? I know he’s just - he has so many questions about it, what could have happened and didn’t and what things could be like, and I had those questions too, so I know it. I feel like he just wants a part of where it all began for him, just to close the book on it, and I want that-”

“She sold him.”

The words catch in Yamada’s throat, and he nearly chokes on them. Yamada leans back, watching Shouta pull further away to cross his arms.

“He knows that. He’s known that all this time, and he didn’t tell you-”

“Why the hell didn’t you?” Yamada growls, his voice almost breaking at the end. Shouta knew this. Shouta knew about this, and he didn’t fucking tell him. His ward - a goddamn person and a goddamn child had been sold twice, and it wasn’t easy to learn about that from the investigation files before Yamada took on the wardship, but his mother. That goddamn Shinsou Ui.

And Shouta knew about it.

Shouta still won’t look at him, but he’s not glaring and he’s not glaring at the wall, but staring at the floor because he knew better. This is goddamn Chisaki all over again, but worse, because Yamada was going to drive Shinsou to the station himself and not know a thing about it. Not know this about his ward.

Shouta stands up, and still won’t look at him. Yamada only turns his head to look when he gets to the shoe rack and he hears the first shoe drop on the floor.

“Shou-”

“I’m going to the station,” Shouta answers, and that’s been an answer in different arguments. Nothing like this, not anything like this. “And I’m going to talk to her.”

Yamada pieces it together all too clearly in the back of his mind, that Shouta didn’t want to. He didn’t want to meet with Shinsou Ui, or he would have been stalking the station since she arrived. This isn’t as much running away from Yamada’s anger - though he knows Shouta should and would fear that. This was Shouta trying to close the door on that option for Shinsou.

Yamada breathes out, head in his hands, and wonders what the hell he can say to Shinsou now that he knows this.

Chapter End Notes

1-A Groupchat Usernames:

Arson = Crime Brulee - Todoroki Shouto
No empty head thoughts - Sero Hanta
No head empty thoughts - Kaminari Denki
My quirk, my weird quirk, and me - Midoriya Izuku
I do not c++ it - Hagakure Tooru
Hang the DJ - Jirou Kyouka
Bakuroli - Bakugo Katsuki
Wow SOMEONE has a life off of their phone - Shinsou Hitoshi
Tik Tok on the Clock but - Ashido Mina
Ya Momo so cool that - Yaoyorozu Momo
Float On By - Uraraka Ochako
Wake Me Up When Spring Comes - Asui Tsuyu
Sparkle Dion - Aoyama Yuga
Sugar Might - Sato Rikido

You Know The Line When You Cross It

Chapter Summary

Aizawa meets Shinsou Ui, which stirs up memories that he'd rather leave forgotten. Yamada and Shinsou talk about Shinsou's parents, which leaves Shinsou deeply hurt by the revelations in that conversation. Toshinori speaks to his successor about a new worry.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warning: Mention of sexual harassment directed towards a child (Skip the paragraph that begins with "She seems to find that funny" in the Hanabusa Kaede interview), Reference to Chisaki's torture of Shinsou, Original Mocha's death mention, Bug mention, Previously on Wards of UA: Shinsou wrote an essay describing why he wanted to see his mother, including how he felt it would repay his 'debt' to society after the crimes he committed, and how his mother could 'rename' him as Shinsou. The best lead for the investigation right now is the 'reviews' that came from a Villain Yelp website that include the names of some criminal organizations that rented Numbers from Miasma. Shinsou believes that he is no longer selectively mute, but has been trying to keep that a secret. Shinsou had a habit of trading questions, answering questions only when one of his own had been answered. Byte Sound called Yamada Shinsou's father while talking to Shinsou in sign. Yamada has recently asked Shinsou to sign 'Stop' whenever he doesn't want something to help him establish boundaries and safely communicating them. Shinsou and Ashido were childhood friends before he was sold to the Miasma. Midoriya was able to manifest Black Whip as a second quirk after Shinsou brainwashed him, and Midoriya recently learned that Shinsou's investigation is related to the Nomus. Yamada has noticed that Shinsou tends to sign 'It's fine,' when he's really not fine with the situation.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

It's not exactly procedure for a pro hero to visit a suspect in custody like this, but Aizawa isn't exactly a procedural hero, contrary to what he convinces his students to think.

He's done it before, and Sansa and Naomasa both have listed those visits as visits. Possibly requesting the use of his quirk if there was a criminal who had a one that couldn't be fully suppressed during questioning. There are several skills he's honed, and putting pressure on when something needs to break is one of them. It happens in the field, and it happens here. The field has looser rules, but he still plays by these.

Naomasa looks surprised, but Aizawa knows he's also hopeful. He knows Naomasa probably only wants the photos on Aizawa's phone, and if the detective is right about his interrogation process like he usually is, then Aizawa could wait outside the room after sending them over.

But he won't, because it's irrational to feel like this.

"Shouta," his mother says, sitting stiffly on the couch. She doesn't look at him, and he notices that too much now. It's only been a week back at 'home,' but he sees it every time she makes that pointed effort not to 'see' him. "Your grandfather said that you applied for that hero school in Mustafu."

He's surprised she mentioned it, because he's sure he's going to be gone next week, or the week after. These little 'reconciliations' never last a month at this point. "The entrance exam is next month. I'm in the top 20% for the practice admissions tests. I applied to Ketsubetsu as a second option."

He's made an effort not to 'see' her either, looking at the wall above her head. He still sees her frown. "Mustafu is far away, it's too far to commute. We don't have family in that area either. Tondechi is more reasonable, or one of the local schools here-"

"I'm not going to live here," he says, and he nearly chokes on a bitter laugh. He doesn't know why she does it at this point, if his grandfather makes her. If this is some kind of act to convince herself that she's a mother, he'd rather her leave him out of it. It's irrational. "UA is the most prestigious hero school in Japan, and I have a good chance of getting in. Not many people have that, and my quirk would be-"

"Don't-" She starts shaking her head, the hand wringing starts up. She might cry this time, if she's really hurt by this. At this point, he's stopped being hurt by it, and wonders why it took him this long to realize that she's only pretending to care. "You're not going to that school, Shouta. You're just going to apply there and not have a place to live?! Do you- you're a child! You can't make these kinds of decisions! You didn't even tell me-"

"I don't even live with you." He makes his voice even, because he knows she'll take any waver as a reason to start screaming. He's not a child, and he's thought this through. "I qualify for scholarships, and I've applied for them. I can rent an apartment and Grandfather only has to sign the lease-"

"You're 14! You're not going to live on your own! You-you're still a child, you can't do things like this!" He already knows it from her pitch, knew she was going to knock against the table when she stands up too quickly. She stops and stares at him, like she always does, and it's such an old act that he wants to laugh at it. "You did that. I saw you, you used your quirk and made me-"

"I didn't!" he yells, he breaks back. A week is too long, apparently, it's making him too much like his mother. But unlike his mother, he doesn't need the act.

"Where are you going?! Shouta-"

"I'm going to pack." He doesn't need to hear the last parts, but she still mutters them under her breath, like she needs the routine. He honestly wonders if she just sits in this house when he's not here, waiting to go through it again.

"I can't trust you, not when you do that. You-you just need to live with your grandfather for a while, you need to learn you can't do that."

His grandfather did exactly one thing right by Aizawa, and that was making sure he could actually attend UA. He tried to be responsible at 14 years old, to plan ahead, and he's lucky that his grandfather already saw the shortcomings. He didn't get half of the scholarships that he thought he would, but his grandfather gave him half of his inheritance early. 5 million yen, in one lump sum, and Aizawa was probably the only 14 year old boy who would take that briefcase full of cash and have any of it left after he graduated high school.

Of course, he was disinherited when his grandfather met Hizashi, but Aizawa had learned that blood relatives are completely meaningless long before that point.

Aizawa waits outside of the interrogation room while Shinsou Ui eats breakfast, and Naomasa luckily doesn't make small talk. Aizawa would rather wait with Sansa, because he knows Sansa doesn't see it. He's fidgeting, it's irrational, but he does it. Crossing his arms, winding one over and under the other over his chest. He knows Sansa doesn't see it, because he didn't see it with Eri's mother when they met with her.

"I couldn't live with h-that," Hanabusa Kaede hisses, her hands folded together on top of the table, but one hand digs fingernails into the back of her other. Almost punishing herself for referring to her daughter, a two year old the last time she saw her, as something other than monstrous. "It killed him. It could have killed me. That horn, it's not even a quirk-"

"You placed your daughter in your father's care, and never attempted to see her again," Aizawa says, as evenly as he can. He looks at her hands, because he doesn't have papers he can look through pointlessly like Sansa, and she has a ponytail. As long as he doesn't raise his eyes, he doesn't see that white hair, or the familiar shape of her nose. "Were you aware that he was involved with racketeering and illicit drugs, as the head of an organized crime family?"

She seems to find that funny. "Of course, I grew up in a yakuza mansion! Guys five times my age have been trying to flirt with me since I was 10, just to get closer to him. Like any of that really matters. Like it matters if they have a line of succession," She winds her fingers together, raising them to keep her hands folded under her chin. "Father wanted an heir, and I gave him one. That thing is probably going to be promised to that Chisaki guy when it's old enough, Father always wanted to have a reason to adopt him into the family properly."

Sansa made sure that conversation was transcribed and attached to the court record that had terminated Hanabusa Kaede's parental rights. She had voluntarily waived them, perhaps in a bid for a plea deal, perhaps just taking the opportunity now that it was public knowledge that she abandoned her child like that. Nezu had copies of all of it on hand, in the same file as Eri's wardship documentation.

Women who give birth, grow to hate their children for their quirks, and abandon them. Aizawa has seen too much of it, too often, and he has to see it again now.

Naomasa pointedly doesn't introduce him when they enter the room. Shinsou Ui is handcuffed to the table, but she seems to cower as much as she can, angled towards the corner like she'd like to hide behind the table. Naomasa sits, but Aizawa leans against the wall, still fighting the urge to move his arms crossed over his chest.

He hears Naomasa flipping pointlessly through papers, but Aizawa doesn't look away from the opposite wall. It's procedure. It makes him into a wordless threat.

"Why France?" Naomasa asks, still not looking up from his file. A casual question, almost spit out by the normally pleasant detective. The pause that follows seems to indicate that Shinsou Ui hasn't heard that one before.

"Different," she answers, weakly. Aizawa has no idea what she looks like beyond that mugshot, and he has too many reasons to keep it that way. Just her voice, one word, snaps against something inside his chest like a rubber band, and he feels utter disgust for her.

“Different,” Naomasa says, in a lighter tone, like a reward for a dog barking on command. “Different, and far away. Maybe you had reasons to leave the country, legitimate fears.”

Aizawa noticed in the reports he’s poured over that Shinsou Ui reacts poorly to direct questions. Aizawa imagines that his ward’s quirk has something to do with that oddity. “No... I didn’t. I just wanted to.”

Aizawa slips up, glancing at the source of that timid voice, one that sounds too much like a child. He sees a thin woman, the roots of her hair growing white, with a tremble in one hand worse than the other. She seems to feel the weight of his gaze and looks at him, fear barely hidden. Purple eyes, purple hair.

He tells himself that she doesn’t look anything like Shinsou.

“ ‘Just wanted’ to leave the country, after coming into contact with a criminal organization that we know are responsible for numerous murders, among other violent activities,” Naomasa says, as coolly as if he were reading the news. “Obviously, I walked into this room two days ago under the belief that you were a woman who needed help, who might have done some unsavory and desperate things, but you’ve certainly convinced me that you don’t want help. Eraserhead, how many people have Miasma killed that we know about?”

“65,” Aizawa answers, making his voice deeper and raspier, more intimidating. That was the macabre number that they found from ‘127’s reviews. What they know only scratches the surface.

“65, that we know about, but they have at least three criminals that specialize in assassination. Silencing people,” Naomasa says, dropping the file and the act on the table. Aizawa would love nothing more than to drop an implication with the reminder that Shinsou Ui will be leaving police custody soon, even if it’s hollow given that Interpol will be escorting her back to France from the embassy so that she can face a few fines for having a forged passport. “How many times have they tried to kill Hitoshi?”

Aizawa bristles with that, even if he knows its purpose. Grasping at any shred of desire to protect her son, referencing that connection with Shinsou’s given name. But it feels all the more wrong from Naomasa’s mouth. “Twice.”

He doesn’t have to fight to growl his words in answer, to shift his eyes and their weight to the woman who could stop this. Her mouth drops open, but not much. She’s heard that before, possibly not the same way. Her hand pulls against the handcuffs before she clenches her jaw tight. She won’t talk.

“He’s under a hero’s protection now. My protection,” Aizawa says, stalking forward slowly. He knows how to make the distinction, a walk towards the empty chair beside Naomasa becomes an advance in Shinsou Ui’s eyes as they follow him. “They’ve tried to kill him in a hospital, in an isolated cell. I have to keep my eyes on him at all times, but I’m here,” Aizawa says, and that’s an empty threat to Shinsou given that he’s safe at UA, but it’s not an empty one to Shinsou Ui when he sits in that chair and folds his hands too close to where hers are trapped. “Talking to you.”

They both let her sit with that, letting the pressure mount. Letting a hero, a protector to the public, become a trained professional with different implications in that silence. It’s a matter of perspective, whether that implication is a real one.

Shinsou Ui’s hands are practically vibrating on the table, rattling the cuffs. She’s staring at him, not quite at his eyes, but his chin probably. Her jaw moves up and down, and with her whitened face and disturbed expression, it almost looks like she’ll puke. “I...How is... He hates plums.”

Aizawa fights not to raise an eyebrow, watching her hands stop shaking entirely when her tone drops like that. Fear falls away too quickly, almost disturbingly. He watches the woman almost laugh to herself, shaking her head.

“My son hates them. Hates them. Just hates purple, I think. His favorite color is yellow, such an All Might fan-”

“Not ‘Kawaii Kawaii Pussycats?’” Naomasa asks, and if Aizawa wasn’t struggling to understand what had just happened here, he would be impressed that Naomasa could say that name with a straight face.

“Pft, no. He’s always been a fan of All Might. I had to buy all of his merchandise, even if it was cheap, it was quite a collection. He did horribly in school, we didn’t think he was going to graduate-”

“Mrs. Shinsou, I know when you’re lying,” Naomasa says, and he usually doesn’t give that away. But it doesn’t seem like that’s what’s surprising to Shinsou Ui, when she furrows her eyebrows, confused. That odd spell of too-casual gushing, like she was a normal mother talking about her son among fellow parents. “How did you get into contact with The Miasma?”

There’s a shake of her head, and Naomasa nudges Aizawa’s foot under the table because it’s already reading as a lie. “I didn’t. And my son is dead, this is- this is cruel, what you’re doing. What you’re doing to me, putains de monstres-”

“Tell me how you didn’t get in contact with The Miasma,” Naomasa says with a sigh. “Since you have spoken nothing but lies this entire time.”

Aizawa glances at Naomasa to see the man have a break in his character, staring at the ceiling in honest frustration. If Shinsou Ui honestly has only spoken lies every time she speaks, perhaps there was a reason for it. Some kind of quirk that was used to cover The Miasma’s tracks, though it’s odd that they wouldn’t just silence her their usual way.

“I haven’t?” Shinsou Ui insists, shaking her head, and her eyes are disturbingly honest. “I’m fine, I wouldn’t- no, I don’t- you don’t understand, I’m just tired. I’m tired of this and I just want to leave. My son was taken from me 12 years ago, he hated plums-”

Aizawa has dealt with plenty of people who have some form of mental instability, but something seems to make his skin crawl with Shinsou Ui. He pulls his phone out of his pocket, and lays it on the table. The first picture that Hizashi sent him of Shinsou, the first day that Shinsou was at UA. He cropped it so that Eri can’t be seen, and he was amused at first that Naomasa insisted that the cat filter could be more effective here. “He hates plums?”

Shinsou Ui stares, going even more still. It’s disturbing, to see this odd fascination with a son that she sold. “He’s....”

“He’s an amazing kid,” Aizawa says, and it turns his stomach to let her see the picture, but he forces himself to go on. To earn a bid for Shinsou’s safety in pressuring this woman to the break. To see what she’s done, so that they can find those that did the rest. “He knows a few French words, but he had no idea how. It was a surprise to him that you probably taught him.”

Shinsou Ui curls forward with a hitched breath, almost a sob. If she sees the scars there, the scars plain on Shinsou’s face around that awkward smile that Aizawa has found more fearful and unsure as he sees more honest ones from Shinsou, Aizawa has more reason to flip to the next picture. Shinsou fast asleep on the couch, a picture that Hizashi insisted on taking despite the anxiety they had at the time, on the eve of Shinsou meeting with Chisaki. His face is relaxed there, the angle where his head is braced on the armrest only shows how deep the scars on his cheek dig in.

“He wants to see you,” Aizawa says, and Naomasa breaks script again by looking at him. He didn’t tell Naomasa that purposefully, even if he knows that Naomasa knows it from the keylogger, from that horrifying essay that Shinsou wrote. “He wants to know what his mother looks like. He wants answers.”

Shinsou Ui curls deeper into herself, but straightens when it seems she loses sight of the phone. Her lips tighten, but tremble, and tears start filling her eyes, but with her hands cuffed, she won’t be able to wipe them away if they fall.

“He knows that you sold him,” Aizawa says, and it is a true fight to keep from sounding accusatory, but he’s almost sickened that he does it well. “And he still wants to see you. To see his mother, when he doesn’t remember anything about you. He wants a connection.”

“He can’t,” Shinsou Ui mutters, a broken voice that gasps and nearly sobs. She shakes her head, finally looking away, looking around the room like there’s some escape to be found despite her trapped hands. “No, no, no! Th... monster.”

Her voice drops to a growl this time, he sees her teeth bared and her fingers curled like claws. He stands up, numb, feels himself towering over her but feels like it’s not enough. “A monster?”

Naomasa looks up at him, and Aizawa is at risk for going off script. He ignores it, he ignores his fingers curling at his sides, how his chest feels like it’s too full and shaking. Shinsou being described as a monster.

“You have no goddamn clue who your son is,” Aizawa growls, as he steps forward and lays a hand on that table, close but not close enough to Shinsou Ui’s trapped hands. “Because he’s seen monsters. Real, cruel monsters. Monsters that you gave him to, sold him to.”

There’s a tremble that wracks through her frame, and it’s still not enough.

“But he didn’t break,” Aizawa says, more and more amazed by it. “Tortured, beaten, starved. He went through all of that, all of his life, and every opportunity he’s ever been given to do the right thing, he does it. He protected a little girl and saved her life too many times to count, he was willing to die to save her. And you think your son, your child, is a monster. You?”

This terrified, sobbing woman cowering in front of him can look weak, look afraid. She was the real monster here, and Aizawa couldn’t forget that. “His quirk-”

“Eraserhead,” Naomasa calls, his head tipped towards the door. Aizawa feels fingernails digging into his palms, feels a coldness completely unlike calm while he follows Naomasa out of the room. He follows too easily, too rattled at the edges.

Frightened, by what he wanted to do if he were left in there a moment longer.

Naomasa tips his head back after he closes the door, looking at the ceiling for too long. His eyes are too full of honest concern, and Aizawa wants to look away from it, knowing it’s deserved. “We have tomorrow. We have the reviews. Take a breath-”

“She was close,” Aizawa says, his arms shifting across his chest and he ignores it. The statement isn’t a rebuke for Naomasa’s interruption. It’s for himself. She was close, and he let her distract him.

“So were you,” Naomasa says, too quietly. Too disturbed, and it stings worse because it’s true. Unprofessional, irrational. He’s never been that close to the line, even if he didn’t cross it. “This is too personal - and that’s not a bad thing!”

Naomasa probably felt the need to add that, another step towards illogical and unprofessional crossing Aizawa’s mind with another snap of something too hot racing through his veins. He knows he needs to calm down, take a breath. He knows what this feels like on too active, too long patrols. Adrenaline becomes something that a hero shouldn’t have - bloodlust, almost.

Naomasa’s half-cocked smile, too fond and too familiar from other cases they’ve worked together, reminds him that the detective doesn’t deserve any of this from him. “I’ve never taken it as an insult, you know. I wanted Shinsou to have someone in his corner like you, who would protect him in more ways than the obvious ones. When someone else might look away.”

Aizawa struggles to find something better than disbelief in that. “You wanted to put him in that room with her. To use ‘Hitoshi.’”

Aizawa finds it harder in an illogical way to forgive Naomasa for something he logically knows isn’t a slight, but feels like one. “You saw it yourself. She’s complete nonsense, she’s wired up too much and it’s been that way since the beginning, before we even started questioning her. But when she sees him, she calms down.” Naomasa looks away, his frown becoming firm. “Shinsou isn’t the only one who wants a connection.”

Aizawa forces his hands in his pockets, mirroring Naomasa’s hands, and forces himself to trust that Naomasa has seen enough. That he’s seen that essay, he’s seen what Shinsou wrote. Shinsou laid out every reason not to let this happen, and Naomasa can’t be that cruel to ignore it.

And he’s not. “If you have any other pictures, I can use them. I’ll still throw everything we have at the wall to see if anything can stick. I don’t want her to get away with this.”

Aizawa breathes, but only after Naomasa looks at him again, too much honesty that he can barely handle at this point.

“You take care of Shinsou. And yourself, Eraserhead. We can handle the rest.”

Naomasa is giving him an out, one that he’s wanted for too long. Too selfishly. He shouldn’t take it, because he knows that he has a responsibility to Shinsou not to.

Hizashi was chosen as a designated hero because of his hearing loss, but Naomasa wanted Aizawa involved because he walks the line in his hero work, closer to police work than other heroes. He’s supposed to walk both sides, but he can’t anymore. Not with this.

Not when it’s becoming too personal.

Aizawa is done with the investigation.

*

When Shinsou wakes up, he frowns and turns his face into Eri’s pillow, because he didn’t plan on falling asleep. He knew Eri probably needed to since she didn’t sleep well last night, and when he tried to lay her down on her bed, she kept stirring and shifting, frowning like she might wake up and be upset that he was trying to leave. So he just laid down with her, intending to get up once she was a bit deeper asleep.

And fell asleep with her.

He still feels groggy, feels like sleeping was more of a mistake than it was. It wasn't as bad as it should have felt before he slept, when he was just talking with Yamada and hardly noticing that the hours had flown by, that daylight was breaking through the window into the living room. It was nice, to talk. To trust that he didn't have to say anything specific, he didn't have to make sure to guard his words. Yamada just wanted to talk to him.

But it wasn't talking, so it was safe. Just signing. Just continuing to be mute. Just.

Lying to Yamada.

Eri pulls her head closer to his chest, her horn dragging along his chin as she does. She's not usually this clingy, but they usually don't sleep like this. His legs are curled up, one arm slung over her and the other still trapped beneath her, so deadened that he can barely move his fingers. She missed him, and he missed her. He feels a tug of guilt, but somehow, it doesn't shake him as much as it used to, when he had to leave so that they would have books to read, so that he could steal soap for her to use.

He wonders if she'd be upset, if she knew that he could talk to anyone now. If she would be angrier or even more upset than she was when they pretended that he couldn't talk to her at all. She will always be more unfathomably close to him than anyone else, but he imagines that she likes that she has that tangible piece that makes her more special. He doesn't want to hurt her to take that away from her.

But somehow, he feels like he should tell Yamada.

He knows it could end badly, and he knows all the ways it could. His quirk is his voice, and they can't trust that he wouldn't use it. No one has ever trusted that. He's never forgotten that he was the only Number who had to wear something to restrain his quirk. Even 127 for all his oddities and near-treacheries never had to wear something to make sure he couldn't use his invisibility to escape.

Chisaki locked his mask every night, and both he and Hari had the remote to shut it whenever they wanted. They probably knew that he would never act out except for Eri's sake, and he wouldn't risk her safety, but they still had that.

He's proven that he can't be trusted, because he used his quirk on Midoriya and threatened to kill him with it. He used his quirk on Eri, and he even showed Yamada how it worked, how he could use her Rewind and he knows all too well how dangerous that could be. He shouldn't even blame them if they gave him another mask, a real one.

27 runs his hand over his cheek, tracing the scars there. Even if it was padded, even if it was only locked when they had a reason to fear his quirk, it would hurt. It hardly makes sense, but he likes that he's the one with that decision. He can hide his face, and no one else can.

He's the one choosing not to speak to anyone now, instead of being mute.

Even if it's reckless, even if it's selfish, maybe it would be okay if he wasn't. Yamada might be happy, genuinely happy. Eri might not be upset. Things could go on as normal, but somehow, easier.

He could be more normal.

He hears Eri sigh, and tries to look down but her horn has his jaw pinned against the pillow. He knew she was probably awake before he felt her hands pulling at the bottom of his shirt, but he finds himself fighting a laugh when he feels her pulling it up. “What....are you doing?”

It seems to work if he takes a long pause, but any other time he asks questions, he feels a ticklish cough that he can't fight. He doesn't know if Izuku is right, if he has Quirk Activation Phobia. If he traded mutism for something else that's strange.

He gets a sleepy growl in reply, before Eri shuffles and squirms, and tries to crawl inside his shirt. He straightens out his legs so she has room, and wonders why that's the first thing that came to mind as soon as she woke up. He curls one arm around her once she settles, the fabric of his shirt stretching out. Her hair and her soft breaths, her warmth feels odd against his skin like this.

“Twenny,” Eri grumbles, looking up at him through his stretched out collar with barely opened eyes. “Mommies have babies in their tummies.”

She lays her head back down, eyes closed, and seems satisfied with that explanation. 27 is not. “You learned about that last night, from the hero students.”

Eri's yawn fans hot across his chest, and she nods. “Mhm, Ko-Ko and Momo told me. ‘S an experiment.”

Eri seems to fall back to sleep quickly enough, her breathing still tickling across the center of his chest. She's not ready to wake up yet, and seems oddly comfortable with this.

27 is not.

He works his hand and elbow to suffer through static shocks over the arm that Eri had been laying on, trying to work the feeling through it to be able to move it properly. His hand is still staticy and weak when he pulls his phone from his pocket, and pulls up the group chat for the hero students.

To get answers.

Kairi Baskin Ate Her Husband With Her Tiger Quirk: @Midoriya this is life or death situation does All Might dye his hair???

Mini Mic Jr. : @Amazon and @CreatureCommander this is your life or death what the fuck did you tell Eri about pregnancy

Crepe Squad Goals: ...shinny its not what u think

Mighty Boi Jr. : No he doesn't and WHAT??? @Yaoyorozu and @Koda i think WHAT HAPPENED????

Mini Mic Jr. : Correct and the clock is ticking. I will get answers.

Mall rat boi: DEKU DONT FUCKING START ACTING LIKE SHITSOU WITH THAT FREAKY FUCKING PROTECTIVE SHIT. SO WHAT IF ERI KNOWS ABOUT BIRDS AND BEES AND SHIT SHES FUCKING FIVE.

Science Momma: We didn't tell Eri anything inappropriate! After testing liquid viscosity in zero gravity, we went to Koda's room for a biology lesson an Sledgehammer Plans:AND?

Not at the bookstore nope not me not sus: Half of us are at the mall where is YaoMomo and WHO CAN PROTECT KODA YAOMOMO HAS BEEN S N I P E D

Proud Grandmother: YaoMomo is studying with Class B, maybe her phone died? And it's not what you think, Shinsou! My crickets are expecting!

Clearance rack here I come: Eri saw the eggs and yaomomo just told her about how human moms have babies she didnt even talk about a dad being involved!!!

Mini Mic Jr. : Fine. Never say anything else about that. Ever.

We Want ur Little Sister: ...Shinsou, I might regret this, but how did this come up?

Not at the bookstore nope not me not sus:Shinsou.

Kairi Baskin Ate Her Husband With Her Tiger Quirk: ...CLOCK'S TICKING. TICK TICK TICK

Mall rat boi: WE SURE DID ANSWER A FUCKING QUESTION YOU YAKUZA RAT BASTARD.

Mini Mic Jr. : Eri is inside my shirt. Because mothers have babies in their tummies.

Not at the bookstore nope not me not sus:

Sledgehammer Plans:

Mighty Boi Jr. : Hey shinsou?

Mini Mic Jr. : what

Mighty Boi Jr. : can you check the chat with me?

Mini Mic Jr. : Fine.

It had been a little amusing to ignore Izuku's repeated demands for him to check this chat, but it's not as amusing anymore. It might be something useful, especially because Izuku is closer to Todo and Todo was supposed to gather information about him to feed back to Endeavor.

The chat destroys itself three times before it doesn't, and 27 flicks through pages of Izuku asking him if he was there repeatedly, something he didn't think to check when Izuku was giving him articles about Mental Quirk Abuse Syndrome for his essay, before he gives up and scrolls to the bottom. For some reason, Izuku wanted to keep whatever information he had secret until he was sure that 27 would be reading it, yet didn't want to say it that night.

Brainwashio: What.

Deku: Okay, this is really important and I really need you to listen and I'm sorry that it's kind of personal but this is REALLY important

Deku: Do you know anything about your dad?

Brainwashio: No.

27 had never thought about it, but he didn't know anything about his father. He doesn't remember him, he doesn't remember if he was ever there. He only remembers his mother, but he had to have a father. A father who was never in his life, who might not know anything about him.

Deku: Okay. I know this might be really weird, but if you can ask Mic-sensei or Aizawa-sensei about him and maybe tell me, it's kind of important. And I know that's really weird, but I don't think they would tell me, but it's important. Really REALLY important.

Brainwashio: Why? It's not important to me.

Deku: I can't really tell you. I'm sorry, it's kind of like a really big secret, but it's really dangerous, and I think you kind of know what I mean by that. You could get hurt if you know.

Deku: And don't tell anyone that you kind of know, okay? That's really important. I'm really hoping you can trust me.

27 doesn't care about whatever 'secret' Izuku had, he knew it couldn't be that dangerous. It couldn't put his life any more at risk than being a Number who wasn't under the control of The Miasma.

But he imagines that Izuku just wants information and doesn't want to trade for it. He wants to keep his secrets and get what he needs anyway, and 27 envies that. He knows that even if things are nice now, even if Yamada and Aizawa don't expect him to tell them what he hasn't about The Miasma, he probably would have never come to UA if he didn't have secrets that they wanted. He would have never had this, never left that interrogation room at the police station.

Eri seems to be dead asleep, and 27 tries to close his eyes, tries to remedy the ache behind his eyes by sleeping a little longer. But he finds he can't ignore it, that question that Izuku put in his head. He barely wants to ask and definitely doesn't want to ask now, but he wonders.

He's known about his mother, what she thinks of him and what she feels about him. She hates him, and he doesn't know if he deserves it, but she wanted to get rid of him long before she did, and she's never regretted it. He doesn't know if his father knows a thing about him, if he would want to change that. If his father could answer some of the questions 27 has. If he could make the ground that 27 could stand on with that, to know where he began so he could stop questioning it.

27 pulls his arms around Eri, still tucked inside his shirt, and tries to sit up to see if she'll wake up. She whines, but when he leans back so that she's resting on his chest, bracing her back with his arms, she seems to settle. He stands up and walks slowly, and tries to ignore how weird this is.

Yamada looks up from his grading, coffee mug half raised and his eyes a bit too wide. 27 wonders if he could ask Yamada to get him a cup, since he feels like he needs it, and he can't make his own because that would mean letting Eri fall.

27 sits at the table in a chair close to Yamada, and he knows there's a way to make this easier. He could make sure that Eri is comfortable and still talk to Yamada, not have to pull away his arms. But before he even opens his mouth, he knows that will lead to a lot of questions. A lot of questions that he doesn't want to answer, not with this. Not right now.

It might be easier to sign it than say it, anyway.

Yamada stares, and looks away to act like he's not staring. Maybe this is weird, but it's what Eri wants, so 27 is going to have to put up with it. "Eri's... feeling a little cuddly?"

27 shakes his head. 'Hero students taught her mothers have babies in stomach. Wanted to try. I think.'

He's not sure if Eri wanted to see what it would be like to be an unborn child, or if that was just a half-formed thought that she took inspiration from in her groggy state. 27 doesn't mind it, it's comfortable like this. He knows it would have been bad if it happened at the 8 Precepts, if he was seen like this, but thinking about Chisaki repeatedly killing him and bringing him back to life for it makes Yamada's clear discomfort a bit easier to ignore. "Ah, a little bean is a little curious about the facts of life. She probably doesn't know a whole lot about that."

27 shakes his head, and almost wants to forbid her from ever learning about it. But while he can threaten the hero students according to that want, he knows he can't with Yamada. 'Nothing. Just this.'

Yamada hums, and glances at the coffee machine. 27 thought it would be easier to ask for a cup, but now it seems too selfish. It seems like a harder question to ask than this one.

'Do you know my father?' 27 signs, even if he can only glance at Yamada while he does. Byte Sound's teasing still rings in his head, and even if he knows it's ridiculous, he wonders if Yamada takes any offense to that question. If Yamada thought anything like Byte Sound somehow does, that Yamada taking care of him means that Yamada is his father, but differently. Not biologically, but still a father. But he's not.

Yamada raises his eyebrows, and folds both hands around his coffee mug before he clears his throat. "Well, no. I don't know him personally. He... passed away when you were three years old. Do you remember him, or...."

27 shakes his head. 'Just curious.' Izuku probably wouldn't want Yamada to know that he wanted to know. 27 didn't really want to know either, he was just curious. It doesn't really matter to him.

"So, on the topic of parents and all, and being curious," Yamada says, glancing at Eri where she's sleeping soundly on his chest. There's a spot that feels warmer next to her mouth, and he can't tell whether it's just her breath or a bit of drool. "Shou and I talked about meeting your mom and all, and... it's not going to happen."

27 feels himself going numb, like he's suddenly drenched in cold water. He looks at Yamada, watching his mouth move in an unsure frown that he covers with a hand when he glances away again.

"You weren't really honest with me, and... I understand why, but that's more of a sign that this wouldn't be a good thing for you," Yamada says, repeating that stupid phrase.

'Not good for you,' 27 has no idea what that means. How he could possibly say it with a straight face, when it's just looking at his mother. 27 has been through so many things that weren't 'good' for him, even if Yamada doesn't know half of those things, he has to know that 27 isn't so weak that he'd suffer from looking at his own mother.

"I know that's upsetting, and I know that I said we were going to do that. And I know that you still want to have some questions answered and feel like you have closure on that, but we're going to try to work out a different way to get that, where you don't have to see her," Yamada says, and his eyes are too honest. Too earnest. Too green, and 27 can't stand to look at it, or look at him.

'Lied,' 27 signs, clenching his hands into fists afterwards to silence himself. He didn't want to sign that, but it slipped too easily, for a moment felt like he had to make his feelings known. Yamada lied to him, lied to him about this. He promised, then took back his word, on a whim and just as he wanted to. Like he didn't care what 27 would feel about it, like 27 shouldn't have feelings about it. Like 27 was just a Number, just needed to be told what would happen to him.

“I changed my mind,” Yamada argues, still speaking too quietly. There’s something unnatural in his voice, something that makes him seem like he’s uncomfortable with this discussion. “And I wouldn’t have agreed in the first place if I knew that... your mother sold you.”

27 turns to look at Yamada, who refuses to look at him. Like Yamada is ashamed, as though he doesn’t want to look at him anymore. He knew that he was sold, and he probably knows the price. Yamada probably finds him cheap, he probably finds that price accurate. Or generous.

But 27 didn’t tell him. 27 didn’t tell anyone, so how could he know? Has he known this entire time? Has all of this - all of it - just been a test?

Everything about last night, all the times Yamada laughed or made him laugh, every time that Yamada went quiet and just watched him sign with that odd, fond look in his eyes. It was all just building up to this test.

“I know it’s confusing,” Yamada mutters, too quietly. Still not looking at him. “I can’t really tell you what to feel about it, but... this woman isn’t your mother. A mother wouldn’t do that, would never think of doing something that horrible. This woman said her goodbyes, and she’s not going to give you what you deserve from her, and that absolutely sucks, I know. But you don’t need her for anything, not closure or answers or-”

‘How?’ 27 signs, his hands falling to the table afterwards too loudly, and the anger from that sound resonates in his ears. He thinks Yamada’s hesitation might be fear, and maybe it’s deserved. Maybe it’s better that Yamada fears him now, with this, instead of the fear that he expects will come if they ever find out he could just ask that question.

“I don’t know that yet,” Yamada says, not answering the question that 27 asked, offering another senseless non-answer, proving how useless he is. “If you’re asking how I know... Shou told me. And Ashido told him.”

Ashi.

27 doesn’t know how long Aizawa has known, if Ashido reported that immediately after that night. She never told him, she probably didn’t know that this would happen. Ashido doesn’t know his price, and that’s one mercy, but now that they know, they’ve probably asked his mother.

She probably told them that she would have settled for less.

“I know that you’re upset-”

‘Stop,’ 27 signs, another test. His test, one that he hopes Yamada passes with this clench in his jaw, something coiled in his arms that he wants to loosen. Yamada lied, Yamada knew, he thought that he knew Yamada better but he was a fucking idiot. Yamada isn’t different.

He hears Yamada lean back in his chair, and he doesn’t hear anything but silence answering him. Passing that test, but it’s not what he wanted.

27 stands up and walks to his room, holding Eri in his arms, and just wants to be alone.

He feels it like something squirming under his skin, he wants to rip it out because he knows it won’t happen. He still has Eri sleeping in his arms, too close to his chest, right on his skin and he wants to get away from it. He feels like they’re all too close to him, even in this room, he can practically feel Yamada breathing on him.

He wants to go back to when he was alone. Alone in his cell, alone in the hallways of the compound, alone on his jobs until he had to bear the client and Bug's expectations of him. He wants to feel the mask, he wants to feel like the mask is a part of him again. He wants it to be simple and make sense again.

He remembers when it didn't matter. It didn't matter what anyone said to him, it didn't matter how they looked at him. He knew he only needed to look out for himself, he knew the way to do that. He knew not to take risks, not to ask for more-

27 reaches out and takes Mocha into his hands, squeezing the plush grey fur too tight. He asked, stole really. He snuck out of his room and thought he could have something else, something that he wanted. He wanted something, and he lost, stole a muffin from the kitchen and had to burn Mocha with his own hands. How could he be stupid enough to forget that?

He shouldn't want. He shouldn't be stupid enough to ask, to trust someone like that. He shouldn't want in the first place. He'll only lose for it.

He feels Eri's small hands on his chest, and he looks down to see her looking up at him. She looks too awake, and he doesn't know how he missed her waking up. If she's been awake this entire time, how much she's heard. How much she knows about him now, things he didn't want her to know.

She shouldn't know how much he was sold for, that he was sold. Chisaki mentioned it a few times, but he hopes she didn't understand what he meant by 'investment.' There was a time that he felt proud of that price, but now it only brings shame. Now that he's sure he's the only person at UA that has a price like that.

"Twenny," Eri says, pulling herself to kneel and stretching the neck of his shirt too tight to wrap her arms around his neck. "Don't be mad at Yama."

27 folds his arms around her, giving her that at least. He feels like something is shaking out of his chest, like this shaky way that he has to force himself to breathe is stupid. He's not hurt, he doesn't care, he knew this would happen, and he's not going to cry about it. "He lied."

27 clenches his jaw, his words were supposed to come out more evenly. He shouldn't care, he shouldn't care. He wants to blame the hitch in his breath for Eri holding him tighter, and he can't. "You don't need a mom, Twenny. I got you, and you got me, and we don't need moms."

He knows that made sense at one point. It even felt nice. Eri is his family, and he shouldn't need any others. He shouldn't want anyone else.

He just wanted Yamada to understand.

27 closes his eyes and forces himself to settle, forces his breaths to even out. Eri doesn't need to know, he doesn't want her to know. He forces himself into calm by lying to himself, convincing himself that she does know this aching rend in his chest and that's why she's hugging him. She's upset about it. He pulls away a hand to wipe at the corner of his eye, useless and pointless tears still making his vision blurry. "We don't. I'm sorry."

Eri pulls away enough to look at him, pressing her hands to his cheeks. He doesn't want her to see his watering eyes, afraid that she'll still see this pointless hurt. It's pointless to feel it, there's nothing he can do about it. Yamada knows he was sold now, and that will become his new normal. Yamada knows he was sold by his mother, and that will change everything here.

27 doesn't want to be here anymore. He wants to run, he wants to be alone, and he can't. He can only hide. “The heroes make you feel better, when you feel bad. Right?”

Eri nods, excitement she can’t quite hide in her eyes and pulling at the corners of her lips with a twitchy smile. “Mirio’s the best at it! And we can play games with him, like hide and seek and tag, like Mizzy showed me!”

27 finds himself smiling, even if he doesn’t feel it as he pulls out his phone. Hide and seek sounds fun.

But only if he can get out of this dorm, and hide for a while.

*

Aizawa enters his dorm and finds himself disturbed by the sight of the empty living room, by the silence that welcomes him. Eri and Shinsou shouldn’t be allowed to sleep all day, and he knows that his husband wouldn’t allow himself more than a few hours to nap given that they all need to sleep well to wake up in time for school tomorrow.

He hears music playing softly from the office once he gets close enough, finding the door open and Hizashi hunched over a notepad, several legal documents pulled up on the laptop in front of him. As Aizawa walks closer, he can see the name on the death and marriage certificates, and wonders what piqued Hizashi’s interest. “Shinsou Kita?”

Hizashi looks up as though he hadn’t noticed Aizawa’s entrance, then pauses the music he was listening to, spinning around in his chair to sigh. Hizashi looks too weary, too worn, and Aizawa suspects that he’s already spoken to Shinsou. “Has Shinsou Ui ever talked about her husband?”

Aizawa shakes his head. He’s looked through what little Naomasa has gathered in transcripts of interviews, mostly questions that were asked and answered by either silence or nonsense. They’ve never gathered anything concrete, and a few test questions about Shinsou Kita just to see if Shinsou Ui would be forthright about anything were met with silence. “Why?”

Hizashi runs a hand through his hair, shaking his head when he glances at the laptop. “I didn’t think about it until Shinsou asked, but.... Things don’t line up here.”

Aizawa never put much thought towards the man that died before he could have much effect on Shinsou’s life, the father that died a year before he was put into the hands of Miasma. He doubts that Naomasa would have either, not when Shinsou Kita is such a minor part of a much broader investigation.

“Shinsou Kita was Shinsou Ui’s second cousin, born three years before she was. He lived in Kyoto, went to an electrician trade school instead of high school, but right after he married Shinsou Ui, he started working as a car salesman and was promoted to management in a year. This is his signature for his journeyman electrician certificate,” Hizashi says, pulling up another document, and Aizawa takes note of the loose and lazy scrawl. “And this is his signature on the marriage certificate.”

Sharp points to each stroke of the pen, each character is pressed close to each other. It’s different in every single way. “You think that someone stole Shinsou Kita’s identity?”

Yamada tilts his head, not willing to say yes, but clearly considering that despite what shaky evidence a signature change is. “I think it’s weird. Nothing against trade schools, but they don’t really churn out great salesmen.”

Aizawa listens for any sign that the wards are in their rooms, but he knows that Hizashi would have closed the office door if they were still here. “Did you talk to Shinsou?”

Hizashi drops his head, all the proof that Aizawa needed that this sudden interest could be a distraction. “He’s pissed. He is absolutely pissed off at me. Called me a liar, and then invited Mirio to come by to take him and Eri out on a playdate, just to get away from me.”

Aizawa takes that for what it is - Shinsou pulling away from Hizashi after being disappointed in the choices made to protect him. They’ll both probably be uncomfortable by the resentment from that decision - Shinsou struggling to grasp that there are authority figures in his life who can know more than he does and take action to protect him, and Hizashi being disheartened that his ward would sulk like a disappointed teenager. “He’s removing himself from a situation that he feels uncomfortable in, of his own free will. That’s a good thing.”

Hizashi looks up at him as though the situation is still agonizing for him, and it might be. But his husband owes it to his ward to continue to make responsible choices for him, for the teenager both too young and too unaware of the consequences of his choices to make good ones. “Yeah, and I’m the ‘uncomfortable situation’ now. He called me a liar, and he wouldn’t even look at me, Shou. If you had just told me, I never would have-”

“I know,” Aizawa says, settling into the other chair. He folds his hands and honestly doesn’t want to look at Hizashi either, knowing that any anger would be deserved. “I didn’t want you to know. To see him like that.”

A child not just abandoned, but sold. It was enough to look at the picture of Shinsou at four years old, to imagine the terror he felt when his world was torn from him and he was placed in Miasma’s hands. It becomes darker, knowing that there was money involved. That Shinsou Ui didn’t just let it happen, didn’t just hand her son off, but profited from it.

Her blank stare, her falling tears, that unnatural calm that fell over her before the break twists it further. Despite what a shattered person she was, there was something close to regret inside her. It would be easier if there wasn’t.

“It doesn’t change anything,” Hizashi argues, not the angry tone that Aizawa expected, but close to it. “Whether Shinsou Ui just... grabbed her son and handed him off, or if she sold him, if she or someone else was going to die if she didn’t, it doesn’t fucking matter. Shinsou is my ward, and he didn’t deserve any of it. And I have to know what happened to him to take care of him.”

‘You have to tell me’ is implied, but unsaid. Aizawa has withheld things before, and regretted it. He regrets it now, again. “She’s probably going back to France tomorrow night. This can all be over, then we can deal with what’s left.”

A day, and Shinsou Ui might already be aware that Naomasa can only hold her in custody for 72 hours. She’ll be harder to break as the hours tick by, as freedom looms closer. As the possibility for answers slips away.

Shinsou will be harder to convince, but he may eventually find closure in that. His mother will leave the country, and have no words or answers for him. No intentions to ever seek him out.

Shinsou may never forget that he was sold, but there should be a time where he finds it doesn’t matter to him. When he can stand on solid ground and take pride in the storms that he weathered that he shouldn’t have, and that his strength has nothing to do with anyone outside of himself. That his connections with others are honestly forged and not happenstance of birth or blood.

Shinsou never had, and will never have what he deserves in a mother from Shinsou Ui, but his name is his own and his quirk has never harmed anyone. And Shinsou Ui will never give him what he wants.

Shinsou just has to trust that he and Hizashi know that better than he does, for now.

*

27 feels a tug, a feeling that this might be a huge mistake, and it only grows stronger as the hours pass.

He honestly had no intentions of playing games with Mirio, but he knows that Eri likes playing with Mirio more than anything, and it's the best distraction he could offer her. After a few rounds of hide and seek, he used his phone to tell Mirio that he was going back to the dorm, and made sure to insist that Eri wanted to keep playing. And said that he wanted to talk to Yamada without her there.

And, of course, he didn't.

Mirio messages him to ask if the 'talk' is over, since it's cold outside and Eri is starting to be affected by it. 27 tells him it is, and then messages Yamada to say that he's going to return a book to Ashido. He probably should return the book that he stole from her, but he doesn't have it right now. Yamada messaged him back to say that he needs to be back at the dorm by 10, and he would like to talk once he gets back.

27 doesn't want to talk, because there's nothing to talk about. He doesn't want to go back to that dorm, even if his hands and face are going numb from the cold. He would probably be warm if he waited inside the dorm, like Ashido seems to think he's doing, but then he might have to endure the other hero students' attention, and he doesn't want that.

It was a bit difficult to scale the balconies to get to Ashido's on the fourth floor, but he found a corner to sit where the wind doesn't affect him as much. It's freezing cold outside, and he's seen a few iced over puddles where something spilled on the ground. Mirio told him that there only needs to be a bit more humidity in the air, and what would be rain can turn into snow. Mirio might be as excited for Eri's first snowfall as 27 is.

27 stares at his dying phone, and hopes that Ashido comes back to her dorm soon. He needs to talk to her, as much as he needs to avoid freezing to death. Even when he notices that his fingers don't move the way they should, they feel stiff, he doesn't want to try to climb down and wait in the common room. He'd definitely have to talk to someone he doesn't want to talk to if he does.

Ashi: where r u???

He hears her door open from the balcony, and pulls himself to standing so that he can move in front of her parted curtain. He sees Ashido drop a few shopping bags on her bed and start to pull off her beanie before she sees him and screams, running forward to rip open the doors to her balcony. "SHINNY you're going to FREEZE to death!"

He's not, but she seems convinced of that. She pulls him into her room and starts throwing blankets at him, making him sit at her coffee table before she pulls off her scarf and wraps it around his neck. She throws off her coat too, tossing it over his head before she says she's going to make him some hot chocolate. Before he can even get a word out, he hears the door slam shut.

And now he's waiting again.

27 pulls the blankets around him properly, because he can't argue against this warmth. He starts shivering again first, and it makes no sense. He waited long enough outside to stop shaking like this, he should be past it. He shouldn't be rattled like this, acting like this.

When Ashido runs back, she spills some of the hot chocolate on her table when she almost throws it down, and grabs the blanket to start rubbing it against his cheeks. "I thought you were waiting outside my door! You're like, dying of hypothermia! What if I didn't get back in time and you were just a little Shinny popsicle stuck to my window?! Jeez!"

27 endures this attempt to warm his face - barely - until Ashido decides to start pestering him into drinking the hot chocolate. There's a huge mountain of marshmallows on top, and it makes it harder to take a drink, but he feels that warm sweetness flowing down inside his chest, almost making him shiver more from it.

But he didn't come here for hot chocolate.

"You told Aizawa what my mother did," 27 says, and even if he doesn't look at Ashido, he can't make his words as sharp as they should be. "He told Yamada, and now they both know."

Ashi sits at the corner, close to him but not too close. She curls her arms around her legs folded in front of her, and he can't find what he wanted in her guilt. "They needed to know what she did, because they wouldn't have been able to extradite her if they didn't have something to charge her for. I know... you probably didn't want them to know. But they kind of need to."

Of course. Everyone needs to know everything about him, every single thing he's been through, and it doesn't matter if he wants to have secrets. They'll make him talk if he doesn't say it, they'll use a quirk to force the words from his mouth or they'll trick him into trusting them, into acting like a fool. They'll strip him bare, until he has nothing that's his own. Not even the names that they call him are his own - not Shinny and not Shinsou. They won't let him take them for his own either.

"I know you're kinda mad about that, but... I didn't do it to hurt you, you know? I just wanted to help," Ashi says, and he hates it. He hates that everyone keeps doing things to keep him from things that 'aren't good' for him, 'protecting' him from useless things regardless of what he wants. Caging him in with good intentions, probably, but even if he was mute, they could ask what he wanted. They could care what he has to say.

"Now I can't see her," 27 says, and he knows that's not enough, without even looking at her. Ashi didn't want him to see his mother, and she's probably happy about it. She doesn't fucking understand it, anyway.

He might as well tell her, since it doesn't matter. Nothing that he says or wants or needs matters, to anyone.

"The first thing they did was take me to a cell, with no lights on. It was dark, and cold. They took me out of it every few days, but they put me back in if I talked. If they called my name, and I didn't answer. If I didn't-" Shh, no no no. You don't want me to put you back in there- "27. That's my name."

That wasn't what he wanted to say, but when he looks out of the corner of his eye and sees Ashi biting her lip, he knows that's not what she wanted to hear. "It was your name," Ashi says, her voice too flat. Too desperate to try to sound strong. Her hand squeezes his, and it's too tight in the same way, with the same intentions. "And now it's Shinsou again."

"It's not," 27 argues, and he imagines that disappoints her. He imagines that it disappoints her differently, different from the way Bug was disappointed every time he failed. “That’s still my name. I can’t-” stop feeling like Bug will drag me back every time I try to make it fit. “I can’t take it back like that. It’s not that simple. I can’t even....”

He almost wants to pull away from her hand, but hers is squeezing his too tightly. He feels her stare and he knows she wants to argue, argue for whatever she thinks is ‘best’ for him, but he just wants her to listen.

“I can’t have it back. Any of it. I can’t remember anything before that. I don’t even know what my mother was like, and you... You have a mother. You can have your parents,” 27 says, and he can’t help the bitterness, the anger. Everything he’ll never have. He could find a way to forget the years but he can’t forget that he’ll never have other things he missed out on. Things he’ll never get to have. “I’ll never be normal.”

“No one is normal,” Ashi says after a long pause, a small shrug rolling off her shoulders before she stretches her legs in front of herself. “You had to go through a lot of shitty things. A lot of people do. A lot of people go through different things-”

“I could be normal if I saw her,” 27 argues, because Ashi still won’t understand. He just wants to stop wondering, he just wants to know. He wants to know what he did, what she’s like. What happened before the dark swallowed everything before it, and left him with too many fractured things that don’t feel real.

“She’ll never be your mom,” Ashi whispers, and maybe that’s true. Maybe it hurts more because she says it. And means it. “She’s not going to realize that she did something wrong, and she’s not going to apologize. And... it’s just going to hurt worse, the more you want that. Because it won’t happen.”

Ashi leans against his arm, and it feels warm. Her hand feels too warm, and he squeezes it because she doesn’t squeeze his. He feels too warm, and it’s horrible, because he probably shouldn’t have said anything. He should have kept it to himself, so that this pain would just be his own, and not hers.

“I just want you to be happy, Shinny, and I don’t want you to get hurt,” Ashi says, and he knows it’s different for her. Because she wants a different impossible thing, something she’s closer to but still can’t control. If she wants that, if she really wants it, it probably hurts because he can’t give that to her. He can’t stop hurting, even if he wants to just for her sake, to stop taking away her smile. “And I really wish it could be easier.”

27 swallows, and almost swallows his words. He thinks it might still be a mistake, that it’s foolish. He shouldn’t ask, because the things he asks for aren’t given. No one thinks he should think for himself. “Tell me... about how it was. What you remember. Please.”

She squeezes his hand, moving it side to side. He looks to see a smile on her face, even if it’s shaky. He thinks it’s the closest that he’s ever been to making her happy. “I can do that. I can call my parents too, because they remember everything. I think my mom still has pictures from our wedding!”

27 finds himself trying to laugh, because he didn’t think it would be that easy. He didn’t think any of the pictures that Ashi shows him, or the stories she tells him would be enough to fill this void.

They aren’t. But they’re almost enough.

At least he has something back, that he can look at and call his own.

*

Toshinori walks back to the dorm with his young successor following him closely, still disturbed by the suspicions he tries to brush away. “I think that young Aizawa is right, that the connection was always there, but something about how young Shinsou’s quirk affected your brain allowed for the connection to fully form. I really doubt that... that something like that is the case.”

Toshinori wants to believe that, to convince himself of it. But he’s as full of doubt as his protege is. “But One For All was created by All For One, and that... that could have an effect on it too. If Shinsou was....”

If Shinsou was All For One’s son.

What Toshinori knows of Shinsou’s history is tragic enough, and he doesn’t want to consider that there’s more of it, even if he knows that to be the case. Detective Tsukauchi has told him a few heartbreaking things, and he knew about the connection to the Nomus before he even met the young man. He would have never considered that connection could be anything more than the horrifying possibility that Shinsou was nearly turned into one of those poor abominations, but the connection that Midoriya has made is almost a worse one.

He would have never thought that his nemesis would look for a successor himself. The man that wants all the power in the world would never want to pass it on, but Shigaraki’s appearance has proven that wrong. He certainly wouldn’t put it past All For One to discard his own son if that poor child didn’t live up to the expectations of his birth, and while Brainwashing was an undeniably useful quirk for criminal endeavors, it wouldn’t have been what All For One would have wanted.

More darkly, Toshinori knows that if that child had been born quirkless, All For One certainly wouldn’t have been opposed to ‘fixing’ that. Granting a quirk like Brainwashing to a child in the hopes of creating a perfect tool for his purposes.

Shinsou himself had described his time before the 8 Precepts of Death as ‘Villain School,’ and perhaps that means that he wasn’t discarded at all. He was being trained for those purposes, trained to lure those who had quirks that All For One would envy and desire into his clutches, made all the more easy by way of Brainwashing.

Perhaps the criminals that had held Shinsou captive had found there was a goodness in him that couldn’t be tainted, that he would never live up to those expectations, and fully abandoned him after that. Shinsou himself may never have known, as he imagines their first meeting and all successive interactions after that would be very different if he did.

Mrs. Shinsou, from what little Toshinori has heard of her from Detective Tsukauchi’s frustrated phone calls, would be the only one who would definitively put these concerns to rest. And Toshinori doubts that she would. That seems to only make Midoriya’s observations more concerning, because while Toshinori wants to believe in Aizawa’s hypothesis, there’s doubt that Toshinori now has.

It’s small, but there may be similarities. Things that Toshinori can’t quite recall clearly, given that he’s only met the man in battle, in fights that they both entered with the intent to kill. The shape of All For One’s eyes might be similar, but Toshinori isn’t sure whether he should believe that they are, or believe in that explanation for it. He doesn’t want to believe or consider it, and yet. “I’m sure you know that young Shinsou shouldn’t know anything about that-”

“Of course not!” Midoriya protests, waving his hands in front of himself. “I didn’t tell him anything about it, about- you know. I wouldn’t want him to get hurt, or involved with that.”

Toshinori nods, and desperately hopes that Shinsou isn't already. "I can speak to Detective Tsukauchi, but I'm sure that nothing will come about like that. But it is late, and--"

Toshinori's phone begins to ring, and Midoriya takes it as a reason to bid his farewell for the night. It's nearly curfew, and perhaps he shouldn't have taken the opportunity for a stroll with his successor when he should be watching over all of the students as was his duty tonight, but those concerns seemed ill-suited for the dorm where they may have been interrupted or overheard.

Toshinori sees that Present Mic is calling him, and answers with a "Hello?"

"Hey Toshinori, is Shinsou still at the 1-A dorm?" Present Mic asks, and Toshinori finds himself flustered because he honestly has no response at first.

"I didn't know he was here at all. I did step out for a bit--"

"Eh?! Skipping dorm duty, abandoning your post? Naughty, naughty," Present Mic scolds, and perhaps it's deserved. Toshinori certainly doesn't want to explain why he had stepped out, knowing it would only earn more teasing about 'personal feelings' or 'unprofessional conduct' as Midoriya was involved. "Don't worry, I'll be over to scold you in a hot minute, and my ward a bit too. Just... if he's not there, shoot me a text, alright? He's... Yeah, just text me."

"I'm sure there's no reason to worry," Toshinori reassures, finding the strain in Present Mic's voice difficult to hear. "Young Shinsou is a very responsible young man, I'm sure that he must have lost track of time if he was supposed to return before now. That's an easy thing to do with the company he keeps."

Present Mic gives him a hint to check Ashido's room, and Toshinori almost grins after he hangs up, and finds a notification from Nezu's surveillance system that there was a mixed-sex gathering in that very student's room past curfew. Toshinori enters the dorm and reminds Kaminari and Sero that the common room must be cleared out soon enough, even if they are in the midst of playing a video game with a 'cinematic cutscene' that can't be paused.

Toshinori knocks twice on Ashido's door, and is pleased that she answers on the third round. He of course has access to enter her room, but that seems terribly inappropriate, even in this instance. "Is young Shinsou here? It's quite late, and Present Mic seemed to expect him back before now."

Ashido looks a bit guilty, scratching the back of her head as she quietly explains that they lost track of time. When she turns, Toshinori sees that there's certainly a good explanation for Shinsou doing so, as he seems to be asleep, sitting on the floor but leaning against Ashido's bed. Toshinori's neck aches in sympathy for the angle that Shinsou's is resting in. "Wakey wakey, Shinny! We got a little bit busted."

Shinsou blinks blearily at Ashido's attempts to rouse him by poking at his cheek, rubbing a hand down his face then sighing when he sees Toshinori. "Present Mic is on his way, but I'm sure he'll understand, given the circumstances."

But that lingering concern in Present Mic's voice gives Toshinori a reason to escort Shinsou to the front door, even if he's sure it's nothing. Shinsou doesn't seem like the sort to be a 'rebellious' youth, but given that he's fallen under Toshinori's charge, it seems like the least he can do to make sure that nothing happens before Present Mic can retrieve him.

"It is quite cold outside," Toshinori says, signing 'cold,' though he hasn't made as much progress as he hoped that he would to learn some sign language. Shinsou's need for such a skill in those around him had given him the push that he needed, that he honestly needed long before now. Every hero was taught a few gestures like 'help' or 'hurt' to aid those who were hard of hearing or otherwise reliant on the language, but noticing how isolated Shinsou seemed to be due to his difficulty to speak drove home that there were other reasons to learn. No one should feel alone on a campus as large as UA's.

Shinsou nods, then turns to sign something that Toshinori barely catches. He sees 'Y-A-M-A-D-A' fingerspelled out, but the other signs move rather quickly. Shinsou seems to catch Toshinori's fluster before he can explain it, and pulls out his phone only to find that it's dead.

Before Toshinori can reassure Shinsou that if he's worried about Present Mic being displeased, as he imagines is the case, Shinsou ducks his head and steps a bit further away, closer to the wall. "Y-yamada... is m-mad."

Toshinori finds himself staring, despite not wanting to startle this, or react poorly to it. Though trembling and afraid, Shinsou's voice was quite a rare thing to hear. "I'm sure that he's not, just a bit worried. He takes his duty to take care of you very seriously, you know."

It was a bit startling for Toshinori to see it, to be honest. Present Mic had such a jovial and playful demeanor for most of the year, quite fond of directing some lighthearted teasing towards him whenever the occasion arose. Toshinori had been worried that such a loud and boisterous personality may be a bit much for what he had seen of the fearful and timid Shinsou, but he would be blind not to notice the shift that comes when Shinsou is in the room.

Present Mic becomes a bit quieter and gentler when he speaks, and his eyes always seem to hover over his ward protectively, if not startlingly fondly. Toshinori is sure that Shinsou senses that as well, that he wouldn't have come so far from his shell if he didn't feel that protection, if he didn't feel truly safe at UA, and in Present Mic's care.

But Toshinori knows full well that he's not privy to the details of that relationship. It seems there may be a strain, or perhaps a touch of fear still lingering within Shinsou, as Toshinori watches him tuck his hands into his pockets, his shoulders too tense and his chin nearly hidden in his pink knitted scarf. "He doesn't... need to worry... so much."

Toshinori's recent conversation with Midoriya, and several that he probably shouldn't be privy to with Detective Tsukauchi still burn in the back of Toshinori's mind. He tries to brush it off, and worry with his fingers catching the chill of the night quite quickly, quite intensely given the current state of his body. "I might be overstepping, young Shinsou, but... I heard that a sensitive family matter has come up recently. If it seems like Present Mic is being a bit overbearing right now, I'm sure it's with your best interests at heart. To protect your 'heart,' and all."

Shinsou turns his head towards him, eyes a bit wider, and perhaps Toshinori shouldn't have mentioned that he knew. But seeing the young man so troubled, perhaps offering an objective point of view could straighten out any misunderstandings between another hero and his charge.

"Present Mic wouldn't want you to struggle alone in your feelings, if something was bothering you. Maybe talking to him about that, and being open about what you feel would be the best way to reassure him," Toshinori says, as he was sure that Shinsou must struggle to do that, quite understandably given how new his situation was. Though the gap between them was always closing, he's sure that Shinsou still feels unsure at times with Present Mic, and perhaps a moment of courage could reassure him that nothing would ever go wrong, that he could never say or do something so heinous as to be rejected from Present Mic.

But he sees Shinsou's eyes narrow and turn away, and worries that something akin to that had happened recently. "I did. He didn't listen. He thinks I'm weak or I'm stupid, but I just..." Shinsou clenches his jaw, and Toshinori has seen that frustration in many of his students, something heartfelt and strong and almost too great for their young but capable shoulders to bear alone. Something that feels too great to impart on those around them that would help. "I wish he would trust me. When I say that I want to see my mother."

While Toshinori knows that he can't truly relate to what Shinsou is dealing with, there's an ever-present ache in the side of his body that knows the silent frustration he feels.

He knows what it feels like to be seen as less capable than he is, and perhaps that helps him relate to his adolescent charges more keenly. While it's nice to be supported, to be cared for when it's needed, Toshinori is no stranger for a helping hand that's insisted upon when it isn't needed. And while he knows at its heart that it's not insulting, it can feel like the greatest insult of them all.

Toshinori has become a fragment of his former self, in some ways willingly, and in many ways not. He knows that he's looked down upon for that, and he understands there are some ways that he has to get used to it. His body will never recover to what it was, and he will only ever slide downhill if he lives long enough to see it. But there's a fire still smoldering inside of himself that wants to be shown, that wants to prove that it's not over for him. That he's not weak, even as Toshinori Yagi instead of All Might.

The cold air catches in his lungs, and he knows that the late night walk in such cold weather was a strain on his health that he has to be aware of. He knows he has limits, but he only knows them when he tests them. When he proves that he can walk to the edge, and at times, cross over them to find new ones.

"You feel that you're ready for that? And you've told Present Mic?" Toshinori asks, and he feels another pang over an old scar, a memory of medical equipment digging in to preserve his life at the cost of his comfort too sharply when Shinsou only nods, disheartened by that. He remembers too keenly that after that fight, after he barely recovered with his life but left half of his torso behind in that hospital, that everyone around him had better ideas about his future and capabilities than he did. Well-intended plans were made known to him at an astonishing pace, without a bit of apprehension in any of their eyes. As though they no longer saw 'All Might.'

Sir Nighteye, his trusted sidekick, begged him to retire. Principal Nezu, a trusted friend, urged him to find a successor. While both were right, and both had sound judgements at the time, he wished that there could have been a question as to what All Might would have wanted. If his feelings could be considered for his fate, even if he's always known that his fate would never be his own after taking on the mantle to become the Symbol of Peace.

He knows it's not the same, it's almost worse because Shinsou has never had a choice in the matter. He's never felt powerful enough to decide any part of his fate, and it's disheartening that even those closest to him would deny him that. And Present Mic probably knows better than Toshinori how little agency Shinsou has ever had in his life. "Then, if Present Mic seems... misguided," Toshinori says, though he hates that he has to say such an ugly word. He's sure that Present Mic means well, but truth be told, the young Voice Hero has never seemed much like a 'listener' to him. "Maybe I could help you with that."

Shinsou looks again at him, and this time seems more shocked by the offer. It's almost heartbreaking, how clearly Toshinori can see that Shinsou wants this with all of his heart. He wants to see his mother of all things, a woman that Toshinori is sure means so much to Shinsou, who could begin to mend what he has gone through and offer peace and reassurance that he's past that. A mother that surely wants to see her son as much as any other.

"While going off campus without your guardian's approval is a very bad decision to make, in this instance, I think it's reasonable, as long as it's done safely. We would just be going to a police station after all, and that isn't exactly the height of delinquency," Toshinori says with a chuckle. If Mrs. Shinsou wouldn't be departing to France tomorrow night, he would try to reason with Present Mic on Shinsou's behalf, but he's sure that their time would expire before he could get a second word out if Present Mic were so opposed to it. "I hate that we may have to take some delinquent measures, but if this is what you want to do, just meet me here tomorrow after school, and I'll take you to see your mother. And I'll take any responsibility from Present Mic if it comes to that. Asking forgiveness rather than permission, and all."

Toshinori knows that he will be asking for a great deal of forgiveness due to his meddling, and he's sure that he hasn't quite recovered any good will from his coworker after that unfortunate and ill-thought out plan to help Shinsou bond with the hero students through light sparring matches.

While Present Mic had made it perfectly clear then that Shinsou might not voice any apprehension if he were faced with something from his past, that he might have felt compelled to fight then because he had been forced to before, Toshinori suspects that Present Mic might not see that stepping forward like this is very different. Shinsou isn't simply going along with the flow, with what he thinks is expected of him, he wants something for himself despite even Present Mic's disagreement. And taking away that opportunity to think and act for himself sounds like poor judgement on Present Mic's part.

But Toshinori can see that it comes from a good place, when he sees Present Mic still wearing that fond expression, even if it comes with some odd nervousness. "It's like I thought, young Shinsou's phone died while he was visiting young Ashido. I should have been at the dorm to make you aware-"

"It's fine," Present Mic waves off with a weary sigh, but quickly forms a teasing pout. "Jeez, but standing out here like this is starting to make me think there's some reason you think Shinsou's gonna bolt out of here. You don't think my ward is some delinquent, do ya?"

While Toshinori finds himself sputtering a bit more to find some defense, given how very close those words were to making him think that this little plot had already been found out, he finds himself too reassured by Present Mic's laugh.

"I'm just kidding! You should get inside though, it's bone chilling weather out here and you don't have a lot of meat to protect those bones and all," Present Mic says, something kind and well-intentioned. Something no less mocking, because Toshinori knows his limits, and the man who was the Number 1 hero in Japan for decades doesn't need to be reminded that it's too cold for him now.

Shinsou steps away from the dorm, and doesn't duck away from Present Mic pulling an arm around his shoulders. It's a sight that Toshinori hopes he's not wrong about, that Present Mic being a bit overprotective was just a minor mishap in a warm and comfortable relationship, and for that, Toshinori is more than willing to be a scapegoat to overcome.

Shinsou turns around, and signs slower this time, using one of those signs that every hero is taught. 'Thank you.'

Toshinori knows he hasn't done anything worthy of that gratitude, and yet, he feels like he has.

The Symbol of Peace allowed so many to live peaceful lives without a shadow of fear, but Toshinori knows now he can only give a young man an opportunity to step out of the shadow, and prove his own courage with it.

*

It's cold. 27 hates that it's cold.

The arm around his shoulders, the air in the back of his throat where he knows he could speak. He could talk to Yamada.

But he won't. It's useless.

"I kind of get that... you probably don't want to talk about it yet," Yamada says, too quietly, and the hand fidgeting on 27's shoulder is cold. The part of this half-embrace that he thought was warm is almost oppressive now, and cold. "Probably don't want to head home yet either-"

'It's fine,' 27 signs, because it is now. It's fine, because All Might will take care of it. He doesn't need Yamada to know anything about it. It will be fine after tomorrow, after it's done.

"So, it's not," Yamada says, and his arm slides off 27's shoulders. 27 didn't invite in the first place, he doesn't miss it. He doesn't.

Yamada stops, and forces 27 to stop too. He can see the fog of his breath, how it almost obscures the nervousness written in the lines of his face. Almost, and it should. If Yamada didn't want this, he has the choice and power to change it.

"Shinsou, you know you can be angry at me, right? We can disagree on things, you can even call me a jerk right to my face-"

'Jerk,' 27 signs, even if he can't look at Yamada. Even if he was baited into this test, he's cold, he's completely fucking terrified, why the hell did he fall for that-

"See?" Yamada says, holding his arms out with a shrug, with a smile too exaggerated, too fake. "Disagreeing, being mad, it's not that bad. I can take it. Trust me, you've got a mean glare, but you've got a way to go before you can top Shou's mad face."

27 will have to work on that then. If he's allowed to be angry and show it to Yamada, then he deserves to make it hurt. It's the least he could do for someone who could decide to rip everything away from him in an instant, to at least let him know how much it infuriates him.

"So just," Yamada stops, looking at the ground like there's an interesting ice slick to wonder about, even if there isn't one. "Just don't pull too far away from me, yeah? You can leave, or you can stay, I don't want to make you uncomfortable. But I don't... I don't want you to feel like you have to leave, or that we can't talk when it's uncomfortable. Because there's nothing you can say to me to make me run away from you, or this. Nothing."

27 wants to run away from those words, that nonsense. Yamada is confusing, too confusing, every fucking thing about him is confusing. He wants him to leave, he wants him to stay. Yamada wants him to do what he wants him to, as he orders him to, but he tries to make it sound like there's no consequences. No punishments. There has to be.

27 knows there's a point that Yamada will leave. Yamada is a person. Not a Number, not a Dog, Yamada gets to decide what happens to him and he gets to decide what happens to 27. Yamada can always leave, and wash his hands of it.

Despite everything, despite how confusing and infuriating and hurtful it is, 27 never wants it to come to that. He wants to believe that Yamada will let him stay.

He knows even if there's risks, so many of them and 27 just made a few more of them loom closer by talking to All Might, especially by talking, but he wants to still believe it.

'Not running away,' 27 signs, clenching his jaw because he knows he still is. Even if he plans on coming back after tomorrow, he's running away because he's still too much of a coward to say it. 'Want to be with Ashi tomorrow. Mother leaving. Ashi. Remembers things.'

Yamada smiles, and it almost seems genuine. It almost seems sad too. "Of course. You know, however you want to..."

It's not 'however,' and he knows it.

Yamada knows it, nodding his head when he looks away. "I think that's a better idea, Shinsou. I think that will make you a lot happier in the long run."

If there's one thing that isn't a lie about this entire conversation, it's that. Happiness isn't something that 27 is given, it's what he takes. It's what he makes for himself.

And 27 might not find happiness, but he will find answers for himself tomorrow.

Chapter End Notes

1-A Groupchat Usernames:

Kairi Baskin Ate Her Husband With Her Tiger Quirk - Kaminari Denki
Mini Mic Jr. - Shinsou Hitoshi
Crepe Squad Goals - Ashido Mina
Mighty Boi Jr. - Midoriya Izuku
Mall rat boi - Bakugo Katsuki
Science Momma - Yaoyorozu Momo
Sledgehammer Plans - Jirou Kyouka
Not at the bookstore nope not me not sus - Sero Hanta
Proud Grandmother - Kouda Koji
Clearance rack here I come - Uraraka Ochako
We Want ur Little Sister - Shouji Mezo

Midoriya and Shinsou Groupchat:

Deku - Midoriya Izuku
Brainwashio - Shinsou Hitoshi

Mother

Chapter Summary

Shinsou attends the Meme Study Group, and it ends poorly for him. And when the time comes for him to make his decision, to go with All Might to see his mother or not, it ends poorly for him again.

Yamada finds himself as close to the line of committing murder as he ever has been.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warning: Anxiety from mild trigger, Dissociation, Mention of Original Mocha's fate

Previously on Wards of UA: Shinsou saw a picture of his mother with white roots in her hair, and white hair is a symptom of Mental Quirk Abuse Syndrome, which Shinsou believes he may have given his mother by using his quirk on her. Shinsou doesn't have clear memories of his childhood before he was sold when he was 4, and before he was placed in a dark room until he answered to the name '27.' Shinsou was named 'Dog' at the 8 Precepts. Yamada took care of Shinsou when he was deathly feverish and sick, and feels more connected to him after that. Shinsou left the 1-A dorm the night before while still wearing Ashido's pink scarf. Ashido told Aizawa that before Shinsou was sold and when they went to school together, they were 'married.' Aizawa is 'done with the investigation,' meaning that he doesn't want to be involved in as many aspects as he had been, specifically about Shinsou Ui being in custody. Shinsou had a panic attack the first time he visited the lunch room instead of eating with Aizawa and Yamada, but he was afraid of being attacked by the students whose quirks he didn't know. Quirk Thief AKA Monoma has wanted to talk to Shinsou one on one for a while, but only sees him during Yamada's English class. Shinsou seemed clearly interested in the pork cutlet bowls Mrs. Midoriya made on her visit to the 1-A dorm, which Todoroki noticed. Jirou was part of a family band project called 'Seken Suns,' and after Yamada played the album in full, asked to destroy Yamada's radio studio with a sledgehammer. Shinsou thought that Todoroki and Midoriya were boyfriends, because Bakugo said that Midoriya 'sucked an icyhot dick' for an expensive All Might figure. Shinsou thinks that he is no longer selectively mute, but he wants to hide that, and it's already known to Bakugo that Shinsou can only speak to people he's used his quirk on, but Bakugo has also heard Shinsou talk when he's fighting, or dissociating. When Eri kicks both of her feet, it's a 'test kick,' to make sure that she's safe. Shinsou lived in an interrogation room at the police station for almost a month, and refused to eat or drink anything during that time. Aizawa recently learned that Bakugo knows about One for All, Todoroki's abusive father, and several other things he shouldn't know, which makes him suspicious about how Bakugo seems to know everything. Yamada knows that Shinsou was sold by his mother, but he doesn't know for how much, as no one does. All that Yamada knows about 'Shinsou Kita,' Shinsou's biological father, is that he might not be 'Shinsou Kita' as there are discrepancies between his signatures on legal documents, and that Shinsou's quirk is probably more like his father's.

It's more irritating, because 27 is sure there's not a point to this.

Eri pulls at another shirt and looks up at him, and seems to already know that he's not certain about it. Uncertainty feels more like refusal, it feels like that makes sense. It makes sense not to wear something he's uncertain about.

But he knows it doesn't make a difference, and that it's stupid. "Yeah, that's fine. Thanks."

27 knows that the brown leather jacket looks nice, because Yamada told him it does. He doesn't know if the black long sleeve shirt looks nice, but it should, and it matches with a plain black face mask. It shouldn't really matter, and he knows he's already making himself too suspicious by acting like this. He's lucky that Eri doesn't know, she won't have a clue if he's lucky, even after this.

He's going to meet his mother today, and he has no idea what she'll see when she looks at him.

27 is the biggest coward he knows, because even now, he wants to run away from it. He knows he can't yet, the decision will be made after school. If he doesn't go to the hero dorm to meet with All Might, then he won't go to see his mother. It's his decision. He decides, and he's sure that if he doesn't and just stays where he's supposed to be in this dorm, All Might won't be able to force him to go because Yamada and Aizawa are against it.

27 decides, and he has eight hours to take back that decision. But he knows he won't, no matter how badly it scares him.

He'll know what he did. Aizawa said that his mother has white hair naturally, that it isn't because he used his quirk on her so much that it drove her insane. But there are other symptoms he knows, that he's memorized, and his mother is the only person that can prove he can't do that with his quirk. He knows he used his quirk on her a lot, to the point that she might be insane, and at least if he knows that he did, he'll know. He'll know better than to ever use it again.

He can know why she did it. If she's not insane, then she's cruel. She sold him cheaply, sold him for the price of his phone. He could know what she bought with the money, what she wanted it for. What she wanted more than a child, because she'll surely brag about it.

He could know other things. He could know what it was like before The Miasma. He could know what it was like for him as a child, before the darkness, before 27, before everything. He could know if he should miss it, which pieces that he barely grasps are real. He wants to know if he cried so much, if he felt so alone, if he was alone so much. He wants to know if this is the best it's ever been for him, if he should feel more grateful for what he has and understand that he's barely meant for it.

He could drive that name under his skin. Once she looks at him, once she calls him 'Shinsou,' he'll be renamed again. All that happened to him - The Miasma, the 8 Precepts - all of that can be peeled back to the beginning. He'll have a name, a human name. Not a Number, not Dog, not 27. Shinsou Hitoshi.

He wants the solid ground beneath his feet before he can move forward, to know himself and know the things that his mind forgot, that his body was there for.

He'll take that for himself.

*

Yamada has always been aware that he can kill people quite easily. There's a certain decibel that he can hit that will rupture internal organs, and that sound isn't particularly picky about whether it's ripping open lungs or slightly less consequential kidneys. Brain hemorrhaging is also something he could whip up on the fly, if he had good cause for it. But Yamada has never hit those notes beyond safely testing whether he could, because he's a hero and a good person.

But Yamada thinks he might just cross that line if he ever saw Shinsou Ui, and he's starting to doubt whether he's really that good of a person because the reason for it is selfish.

Things had been going amazingly well with Shinsou. Ever since that little sick, the wall he had been climbing seemed to be getting shorter. Yamada knew he had a way to go, but he felt like he was getting to a comfortable place with Shinsou. A place where Shinsou felt like he trusted him, and maybe even liked being around him sometimes. A place where all those pleadings for 'Stay. After investigation. Stay' could mean so much more than just 'stay,' it could be so much bigger than that.

And now it feels like Yamada is back to square one.

Shinsou seems distracted, when he's not intent on distracting himself from his surroundings. He barely picked at his breakfast, only took a sip of coffee when Yamada had to nudge him. During both English classes, Shinsou had his head tucked into his personal lectures and workbooks, and even the little herolets had picked up on the fact that Shinsou was not interested in anything or anyone around him. Anytime someone tries to make an attempt to draw him out, to just get a little sign or a little chat, it's met with a twitchy scowl and quick dismissal.

Even with Yamada.

It's the nervousness that really gets to him. It's like they're back to day one, but worse because Yamada has seen such a difference in day 2 through 30. Yamada wants to see anger if he can't get anything else, if Shinsou wants to avoid him because he's pissed off that Yamada won't take him to see his mother, then at least he could give him a big blow out to deserve this timidity.

But Yamada knows that Shinsou has probably already said his peace, and it will only take longer for this icy spell to blow over because of it. Shinsou is going to avoid him as much as he can, and he can't do that terribly well because they live together, and whenever Shinsou feels like he might miss Yamada a bit, he'll start to see the ice thaw out.

But given that Shinsou can be incredibly stubborn at times, Yamada won't be surprised if this drags out until the end of Shinsou's wardship, and there are few things more terrifying than that.

Shinsou looks up at the door to the teacher's lounge for about the 30th time, and probably wishes for an excuse to bolt out of it. He pushed his chair a bit further away from Yamada's when they started eating lunch together, which stung, but Yamada thinks those frequent looks at the door sting a bit deeper. He can practically feel how uncomfortable and trapped Shinsou is right now, and it's making him uncomfortable too because he absolutely hates it.

Yamada is close to his breaking point, watching Shinsou pick at his lunch and hardly eat any of it, knowing that the kid needs to eat even if it's away from him, when the door opens and it seems Shinsou's savior has been found in one Todoroki Shouto.

Todoroki stands in the doorway, hand resting on the doorknob, and seems to take an oddly long time to take in the sight of two teachers and two wards eating lunch together before he speaks.

“Kaminari wants to talk to Shinsou about something of grave importance in the lunchroom. I’m here to escort him. And I have pictures of Soba as a bribe.”

Yamada doesn’t think there’s a single thing that Kaminari has to say to Shinsou that’s important, and Shinsou has made his opinions about Todoroki’s ‘secret’ cat pretty clear. But while Yamada isn’t surprised that Shinsou is practically jumping to his feet for the chance to escape, his stomach flipping inside out seems to be. “Oh? Ditching us that quick?”

Shinsou doesn’t even look at him after shrugging on his backpack, but turns just enough so that his signing can be seen. ‘Cat. And need to give scarf to Ashi. Borrowed it.’

Flimsy, awful lies. Yamada plasters on a smile like he doesn’t see it at all. “Of course! And you can head back anytime you want, or pick up something from Lunch Rush. On the house and all.”

Eri quickly decides that regaling Shouta with what she learned about weather patterns from her science workbook is absolutely boring compared to the chance to hang out with the hero students for lunch. “Todo, does Lunch Rush have cinnamon rolls? Or apple overs?”

Or, perhaps she has other intentions. Todoroki nods a bit more seriously than the question calls for, and gives her a thumbs up. “He only gives one serving per student, but we can band together and get 20.”

Yamada spies a withering look come over Shouta’s face when he starts to do the math on that, but it seems to relax when he realizes that the tail end of the sugar rush with all its cranky and irritable glory wouldn’t kick in until Yamada’s free period. To which Yamada has to put in his two cents. “Or, we could follow some nutritional guidelines, yeah? Let’s limit our scheming to five little apple overs, that way we don’t get sick and miserable at school.”

Luckily, Shinsou seems the most agreeable to that, and takes Eri’s hand after nodding, not quite at Yamada but Yamada didn’t expect him to. Maybe he should just be grateful that even though his ward practically hates his guts, he’ll keep Eri safe from gorging herself on apple pastries.

Shouta raises an eyebrow at the quiet that falls over the teacher’s lounge when the kids head out, and Yamada puts down his chopsticks with a sigh because he didn’t want to get into it. “Cool, great, awesome. The kids are fleeing from us with every opportunity they get, I love that.”

Shouta has the misfortune of finding something funny about that and snorts, and Yamada turns to look at him to know what the hell is so funny. “A five year old wants desserts and a teenager has discovered how to be a teenager. This isn’t the end of the world, Hizashi.”

Yamada rolls his eyes, then his neck to try to help this devastating situation. Shouta was telling him to loosen up and stop worrying about the kids, so maybe he does need to look at it from a different perspective. “...What’s with this ‘Ashi’ thing, anyway? I know that, you know, they had a thing but I thought Shinsou was best friends with Bakugo.”

Shouta takes a bit too long to swallow, and doesn’t give him the dignity of looking up from his next bite. “They were married, and never divorced.”

Yamada finds himself torn between wanting to know how exactly that came about, and how long his husband has been keeping yet another secret about Shinsou from him. “Shou... we have not had any kind of talk with Shinsou about that. Any of that. Any of that, at all. What if Ashido-”

“Hizashi,” Shouta interrupts, coming to the defense of his student who better not have taken advantage of his ward in any way with that. “They’re friends. And Ashido is a... better influence than Bakugo. Beyond that, I think that Shinsou is doing what he said he would. He's getting the answers and closure that he needs from reconnecting with Ashido."

Yamada doesn't like the reminder that Shinsou already asked to go over to the 1-A dorm after school. He went to his room as soon as he got back last night, he seemed to take longer to get ready this morning so he wouldn't have to spend too much time not eating breakfast, and finds every escape possible to avoid Yamada during school. And while there's likely an end to Shinsou Ui being in the country tonight, Yamada isn't so hopeful that things will return to normal tomorrow morning. "So... Do you have plans to pop by the station tonight, or..."

Shouta shakes his head, still looking a bit too interested in his lunch. "Naomasa will tell me."

Yamada doesn't have a lot of hope that things will turn out differently than expected. Shinsou Ui will get away with what she's done, because Ashido's statement repeating Shinsou's words isn't enough evidence, and short of finding Miasma and any evidence or confession from them, only Shinsou Ui's own words could convict her. A kidnapping case that wasn't will still seem that way.

And even if Shinsou Ui's conviction isn't the closure that Shinsou wants now, it's something he still deserves to have when he realizes that's the closest to closure he'll ever get.

*

27 nearly collapsed with relief when he left the teacher's lounge, these quiet halls a welcome respite. There's just something about Yamada that's terrifying now, even though 27 has had worse plans and worse people to hide them from. He has to keep reminding himself that Yamada isn't Chisaki, and he's definitely not Bug. Yamada would be mad, he'd be disappointed, but he wouldn't hurt him.

He'd just be upset. Disappointed. Hurt, probably.

That shouldn't feel worse than Cherry and Blossom writhing under his skin, but it does.

27 knows to be prepared for the loud lunchroom, the loud people. The loud quirks, even if they're not quite as loud this time. He sees familiar faces when he looks for them, either hero students from 1-A or 1-B, and watching the Joint Training Exam allowed him to know how they fight and what quirks they have.

He sees Quirk Thief look at him and nearly jolt in his seat, and he can practically see the moment that he realizes how unexpected 27's visit to this place is, and how he could take advantage of that to escape the guard detail that the Heavy Handed Leader enforces on him. But that Redheaded Bug is observant too, and 27 breathes easier when she catches Quirk Thief on the back of his shirt to keep him in place.

Todo remembers that Eri has one desire, and one desire only from this venture, and guides them to a window in the wall staffed by some kind of robot. "An order of apple turnovers for all three of us, and a carton of milk," Todo orders, then looks at 27 like he's supposed to add to that.

He could. Maybe he should. But he shakes his head, because it's not worth it, and he still doesn't feel hungry yet. He probably won't until after he sees his mother, and another hunger is filled.

"And a pork cutlet bowl," Todo adds, and 27 remembers that dish seemed to be Izuku's favorite, since his mother made it for every hero student when she visited. It's a good study meal, but the hero students don't have any difficult tests that 27 is aware of.

The robot wearing white clothes disappears from the window's view for a few seconds, then comes out with Todo's order. The way he says 'Enjoy your lunch' is odd, and muffled like a human is wearing that weird tubed mask. That kind of echo is familiar, but 27 swallows and concentrates on the feeling of Eri's small hand holding his. The way that voice is muffled is familiar, like Hari's and Chisaki's and others, but this is different.

27 almost wishes it wasn't when he follows Todo to a table where Bakugo, Ashi, Seken Sledgehammer, Kirimson Shark, Adhesive Strips, and Pikachu are sitting. Pikachu grins and looks like he almost glows, and the way his lip curls like some overconfident mafia thug makes it all the more likely that he is glowing with his electricity quirk activating. "Got him with the cat pictures! Now you can't escape, Shinsou!"

This is an escape, but 27 quickly realizes it's a terrible one when Zappy pulls out a thick binder that definitely isn't from his studies. Sledgehammer Girl and Bakugo look the most unamused, and 27 briefly considers whether he can annoy Bakugo into giving him a better escape. But Eri taking an empty seat next to Kirimson Shark to ask him to open her milk carton seals his fate.

He knows they would give her more desserts than she can handle if he doesn't keep a close eye on them, so he has to stay. "So, memes move fast, and we're going to get you caught up on some current ones later, but I've devised this study plan to be perfectly tailored to your tastes. We'll start out with a little blast from the past - Can Haz Cheeseburger Cats."

The pictures seem self-explanatory, to a degree. Shinsou doesn't know why the cats want cheeseburgers, but it certainly looks like they do. Todo puts the pork cutlet bowl down in front of 27 for some reason, and 27 isn't sure whether he should move it closer to Todo or wait for him to take it back. If this is another odd game he doesn't know how to play.

"So," Sparky says, pulling some glasses out of his pocket before he hands the binder off to Cellophane to hold it upright. "Cats are notoriously bad spellers--"

"False," Todo cuts in, folding his hands on top of the table. "But Kaminari can be wrong, so it's pointless to argue with him."

Zappy winces like that was a long argument that he didn't want to remember, his eyebrow almost twitching. Bakugo looks at the table that Izuku usually sits at with a sneer, and maybe he honestly doesn't know that Todo and Izuku aren't boyfriends. 27 didn't know it himself until they told them so.

This is apparently the 'Meme Study Group' that was so important for 27 to attend. It looks like studying, and Sparky tries to make it sound like studying as he goes on about 'history' and 'application,' and 27 was honestly surprised that he knew half of those words. The concepts are simple, different images that are the same in concept, unified by the exact same words plastered over them. It can be a different cat, but they all want cheeseburgers, and it's funny because....

27 never gets an explanation for how it's funny, because Zappy goes off into several tangents and makes this 'study session' into what feels like a hundred lectures going on at once. The others don't make it easier, because they also have opinions. They also use words that are the names of 'memes,' and somehow, just invoking those names is funny sometimes.

27 feels like he wants to leave long before Bakugo really makes that 'urge to leave intensify.' "Oi, if you're not gonna eat that shit, get something else. Or make Halfies fuck off and get it, since he's responsible for you and shit."

27 looks down at the pork cutlet bowl, the breading is probably soggy and the entire dish is probably half cold. It's probably more suited to Todo's tastes because of that, so he nudges it towards him with the back of his hand. “Not hungry.”

And thanks to Bakugo, that simple statement earns too much attention. Any scraps from the hero students’ plates are offered up to him, and even Eri tries to hand him her last bite. He feels like one of those cat meme pictures, the one who looks smug when he’s surrounded by knives. Each piece of food feels like something that dangerous.

‘Not hungry,’ 27 signs, crossing his arms afterwards, and he knows this was a mistake. He wants to leave, and he knows it’s almost the end of this lunch period, so it’s useless to invite more attention to do that.

Do they really think that he wants that? Their scraps, their attention, their eyes boring into him and shifting into something uncomfortable? It’s worse because they don’t know when to stop, even when he states it clearly, even when he tells them. It’s worse than the clients who would seem to assume that he’s stupid just because he was small, who would lean down and talk slower, tell him what he already knew from the paper that Bug gave him. You keep your eye out for any trouble, and you tell us if you see anyone snooping. That means anyone who isn’t here, and if you mess that up-

27 sees the hand reaching for him and tries to throw it against the table on instinct, but it seems to catch before it makes contact. Todo stares at him, his wrist still in 27’s grip, and slowly moves his hand to pat the back of 27’s hand.

It’s. Just. Weird. “Do you want a cheeseburger?”

27 only wants to know one thing. Just one thing. He just wants to know if Todo is really that stupid, or if he’s just fucking with him. “No.”

27 gets a reminder he needed before he opened his stupid fucking mouth when Blasty kicks his chair away from the table and stands up, stalking around the table to his side. Blasty knows. Blasty knows when he can speak and when he can’t, he can’t speak to IcyHot, he never used his quirk on IcyHot, Blasty knows now. “Oi, Shitsou’s coming with me. You want to stay here or go back?” Blasty asks Eri, and 27 almost feels like laughing.

He’s going with Blasty. Eri gets a choice. “‘M coming!” Eri answers, finishing her last apple turnover, and Kirishima stacks her plates on top of his to dispose of them.

Blasty makes the right choice in grabbing his jacket from the middle of his back to pull him up, because 27 had been anticipating the opportunity to grab his wrist and make use of it if Blasty aimed for his shoulder or hair. 27 goes limp and forces Blasty to drag him to standing, and it should be more difficult for Blasty than it seems to be.

It’s just that much more annoying.

Blasty only growls half a complaint disguised as an order for 27 to stand by himself before Ashi jumps up and thinks this is a game. She beams and grabs his feet, and if it were anyone else, he’d kick them in the face, but he just tugs his legs back under himself and wrenches himself out of Blasty’s grip, straightening his clothes. This is supposed to be a nice outfit.

There’s no point in arguing whether he’s leaving, because he is. There’s no point in answering Blasty’s frustrated growls or glares, there’s no point to it. Things happen to 27, people do whatever they want to his body. It’s not even his, he’s been sold or rented so many times at this point that they don’t even need to do that anymore.

For some reason, Ashi stays quiet until the lunchroom doors close behind them. “Hey, I can run to the vending machine and get some strawberry milk real quick! You should at least drink something-”

“Great, go do that,” Blasty snarls, jutting his chin at Eri, and if Blast thinks he can call the shots and order Eri around, he’s made a mistake.

“I’m not hungry, I don’t want milk, just fuck off,” 27 growls, taking Eri’s hand in his and tugging her to walk faster, away from them. Just away from them, away from all of them, all of this cold, this stinging, this trembling. It’s cold in his chest but too warm on his skin, he hates it. It’s disorienting and it almost makes him laugh.

“Shinny-”

“Why the hell won’t you l-listen to me?!” 27 yells, but it’s not him. Somehow it’s not him, somehow he’s being controlled. It’s too cold. It’s too cold, too nothing, freezing, he can’t feel anything but words bubbling in his throat, shaking. It sounds like laughter, but it’s not.

“Twenny.” Eri’s scared. He scared her, yelled, he did that, she’s scared of him, he’s pathetic, he took that for himself but it’s not his, he can’t do that. He can’t don’t do that.

...shi, don’t. Cold. Why does it feel cold? Don’t say that. Be quiet. Today’s a good day, don’t do that. Ignore it. Don’t scratch-

27 stares at the back of Momo’s head, her ponytail flaring out in spikes. There’s words in his ears, a familiar voice. He pulls at the odd sensation in his ear and pulls out half of it, he was wearing the headphones.

It’s homeroom.

27 feels the fog at the corners of his mind, feels how muggy and dense it is and how it swells, but he barely remembers how to make it recede. He presses his feet harder against the ground, tries to make the sounds in the other ear turn back into words. “...an action that drew the Warring States period to a close.”

He doesn’t remember learning about the Warring States period.

He looks down, because he remembers this part at least. He’s wearing the same clothes, it’s not like that time. He didn’t get lost for too long, but he got lost. Dissociated. That’s the word. Sometimes it’s different.

He looks at Eri, and he sees it in her eyes. That she saw it. She kicks both of her feet out from under her desk with a wavering smile, one she doesn’t use as much anymore. She’s supposed to smile fully, not like this.

27 smiles back, but barely. It dies when he looks up at Aizawa and wonders if anyone else knew, or saw. If Yamada saw it, what will happen to him now. What’s going to happen to him after school, if they have a reason to keep him from going to Ashi and bothering her if he’s acting up like this.

27 tugs the pink scarf around his neck, just to reassure himself that it’s there. It’s an excuse, an argument he could use, even if he’s not sure if it will be effective. He’s not supposed to act like that, lose himself like that, he hasn’t done it in so long.

He keeps feeling the fog at the edges, runs through every hack that he knows to keep it at bay. It flares when he looks at the clock, when he looks at the door. The hesitation to pack his things after the bell dismisses the hero students feels like a flicker of it, but he tells himself that it's not. He's fine. He has to be fine, he has to see his mother today.

He has to stop doing this.

Yamada comes into this classroom instead of waiting in his, and that's a bad sign. While they're walking back to the dorm, Yamada turns and smiles at him. "Hey, still down for that little hang out sesh? If you're not, I was thinking we could come up with a rousing game of scrabble and make some muffins from scratch! Found a neat recipe I wanted to try."

It's a test. It's more of a test when Aizawa looks back at Yamada and looks irritated by it, like it was the wrong time or wrong place to test him. It's the worst test because he still doesn't know if they know, because sometimes they know. Even if they don't know, they know what his body was doing after lunch until this point and he doesn't.

It's just cruel, that it's like this.

'Forgot scarf,' 27 signs, looking at the ground ahead of him while he tugs the stolen scarf around his neck. It's the best answer he has, because it's neither admitting that he's weak and he lost himself, nor asking them to ignore that it happened if they know.

He's still asking for what he wants, in the safest way possible. Yamada seems to see that, and almost looks disappointed that he answered so well. "Of course, don't want Ashido to go without her scarf and all. Make sure to get another one for the way back, it's gonna be really cold tonight."

That almost seems stupid, to carry an extra scarf so that he will be a little more warm for a walk that takes 10 minutes. As if that could be dangerous for 27, as if that would hurt him. Just his neck and his ears being a bit colder, not even to the point that he would still feel it when he gets back inside. He wouldn't freeze from that.

But 27 does it. When he gets back to his room, he gathers another scarf in his hands, knowing that it might be colder if he stays out later than he's supposed to. He has no idea how long he'll be able to talk to her, how long he really has to talk to her. How much it will take until he's satisfied.

27 looks at the picture of 50 on his desk, and almost opens his mouth to tell her. He doesn't know what she would think of his mother, even though Yamada and Aizawa both seem to hate her. He wishes that he knew, so he could wrap her voice around the words she would say. Kiddo, it's going to be alright.

27 takes a deep breath, and decides those are the words he wants to hear from 50. Not that his mother is horrible, not that he's too weak to see her, not that his name is complicated and he has no way of fixing it. Just that it's going to be okay, however this turns out, however angry Yamada is or what he does when he's angry. It's going to be alright.

27 nods when Yamada asks if his phone is charged, and doesn't miss how he doesn't tell him when to come back to the dorm, almost finding himself waiting for it. But Yamada just smiles, taking off his jacket and speakers, stripping away from Present Mic and back into Yamada. There's a tug that feels like this hesitation has a different reason, wondering if Yamada is going to pull his hair back into a braid or a ponytail, or if he's still going to make muffins just for Eri.

But 27 closes the door behind himself, and feels cold.

Naomasa was struggling to find a reason to leave his office when Toshinori knocked on the door.

He knew he should try, he should keep trying. He owed that to so many people, from the captives still at Miasma that could be freed in a sting investigation, to the victims of the violent crimes Miasma lent muscle to, to the dead Numbers and Nomus created by Miasma's involvement.

But Shinsou Ui wasn't going to crack. Not when she was already clearly shattered.

Naomasa has interrogated a lot of people who weren't 'all there,' but there's something different about Shinsou Ui. He's called Hanajima in multiple times, and she can't put her finger on it either. It's like Mental Quirk Abuse Syndrome, from the white hair, the shaking in her hands and feet, how quickly she'll flip the switch on a conversation out of nowhere, but it's not. It's rare that Hanajima offers any solid opinion without the clarification that she needs far more time and trust with anyone she evaluates, but she was sure that Mental Quirk Abuse was not at play here. Naomasa couldn't entirely follow it, but something about the degree to which Shinsou Ui changes, and the way that she reacts to Hanajima's mental emitter quirk is the most damning evidence.

Naomasa was wavering between making another attempt to talk to Shinsou Ui or checking up on whether The Commission of Wardship Affairs still had Shinsou Hitoshi's DNA samples for a paternity test, when he heard the knock and opened the door, and felt like a ton of bricks were crashing down on him.

"Detective Tsukauchi, can we have a word with you?" Toshinori asked, and Naomasa nodded, still trying to unravel why Shinsou was here with Toshinori. Why he hadn't heard anything about a police escort being requested, and while he doesn't think that would stop Present Mic or Eraserhead from taking Shinsou to the station, that lends to a suspicion that they don't know where Shinsou is right now.

That's already an incredibly concerning matter, but so is Toshinori trying to convince him that he should let Shinsou speak to his mother.

Toshinori gives a sheepish look in response to Naomasa asking whether Eraserhead or Present Mic agreed to this, probably due to not wanting to put the truth to words, not entirely because Naomasa's quirk would find that truth immediately. Naomasa knows that the conversation with Eraserhead to tell him where his ward was and what Toshinori was trying to do wouldn't be pleasant, but something else makes him hesitate to make that call.

Shinsou seems like he wants to do this.

Naomasa knows well enough that Toshinori wouldn't force the kid to come along, and Naomasa knows some of the reasons that Shinsou wants to meet with his mother. He read the essay from the keylogger, and he knows very well that a lot of the reasons Shinsou has aren't good ones. But Toshinori explains a suspicion that he sees reflected in Shinsou's steady gaze, one that gives him pause.

Shinsou says he wants to do this, and Present Mic was overruling him. While Naomasa suspects that Toshinori doesn't know the full story, he doesn't know about the essay or why exactly Shinsou Ui was extradited after the second request, Naomasa finds himself considering the possibility. The young man staring at him, meeting his eyes even though he's silent, is far different from the young man that was forced to live at the station.

When Naomasa first met Shinsou, he met a child constantly curling into himself, who wouldn't look up from the table in front of him if he dared look up from the ground. Who would almost shake sometimes just by someone entering the room, who couldn't be convinced to eat or drink or trust them that much, and who now had too many reasons to want to avoid the police station or fear being here. But Shinsou was here, because he wanted to be, regardless.

“Toshinori, do you mind stepping out for a minute?” Naomasa asks, because while he’s sure Toshinori isn’t privy to everything and that he shouldn’t be, he’s almost certain that being alone with him will rattle Shinsou. Not as much as seeing his mother, but it’s a necessary test because of that.

Shinsou watches Toshinori leave, but turns back to look at Naomasa, hands folded in his lap, gaze steady. It’s promising, and Naomasa isn’t entirely sure if that’s a good thing. It definitely complicates the situation.

“Shinsou, I’m glad you’re doing well. I really, truly am,” Naomasa says, still shocked that he is. He’s seen how the kid’s eyes will glaze over, no matter how gently he speaks, how sometimes it seemed that terror stripped away everything that was human about the kid when they were forced into desperate measures. The many times that an officer who had been supervising the force feeding had stayed too close after the restraints were loosened and suffered the consequences of that when the kid reacted violently. “But, I work very closely with Eraserhead, and I know the reasons you gave him to see your mother. There’s actually a few that I wanted to clear up, because your mother doesn’t have Mental Quirk Abuse Syndrome. We’ve verified it with a professional psychologist.”

Naomasa tries to hand Shinsou that report, and while Shinsou looks, he doesn’t take it. He clearly wants something else.

Naomasa folds his hands over his desk, and wonders how heartless it is that he asks him when he knows Shinsou can’t answer verbally. “Do you feel like you’re ready to see your mother?”

Naomasa’s Lie Detector quirk works on gestures, as Shinsou already knows. When he was first trying to get any information out of the kid, Naomasa told him that he would know whether he was telling the truth if he shook or nodded his head.

Shinsou could nod or shake his head here, but he doesn’t.

“Yes,” Shinsou says, that word too steady and surprising, almost enough to make Naomasa overlook how his quirk makes him feel.

Lie Detector is a bit nuanced, more than most people think. While direct questions work best, things that aren’t up for interpretation, there’s a difference in whether someone truly believes something or whether there’s doubt. Naomasa doesn’t feel the full pinch in his arm, but he feels a small tug, something that feels like doubt. Shinsou isn’t entirely lying, but he’s not entirely confident either.

And while that makes his position more difficult, it’s also a bit more promising. He would be truly worried about the kid if he didn’t have doubts.

“You probably don’t remember her, given that you were so young the last time you saw her,” Naomasa says, and while that should make it easier, it doesn’t. If Shinsou Ui was directly abusive to her son while she still had him in her care, Shinsou had at least forgotten it, but that might not take away the impression that kind of care would have left on him. Not that it would be the strongest one. “But you know what she did. And you still want to see her?”

Shinsou does look away, towards his hands, and when his eyes raise they fall on Naomasa’s desk. There are a few files that he made sure to cover up before letting Toshinori and Shinsou inside, some that aren't related to Shinsou but no less confidential, and some that are tangentially involved. But even if Shinsou doesn't meet his gaze, his focus is steady, and Naomasa knows to read into that as much as his words and how his quirk feels when he hears them. "I know what she's done. I don't know... what to feel about it. I want to know that for myself. Even... if that's difficult."

There's still a tug, but it's lighter, because Shinsou's own words admit doubt. Naomasa knows on its face, that's a reason to pick up the phone and call Eraserhead. But the fact that Shinsou is still talking of all things, in this very police station, makes him pause. "But you still want to do it? Even if this could be overwhelming, and you might find yourself regretting that choice?"

Shinsou nods, and that sings true. His doubts have been cleared up, it seems, when he's faced with that metaphorical precipice. He wants to do this, even if he's not sure that he's ready. Naomasa won't say his own doubts have dissipated, but Shinsou makes a good argument when he offers a bit more strategy to it.

Naomasa tries to call Hanajima, because while it's a toss of a coin whether her quirk was truly ineffective with Shinsou or if they tried to use her Safety quirk when he was too keyed up for it, it's protocol to have a mental health professional weigh in before these kinds of meetings. But Hanajima was visiting her sister who had just given birth a few days ago, and her voice mail reminded him of that. So Naomasa had to toss his own coin instead.

But he thinks with Shinsou as he is, and with his plan, that coin is a bit more weighted in his favor.

*

27 feels it when he steps forward to open the door. He freezes.

He was trained not to do that. Bug would hit him harder, and she wouldn't stop until he thawed out enough to try to break away. Hesitation is a failure, it's a death sentence, and he's learned to just act.

This isn't anything like that, but it's harder to convince himself that he can take the time that the detective told him he could.

He gets to decide. He can stop anytime he wants. He's in control here, he's in control. He can't control his mother, definitely not now. But he knows that he has to.

The detective said that his mother didn't have Mental Quirk Abuse, even if it's clear in her white hair that she must have covered up the same way Yamada covered his bleached hair. Maybe even with the same hair dye. It's clear with the hands he could see shaking on the table when he looked through the window before he came to the door.

But if the detective was wrong, 27 could prove it. The articles that Izuku sent him told him about it, how specific quirks being used to the point that they cause that kind of illness cause a unique reaction after that point. He's never seen it in Eri.

But he has enough questions for his mother. He can make the effort to word at least one of them the right way, and hope she still answers.

27 turns the knob, but feels like he's watching his hand turn it. He watches his mother turn to look at him, and feels like Eri must have felt this way. When he saw her for the first time after the raid, when he knew she was safe and alive, he's sure she felt so much apprehension standing in this same threshold, overwhelmed by the fact that he was still alive too.

He's not going to run into his mother's arms like Eri did, and he can't when he can't decide what his mother looks like. Her face goes slack, and everything stills, but he has no idea what that means for her. What she feels looking at him, when he doesn't know what he feels either.

He has to look away, look at the ground so he knows where to walk when he walks to the chair. When he sits and has to look at her, he looks at her hands. They aren't shaking anymore. They're odd hands, a bit too thin, a bit too boney. A bit too much like his, when he looks down at his own, folded in his lap because he's sure she doesn't want them too close to her.

"Hitoshi." His mother's voice sounds strange, and it's almost like he's made a mistake. They all have, that voice is so unfamiliar. It's almost like she's not his mother, just a very unfortunate stranger who's been forced into this mess, mistaken as her. Her eyes hardly match what he remembers from the rearview mirror of the car, his clearest memory of his mother. This isn't her.

He looks up, and her face is still slack, but her eyes are watering. She pulls one of her hands away and tries to wipe at the tears, before she smiles at him. Her smile has too much teeth, it seems too strained. It's not an honest smile, it's a lie, it's a mask that tries to convince him that this is fine.

"You're..." Her voice is stranger, thicker. She laughs at it under her breath, not the way she should laugh at this. Not laughing at him for trying to see her, to get answers. "You've grown."

He had to grow in 12 years. That's not the biggest difference since the last time they saw each other. "Had to," 27 says, even if it's a whisper. Even if it's not at all what he wants to say.

She nods, and clears her throat. She puts down her hand firmly against the table, even if her tears are still falling. He wants to know if she's looking at him, but he still can't look up. "You have... a lot of questions. You probably want to know... a lot."

27 wonders why she won't answer them before he asks if she knows. If she sounds that nervous because she's afraid he'll ask her a question. Like he could force her to answer, force her under his quirk. She's probably still afraid of him.

He wishes he had something that simple to fear from her.

"The money," 27 says, and he wishes he could say it louder. When she doesn't answer, when he thinks she might have forgotten what he means by that, he feels something in his throat that raises his voice. "I want to know what you did with the money."

He looks up, and sees nothing but his own eyes set in her face. Purple irises and white pupils, and utter blankness answers him. He just wishes he knew what that means.

He wants to know why he still doesn't feel like 'Hitoshi.'

*

Yamada is trying his best to accommodate Shinsou's need for 'space.' He knows he should be proud of him, that Shinsou would feel safe enough to pull away from him, to explore this friendship with Ashido, to get away from someone who makes him feel uncomfortable.

But Yamada doesn't like being the person that Shinsou is uncomfortable around.

Sure, Shinsou is a teenager, and Yamada is no stranger to that very teenage impulse of thinking anyone over the age of 22 is an idiot who just doesn't get them. Shinsou acting like a teenager is a good thing, a great thing, an amazing thing. And Yamada still hates it.

He knows that Shinsou needs the space, and he needs the space to process some very heavy stuff. And Yamada wants to give him all the space he needs in this difficult time, and definitely doesn't want to step over any boundaries.

But he's also sure that Toshinori would love a little impromptu chat about American cuisine, and that's absolutely the only reason he's walking over to the 1-A dorms.

He's not going to pop into Ashido's room, he knows how to keep his little visit on the down-low. He just wants to make sure that things are going swimmingly, that Shinsou isn't devolving into a wreck and suddenly or violently overwhelmed with the urge to come home. If things are fine, Yamada can finally put his worries to rest, only make Toshinori aware that if anything comes up on the surveillance cameras that he contacts Yamada immediately, and wait at home for Shinsou to come through the door and hopefully be in a good enough mood to have a chat.

Ashido might help him take a trip down memory lane, she might have the photos and the stories that Shinsou thinks he needs. But Yamada hopes that this sourness about not taking him to visit his mother won't stop Shinsou from reaching out to someone who's a little more capable of talking him through these big emotions.

But when he gets to the dorm and sees Ashido and a few others lounging in the common room watching some classic Vine compilations, with no ward in sight, Yamada feels some pretty big and pretty overwhelming emotions. "Hey guys! Where's the hero on staff at? Any All Might sightings recently? Or Shinsou sightings?"

Ashido is the first to look confused, but Bakugo stopping with a handful of popcorn halfway to his mouth is worrying, because Shouta has a weird and slightly paranoid little theory that particular little combustion herolet knows practically everything.

"All Might had to leave campus for an urgent matter, but rest assured, we are sworn to behave like upstanding heroes in training in the meantime," Iida answers, and that explains why he's supervising the Vine fans while sitting too straight in that reciner. But that really doesn't answer the questions Yamada really wants answered.

Midoriya's wide eyed panic gives only the slightest warning to Bakugo's popcorn explosion, before the explosive teen jolts up to standing. "Corpse face must've brainwashed him, I swear to fuck, if he's talking to his shitty mom right now--"

"What are you talking about?" Uraraka demands, jumping up to Shinsou's defense, and Yamada admires that and hopes it isn't warranted.

"Shitsou was trying to--"

"THANKS for the intel, you guys just sit tight," Yamada cuts off, feeling a panic he can't play off and can't hide behind a hero persona, if Shinsou really did this he'll- "Watch some memes, don't break anything. Don't wait up for All Might."

Yamada turns on his heel and barely holds himself back from sprinting to his car, the thought of calling Shouta to tell him that his students are unattended at the dorm keeps circling his mind but he can't bring himself to pull his phone out of his pocket.

When Yamada finally does, he calls Toshinori from the driver's seat of his car, and gets his voice mail. The next 10 minutes are fuzzy, but when he looks at the clock, he only vaguely remembers running a few stop signs and that the drive to the police station usually takes 20 minutes.

He does run when he gets out of his car, when he can't even feel the stares from off duty or desk duty officers while he makes his way to the interrogation rooms, knowing that's exactly where he'll find answers. He wants to see Shinsou Ui sitting alone, maybe with Naomasa continuing his work on her. Maybe Naomasa standing outside the door waiting to go in, but that's not what he sees.

Yamada knows exactly what his throat feels like when he's about to use his quirk, and seeing Toshinori standing beside Naomasa, looking through the window into an interrogation room, makes it very difficult to swallow that feeling so that his voice comes out normal. "What the fuck are you doing?"

Yamada's voice comes out almost too small, too strained, because Naomasa knows better. With Toshinori, he can imagine what kind of things Shinsou would say, the heartstrings he could pluck to play a goddamn symphony with. Toshinori has already proven no match for Shinsou when Shinsou wants to throw himself headfirst into danger, but Naomasa doesn't have that excuse.

And he thinks that Naomasa is very right in asking him to 'Stop,' but picking up some JSL won't save him right now. "I know that you don't approve—"

"Ho, you're goddamn right," Yamada says, feeling a laugh that is not a laugh bubbling out of his throat. "Tsukauchi, if you don't want me to blow that wall, and you, into the next block, you will give me one good reason why I shouldn't, right now."

Yamada plays a very convincing villain in the student's training exercises, and while this is barely a performance and entirely a threat, Naomasa takes it with the bravest face he's seen. "Shinsou told me that before you said no to this, you set up a system for him to sign 'Stop' when he wanted out. We're still doing that."

Despite himself, despite knowing exactly how his quirk works and what it needs, the breath is nearly knocked out of Yamada at those words. Even when Shinsou was running away from him, refusing to take his denial of this meeting seriously and pulling that classic 'Oh, I'm just going to a friend's house' stunt on him, he was still listening to him and taking heed of that advice.

Naomasa must have seen that, because he steps away to clear up a space to look in on this meeting. Yamada doesn't want to take it, because a step inside that room to look in on the interrogation room is a step away from the door to yank his ward out of it. A step forward is a step closer to seeing Shinsou Ui with his own eyes, to see Shinsou seeing her. And Yamada knows well enough what he'll feel if he lays eyes on that woman.

But it's tearing him apart to wonder what Shinsou sees when he looks at her.

"It's just started," Naomasa mutters under his breath, and maybe that's reassurance that Yamada hasn't missed anything devastating happening to Shinsou while he wasn't there. Maybe it's an explanation Naomasa thinks is needed for why Shinsou looks too stiff while he's sitting in that chair, barely looking at the woman who is wiping away tears.

"You're..." Shinsou Ui laughs, nervously, and Yamada doesn't miss how Shinsou barely reacts to that. The tension stringing up his ward is impossible to miss, Shinsou just looks so uncomfortable that it's hard not to keep himself from pulling him out for that reason alone. "You've grown."

That's such a bullshit thing to say that Yamada wants to pull her outside. Of course Shinsou has grown, Shinsou is 12 years older than the last time she saw him, and he's been forced to change in horrible ways. If she can look at the scars on Shinsou's face and have the balls to laugh, to say anything but 'I'm sorry,' then she deserves what's coming to her.

And she doesn't deserve what she gets.

"Had to."

Shinsou is talking to her.

Even if Shinsou's voice is small, there's not a flinch or a hesitation, not a single shred of doubt that he could talk to her. This woman hasn't seen Shinsou in 12 years, she's not his mother and even Shinsou can't possibly see her like that. But Shinsou is talking to her.

"You have... a lot of questions. You probably want to know... a lot." Shinsou Ui sits up straighter, tries to look more composed, more like it's down to business. But there's a sickening softness in her eyes that looks like she thinks this is what it's not, it's not Shinsou getting answers and moving past that and into any kind of reconnection. Not when Shinsou still won't look her in the eye.

"The money."

Yamada knows the exact moment his heart stops, the moment Naomasa shifts on his feet because he sees this as a moment to collect important testimony. The moment where it becomes all too real for Yamada to know that Shinsou knew he was sold, because while he heard it from Shouta that he did, hearing Shinsou say that makes it too much.

"I want to know what you did with the money." Shinsou looks up, but he seems to wince after he does. Yamada knows he doesn't really want to know, Shinsou thinks he can handle knowing but he can't. There's no answer to that question that will make it any better, make any of that pain go away.

And there's an answer to a question that Yamada never wanted to think about, that makes the entire thing worse.

"112 thousand yen... It's cheap," Shinsou says, and Yamada wants him to say anything else. He scrambles for any other answer than the obvious one for what Shinsou is talking about. Shinsou takes that away from him, tilting his head a bit to look down. "I was... cheap."

Shinsou Ui exhales, almost a laugh and that almost makes Yamada want to kill her, but she shakes her head while staring at the table with too-wide eyes. "The money. That's what you want to know about?"

Yamada decides that manslaughter is definitely still on the table because how fucking dare she? The way she looks like she can't believe it, like she's insulted that the son she sold isn't asking about how she's been or what she's been up to after all these years. Like Shinsou should have any interest in her when her interest in his life clearly ended at the point of sale. "Cellphone."

Shinsou mutters that word, and it doesn't make sense until it does. The way Shinsou treats his phone, how careful he is with it and how Shouta said he nearly had a panic attack when it ran out of battery that first time makes too much sense.

It's been right under Yamada's nose this entire time, but he didn't want to believe it. Shinsou really, truly thought that he was worth as much as...a cell phone.

Shinsou Ui shakes her head, wiping away her tears again. She folds her hands in front of her chin, leaning on the table with her elbows before she clears her throat. She looks angry for a moment, before it collapses into too much calm. "Probably rent. Maybe wine, I don't really remember. I didn't keep track, I was just..."

She shakes her head, whatever she wanted out of this conversation, she's realized that she's not getting it, and she doesn't deserve it anyway. Shinsou doesn't look like he realizes that he won't get what he wants either yet, just staring and watching her.

"It was better for you. They said you'd have to pay it back, so I wouldn't... What they told me, the police officers, I didn't know! They were supposed to take care of you, when you got older you could...." Shinsou Ui sputters over fragments, pieces are the only things they have to work with. 'You'd have to pay it back, so I wouldn't,' she sold her son cheaply so he wouldn't be forced to commit as many crimes to pay back his captors and earn his freedom.

Yamada already knows that's a lie, but it seems to be one that Shinsou Ui believes, judging by Naomasa's hastily written notes. There's no freedom for members of Miasma, because they would have found someone who got free before this point. Shinsou Ui sold her son, and she didn't have a clue who she was selling him to.

That's enough for Yamada, enough to know that Shinsou Ui doesn't have anything else to offer. She doesn't know enough to tell them what they need to know about Miasma, and there's not a damn thing she can say to make Shinsou feel like he knows enough about his past or his parents.

But before Yamada gathers enough of himself to move to the door to stop this, he hears her voice break and change to something smaller.

"Your cat. Smokey, the little stuffed cat." Yamada turns to look at Shinsou Ui, how she's smiling so fondly at Shinsou, covering her mouth with one of her hands. Shinsou actually looks disturbed now. Yamada is disturbed because he thinks that Shinsou sees this as a connection. "Do you... still have him? You loved Smokey, you really wouldn't go anywhere without him. When you saw him, you just had to have him-"

"Dead," Shinsou says, too high and too strained, and when he glances at the door Yamada wants him to either run to it or sign for this to be over. But he doesn't. "I had to burn him. B... Bug made me."

Shinsou keeping that stuffed cat on his bed, and his reaction to it the first night, makes too much sense. Yamada wondered at the time if it was part of Shinsou's past, that first fragment of something painful that Yamada thought was something mundane like a childhood pet he had to be parted from. But they made him burn his stuffed animal.

Yamada hopes he meets that 'Bug' person face to face during the raid that he knows he'll be part of, on that Miasma compound.

Shinsou Ui looks at him horrified, as though she hadn't seen what she's done before now. As if it's not written on Shinsou's face, on his hands, in his scars that she hurt him by what she did. "You really loved him. I'm... I'm sorry, it wasn't supposed to... You couldn't stay, if you did, I would have.... I would have burned you."

There's a cold numbness crawling up Yamada's spine, absolutely chilled when he sees out of the corner of his eye that Naomasa writes that down. As a truth.

Shinsou Ui would have hurt her son, burned him, possibly killed him. And she said that to Shinsou's face.

Shinsou doesn't look surprised at all, and that's the most disturbing part of this. "You hated my quirk.... Didn't you?"

Yamada wants to know and he doesn't, he knows there's no reason that Shinsou could hear to make this right and Shinsou Ui has proven thus far that she's fucked up enough not to need a reason. It's a haze in the back of his mind that makes him lunge for the door, reminding him how Shinsou's quirk works and how he can't try to use it on Shinsou Ui.

"You're not going to answer me because you hate it," Shinsou says, and Yamada looks up to see that shaking tone matched with a teenager who looks like he's shaking in anger, glaring at his mother. "I couldn't ask you questions. You wanted to get rid of me-"

"Everything else," Shinsou Ui says, meeting Shinsou's anger with her own, and it's never been more ill-placed. "Everything else was me. Your hair, your eyes, your name. Everything. But your quirk..."

Yamada wraps his hand around the doorknob, even when he feels Naomasa's hand curling around his shoulder to try to stop him. He doesn't want to know the answer, and he knows Shinsou doesn't either.

"You had your father's quirk," Shinsou Ui says, before she gasps, burying her face in her hands. "I missed him! I couldn't... I couldn't...."

That... was not what Yamada expected to hear.

"I couldn't deal with it anymore! I couldn't keep missing him like that! Everytime, with your quirk, it was him but with your voice," Shinsou Ui sobs, but Shinsou just stares, completely unmoved by it. "It was him, but it was wrong, and I never... I never...."

Shinsou Ui looks up at Shinsou, still shaking with every gasping breath.

"I never bonded- I don't remember giving birth to you. That's why you're like this," Shinsou Ui says, an eerie calm falling over her, and this time Shinsou seems to finally see it, to see that this woman who was related to him by blood was so clearly unhinged that he shouldn't think about her for a second longer once he got out of that room. That he should call the end to this meeting and be done with it. "You're only like this because I never loved you."

Shinsou doesn't call it, but Yamada does.

Yamada shoves Naomasa away and opens the door, seeing Shinsou sitting there like a puppet with the strings cut, with too much of him leaving his body again. Too blank in his eyes, too slow in his breathing, and this woman.

He's never wanted to use his quirk against someone the wrong way as much as he does when he steps foot in this room and lays eyes on that woman.

"I wanted to love you, I wanted to mean it! You were my son, you were my son, I couldn't-" Shinsou Ui turns and stands up, her eyes too wide and she steps too close to Shinsou. "He's my son-"

"Like HELL he is!" Yamada slips and he doesn't feel it, he feels something that he knows how to avoid slipping over him, but he forces it back when he forces himself to look at Shinsou. Shinsou shouldn't see him like this, he doesn't need him like this, and Shinsou sure as hell needs him. "Shinsou."

Yamada just wants to grab him and pull him out, but he knows that doesn't always work well. Shinsou can come out of a dissociative spell and lash out violently at anyone touching him, or anyone standing too close to him, especially in this room. Yamada knows that, but can't stop himself from crouching next to him and resting a hand on his shoulder.

“Shinsou, we’re leaving,” Yamada says, because he can’t be in the same room as this woman, and if Shinsou wakes up and decides Yamada is a threat to him, he’ll take any broken bones or blood because if Shinsou Ui keeps staring at him like that, she’ll be the one needing a hospital.

Yamada pulls Shinsou up by his shoulder to stand, and has to wrap an arm around his shoulders. Has to pull him into his side and shield him from as much of Shinsou Ui as he can while he walks him out, but something she utters under her breath almost stops him. “Present Mic... you were his favorite hero.”

Yamada grits his teeth and knows he won’t believe a damn word she says, that it doesn’t matter at all. He doesn’t look at her, doesn’t stop, but he still hears it before the door closes.

“Please... Please take care of my son-”

Toshinori looks shellshocked, and hilariously, looks close to tears. Naomasa looks grave, and Yamada decides he can’t tolerate looking at either of them for another second. He keeps walking Shinsou out, almost dragging him out of the station.

Once they get outside, once Yamada feels the freezing cold on his face, he has to stop to make sure Shinsou has his scarf on properly. It’s cold, he might be cold in there, wherever he is, wherever Shinsou Ui put him when she told her son she never loved him.

“M...Mocha,” Shinsou whispers, and Yamada stops staring at the pink scarf between his fingers, looks up at Shinsou’s shell-shocked face and knows his own expression needs to look more reassuring and less murderous. “She didn’t... remember his name.”

It breaks Yamada because he knew she wouldn’t. She wouldn’t give Shinsou what he was looking for, even if she could. In the back of Yamada’s mind, he knows there’s a possibility that Shinsou Ui isn’t evil, just disturbed. Just needed help in horrible ways, ways that she didn’t get help for and because of that, she couldn’t be the mother that Shinsou needed.

The one he was looking for.

Yamada doesn’t know if he moves first or if Shinsou does, but he pulls his ward tight against his chest and holds him. He knows it doesn’t do anything, a hug can’t take back the last twenty minutes or those ugly truths, but he wants it to. He finds himself saying the words that Shinsou Ui should have said, because someone needs to say them for Shinsou. “Shinsou, I’m sorry. You shouldn’t have heard that, she shouldn’t have... It doesn’t mean anything, you don’t have a damn price tag. You’re you, you’re Shinsou Hitoshi despite all of that.”

He hears and feels Shinsou gasp against his chest, he feels his fingers curling and clenching and digging into his back. God, the kid deserves to cry it out, to really cry this time. Yamada doesn’t care if he starts wailing too, he’s never had the opportunity to face his own biological parents and hear that ugly truth. ‘I never loved you.’

What a shitty thing to say, to anyone, to a child most of all. A child who needed love as much as care, who already missed out on so much of that. Yamada already knew whatever happened before Miasma wasn’t pretty, it wasn’t something that Shinsou should remember. “Shinsou.”

Yamada can’t take any of it back, but he wants to. If he could have been there before he was, if he could have known what would happen on that horrible day in August, even if he was only 20 years old, he would have been there. He would have stopped all of it, he would have taken Shinsou away from all of it, saved him from it.

Yamada tightens his arms around Shinsou and already feels cold from what he says, when the words can't help but leave him. "I love you."

He knows those words don't come out right, too quiet, and they come 12 years too late. He knows he shouldn't have those words trapped in his chest because the only thing he can truly offer Shinsou right now, the only promise he can really keep is that he'll protect him from Miasma until Miasma has been taken down. But there are so many more promises he wants to keep, he wants to keep Shinsou. He wants to give the kid absolutely everything he's never had, and maybe it starts with this.

He'd be lying to himself if he hasn't felt this way for a while. The kid trembling in his arms has been family for a while, even if that's not what the wardship papers say. Even if those papers never change, even if Shinsou would be better off with a clean slate and a new home and so much distance from everything shitty that happened to him at UA, he'd still love him. This kid will still feel like a son to him.

He doesn't expect Shinsou to answer to that. He honestly doesn't expect Shinsou to cry any differently, even with this. Shinsou still cries too quietly, white knuckles holding too much inside, but when Shinsou presses his face a bit closer and another silent cry breaks out, Yamada can't help but feel warmer.

He has to be warm, because he's the only thing sheltering Shinsou from the cold right now. His arms are around the kid to protect him in every way he can.

And a hero's arms just don't feel strong enough.

*

The detective keeps staring at her. Ui keeps staring at the door. She hears the detective talking, hears his voice at least, but it's as though Japanese isn't her native tongue, and those words are just the buzz before her quirk reveals the meaning.

"The cloud. He had a cloud." Dammit.

She folds her hands together again, she tries to remember the process. She had to leave half of her medication behind in the Ukraine, it wasn't exactly feasible to get a refill while she was on the run. The seizures will be starting up again soon enough, and she knows if she forces it, she might trigger one.

But she forces her knuckles to grind against each other, imagining each little syllable that needs to come from her mouth. "Laptop."

The detective looks confused, and she almost wants to cry. She almost does, and maybe that convinces him. "You need a laptop?"

She nods, she finds herself nodding too much, still flooded with relief and fear in equal measure. God, she's really going to do it.

She's sure the clock is about to run out, maybe even in a matter of hours. She knows she should get to the point of it, to lay her neck out on the guillotine she's been running from for the past 12 years. She's considered laying it out long before now, but was always terrified out of it.

Shinsou Ui knows she's a weak person, with a weak heart. That's practically how it's been for her entire life.

Maybe things would have been different, if she never met Hiroto. If she never took that temp job, never looked up at him while they were stocking the aisle of that grocery store. Never saw that crooked grin that he would wear, or heard that enamoring voice. What's a pretty thing like you doing on aisle six?

Hiroto would say those lame lines that she's heard a thousand times, but it was different because she could almost feel how earnest he was. He was always unafraid to be lame, to say something cheesy, and to always mean it. I'll buy a house, and a car for both of us. The fence doesn't have to be white, and I'm not sure how we'll end up with half of a kid to go with the other two.

She had a weak heart, and that heart tumbled over itself for Hiroto. Despite every red flag that her parents couldn't help but to point out, every flag that just waved in the wind and never amounted to anything more than a few complications that he sorted out himself. Those six years with Hiroto were the best years of her life.

Some, admittedly, better than others.

Ui was terrified to become a mother. Hitoshi wasn't planned, he was a surprise and a very good reason for a very quick wedding, but she just didn't feel ready. She would try, she would read all the books and try all those tips, she sang to a swollen belly whenever she was alone because she was just too embarrassed to do it whenever Hiroto was around. Everyone said it was different once you held them, once you really realized you were a mother.

Ui probably messed that up, because she was weak. Everything hurt, there was pain lacing up her spine and through her hips and the nurses kept telling her to get ready for the worst. She was weak, she was weak, and she begged Hiroto to do it. He didn't want to, he didn't want to use his quirk like that, but she begged him to.

He put his hands around her face, holding her, whispered It's going to be okay, and then it was. Almost. She had something warm and fresh from her body lying on her chest, wrinkled and disturbingly silent. She ran her fingers lightly over the sparse hair that she thought was Hiroto's black hair, that turned out to be her purple shade. She kept nudging the red and wrinkled thing in her arms, trying to get him to open his eyes so she could see them. Her eyes too.

She named him 'Hitoshi,' because that was the name for a boy that Hiroto decided on. She mostly hoped that it would make her... feel something.

It didn't.

She took care of Hitoshi. She breastfed him because the books said that was better, it was better for bonding. She changed him, she sang to him, she smiled and played and kept track of all of those important little milestones. He didn't babble very much, but his first word was 'At.' Hiroto tried to write that off as more babbling, still hoping for 'Dada' in a competition she honestly had to pretend to care about, but she pointed out that he would point to the neighborhood stray whenever he said it. 'At' meant 'Cat,' and that was supposed to be something she should be overjoyed with.

It was fine. Hitoshi just came at the wrong time, it was just stressful for them financially for her to stop working, it put their plans for the future on hold. But it would get easier with time, when Hitoshi could go to school, when they could move forward. Hiroto talked about the next kid almost incessantly, almost as much as he talked about Hitoshi, and she would almost slip up when she reminded him that it couldn't be now.

She almost said that she couldn't do it again.

Ui never thought about not being a good mother, or about not being a mother at all. It was just how it was supposed to go, it was supposed to work out. Maybe she was just more sensitive to the demands of infancy, the terrible two's. Some books said that children don't really have a personality until they're 6 years old, and maybe then she would find something enamoring with Hitoshi. Something so that he would never have to know that these years were terrible for her.

She tried to teach him her favorite language, French, because the books she read said that Hitoshi was more malleable to learning different languages at this stage, it would benefit him later on. She mostly just wanted to find something enamoring in the way he would say those words, to find something to connect to, to make her feel that impossible something that motherhood is. All she ever heard was fumbled babble, even if she saw Hitoshi's earnest attempts in his eyes.

But on that terrible day in August, Ui's head nearly exploded. She had a migraine like none other, and it came on in an instant. In the haze of the pain similar to a freight train trying to burst through her skull, she worried that she was having an aneurysm, that she would collapse on the floor and no one would be able to free Hitoshi from his crib until Hiroto came home from work in nine hours. No one would make Hitoshi lunch, or let him out to use the bathroom.

The migraine faded, her seemingly near-brush with death faded into a throbbing ache that was more familiar, but not worth dragging Hitoshi to the hospital for. She tried to pull through it, act like nothing was wrong. Trying to drag Hitoshi into waking even despite the pain that flared with his every grumpy and loud whine. It was just hard to wake Hitoshi up in the morning, and her migraines could be pretty bad. She wasn't really considering shaking him out of it.

Then there was a knock on the door, and those awful words from that police officer. Mrs. Shinsou, I'm very sorry. Your husband was killed in a traffic accident.

Oh, but when is he coming home? That's when Ui knew it was all a mistake.

Some people feel a pain in their chest, and a horrible premonition when their loved one passes from this world. Ui had worse, and it never got better.

She tried. She honestly tried. She ground her teeth whenever Hitoshi asked when his father was coming home, she gave up on the books and milestones and family videos, but decided she would get back to them when she was better. She just had a lot on her plate now, a single mother who had to work, who had to pay the landlady a decent amount to watch Hitoshi until he could be enrolled in public school that would cost minimally less money.

She knew it wouldn't last, that she'd stop thinking of Hitoshi like a financial burden, and nothing more. Even if Hitoshi looked everything like her, she'd start to find pieces of Hiroto to love when he developed a personality. When this pain in her chest and this wailing into his pillow could stop.

Hitoshi developed something else. His quirk.

It was a disaster.

Even his quirk wasn't enough like his father's, it was wrong, it was still so much like her. She just couldn't stand it, and she couldn't really blame him. Hitoshi needed to talk, to ask questions, even if he didn't have a quirk that relied on that. But she just couldn't because it made everything worse.

There were things she was able to hide with white knuckled restraint. When she forgot to pay the landlady three times in a row, when she got a note from his school about paying for his lunch fees or actually packing something in his little lunchbox to send him off with. When she got notes about his excessive absences, because she left for work in the morning and forgot she had a son to wake up for school. When she felt that sickening white dizziness start to hit her at work, quickly excused herself to the bathroom, and laid on the floor until her body had trembled and shook froth out of her mouth, when she could come back into her mind and slowly regain control of it.

Everything was worse with Hitoshi's quirk. It was a flip of the coin whether she would have to curl her hands into fists so she wouldn't try to kill her own son in that unfathomably dark rage, or if she would have a brutal seizure. Either way, she would have to excuse herself to her bedroom, lock the door and ignore his crying, and try to go on when it passed. Try to beg her son to stop so she could handle this.

But she couldn't. It was becoming clear that this wouldn't pass, Hitoshi wouldn't stop, and the worst would be coming. When she held another note in her hand that was packed in Hitoshi's backpack, a handwritten note from his teacher that kindly requested a home-visit but wordlessly threatened greater action, she went cold. And decided this farce needed to end.

She wasn't meant to be a mother, but she tried to force herself to be one. Every single action against her, everything she tried to ignore or force through, it didn't matter. It won now. She couldn't be a mother, so she knew what to do.

She called social services. She told them that she was neglectful, she was awful, she couldn't raise her son and they needed to take him away from her. The woman on the phone kept asking questions, she couldn't understand why and sometimes asked what the hell Ui was saying. It was a fair question, Ui knew she could mix her words sometimes, she could get a bit more volatile than the situation called for, and she got volatile again when she screamed that she couldn't deal with Hitoshi's quirk.

That was right, she couldn't deal with it. But the way she said it wasn't right at all.

The investigator that came to the apartment seemed to know what she was doing. She didn't look through the pantry, didn't look through much of the apartment at all. She asked if Ui had a report from a quirk specialist, asking more questions about Hitoshi's quirk. Ui handed it over, answered those questions as best she could. When the woman said they were interested in taking in her son, in making it all go away, she felt nothing but relief.

5 million yen. The woman said that number like it was nothing, but for Ui, she went completely cold.

I don't... have that much. Ui had a pitiful savings account, and absolutely no one would loan her money to do this. No one would believe it would be in Hitoshi's best interests to get away from her. To have a normal childhood with someone who could take care of him, who could love him.

The woman looked a bit confused, a familiar sight that only became more familiar to Ui after that, then laughed. No, we would like to offer that much. So you don't have any reason to ask any questions once it's done.

They wanted to... pay her? That didn't make sense, but Ui was sure that she would have to pay some sort of fee or fine for bringing a child into this world and not being able to take care of it. The woman went on, trying to explain, and at the end of it, Ui understood.

She understood too much.

Hiroto had a past, and sometimes that past wasn't so distant. He did things for terrible people, dangerous people, and there were times that he refused to walk down certain streets because he was sure he saw a familiar face. A face that would do horrible things if they knew where they both lived.

This woman wasn't from social services, and she should have realized that she didn't have a badge before that point. But Ui knew that she knew where she lived, where she and Hitoshi lived, and that they wanted Hitoshi.

Ui is a weak woman, and she just wanted an out. 112 thousand. Please.

That was all that was in her savings account, and once again her mouth decided it was independent from her mind. Maybe it made sense to her mouth, her mouth still thought that this was just a fine to be paid to social services, but in Ui's mind, she felt trapped.

She knew 'they' weren't good people, and the woman explained how very powerful they were. There would be a police officer who would come to her door, who would 'investigate' her son's disappearance after she reported that he was kidnapped the next day. The police officer would help her, there were many police officers who would make this easier for her.

The woman gave her directions and a time, and thanked her for her business.

Ui sat on the couch until she realized that her son had come home from school already. And that she had to pack.

She kept imagining what would happen, when she drove away. Hitoshi would still escape her, still be free of her. He would be so much like his father, and with his father's quirk, that was all but given. It wouldn't be for long, he would have to pay a debt, but it's almost like boarding school. He would graduate at some point. He would... he would be fine.

Ui knew he was scared. She watched him fidget so much before he worked up the nerve to ask where they were going, and seeing his fear too clearly made it too easy to answer him. We're going to meet Mommy's friends.

That's what Hiroto would call them, 'friends.' Even if they weren't.

She wasn't sure if it would be too bad if Hitoshi took control of her after she answered, and her unresponsive body drove them both into a ditch.

She was relieved when he fell asleep, his eyes closed and his eyelashes somehow longer for it, his chubby cheeks pressed to that cat plushie he loves so much. He sighed heavily in his sleep, and she felt the ghost of his breath on her chest like she had so many times when he was an infant sleeping in her arms, but it was different. She found the pull of a smile before she realized how deeply that feeling tugged in her chest. She tried to look at the road, to wipe away the tears coming to her eyes. She couldn't begin to feel this way about Hitoshi now, now that it was over. That there was no other way.

Ui knew when she parked the car, that she could still run away. She could put the car in reverse, drive away from those frightening people standing on the side of the road. She could try to do what was best for Hitoshi, even if it put her life at risk. That's what a mother would do.

She stepped out of the car instead.

They made her sign a document, something that looked like a receipt at first, but when she squinted in the dim light, she could make the words out better. It was a confession of sorts, to say that she willingly did this. She willingly gave up her son to this Miasma's care, in exchange for 112 thousand yen, because she disliked his quirk.

Much like when she talks, some words are right, but some are completely wrong.

She heard his voice calling for her while she walked back to the car, when she buckled in and started the engine. She refused to look, and she almost didn't. But when she was driving away, almost out of sight, she looked in her rearview mirror and saw Hitoshi so afraid, pulling out of that terrifying woman's grasp, screaming for her even if she couldn't hear his words.

She doesn't remember what the road that led back to her apartment looked like. All she saw was her terrified son's face.

That face didn't fade from her memory.

She spent hours sobbing, before she made the call, numbly. She still stumbled over her words too much, and it took too long, almost long enough for her to take them back and give up the truth. The police officer came to her apartment, just as promised. He said that things would work out, he would make sure it was easy for her. Just as long as she remembered the story.

It was hard to know who needed to hear the story, or who knew the real one. It was terrifying, and as much as she missed Hiroto, she never wanted to be this close to him, to feel the same terror he must have felt, these invisible eyes staring at her. What had she done?

She would scream herself into waking some nights, still haunted by her son's face. Still haunted by the clothes she didn't pack, the things left in his room. The terror that she couldn't make herself believe was gone by now, she tried to hold onto the hope that he was fine. He was in the care of some powerful criminals, criminals who would make him do criminal things. But he was young, they would wait until he was older. They would take care of him. He might be happier now.

She would drink, a lot. A worrying amount. Something that the people around her, the kind people who had sympathy to give, company to offer to a woman who so tragically lost her son and became a mess, would ignore or politely try to stop. When the nearly-constant dizziness in her head had a real reason to exist, to deepen, and lull her into a place where she almost didn't exist, it could turn out blissful or painful on the turn of the coin. Sometimes, she could forget what she had done, forget what day it was, and walk into Hitoshi's room expecting to find Hiroto and her son. To think that Hitoshi was using his quirk on her to explain the light-headed feeling yet still believe that he was still a baby, sleeping so quietly in her husband's arms.

Other nights, she would get drunk and scream, try to scream back at that small and terrified face she can't forget, and tell him that she was sorry.

There was a day that came, that she decided she needed to leave. She couldn't help the sinking feeling in her gut that none of this would have happened if she left earlier, if they left earlier. If Hiroto didn't laugh off her suggestion that they could move to France, the place she'd always wanted to live ever since she was a child. Ui, that's so expensive! Sure, you know French. You could pick up any language just like that, but it's hard work for the rest of us.

She kept thinking about it, like a record constantly playing in her mind. She saved aggressively, worked a second job, and that thought almost blurred into reality for her sometimes. When she stepped off of the plane, she looked through the crowd and tried to find her husband and son. She had just taken a trip back to Japan, to get the rest of their things, but they had been here all along, they had lived in France for years. Je t'aime maman! Je vous ai manqué!

Much like convincing her mouth, it took three hours to convince her to leave the airport. That she still wouldn't find them there. That moment almost embarrasses her, now that she can look back and know exactly what it was.

Three months later, she had a seizure in a bar, and woke up in a hospital. She woke up with doctors who wanted to do tests, who worried over her, who asked too many questions. Her mouth finally gave up the incriminating truth that would add another smear to the reputation of a man who had been dead for ten years. The doctors almost seemed relieved to hear it.

That started the real testing, gave her more medications than she cared to think about. She had no reason to tell her employer, a kind woman who had always allowed her to use email for even the smallest communication. Perhaps, this is due to your quirk? These things have give and take, and you are the most useful translator we have in our employ.

It wasn't her quirk that did this, that turned her mouth and words into a separate being, that made her as clumsy in her body as she was with her words, that made her have those horrible seizures and feel too many wrong things. It was Hiroto's. It was still her fault, because she forced him to use it on her.

As much as she felt before the medication, it was worse when she was on it. When Hitoshi's terrified face came to her more clearly, and her daydreams about his better life without her turned into nightmares she couldn't escape. What she had done, what had she done? She couldn't take it back, and could hardly face it.

Then the knock came on her door. Ms. Paro, we'd like to talk to you about your son, Shinsou Hitoshi.

She ran, as soon as she could. Dark alleys she had to fumble through, horrible things she had to do or endure to get this far. She just wanted to run from it, from the awful truth, from the thing that was worse than the guilt she felt when someone asked if she had any children, and she said that she did, once. She was able to leave it at that, but not anymore.

She never intended to let it get this far. She had wondered if Interpol was in on it too. If the police officers talking to her were part of it. If those pictures they showed her were real, if this was just an awful test of some loyalty she promised when she signed that paper and handed over her son, if this was punishment for trying to escape them.

She tried, she tried to cling to the thought that those pictures were of someone else, not her son. Not her son, her son wouldn't look like that, wouldn't have those scars. He was 16 now, he probably had to do some unsavory things. But they said they would take care of him, he wouldn't get hurt like that.

Then that hero spoke to her, telling her about her son. What he did for a little girl, what she couldn't help but think was so Hiroto. Couldn't help but think of that same lazy grin, that earnest way he would shrug off any generous act he gave so easily to others. It's the right thing to do.

Born from two criminals, and despite everything that she has done, Hitoshi is a better person than she is. Than she ever imagined that little boy with his quirk would ever grow into. Born from such a weak mother, he was such a strong son.

What a monster that made her. Why she did it, why she said anything about his quirk when she made that call, that made sure everything would fall into this perfect ruin.

Then she saw him. She saw her son. With those scars.

She knew she owed him the chance to give that pain to her, to carve her face up like that to match so perfectly with his, when she deserved it all along. She was his mother, she brought him into this world. She brought him to this place, through those painful things, and she owed him so much to try to bargain for forgiveness and know she wouldn't earn it. To at least try to make things right.

To give him answers, at least, to those questions that she shouldn't fear so much when she knows why his quirk makes her feel that way.

But she couldn't. Her mouth still betrayed her, those clumsy words still came out wrong. She has to make it right, she has to try to make it right. The truth, at least, is what Hitoshi deserves. He deserves so much more, and she knows he'll have it now. She knows there are other things she can give him that she deserves, when she doesn't have the ability to give him enough for forgiveness.

There's a laptop with a white screen in front of her, perfect for communicating those answers. Perfect for finally bypassing her treacherous mouth, to cling to the one way she can still get her right words across.

But she's not running from it when she pulls up an internet browser first. There's something else she needs to get to Hitoshi first.

Ice

Chapter Summary

In the aftermath of seeing his mother, Shinsou has a new worry he's never considered before. Even after making things right with Eri, the anxiety lingers, until Aizawa brings him answers. Yamada struggles to accept what he's learned, and only finds peace with Midnight's help.

Shinsou and Eri see their first snowfalls.

Chapter Notes

Triggers: Dissociation, 50 mention, Bug mention

Previously on Wards of UA: Shinsou dissociated during the meeting with his mother, after sneaking off campus with Toshinori's help to meet with her, and was taken back by Yamada. Yamada has asked Shinsou to sign 'Stop' when he's uncomfortable with something, to help him establish boundaries. Shinsou entered a dissociative fugue state for nearly a week after Chisaki destroyed his hand in front of Eri, and Eri died in front of him before being resuscitated, and though Shinsou has repressed that memory fully, Eri remembers it as the 'bad away.' Aizawa and Eri have a game where they 'look for missing cats,' where Aizawa shows Eri a picture and asks her where the cat might be, and pretends to text her answers to the police so they can find the 'missing' cat. Bug's quirk allows her to store maggots inside holes in her body. Earlier in Wards, Shinsou would want to trade for information and things he wanted, such as when he offered for Aizawa to keep his phone and would describe one Number for every hour that he was allowed to sit outside. Midoriya tried to explain Mental Quirk Abuse Syndrome to Shinsou before, and gave him scholarly articles on the subject to prove that if Shinsou didn't give Eri MQAS, then he probably can't as the repeated quirk use and Eri's age made her the most susceptible, and Shinsou would have been less likely to do it to his mother as he was much younger the last time he saw her. Bakugo has taken it upon himself to be Shinsou's therapist, and was present when Shinsou dissociated the day before after lunch, which is the 'Zombie mode shit' he refers to in this chapter. Bakugo also noticed that Shinsou spoke to Todoroki at that lunch, and decided to make Shinsou leave the lunchroom after that, concerned that Shinsou was speaking out of severe distress. When Bakugo confronted Shinsou about his ability to talk to him and anyone else he brainwashed before, Shinsou said he wouldn't use his quirk on Bakugo and that he could wear a mask again, which Bakugo tried to insist wouldn't happen, and that it was fine for Shinsou to use his quirk. After the Jun interview, Yamada told Shinsou that when a blizzard comes to UA, they could all drink hot chocolate and sit under the kotatsu together.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Slip.

He's in the car now. Yamada is saying something. Something nice, but he's worried, he's probably asking how he is, whether he can go home right now-

Slip.

He's not here. He's barely here. He's dipping into reality with his eyes barely opened, he tries to move his hands but sees his hands already moving-

Slip.

The light of the street lamps catch in his eyes, he looks up at them, maybe if he hurts his eyes he can stay, but his foot slides from under him, Yamada says something and there's pressure on his shoulder-

Slip.

It's disorienting. It's terrifying. He tries to stay, he wants to stay, he doesn't know what's happening or what he's coming up from, and he knows Yamada doesn't see it because he's looking at the front door now.

He can't slip.

He holds his breath, and holds the words inside his chest. He's wrong, he's broken, he's too old for those words but Eri isn't. She has to hear them, she has to know, she has to know that she's loved so she won't grow up to be as broken as he is.

Children are supposed to be loved. People are loved, somehow. That word is odd, it's unfamiliar. Love is enjoyment, love is an almost obsessive glee over having it. His mother said he loved Mocha, even if she didn't remember his name. Bug would say that Memory loves doing paperwork, Bug would love when someone did something wrong and she could correct that, but those two loves were sarcastic, they were either odd for it or not love at all.

In the videos that Ashi showed him, of when they were kids, she would say that she loved him. It seemed possessive, love seemed to be a word that would make him stop what he was doing and hug her. Shinny, I love you, that younger Ashi would gush while she was tugging at his hair, and in those videos he would turn around from the toys he was playing with and hug her.

Maybe 'love' was a way to make him hug her. Maybe 'love' was another word for hugs.

But Yamada said that he loves him, and he was already hugging him at the time. The way he said it was almost afraid, like love is a powerful thing, almost too powerful to speak it. Love is powerful, and children need it.

Children need it to thrive, and he's never said that to Eri. He's never given her that.

27 tries to make himself real. He tries to hold himself just enough. He feels it slipping, he feels the haze when he thinks of how much he wants to not slip away, how terrified he is that he will, and forces his hands to curl, only to be too terrified when he makes them do something else. 'Stop.'

Maybe this fear is keeping him here, maybe it's how terrified he is when Yamada pulls his arm away. He's too terrified to look at him, he's that much of a coward. He doesn't know how to say it, and he doesn't know if he can. "We're stopped," Yamada says softly, it should be confused, it should be angry, but it's just soft. It's just quiet enough.

'Can't. Away. I don't.' He signs so much like his mother speaks, and maybe he should just talk instead.

Yamada's hand reaches out for him, but it falls, and out of the corner of his eye, he sees Yamada looking around. "Do you think that... cats are okay? Right now?"

He nods, even if he doesn't know what that means. He just feels himself slipping, and he wants whatever Yamada thinks would work to work. He just doesn't want to slip.

He does.

He's in a dimly lit room, but it's familiar. It isn't until he sees how messy it is, how much furniture is stuffed into this living room that it's Witching Hour's dorm. There's pressure on his knee, and he looks down to see the tabby cat that seems too thin, every vertebrae on his spine seemed too prominent the last time he petted him.

He pulls his hands away to pet Sushi, and realizes he was signing at the time. When he realizes that, he doesn't want to look at Yamada, even when he sees him out of the corner of his eye. Sushi sniffs his hand, and seems to find him friendly, enough to butt his head against his hand and start begging for affection, which he eagerly gives. "Always a good time for a Sushi date."

Yamada is trying to sound like this is normal, but it's not. He might realize that all the angry words that have probably been said, all the scolding he deserves for sneaking away, need to be repeated. There's a flash of his mother's tone that he feels in a way that doesn't make sense, that makes him wish that Yamada doesn't decide this is a good time to repeat himself.

"Nothing like hanging around a happy kitty like Sushi. Or Socks. Shou and I actually got adopted by a little kitty a few years ago, our little Sock-er-ina," Yamada trails off, and there's probably a reason that he's never seen Socks. Probably a normal one, an inevitable one. One he doesn't want to think about. "As much as Shou loves cats, he's so weird about the whole 'consider the responsibility' and all. Cats are pretty independent, they like having people around, but I don't think Socks was crying herself to sleep while we were at work."

Aizawa 'loves' cats. He thought he knew what that meant, but he doesn't. There's another meaning to that word, and it's complicated. Aizawa could love cats, he could be obsessive about them and want them, but decide not to have any. To keep them. For their own good. I would have burned you.

His mother didn't love him. That's not why she didn't keep him. It wasn't out of love, but lack of love. She just didn't love him, and she probably would have killed him.

He couldn't have been normal. She couldn't have been a warm mother. He didn't have a normal childhood, ever, so that's fine. That's the ground he can stand on, to know himself and know where his body has been in that way. To make it his in a way.

Sushi presses his paw into his chest, his whiskers tickling his chin. He watches Sushi's nose flare in and out as he sniffs, as he seems oddly curious. He is too, but he's not sure if he should ask. If asking is going to be risky. 'L-O-V-E. Children need.'

Children need love, and he doesn't understand it. He's broken, he's beyond those words, but Eri isn't. He has to say that he loves her the right way, he has to say it enough and hope that it fills the void. He has to hope she can still be normal, that she can forget when she didn't get those words that she needed from him. She won't remember these years if she grows up normally, and maybe the lacking care he gave her will all be swept away.

Yamada takes a long time to answer that, and he feels like pulling Sushi closer to hide his face in his fur, treating Sushi too much like Mocha.

“Kids... do need love. They need loving parents, or loving guardians. And... I’m sorry that you didn’t get that,” Yamada says, quietly. Yamada seems upset that he’s broken, but he had to have known it this entire time. “But, love comes around in a lot of ways. Like 50. I’m sure that she really loved you too.”

50, feeling possessive or happy about being near him. 50 filling a void that he needed. That does make sense, at least the last part. He’s sure that she never felt as happy or safe or warm with him as he did with her, but there had to be some unfathomable reason that she kept coming to his room to spend time with him, kept insisting to Bug that she could train him.

He doesn’t know how old he was when he met 50, or when she died. He thinks he was older than Eri, but he’s not sure. He can’t remember if love is something that’s required at a certain stage of child development, if that’s just something so common that the authors of those books didn’t think to mention. That it should have started at birth.

When his mother didn’t remember giving birth to him, and couldn’t love him then.

“Shinsou.” He hates that name. It’s not his, because now he knows it’s hers. It’s the bond they both hate, that they both have to reject now. A family name, and they’re not family. “It’s fine, really. I know it doesn’t feel like it, and maybe this whole thing feels like the reason that you were looking for. But it’s not.”

He doesn’t know what it is, then. His mother sold him because she didn’t love him, because he’s unlovable, and he’s broken because she didn’t love him. He doesn’t know what he looked like when he was born, but it must have been monstrous.

“I...didn’t get a whole lot of love when I was growing up either, at first,” Yamada says, and he looks to see Yamada staring at the couch cushion beside him, like there’s someone else sitting there that he’d rather be talking to. “Foster care, institutions. Not a lot of people were willing to put up with the whole ‘deaf kid has no idea how loud he’s talking’ thing, so I didn’t get a lot of people who were willing to help me out with that. Not until I was placed with my moms.”

Most people have one mom, and a father. Yamada has talked about his biological mother and father, but they didn’t raise him, and sometimes it seems like he’s angry or bitter about that. Maybe he feels hurt, and feels like they didn’t love him either, when he was born.

“It’s hard to sit with that, with counting up all the things that could have gone differently, all the people who could have been kinder to you. It’s easy to think it’s your fault, but it’s not. Sometimes there really isn’t a reason for it,” Yamada says, but it would just make sense if there was. It feels worse if there isn’t, if this is what he was supposed to turn into. If there really was no way to change his path. “But there was a point for me, where I stopped wondering about it and realized that I was happy where I was. I felt loved, I felt complete, and I’m not saying that I was ever happy to go through that. But I was... satisfied, that things turned out like this. That I could be this person that I am, and stop wondering about an imaginary person. Because the person I am turns out to be an amazing person. If not a little too good at annoying my favorite listener.”

Yamada kicks his foot from side to side, like he thinks about kicking out at his feet. He doesn’t feel like Yamada is annoying, most of the time, and finds himself smiling because it’s stupid. ‘Not favorite.’

Yamada can’t mean that he’s his favorite listener. He’s married to Aizawa, and Aizawa listens to his show. Eri listens to his show too, and thinking that Eri isn't someone's favorite anything is so wrong that he refuses to believe it. "Nah, you're my favorite. Don't tell any of my regular callers, or anyone who has those limited edition autograph cards, but you're definitely my favorite. Can't even tell you why, I just...feel it. You know?"

He knows he can tell that Yamada's smiling, without even looking at his face, just by the way his voice sounds. He knows that feels nice, to know that Yamada is smiling.

He knows that feelings are complicated, that sometimes words can't hope to describe them. It feels like drawing a picture instead of looking at the scene, or taking a picture of Eri that never comes close to looking like she looks, because Eri is breathing and living and real outside of that phone screen.

He knows that he only hates the Present Mic persona because it feels like that, like the picture instead of the person. He just doesn't know if it's a good thing that he feels that way, if it would hurt worse if Yamada becomes too much like 50. If he remembers this feeling even more, because he's older now, and these memories wouldn't fade.

"So, I know things are going to be a little rough for a while. But just reach out whenever you need me, and we can take a break. Just keep things moving at your pace," Yamada says, and maybe he should be irritated by that. Maybe it's late, and he didn't want to stay at Witching Hour's place this long. Maybe he's still irritated about what he did, but doesn't want to say it, because he made things 'rough' for himself. "But, I just want you to know... I meant what I said. I love you like you're family to me, and however that turns out, it's still true. If that's... something you feel like you're okay with hearing, you know."

He heard it, but he still doesn't understand it. Even when he tries to slide it into place, tries to imagine Yamada being there when he was younger. Being a part of his family.

It's terrifying, every time that Yamada says it, but it's somehow different. It's somehow odd, like the heat that comes when his fingers are frostbitten. It's wrong, because his fingers are cold and they feel warm, and it's wrong because Yamada shouldn't love him at all. He's not a person who can be loved.

But he can't stop from tilting his head down, almost a nod. Almost agreeing, because he doesn't want Yamada to feel obligated and go over the top with it. He doesn't want to feel like Yamada is trying to fill an unfillable void for him, just because he's kind. But in a selfish way, he wants to still feel that impossible warmth.

Sushi falls over onto his side, trying to invite him into rubbing his belly, but he knows well enough that's not a good idea. He still admires this cat's wickedness, how Sushi knows he'll get away with it. Sushi will get anything he wants, anything he deserves. It's not even spoiling, because he deserves it. "Sushi is definitely enjoying hanging out with you, Shinsou."

Slip.

*

Eri knows when Twenny's away.

Twenny goes away sometimes, and she hates it. It used to be really scary, and lonely, because Twenny would be there but he wouldn't talk to her. He wouldn't move, even when she pulled on his hands. Even when Twenny talked after that, he would talk weird, like he was really tired but a little different from that. But Twenny would always come back.

The worst time was when Twenny was away, but different. Twenny would wake up, and he would help her get ready in the morning, and he would comb her hair. But he wouldn't talk to her.

Eri knows something really bad happened when Twenny was hanging out with Ashido, because he almost never gets that bad away, but he did when he came back. Twenny wouldn't talk to her, but he would talk with his hands. Yama said Twenny was just really tired, but Eri knew that wasn't true. She knew Zawa was worried about it too, because he talked to her quiet while they looked for missing cats, and sometimes forgot to talk like he was going the bad away too.

Zawa read her a book so she could sleep in her own room, but after Eri pretended to fall asleep, she went to Twenny's room. She knows the bad away takes a long time, but Eri doesn't want Twenny to be the bad away now that they live with the heroes. She knows that she'll miss him a whole lot, and she doesn't like missing Twenny at all.

Twenny was sleeping, but she made sure he was warm and comfortable, and even gave him her Hello Kitty blanket. She forgot to bring her stuffed animals, but Twenny has a Grenny and his cat Mocha, and she made sure they were really close to him. She knows if Twenny remembers that they're safe, then he'll remember he doesn't have to be away, and he doesn't have to be scared.

Twenny makes a face in his sleep, and she remembers what that means. She curls up really close to Twenny and holds him really tight, and tries to hum to him like he used to when she had bad dreams. It would always help when she would wake up and he was already holding her, and she could hear his humming and know she was safe.

Twenny wakes up and tries to sit up, and tries to push her away but he remembers who she is, and looks at her before he holds her really close. Twenny is really scared, and Eri doesn't know how, but she really wants to hurt Ashido and make her go away for whatever bad thing she did. She shouldn't be a hero if she made Twenny so scared.

"Eri, it's okay," Twenny says, and Eri feels bad because she's not helping Twenny feel better if she can't stop crying, but she feels so bad because Ashido is so mean. "I'm sorry."

Eri shakes her head, because she doesn't want Twenny to feel sorry, or feel bad, or feel scared anymore. She tries to hum, but she really can't, because she's still crying. Twenny sits up and keeps holding her, and she wishes she was bigger so she could hold Twenny and make him feel better instead.

"Eri," Twenny says, and he doesn't say anything else. Eri looks up to see if Twenny looks like he's away again, but Twenny is biting his lips, and he looks really sad. He pulls his hands away from her back and holds them up to talk to her. 'I you.'

Eri uses her hands to say the same thing, even if she doesn't know what the third sign means. Twenny smiles, and says it again with his hands, and she says it back because she wants Twenny to feel better.

'You're family. I you,' Twenny says with his hands, before his smile gets really shaky, and it looks like he might cry. "I love you, Eri."

That makes Eri feel like she's really warm, especially on her face. Twenny never told her that, but she knows that people love each other when they're family. And she is really family for Twenny. "I love you too, Twenny!"

Eri hugs Twenny really tight, because she knows Twenny really does love her, and it makes a lot of sense. Not a lot of people say they love each other, but people who do are family, and saying that they love each other means they're super special to each other. And Twenny is really super duper special to her.

But, she's a little worried, because being in love means something special, and she's not sure if they can be in love.

"I'm sorry that I didn't tell you earlier," Twenny says, and he sounds really sad about that. "But I've always meant it, even if I didn't tell you. You've always been loved."

That makes Eri's face feel even hotter, and her toes feel really curly, but she's glad that even though Twenny sounds sad when he talks, he smiles at her when she looks at him. "Did Ashido make you feel bad about not telling me?"

Eri would have been really mad at Ashido if she did, but Twenny makes a confused face, and shakes his head, before he looks down like he doesn't want to look at her. "No, I... met my mother. She... told me about that."

Eri holds Twenny's face with her hands, because she doesn't like Twenny's mom. She knows Twenny's mom is kind of like her real mom, because her real mom gave her away and Twenny's mom did too. She doesn't want to meet her mom, and she doesn't know why Twenny met his mom either, but she wishes he didn't. "I don't like your mom, Twenny. We promised we didn't need moms, so don't let her make you sad, okay?"

Twenny smiles with only half of his mouth, and he looks like he wants to laugh. "I thought I was your mom. You still need me, right?"

Eri nods, but it doesn't make sense if Twenny is her mom now that they love each other. "You're my family, Twenny, but you don't have to be my mom. Moms are bad, and you're not bad. You can be my older brother, kind of like Shozo, or just Twenny. Or you can be my husband, too."

Twenny laughs, and shakes his head. "You really don't have to think about marrying anyone right now, especially me. Or ever." Twenny gets kind of quiet, and his hands get kind of fidgety on her back. "You have two dads now, so you don't need me as a mom. I can...just be Twenny."

Eri gets to fall asleep with Twenny holding her really close, and she gets to hold his favorite cat Mocha. She makes sure to hold him really tight so Mocha doesn't fall off the bed, and when she wakes up when Yama comes, she almost wants to take Mocha to get ready, but she doesn't want Mocha to tell Twenny what she needs to talk to Yama about.

"Yama," Eri says, while Yama is braiding her hair in a long braid like she picked today. "When do people get married?"

Yama hums and makes a thinking face at her head when she looks at him in her mirror. "Well, people get married when they're adults, and they're in love with each other. Or at least, when they think they're in love. Me and Shou made sure to live with each other for a year before we got married, because even though we knew each other for a long time, we wanted to make sure that we really loved each other and that we'd be a good fit for each other too."

Eri knows she's not an adult, but she's not sure how long it's going to be until she is one. Mirio is almost an adult, but he's still in school, so he's probably not really an adult. But Eri lived with Twenny for a long time, so at least they know they're a 'good fit,' and that probably won't change even when they're older.

"Has someone caught my little bean's eye to make her think about her nuptials?" Yama asks, and his voice gets kinda wavy like he's teasing or singing, and Eri has to shake her head, because Twenny didn't do anything to her eyes.

"Twenny said he loves me, so we gotta get married, 'cause only married people say they love each other," Eri says, and Yama looks really weird in the mirror, at first like he kind of wants to cry or that she's really cute, but then he looks kind of serious.

"Well, that is true that married people tell each other that they love each other, and you probably heard that from me and Shou," Yama says, but he starts looking kind of sad at her hair while he's braiding it, before he tilts his head to the side. "But, love can come in a lot of ways. You can love your friends, or love your family, or love a romantic partner. And I think Shinsou was trying to say that he loves you like family."

"And that's different?" Eri asks, because she has to be sure. She doesn't want to get it wrong and hurt Twenny's feelings, because even though he said they're family, if it made him happy to marry her, then she thinks it would make her happy too. Twenny could cook like Yama cooks for Zawa, and she can take a whole lot of naps like Zawa does. But Twenny would probably be better at making her play-mad like Zawa does for Yama, because Twenny never gets mad at her ever, so it sounds like Twenny would be doing all the work in their relationship.

"It's pretty different, but I can see how it's a little confusing," Yama says, and he smiles at her when she turns around, even if it's a little sad. "It doesn't really change a whole lot, because I'm pretty sure that Shinsou has loved you like you're family to him for a long time. Doing things like taking care of you, or making sure you're happy, those are ways of saying that he loves you too. But it's nice to also say it, you know?"

Eri nods, even if her face gets really red and her toes get curly when Twenny says it to her. She's pretty sure that if she got really really cold, she wouldn't have to use his kotatsu head, because he could just tell her that he loves her and she'd feel warm all over. "I'm glad I don't have to marry Twenny though. I wanna live with him forever and ever, but I don't want him to cook all the time, 'cause he's not as good at it as you, Yama."

Yama puts his hand over his chest and makes a funny face at the ceiling. "Eri, I'm so glad someone appreciates my cooking. But Shinsou is getting better at it, right? We'll get him there!" Yama looks at her kind of like he looks at Zawa when he wants to make him play-mad by poking him a lot, then asks, "Is there anyone my little bean might want to marry someday, though?"

Eri tilts her head to think better, and hums because she knows a whole lot of people now. "If I marry Mirio, then we could play a lot of games all the time and have fun, but Momo is a lot of fun too, and Kami said she's gonna be someone's perfect wife when she grows up, but I think he was talking to Jirou when he said that."

Yama nods kind of serious. "That is true. You might not want to get involved with a woman who might already be involved with someone else. It might turn out to be pretty messy." But Yama smiles, and makes sure all of her hairs are in her braid before he pokes her horn and her nose. "But luckily, those romantic plans are pretty far in the future! 12 years at least, even though I'm pretty sure Shou would prefer 40."

Eri would have to be really old if she waited until Zawa said it was okay for her to marry anyone, so maybe getting married isn't a good thing. But that's okay, because Eri doesn't have to get married like Sailor Moon did, and she can be like all the other Sailor Scouts who didn't really get married at all, even though they had a lot of crushes.

"And you know," Yama says, and he gets a kind of serious look on his face, but somehow his eyes are happy instead of sad. "I love you too, little bean. I love you like you're family to me too."

That still makes Eri's face feel hot, and Yama laughs a little, which makes her a little mad. "I love you too," Eri says, because she kind of wants to see if Yama's face will get red too, and maybe she won't feel mad if she can laugh at him too, and his face really does get red.

But Zawa's face gets a whole lot redder when she wakes him up to tell him that she loves him.

*

He had been on the edge of sleep, but felt too stretched out in place as he stared at his closet, knowing that if he did fall back to sleep, Eri would just wake him up to get ready. He feels the haze of that ability to drowse and fall back asleep, but even when he moves his arms and legs, curling his arms closer around Mocha, he still feels it. And he knows it's different.

He still feels like seeing his mother was a mistake, that he didn't find the ground he was searching for. He found ice, ice he keeps slipping on. He feels like there's part of him that was ripped out and left in that interrogation room, and he hasn't felt completely whole since. He can't get her voice out of his head. He feels like he's even more broken-

"...school," Aizawa mumbles, and he seems half-asleep. 27 isn't, because he feels himself cracking like glass under pressure, and he doesn't know if Aizawa sees that. If they're ever going to blame him for this, for being stupid and broken.

He sits up, tucking Mocha between two of his pillows and feels like holding him in his arms this entire time was a mistake. He feels like he's completely unprepared to pretend like he hadn't just slipped away from every word that would have allowed him to play that off. Aizawa is in his room, which is weird, and he was talking about school. And he has no idea what response he's supposed to give to any of that.

And more stupidly, he wishes he could just curl himself around Mocha and pretend that none of this was happening. Aizawa might see that, even when he's half-asleep his eyes seem to hold too much power, because he looks at him and 27 is convinced that he knows. "Toshinori offered to cover my classes if you wanted to stay home today."

That's probably the gist of what he said the first time, but he repeated it with different words. He doesn't know when the end to this odd stalemate will come, when he can find out whether they just have so much pity for him that they can't find a reason to mock him, or if they're just biding their time until he does something too stupid for him to come back from. Or if they're just waiting until the end of the investigation, so they can get rid of him. Their patience comes because there's an end in sight, despite what Yamada says, because Aizawa clearly doesn't feel the same way. 'Stay.'

He knows it's the wrong choice. He knows that he just wants to stay in bed, with Mocha in his arms, and pretend like none of this ever happened. Pretend that he'd never heard those words, I would have burned you.

He wants to forget what he knows for a fact now. Her shaking hands, her whitened hair, the clumsy fractured words she said. He knows he drove her crazy, to the point where she would have killed him if she didn't sell him. At least he knows why he was cheap.

But he wishes that he could feel guilty for that, like he should, instead of blaming her. Wishing it could have been different.

Aizawa isn't there, and he must have slipped again. Eri walks into the room, and he knows he needs to stay. “I’m gonna miss you at school, Twenny! But Zawa said you’re not feeling good, so it’s okay if you don’t miss me this time ‘cause I don’t want you to feel bad.”

He wishes she could command him like that, could make this any easier, just by saying he’s not allowed to miss her. But he tries to smile for her. “It’s just today, I’ll be better by the time you get home. I promise.”

She offers a smile that’s probably as shaky as his, and curls a pinkie finger around his before he can make his hands move to accept it. “I love you.”

He loves this. If love is an obsessive flood of warmth in his chest, something that almost feels crazy and complete, then he loves this. It’s a warmth that floods him, and finally makes him feel real enough to smile fully for her.

He just wishes that feeling, or any feeling, would stay when Eri and Yamada leave.

*

Aizawa finds himself drinking a second cup of coffee, standing alone in the kitchen, completely at a loss.

He knew Hizashi would have rather taken the day off, but when Hizashi received that offer from Toshinori, Aizawa had mumbled that he could stay home instead, still barely awake with only the hazy idea that he should. As much as he knows that Shinsou is probably overwhelmed right now, with a sight and experience they tried to keep him from, he knows his husband feels the same strain keenly. He knew it by the way Hizashi muttered about that ‘Steady Shou routine’ that he thought it would be useful, offering neutrality for Shinsou to ground himself into where Hizashi might make overtures that would be more emotionally overwhelming.

He knows Hizashi has crossed the line, that he thinks of Shinsou less of a ward and more of something that would be reckless for them both. This situation only seems to prove further how ill-suited they would be to take care of Shinsou long-term, when once again they have failed to keep him safe.

He just wishes it could be easier. That they could just keep Shinsou safe from Miasma, an easy thing to do on UA’s fortified campus, instead of trying to keep him safe from painful memories that seem to be a near-constant in his life, from the moment that he was born. It seems like every name he was given, even his birth name, has been a curse for the kid and a promise of misery.

He can’t get the number out of his head.

He didn’t want to know. Somehow, it was easier to see the 28 million that Chisaki had paid, to see that receipt before he ever truly met Shinsou. Aizawa knew it would be worse, to know what Shinsou’s own mother had sold him for, and even if no number could be easier to stomach, the one that Hizashi had choked out with gritted teeth was one of the worst.

112 thousand yen.

Aizawa has had bounties for criminals worth more than that. Two months rent at his first efficiency apartment was worth more than that. There wasn’t a single number that could measure Shinsou’s worth, that would be worth trading a child for, and even if Aizawa believes Shinsou Ui’s story that she sold him cheaply intentionally so Shinsou wouldn’t have a greater debt to pay back, he can’t imagine it. A small amount of cash in exchange for a priceless child, and how much that cost Shinsou in the long run.

Aizawa didn't want to answer the phone call when he finally hears the ringtone, but he still found himself doing so, casting a wary look down the hall towards Shinsou's room. "Present Mic should be your first point of contact."

Naomasa makes a tired huff of acknowledgement to that, and Aizawa can hear the ancient coffee machine at the station rattling to life in the background. "I'll make a note of that from now on, just wanted to see if I could catch you before.... Isn't it a school day?"

There are very few times where Aizawa has seen Naomasa work himself to this point, where the detective seems to forget time and space and surroundings after doggedly chasing that lead. Given what he heard from Hizashi, and the reason Naomasa would be calling, he hopes he's caught it. "I'm skipping, but I don't have time for anything that could have been an email."

He hears snatches of conversations quickly pass in the silence from Naomasa that follows, before he hears a door shut. Naomasa retreating to his office, which indicates that it is important. "I don't know what Present Mic told you about that meeting, but... Shinsou Ui isn't insane. She's only incoherent when she talks because she has a very... specific brain tumor."

Aizawa doesn't blame the early hour or lack of coffee for his inability to feel pity upon receiving that news. "So, she was able to be more coherent in order to tell you that."

"Wrote out a full confession on a laptop. When she speaks, it's - you know, but writing things down seems to work for her. She even explained how she was planning on hiding that until the clock ran out," Naomasa explains, then sighs. "In terms of the investigation, it's not a lot. Confirmation that they have some connection to Social Services, but she didn't remember the name of the woman who answered her call when she reported herself as a neglectful mother. She described three people, a man who matches the picture of 'Boss' that Chisaki laid out, and a woman who matches the poisoner 'Memory,' who was also the one who visited Shinsou Ui's home under the guise of a Social Services investigator. The other person there was a blonde woman, heavily scarred, with one singular black eye."

Aizawa remembers that mystery very well, even if he won't bring himself to describe it for Naomasa right now. "From the hospital."

He hears Naomasa hum. "The woman who pretended to be a nurse in order to make the first attempt on Shinsou's life."

Someone that Shinsou clearly knows, and has never mentioned. Given that 'Boss' and 'Memory' weren't identified with numbers, that seemed to imply a hierarchy, and that 'Memory' was part of that administration. Perhaps this blonde woman was part of it as well. "Everything I've heard so far could have been an email."

He hears Naomasa huff, before his voice drops lower, becoming more serious. "It's more about what Shinsou heard during that meeting. Shinsou Ui told him that she 'would have burned him.' What she meant was that she would have killed him, probably through neglect or accident. Due to the tumors that have been making her less and less capable of coherent speech, she tried to put him in foster care because she was also having severe lapses in her memory at the time, violent mood swings, seizures. She's gotten some form of treatment in France, but she was honestly convinced at the time that Miasma was a form of specialized foster care when she sold him. She couldn't have taken care of him without help. And she felt like she hadn't established a maternal bond with Shinsou, that she 'didn't love him,' because she was under the influence of Shinsou's father's quirk when she was giving birth to him."

Yet, 'Shinsou Kita,' the man married to Shinsou Ui on paper, was quirkless. "Is his father alive?"

Aizawa asks, now that it's become a reasonable question.

"No, he did die in that traffic accident. Sato Hiroto stole Shinsou Kita's identity to cover up his criminal history, when he tried to get a clean start to make a family with Shinsou Ui," Naomasa explains, and while that's an answer to more questions than Aizawa asked, there was one he truly didn't want to.

They knew that Shinsou's father's quirk probably held a stronger resemblance to Shinsou's, given that his mother's Polyglot quirk didn't seem to resemble Brainwashing at all, but there were implications with that. Sato Hiroto having a criminal past was certainly not a surprise, but the knowledge that there might have been a happy family home in Shinsou's distant past is one.

"Shinsou Ui still doesn't... always seem to understand the gravity of what she's done. There are a few emails I've sent to you and Present Mic that she wanted her son to have. Family videos," Naomasa says, and he says that with the same uncertainty that Aizawa does when he thinks about showing those to Shinsou. Shinsou wanted to know, wanted to have that reconnection with his early childhood, but even innocent and happier times would be bittersweet with the knowledge that it changes nothing. "With the confession, she's being charged, but I expect a light sentence. Plenty of evidence for her insanity defense."

"Who would be the point of contact for that?" Aizawa asks, even if he barely should.

Shinsou Ui 'not understanding' may mean that she would still attempt to be part of Shinsou's life, she would still try to make decisions for his care once those parental rights are made available to her. While Aizawa imagines that her court case would take place in the future, postponed until the entirety of Miasma's existence could be made known to the world, the timing and handling of that might be crucial.

While Eri's mother had voluntarily waived any right to control her daughter's future, Shinsou Ui could still decide whether Shinsou could be placed in foster care or not, or if he would be placed in a childcare institution to wait until the end of his legal minority or until Shinsou Ui had served her time. Until Shinsou Ui could be evaluated as a 'fit caretaker' for the son that she sold.

That would all hinge on whether she would be deemed unfit due to the insanity defence that she might plead, a defence that would place her in an institution until she was deemed fit to return to society. While neither option is the best for either Shinsou, Aizawa is far more interested in his ward's best interests. "I'll keep my eyes on it, of course. Investigating detective, and, you know. Someone who wants what's best for Shinsou."

Aizawa finds himself going a bit cold from relief that Naomasa was making this call, knowing that Sansa would have some playful teasing about adoption procedures if he were the one to deliver the update. A concern that has clearly gone past teasing in his husband's case.

"That's why I called, you know. The kid got some wrong answers, and he deserves the right ones," Naomasa says, and that seems to explain the state that he was in when he first called. Naomasa probably stayed up all night or at least late into it to find those answers for Shinsou, something that might settle the kid back into his skin after the shock of meeting his mother like that.

But that leaves Aizawa with the question of whether it would.

Aizawa takes another sip of coffee after he ends the call with Naomasa, refusing to look at the clock and imagine what kind of questioning Toshinori is weathering through with his homeroom class. Bakugo at least has some idea of what happened last night, and will loudly demand answers. Aizawa instead tries to pull forward the facts of his present situation.

Shinsou dissociated clearly in the meeting with his mother, but Hizashi said he also indicated that he was feeling disconnected in a similar way when they first attempted to return to the dorm. It would be rational that Shinsou would retreat from his current situation, discovering from his mother's own mouth that he could have been killed by her hands, that she never felt a maternal bond with him, and that alone isn't the whole of the horror. Aizawa knows for himself that Shinsou Ui seems like she has Mental Quirk Abuse Syndrome, even if she doesn't, and he knows that Shinsou seems almost obsessive over his worry that he could cause that.

Shinsou opened Pandora's box, despite their efforts to keep him from it when they knew he wasn't ready, and that no one would be ready in a situation like that. There is no way to hide those horrors, and Aizawa knows very well they can't properly help Shinsou cope with them. But something catches in his mind when he wonders why Shinsou had so doggedly pursued this issue, what he really wanted from his mother.

I don't know. I want to know.

Shinsou signed those words when Aizawa refused to let him meet his mother the second time, after he had laid out his exact and disturbing reasons to see his mother in that essay. At the time, Aizawa thought he was seeking proof to be verified with his own eyes that he did or did not give his mother Mental Quirk Abuse Syndrome, but the more that Aizawa thinks beyond that situation, he sees something more beneath the surface.

When Hizashi first started his scrapbook-making hobby, he had a pained wince when he admitted he had no 'real' pictures of himself before he was nine years old. Apart from portraits with white backgrounds, pictures taken by foster care institutions or caseworkers to coldly document what Hizashi looked like that year, possibly only needed if he went missing, Hizashi's first 'real' picture of himself was taken when he was first fostered with his mothers. It was a collection of snapshots, Hizashi playing on a swingset and smiling at a family restaurant. To Hizashi, those pictures served a purpose beyond knowing what he looked like, it was a way of remembering where he had been, what he had been doing when those memories faded with the passage of time.

A way of knowing who he was, even when he was no longer that young boy with a crooked grin and ill-fitting glasses.

Aizawa doesn't see his own childhood the same way. He's glad to forget, and he looks forward to the day that all those memories are gone, when he can only clearly remember his first taste of freedom with high school and UA, when his life truly began. But Shinsou probably feels differently.

Even if Shinsou has more reasons to forget, he has more reasons to want to remember. He's never held ownership over himself, and more than the possibility that he wanted to imagine a happier time in his life now forgotten and lost to him, he probably wanted to know what he had been through from the beginning. To at least claim ownership over himself by knowing where his body had been, even if he has completely changed as a person.

He stops by the office, taking the time to review the files that Naomasa sent. It feels prying, it feels incredibly invasive, but he can't show these things to Shinsou blindly. What he sees there confirms his suspicions, that Shinsou Ui was a drastically different person before her husband's accident. The woman who would smile and hold Shinsou in her arms, who would laugh and smile at her husband who barely exists in these videos either, is completely different to the Shinsou Ui that he met.

He finds a video that he almost wants to send to Hizashi immediately, but knowing that Hizashi wouldn't be able to handle viewing it when he still needed to be present for his classes and for Eri, he doesn't. But he wonders what Shinsou will think upon seeing it, if he wants to.

When he knocks on the open door, it takes a while for the answering clap to allow him to enter. Shinsou is sitting at his desk, his history workbook open but nothing written, his laptop open as though he's still searching for answers. Aizawa hasn't checked the keylogger on his phone, and he wishes that he didn't need it. That he and Shinsou could simply talk about these painful things.

Aizawa sets a cup of coffee on the desk beside Shinsou, before he sits on the nearest corner of the bed. Shinsou's gaze lingers over the coffee, slowly turning to look at Aizawa, and Aizawa notices the stuffed cat still tucked in the bend of Shinsou's arm.

'Mocha,' a piece of Shinsou's childhood that they accidentally stumbled upon early on. A stuffed animal that Hizashi said Shinsou had to burn at Miasma, his anger when he recounted that part of the meeting so present that Aizawa wonders if that was intentional on Miasma's part. To force Shinsou to give up every ounce of childhood innocence he had left in such a brutal way, to become the tool they envisioned. A tool that Shinsou didn't become, instead becoming the teenager sitting and staring at Aizawa with both fear and loss that Aizawa has no way to truly ease for him.

"You have a lot to think about, after meeting your mother," Aizawa says, painful answers and worse implications that are a cause to grieve. "It takes time to sit with that, and accept it. That you can be failed by people that society deems are infallible."

Hizashi himself slips up, forgetting that Aizawa's mother is physically alive, but dead to him. His father was never there enough to be remembered, not enough to matter. The man never had any intentions of playing that paternal role, but Aizawa respects him for that more given how often his mother's attempts to do so turned sour.

"Your mother doesn't have to matter to you," Aizawa says, because he's done that himself. He's grieved with every trip from his grandfather's home to his mother's, every quick return back. When he stepped foot in his first efficiency apartment at the age of 14, turning the lights on and realizing that he was completely free now, and completely alone. It was nearly enough to make him collapse.

He wanted to wail against how wrong that was, a feeling that festered when he saw parents meeting their children outside of UA's gates with every holiday break or big event. When he drove himself to the limit during his first Sports Festival, when he kept pushing after that because the top of the podium meant hope, it meant meaning, it meant things that he would never find if he went back to that empty apartment without that gold medal.

He knows that Shinsou hasn't reached that point, that it's only a possibility that he's standing in the threshold of that empty apartment, and hasn't even turned the lights on. He knows, but he doesn't have the ability to feel it yet, to know the full gravity of that situation. Shinsou didn't seem to know what family names were when he asked why Aizawa would call Iida Tenya 'Tenya' in a conversation about both brothers, he couldn't possibly know the horrible weight of every honest question about his family situation that he hasn't encountered yet, but will still have to answer to. That Shinsou will never have a family connection like most people do.

Shinsou proves how little he seems to understand family dynamics when he looks back at the mug of coffee, then signs. 'Don't want name. Not S-H-I-N-S-O-U.' Shinsou hesitates, and Aizawa knows he knows his request won't be granted before he even signs it, but he pulls an almost invisible wince beforehand. '27.'

"That isn't your name," Aizawa says, refusing it with his entire being. He would not refer to his ward like that, to use a name that was given to him, another price that this child paid after Shinsou

Ui sold him. “If you feel like giving up your family name would help you, that’s fine. But that name wasn’t given to you to be yours either.”

‘27’ was a name given to a child, meant to be a label on a product. The teenager under his care is not a product, he’s not a thing that can be sold or bought for 112 thousand yen. He is a person, and he deserves his own identity.

“We know that Eri’s family name is Hanabusa,” Aizawa says, and he sees his ward look at him as though that is news to him. While his ward was the one to confirm that Eri was related to the previous head of the 8 Precepts, he may not have known the specific name that would carry over to her. “We haven’t told her that, or that her mother terminated her parental rights to her voluntarily. Eri is her own person, apart from that.”

Aizawa considered it, taking Hizashi’s family name if only to absolve himself of the weight of his own, but he refused to. He made his name his own, separate from his family. The people closest to him don’t refer to him by that name anyway. ‘H-I-T-O-S-H-I.’

Aizawa meets his ward’s eyes after he sees that, sees that the teenager in front of him is unsure of that name as well. He might just be asking if that is his given name, the name that marks him as a separate member of the Shinsou family, the name that was given to promise him a sense of identity. “Hitoshi.”

The weight of that name settles easier than it should. Aizawa is still too aware of what that name can mean, what it can imply, and how it shouldn’t settle so well. He’s known Hitoshi for a month, and still feels like he barely knows him, that he can barely take care of him like he should. He knows how elated Hizashi would be elated if this name was insisted upon with him too.

He knows it probably settles so easily in a way that explains why he was irritated that Naomasa would use it so casually in that meeting with Shinsou Ui.

Hitoshi nods, the barest twitch of a smile at the corner of his mouth. ‘Different.’ Different seems to be a relief, an oddly important one, but Aizawa pieces it together the more he thinks about that word and that name. Shinsou Ui would have called him ‘Hitoshi,’ but from Aizawa’s mouth, it feels different, in a relieving way.

It’s dangerous for him to ignore the implications of that, but Aizawa does. “Hizashi told me about the ‘Stop’ system. I want to discuss something that might be overwhelming for you, and I want you to use that if you begin to feel overwhelmed.”

Hitoshi straightens, his face almost seems too guarded, too much of a reason to not offer this already, but his eyes seem more open and curious than Aizawa has ever seen before. Aizawa curls his hands around his coffee mug, and decides to risk it.

“Your mother doesn’t have Mental Quirk Abuse Syndrome. She has a...unique brain tumor,” Aizawa says, ‘unique’ being a kinder term than ‘horrifying.’ “From your father’s quirk.”

There’s a twitch at the corner of Hitoshi’s jaw, but no request to stop this discussion. He likely knows nothing about his father, and has probably never wondered what his quirk would be.

“Your father’s quirk, Zombie, could control people much like your quirk, but he would create that control with small worms that would-”

‘Stop.’

Aizawa stops, as soon as he sees that shaky sign. Hitoshi stares at his folded hands, his breathing coming too quick, but before Aizawa can call for his attention to guide that breathing back to normal, Hitoshi looks at him.

'Picture. Father. Please.' Aizawa nods and stands, wondering if somehow 'Sato Hiroto' wasn't as dead as he seemed, or if Hitoshi had meant some secret relation that had a similar quirk. What would inspire that panic to come on so quick, and so violently.

Hitoshi follows him to the office, and the laptop already had the necessary folder open. Aizawa finds one of the few pictures that doesn't have Shinsou Ui to show Hitoshi what his father looked like.

Hiroto honestly doesn't seem to look like Hitoshi at all, a lanky young man with black hair and brown eyes, and all that Aizawa knows about him for a fact is that he is dead and he had a criminal past. But there's an undeniable affection in his eyes when he looks at his son cradled in his arms.

The young Hitoshi in this picture is scarcely more than an infant, scarcely looks like the teenager at Aizawa's side, but the under eye-circles he always seems to have seemed to have started early with the light purple bruising under Hitoshi and Hiroto's eyes, that messy purple hair still wild. Purple eyes that seem so much wider, despite being so much smaller, with a blank faced innocence directed at the camera, and presumably at Shinsou Ui holding it.

Aizawa doesn't know what Hitoshi feels when he looks at this picture, but he looks out of the corner of his eye and sees Hitoshi slowly sitting down, eyes still locked on the screen. He imagines this stirs up more than he thought it would.

Aizawa tilts his head, wondering if it would be right to tell Hitoshi where this picture came from, that all of those videos and photos he had saved were rightfully Hitoshi's. If these things could be what Hitoshi was searching for all along, if there was any sweetness to be found in the bitterness that there was such a tragic end to what seems like familial bliss. "You can look through them."

Aizawa tilts the laptop towards Hitoshi. He puts everything that he can under Hitoshi's control, so that maybe he feels like he can control it. Even if everything else had been stripped away from Hitoshi at some point, from his name to his unscarred skin to even the purple shade of his hair, this is all that Aizawa can give, and he's not truly giving it as much as transferring it from Shinsou Ui to her son.

Hitoshi shakes his head, before it falls forward, that panic that had stilled so quickly when he saw that picture seemingly flooding into relief. That doesn't seem to last either, when Hitoshi brings his hands up to run through his hair, still not looking at Aizawa when they drop to sign.

'What. In exchange.' Despite Hitoshi being the one to offer it, there's another small shake of his head that already seems to sense that this is given. That Aizawa would ask nothing from this.

But he does. "Does it help to have this?" Aizawa asks, because he hopes it's more than what it is, he hopes it's enough.

In a way he's almost ashamed of, he hopes that Hitoshi simply doesn't understand the gravity of what was taken from him, and he can take these pictures and videos to be more meaningful than they are, to be enough. To give him that sense of knowing who he always was by seeing how it could have always been for him, to see that Shinsou Hitoshi that was cared for and brought into a world without the intentions to ever have his life turn out the way it did.

There's a clench in Hitoshi's jaw, an undeniable anger burning in his eyes, that tells Aizawa that it isn't enough, that it's an insultingly poor effort. Aizawa doesn't disagree with that. He knows there's nothing that can be found in these memories, no explanations that can ever measure up to what was taken. 112 thousand yen cost too much.

And still, Aizawa has to try. To offer something.

"Your father used his quirk on your mother, and whether it was impossible to remove or not, the part of his quirk that controlled her died at the same time he did. Those foreign bodies in her brain caused her to have problems in caring for you," Aizawa says, even if he refuses to let himself imagine it. 'Lapses in memory, violent mood swings.' Hitoshi was three years old when his father died, a toddler. Completely reliant on Shinsou Ui's care. "She contacted Social Services to have you placed in a better situation. But Miasma had ties there."

Aizawa read the confession twice. The first time was to take it in, to know what happened, and the second to figure out what he could say to explain it more palatably. He already knows that Miasma has also turned police officers into double agents, that those who find themselves in Miasma's web will find themselves trapped. But Aizawa would have taken his chances with trying to run, and he imagines it's not just because he's a hero. He imagines there are many people who would have risked their lives for the chance that their child would escape that bleak future.

Shinsou Ui wasn't one of them. "It shouldn't have turned out like this. I'm sorry."

'Hair. Fine,' Hitoshi signs, his hands shaking and his glare fixed on the desk rather than the screen. Refusing to look at him either way. 'Hands. Fine. Did that. Didn't.'

His mother didn't sell him because she had Mental Quirk Abuse Syndrome. Hitoshi never caused that with his quirk, and probably can't. As much as that should have been a relief, it's not, because Hitoshi now finds himself with a truth less understandable than the one he's relied on until now. He had no control over the course of his life at 4 years old, he never had that control, and that his tragedy began in a series of failures, the root of which was Miasma's influence. "Your mother has never had Mental Quirk Abuse Syndrome. She didn't...."

Aizawa can't even bring himself to say it.

He's known. He knew what Chisaki did when Hitoshi was only 12 years old. He knew when Hitoshi told him about his 'jobs,' and he suspected it before that. The child sitting next to him, nearly shaking in anger and still far too silent about it had been sold and rented, money exchanging hands in return for scars and pain and sorrow that he had no choice but to bear. Aizawa has known that.

And he can't even say it. 'What. In exchange,' Hitoshi signs, his hands still shaking and his eyes still narrowed. Aizawa sees that stuffed cat pulled even tighter to Hitoshi where it's still tucked under his elbow. 'Why?'

That's a question Aizawa can never answer. There's not a single answer that will ever be enough.

He imagines that the lights of that lonely efficiency apartment are on, and that Hitoshi is still standing at the threshold, still trapped and waiting for someone's voice to welcome him home. Even if he knows it won't come.

"You're not alone now," Aizawa says. He feels the silence answering him like he's never felt it before, as though he's the one talking to himself in that old efficiency, like he used to when it was too much. "You were alone, and you shouldn't have been. You were failed, and you shouldn't have been. There is nothing that will take that back."

If there was, Aizawa would take it back. He would pull everything back to that moment it began to spiral into ruin, he would take that awful question that Hitoshi can't even say to be meaningless. He would write a history that doesn't have a reason to be questioned, that would never bear the weight of that horrible 'Why.'

"You're here, and you're moving forward," Aizawa says, even if he can't see that future either. He knows the degree to which he can shape it, and he will make every effort to make sure that it's right. That Hitoshi won't look back after his wardship ends and his slate is cleaned, that everything painful here is severed and he can begin again. That he'll come to a day where that 'Why' doesn't matter, when the answer comes in the peace that follows. "It will never be like that for you again. It's over."

He wishes it were as simple as saying so, that those horrible feelings would follow logic, that they wouldn't linger.

But Aizawa knows well enough that it's not.

'Not. Mistake. Away,' Hitoshi signs, the shaking gone but the stillness almost brittle, still fearful and somehow guilty when Hitoshi looks at him. 'Not here.'

Hitoshi feels disconnected, because there is no connection to be made. There's nothing that can truly pull him out of that dark misery in knowing that there's no answer, that healing from that pain will not come in looking backwards. "You're here. And it's fine if it doesn't feel like you are."

Hitoshi looks confused, a pull between his eyebrows that smoothes out, that wants a better answer. Aizawa doesn't have one, but he knows what that feels like.

There were spaces in time where it was easier to fall into that un-reality, rather than feel the full weight of his mother's stare. To feel the couch or the chair he was sitting on fall away from him, to feel every sensation muting or shrinking deeper into himself. Oddly enough, the best solution that he had found came long after those experiences. "It's fine if this doesn't work for you, but you can try using this."

Aizawa stands and walks to the closet where Hizashi keeps most of his spare hero costumes, and where Aizawa keeps his capture scarf on the rare occasion it's not on his person. He walks back with the familiar bands feeling oddly heavy in his hand, with the weight of Hitoshi's focused stare on it, knowing that this exercise isn't just uncomfortable for him.

"Breathing or grounding exercises can help, but so can focusing on something small that you can control and hold in your hands," Aizawa says, and the thing he's holding in his hand, offering to Hitoshi isn't small.

His capture scarf has always been his, it's entirely an extension of himself to the point that he's sure if it were damaged in a fight, he'd flinch and expect to feel pain. He knows that Hitoshi might reject it, because Hitoshi knows somewhat of how it works. To manipulate the scarf, Hitoshi would have to develop a keener sense of his own quirk, and he probably hasn't even accepted his quirk. Despite knowing that, despite knowing the logical reasons for it, there's an apprehension held tight in Aizawa's chest when he thinks it might hurt him if Hitoshi rejects using it.

But Hitoshi holds out his hands, arms still braced against his legs. Aizawa lays the capture scarf across his hands and sits, almost jolts when he sees Hitoshi's arms raise upwards. "It's better not to wear it around your neck until you master controlling it."

He nearly strangled himself a few times doing that, and it seems he had good reason to worry as the capture scarf nearly flies out of Hitoshi's hands before he grabs it. It still squirms, the end tugging a loop through one of Hitoshi's hands, before it falls limp. Hitoshi still stares at it, and looks up in near awe when he looks at Aizawa.

It's an expression so like the images of that young boy Aizawa had spent nearly an hour looking at that he can't help a fond smile. "It responds-" Aizawa stops, watching the scarf begin to squirm again, just to confirm his suspicions. "To a unique signal in your quirk. You can learn how to manipulate that freely."

But the capture scarf responding before Hitoshi learned to do that confirmed one thing about his quirk. That it didn't entirely rely on his voice.

Hitoshi had been able to use his quirk on Eri without a verbal response from her, or a verbal response from him. Whether it was mere repetition or the deep level of trust between the two wards, that seemed to be an example of the height of Hitoshi's abilities. To take control over another person without a single word being said, or a nonverbal cue being enough.

He sees Hitoshi run his thumb over the white band, he sees that same familiar furrow, and it almost surprises him to see the scarf still again. Hitoshi might have actually mastered that in minutes. "E..."

Aizawa mentally tries to smooth over his singing nerves, the shock of hearing that one syllable with Hitoshi's voice. He's heard that voice enough directed at others, directed at a few of his students and Eri, but he wonders if Hizashi nearly flinched the few times he heard it as well. Or if Hizashi had a reason to believe that surprising voice would be forthcoming in those rare moments, when Hizashi had clearly earned the trust for it.

Aizawa doesn't speak, doesn't want to interrupt, and nearly wonders if Hitoshi were trying to say Eraserhead, but he sees the capture scarf neatly folded across Hitoshi's knee, before he signs. 'Essay. In trouble. Not....'

It's utterly confusing, until Aizawa realizes Hitoshi spends too much time with a few of his students in particular. "You're not in trouble for using your quirk on the capture scarf. Or for..."

Hitoshi should be in trouble for going off campus like he did, lying to both himself and Hizashi about his whereabouts, going expressly against their wishes to see his mother, and probably manipulating Toshinori to go along with it though the retired hero seems convinced that he was the one practically forcing Hitoshi to go. But Aizawa will gladly place the blame on Toshinori instead of salting an already clear wound.

"You're not in trouble for visiting your mother either. But I hope you understand that Hizashi and I need to know where you are, and that we have the right to make decisions you don't agree with," Aizawa says, but when Hitoshi glances away with a firmness in his frown, he realizes it's not that simple. "It's for your best interests, not just because we can. And when we disagree, you can make your voice heard, even if Hizashi and I don't change our minds."

He sees a twitch at the end of Hitoshi's eyebrow, and a particularly dry look reminds him, 'Can't. I'm mute.'

Aizawa would be lying if he said that he didn't feel a bit left out of that joke. "Then, you can write an essay filled with all the critiques you have about your care. I'm sure Hizashi will even put a sticker on it."

There's a huff that finds amusement with that, what Aizawa knows for a near-fact would happen.

As much as it is difficult to punish a kid who had been punished enough for things that weren't under his control, Hitoshi was probably the only teenager in the world who needed encouragement to act out a bit, and find that the punishments he had come to expect didn't belong in the world he now lived in. That he was free, and the worst that could happen to him now was being grounded. Not that Aizawa was entirely convinced that would be disciplinary given Hitoshi's choice in friends.

Hitoshi glances back at the laptop, the image of his father and his younger self still displayed. He sees the amusement from before drain away, and whatever Hitoshi feels when he looks back on those memories lost to him, Aizawa still doesn't know it. "There's more, if you want to look--"

Hitoshi shakes his head, and looks instead at the capture scarf, curling a hand over where it rests before he raises his hands to sign. 'Here. But. Want to learn. If okay.'

It might be hypocritical of him, but Aizawa thinks when Hitoshi looks at him like that, he can deny him nothing.

*

Yamada had to wait in near agony for two classes, but when the bell for lunch rings, he practically beats his students out the door.

With his favorite little bean at his side, of course, holding onto his hand and reminding him that little legs can only carry a little bean so fast compared to his. "Did you put secret apple overs in your lunch, Yama?"

Yamada almost laughs, his sweet little Eri being convinced that some apple pastries were the reason he was so eager to get to the teacher's lounge for lunch. "Nope! No secret apple overs today, but we do have some apple bunnies to slice up when we get to lunch!"

He thinks the secret to making sure Eri isn't too terribly distracted by the lack of 'Twenny's at lunch might be a few more apple treats in her bento box, but he hasn't thought to try it until today. And while he is reassured by Shouta's text that those misunderstandings had been cleared up with Hitoshi, and that he seemed to be doing a bit better for it, he's still itching to get to a computer and pull up everything that Naomasa emailed to them.

Well, not everything. He doesn't give a rat's ass about Shinsou Ui's confession, and it's hard to care about much when he knows there are pictures of Hitoshi when he was a baby that he could be seeing.

They only have two pictures of Eri before she was rescued. When the 8 Precepts compound was thoroughly searched, they were found in a desk that didn't seem to belong to Chisaki, possibly kept by her grandfather. Yamada hasn't found a place for them yet, hasn't brought himself to fill out the first page in Eri's dedicated scrapbook because of it. A sleeping baby, those red eyes closed and that tiny horn little more than a nub, bundled up in a pink hospital blanket, and a two year old girl smiling brightly at the camera in a frilly pink dress.

It's the smile that Yamada worries about. He knows that Eri will have questions one day, she'll want to know, but he doesn't want to risk letting Eri find that picture and somehow feel worse about those shaky smiles that mean so much more after all she's had to go through.

But he thinks that his little bean might also be excited about some 'baby Twenny' pictures, which is why he doesn't try to angle the computer monitor away after setting up lunch. He carves up an apple so it doesn't have time to turn brown, and takes the juice box from her hands when she offers it, a good attempt made to puncture the straw in by herself. And he has to remind himself to take at least one bite of lunch before he dives into getting those pictures in front of his eyes.

And he nearly drops his chopsticks when he sees there are videos too.

It's not creepy, and it's not like this is reserved to Hitoshi. He wrestled and whined with Shouta for years before he got those baby pictures and videos from him, something he felt guilty about later when he found out Shouta never wanted to keep those things for himself and had to suffer through a phone call and nearly a lunch-date with his mother to get them. But there's just something special, something so nearly-astonishing about seeing the younger versions of the people that he loves, and as much as some might cower in embarrassment about it, he's never felt ashamed.

He can't feel ashamed of the first nine years of his life anyway, not the right way, and even if he still can't remember what was so enthralling about tigers to his 10 year old self, he's never shied away from showing off those pictures.

He knows Hitoshi might. He knows Hitoshi has gotten the hang of being embarrassed about baby pictures when he only had one in his possession courtesy of Ashido, and might not be terribly fond of Yamada taking liberties here when they were on offer courtesy of Naomasa's thoughtfulness. But absolutely nothing is going to make him regret this.

"Babe, that is hideous. Why did you buy that-"

Yamada regrets it. Probably.

It's a little hard to tell what exactly he feels when he's looking at Hitoshi. As a toddler.

Wearing his merch.

Yamada stares at the paused video for too long, not entirely sure that he's breathing, and not entirely convinced that he's seeing this. But Eri kicking out her feet to try to scoot her chair closer, inadvertently kicking his leg serves just as well as a pinch. He's not dreaming.

He's not sure he would be dreaming about this.

He got signed on as a sidekick to the first flashy agency that offered after he graduated, and that agency pumped out merch like nothing else. It seemed like the first month that he was a professional hero was filled with more interviews, merch consultations, and costume planning sessions than actual work, and the marketing heads got the particularly bright idea to capitalize on a crossover of hero merch and tacky baby clothes to make that particular abomination.

'Hear me shout!' the grinning cartoon of his younger self, still wearing bright red speakers on his shoulders with a hairstyle not quite as tall screams at the corner of Hitoshi's shirt, the words taking up the most space across the toddler's torso. Oddly enough, there's a huge demand to make fun of or complain about the natural instincts that babies have by making them wear clothes that almost shame them for it, like one of those pictures of a misbehaving pet standing next to a sign they can't read.

Hitoshi can't read that shirt, he's still frozen in place with his arms lifted above his head, a tight grin and eyes directed to someone standing off to the side, mostly concerned with his silent pleas to be picked up.

The black dress slacks barely in the frame, worn by the person Hitoshi is trying to get to pick him up, don't seem to be Shinsou Ui's style.

“That’s Twenny!” Eri says, around a mouthful of apple that he probably should have tried to get her to save for a dessert. Eri’s excitement seems to remind him of what else they would be seeing, or rather hearing, if the video resumes - Shinsou Ui’s voice. Shinsou Ui would be in these videos and pictures too, and while he doesn’t want that woman even that close to Eri, even if Eri doesn’t know who she is and never learns, it somehow feels wrong.

But not wrong enough that Yamada doesn’t resume the video. “Yep, that’s our Twenny when he was younger.”

And his father, who leans down and picks him up with an exaggerated huff, who smiles at the toddler wrapping chubby arms around his neck and then at the woman operating the camera, before he pulls one of Hitoshi’s arms away to show off the shirt again. “Ui, you cannot talk like that about my guy Present Mic. We’re big ol’ Mic-ies, aren’t we bud?”

Yamada doesn’t know what gives him whiplash more, the name that his hero fans use to set themselves apart from the casual fans of his radio show, or Hitoshi agreeing with a high pitched “Yup!”

Hitoshi might actually kill him if he finds out that Yamada has watched this video, that he has it. And will save it to every storage device he has, and then some. He’ll program it into the goddamn microwave somehow. “And it cost...”

3000 yen, unless Hitoshi’s father bought the agency bundle, which he didn’t. And he probably didn’t buy the hooded towel set either, which Yamada can’t decide if that’s criminal or if it might possibly save his life.

“Ma’am, you are aware that the only reason this lovable hunk is standing here, holding this sweet little guy,” Hitoshi’s father says, curling his fingers into Hitoshi’s side to bring up some giggles. “And bringing home a nice little bonus this month is because Present Mic saved my life, right? Legally, he’s our favorite hero, so you can come over here and give us-”

Yamada has never found the sound of a door opening to the teacher’s lounge more blissful, and he only takes a quick look over to see Nemuri and Toshinori standing in the doorway before he finds the words to choke out. “Defenestration break, take over the little bean for me!”

Yamada pats Eri on the head when he passes, and he knows she’ll probably have questions about this one day if she remembers it, but he hopes Shouta makes enough of a habit of jumping out the window in the teacher’s lounge that she won’t.

Yamada feels his boots crunching on the frosty ground outside more than anything, feels the cold air on his face, but doesn’t feel enough. He feels like he probably needs to scream, he needs to scream until it makes sense, but he just leans back on the cold wall behind him and slides down.

He doesn’t even remember the guy.

Yamada has been a hero for 11 years, but he’s done hero work since he was 16. He doesn’t keep track of how many people he’s saved, that’s something for hero managers to obsess over and the Hero Commission to keep track of, and he imagines he’ll be pleasantly surprised when the final number comes out on a plaque when he retires. He doesn’t remember many faces, they usually wear the same expression of terror when he first sees them, and that tends to blend them together over the years. He can practically hear Shouta telling him it’s logical that he wouldn’t remember, but he just.

Shinsou Ui slid off the rails when her husband died. She said that she couldn’t take care of Hitoshi after that, after those horrifying brain worms died and started calcifying in her grey matter. He can't be sure of his math, because he doesn't even remember, but the first civilian he saved was a middle aged salaryman with a wing quirk who was almost crushed by a bat quirk villain on the second day of his internship.

When he was 16.

A few more incidents after that, during an exciting internship that meant so much at the time, suddenly might mean so much more.

He either saved Hitoshi from probably dying of neglect when he was an infant. Or he doomed him to how everything turned out. If he saved his father's life during that internship, before Hitoshi was even born, that meant he was in the hospital to use his quirk on Shinsou Ui, and put those brain worms in place.

Butterfly effect. Yamada never should have been a hero.

He's still stuck on that thought, still trying to force himself to do the math or at least remember if he met Hitoshi's father during that time, because he's sure he'll be able to breathe once he gets that answer. He hears the window slide shut behind him and sees Kayama defenestrate herself. "I might have ruined Hitoshi's entire life."

Kayama just lifts an eyebrow, cocking her head. "That shirt was hideous, but Eri wants one now, just so you kno-"

"No, I just-" Yamada tries to will the words to come out, throwing his hands back and forth in front of him, the math he's still stuck on and he knows Kayama is better at math, she still remembers how to do percentages and everything. "I saved Hitoshi's dad's life, he gave his mom brain worms when Hitoshi was born, that ruined everything, I don't know which came first and I really need to know if I-"

He throws his hands a few more times, before Kayama's confusion slowly melts into concern. Or as much concern as she can manage when she still seems confused. "Brain...worms... I guess?"

Yamada practically feels the strain in his eyes from how hard he's staring at Kayama, begging her to be right. To at least tell him that, so he can believe it for a little while.

"You're 32, Shinsou is 16. Shinsou was born six days before you turned 16, and I remember you couldn't shut up about saving a person's life and being a real hero when you were only 16-"

"Thank fucking god," Yamada groans, and lets himself fall forward, finally able to breathe. But still cursing that infernal abomination that is math for getting him into this state. "I can't believe I just-wait, how do you remember his birthday? And my birthday? You never remember anyone's-"

"Can we go back to brain worms?" Kayama asks, asking a question that she wasn't read into and should be spared the answer to because just those words being spoken makes Yamada shudder.

"His dad's quirk. Like those little...parasites... that just...." Yamada has seen the videos.

Kayama, in an act crueler than when she 'accidentally' stabbed him in the upper-upper thigh with those weaponized stilettos, had shown him those videos. Insects invaded with tinier, squirmier, worse insects. An entirely too-calm narration over a video of a drowning cricket that explains that the cricket didn't want to be anywhere near the water, but the swarm of worms bursting out of its creepy little head made the cricket do that.

Yamada isn't quirk-shaming. Hitoshi's father might have been a great guy, who at least had great taste in heroes as one of his fans, as a Mic-ie. But he does not want to think about how his quirk works, or his taste in women.

Present Mic... you were his favorite hero.

Yamada's hands fall to his sides when he remembers that, the words that Yamada thought were almost worse than not remembering Hitoshi's stuffed cat's name. He thought she was talking about him being Hitoshi's favorite hero, something he was sure wasn't true given the Kawaii Kawaii Pussycats merch, something he's still sure of when he can just tell that the Wild Wild Pussycats would have been more to little Hitoshi's tastes.

Shinsou Ui was talking about her husband being a fan. And pleading for Yamada to take care of her son.

He doesn't have to forgive Shinsou Ui, and the jury is still going to be out until the real jury is out, and decides whether she can exercise her parental rights over Hitoshi and what she does if she keeps those rights. But he can see another flicker of a woman who did want the best for her son, and might still want it. And better want it if she has any say in Hitoshi's future, unless she wants an extended cut of what he would have to say about it. Bass boosted and everything.

"Seems like you're not the only one hoping that Principal Nezu surprises us with an early release," Kayama says with a groan, stretching her arms above her head. Yamada looks at her, clearly wanting that to happen but with no idea why it would, before she drops her arms and grins at him with a bit of menace. "Hey genius, you want to take a look around? Mr. Oh-so-professional-saved-a-life-at-16 hero, so incredibly aware of your surroundings?"

Yamada just has to turn his head a bit to see the static he was feeling wasn't all inside his skull, so far only white patches on the ground that would be a tough sell to the principal, but the thick flurry pouring from the sky is a better argument. "Oh. It's snowing."

And he's got to get his little bean out here to see it.

*

He's definitely here now, definitely completely inside his body. Everything is very real now.

Especially this headache.

Hitoshi knows the training was his idea, and it helped. He knows he still doesn't get it, if he thinks hard enough and mostly just glares hard enough at the capture scarf, he can stop it from moving. He can't make it move by itself all the time. There were a few times where he imagined he was talking and it worked, but even that didn't work every time. It will only reliably move when Aizawa talks, and maybe Aizawa knew that, and talked about pointless things just so he could practice stopping it.

It doesn't make sense, this prickle under his skin that wants to keep at it. To keep training until he reaches some conclusion, until he can at least control when the capture scarf moves even if he can't control how it moves. This training was his idea, and it seems like he can decide when to stop, and that barely seems like training because of it.

But even when Aizawa sets down a glass of water and a pill, with instructions to drink the entire glass because it will help, he doesn't want to give back the scarf.

The capture scarf is the most valuable thing Aizawa owns, and he doesn't have to say that for Hitoshi to know it. He knows that even better now, imagining himself using this scarf in a fight, to have the chance to actually put distance between himself and his opponent instead of relying on fractions of a second to react or create a pin. This scarf is more important to Aizawa than Hitoshi's knife, maybe as much as the knives 27 first trained with would have meant to him if he could have kept them. Kept the knives that 50 gave him.

And Aizawa just put it into his hands.

The capture scarf uses his quirk. He's not really using his quirk when he holds it, but he is, and Aizawa is letting him use it. When 27 slipped up, when that word almost slipped out, Aizawa didn't react at all, and he still hasn't said anything about testing his quirk or getting a muzzle.

Hitoshi doesn't know what to think about that, if it's really true. If none of this is a lie, if he won't wake up tomorrow and find all of the things that could mean to just be a test, or something that Aizawa doesn't see fit to bother himself with yet. If his quirk isn't that dangerous yet.

But his quirk isn't dangerous. Izuku was right.

He didn't hurt his mother, but his father did. His father's quirk caused his mother to sell him, but even then, it didn't seem intentional. His father looks... like a nice person. A person he can't remember at all, a stranger, but not someone unkind. He looks a little bit like Aizawa.

Hitoshi is just grateful he doesn't look anything like Bug. He knows that quirks can be similar in families, and he used to wonder if Hari was somehow related to Eri because of that, but the thought of being related to Bug because she also had bugs inside her body as part of her quirk....

Aizawa sets out a pre-made bento box after he takes the medicine, and Yamada probably made it to make sure Aizawa wouldn't cook. He wonders what Yamada would think about calling him 'Hitoshi' instead of 'Shinsou' too, or if he wants to keep calling him 'Shinsou' because it's part of his sign-name. He was almost sure that Aizawa would turn him down, to tell him he couldn't be like Eri and just use his other name, but he didn't. And that name sounded so different than the way his mother said it.

And he's glad that Hitoshi can be his name.

Hitoshi. It means 'Person,' and 'Messenger,' or 'Use.' To use a person, or deliver a message.

Shinsou. It means 'Mind,' and 'Manipulate.' To control someone's mind. Brainwashing.

His quirk was there, even in the beginning, even when he was born. It was there before he even developed his quirk, before he was sold. His quirk was written in his name.

But his other name, the other half of it that Ashido said he's always kept, even if he forgot it, meant that he was a person. 'Hito.' Despite everything, he was born to be a person.

He wants to get farther away from those other names, and cling to this one. He wanted the wrong one, and he doesn't want to be 'Shinsou.' He doesn't want his quirk to be all that he is, all of his value. He doesn't want to be what The Miasma bought, what his clients rented, what Chisaki bought. He wants to be Hitoshi.

Even if he has to use other people to do that.

He starts to wonder how he can use Aizawa, if he can convince him to let him go to school now even if it's almost over. If it's lunch, Eri and Yamada will come back in a matter of hours, but even that seems too far away now. He knows it's selfish, it's almost like there are thousands of words trapped in his throat that he needs to tell them, but he knows it's not. He just misses them, even if it's only been a few hours since he last saw them.

And he almost wonders if he used his quirk to make that happen when he hears a knock at the door, before he remembers that Yamada has the key. And Yamada wouldn't sound anything like that voice. "Oi, open up! I know Shitsou's in there!"

Aizawa looks at him, like Hitoshi invited this attention at all, which he didn't. But that stare lingers like he's asking if Hitoshi wants him to open the door, as though that's his decision. It's Aizawa's dorm, he's the one who decides who's in it, and he's supposed to be in charge of his students anyway.

Aizawa sighs, making his way slowly to the door, as though he's barely awake even though it's long past morning, and if he tried to make a secondary barrier with his body when he opened the door, it was a poor one as Bakugo slips under his arm and jumps over the leg kicked out to catch him. And he looks angry at him for some reason. "Great, you saw your shitty mom, you're logging out and shit, so I had to put this shit together to stop that shit."

Bakugo tosses a binder at him for some reason, and at first, it looks like that Meme Study Guide that Sparky made, but it has a different cover. 'Hacks for your dumbass PTSD.' It's written in some really sharp calligraphy, and red ink that looks like blood. It looks like a lot of effort went into it, just by how many pages it has.

"And if someone wants to get Shitsou any kind of actual professional fucking help sometime, that'd be fucking great," Bakugo growls, and Hitoshi glances up to see if Aizawa has the capture scarf back, or if he's going to use it, but he just sees Aizawa and Bakugo glaring at each other. For some reason, he wants to slide some paper in between them to see if it catches on fire. "But a real fucking therapist wouldn't let toss Shitsou in a room to see if something rattles out of his fucked up mom's mouth, so I guess that's-"

"I made All Might take me," Hitoshi argues, because even if it seems like Aizawa won't put Bakugo in his place, Bakugo being angry at anyone but him makes him uncomfortable. It feels like he's being ignored. "And I'm fine now, but thanks."

There are a lot of pages in this binder. It's like a scrapbook, with printed pages and scribbles in the margins, but unlike Yamada's scrapbooks, the scribbles are written in red and have a lot of irritated and colorful opinions about symptoms of PTSD. There's a lot of red on the sections about 'Irrational anger.' "You're fine. You're fine, even though you were blowing the shit out of my phone at 3 fucking A.M. After your weird fucking zombie mode shit-"

There's a page that looks like a real scrapbook, and it's the first one on the 'Mildly Logged Out' section. It's pictures of Eri. The one at Shichi-Go-San, the picture of her smiling with her friend Mizzy. There are other pictures he doesn't recognize, Eri smiling shakily at the camera with a pair of rabbits crawling over her lap, Eri sleeping on the 1-A dorm's couch and leaning on Todo's arm, though he stares blankly ahead. Eri sitting on Mirio's shoulders in a crowded place, both of them smiling even though Eri's eyes are on one of the candy apples that Mirio is holding.

Eri is the thinnest in that picture, so he knows it's the oldest one in this collection. He knows from the crowd, the candy apples, the fact that Mirio is there, that it must be from the Cultural Festival she told him about. The first time he saw her after the raid, she told him about how loud it was, how scary it was to be among all those people, but she doesn't look afraid.

He was sure he would never get to see that moment that he missed, that place in time that he was away from her. But most of these pictures seem to hold those fragments that he didn't think he'd get to have.

“As admirable as this effort is,” Aizawa says, looking a bit less angry, but more exhausted for it, his arms crossed loosely over his chest. “You can’t use your access to the staff dorm in a situation like this to bypass asking for permission. And you’re going to be late for your next class.”

“It’s cancelled,” Bakugo answers, oddly devoid of his usual snarling and yelling, and he digs a hand into his pocket. “Heads up, asshole.”

Bakugo usually doesn’t warn him when he’s going to throw something, and it’s more fun that way, but Hitoshi can’t catch it fully, stunned when he notices that it shatters in his hand before he realizes it’s cold. Before he realizes what it is.

“It’s snowing, and it looks like Nezu’s not breaking out the robots to make everyone get back to their shit-Oi!”

Hitoshi has to see it for himself, but even when he’s outside, he doesn’t see it. He doesn’t see Eri seeing it, and that’s the part he dreads. She’s never seen snow before, and she’s probably looked out the window to see it. She’s probably already ankle-deep in it like the students spread out across the campus, and he’s missed whatever first came to her mind when she saw it. But he has to know if she feels the same way too.

He knows he was born in the summer, and the way he feels about snow has nothing to do with some fondness from his birth. He’s not sure if there is some memory hidden inside of himself that has him almost smiling at this blanket of white, or if it’s just how muted the world is now, how it doesn’t seem so loud.

Even when he had jobs, he would stare at the whiteness that didn’t exist in The Miasma’s compound, that wouldn’t touch the inside of secret warehouses and would melt in the hallways of the 8 Precepts compound. It would feel like something untouchable, something that felt colder than he expected it to be when he picked handfuls of it up on that trip to the bookstore. The first time he could touch it.

There must be some kind of universal appreciation for it, because he’s sure the students who are playing in it, rolling it into spheres and throwing it at each other have been able to touch this snow since they were children. The world is quiet enough with the heavy and hazy drifts still falling on the ground that he can barely hear Bakugo yelling at him while he follows. He’s yelling that it’s cold and he’s going to freeze, as though he’s too stupid to notice the chill biting through his clothes and stinging on his bare skin, but he has to see it. He can’t miss Eri’s first snowfall.

He sees it.

He sees Yamada first, the black of his leather jacket and pants dusted white, and that his hair is bent upward and frosted. He sees Yamada smiling down at something on the ground, and he can see Eri’s small arms and legs moving where she’s laying down. He’s seen other students doing that.

Yamada bends further over to offer his hand, and pulls Eri off her feet where she’s clinging to it, before he sets her down closer to him. He can barely hear what Yamada says at this distance, and he can’t see what shape he’s pointing at on the ground. But he can see Eri beaming, her hands fisted in front of her chest in excitement before she jumps and lifts them above her head, and keeps jumping, her long white braid bouncing on her back. She’s saying something he can’t hear, but he doesn’t have to hear it.

He can see it. Eri's first snow, and how excited she is.

There's something cold on the back of his head, and it sticks even where it splatters on his back, flecks of it dripping down his neck. "Oi! You've gotta put on a jacket or some shit, you can't just run out without saying shit- the fuck are you smiling at?"

He's smiling. He can't stop, even if that makes Bakugo mad. Even if Bakugo doesn't sound that mad about it anyway. "It's the first time she's seen it. Snow."

Bakugo scoffs, still growling under his breath. "Yeah, well, she's gonna see a lot of it. Don't tell me you're obsessed with Christmas or some shit, if I have to keep you from staying up all night trying to brainwash Santa Claus-"

"He owes me a lot of presents," Hitoshi jokes, letting his smile turn a little sharper at the edges, even if he can't will it completely away, even when he looks at Bakugo's scowling. "Yakuza debts and all. Gotta balance my books."

Bakugo rolls his eyes. "Stupid," he mutters under his breath. "Stupidest fucking mafia scheme I've ever heard of. And if you keep standing here staring like some creeper, I'm gonna go over there and roll your little sister complex into a snowball and throw her at you."

He feels someone behind him, too close, and wonders how he didn't notice before he feels something being tugged over his head. He turns around to see Aizawa with a jacket and scarf, and oddly enough, is actually wearing a jacket himself. "It's probably going to take a while to drag both of them back inside. You might freeze like this."

He's never considered the possibility of freezing to death. Bug, Chisaki, a bad job, 127 coming to finish him off - those all seemed more likely. But when he has to look away to shrug the jacket on, to pull the scarf and gloves on too, he's almost irritated that Aizawa wouldn't let him risk it. "SHOU!"

"Twenny!" Eri calls to him, but starts running anyway. He finally feels the snow sticking to his heels, he kicked his feet into his shoes without properly putting them on, and as he tries to kick them deeper in he can't quite run to her because of it. "Twenny, I made a snow angel! It's snowing! It's snowing! Snow is so pretty!"

It is pretty. The world is blanketed in white, snowflakes catching on the wisps of Eri's hair, on her clothes, how happy she is. He has to dust the snow off of her head, finding more clumps sticking to the back of it. "I want to see."

He wants to see all of it.

Yamada is already taking a picture of the snow angel, and he keeps taking them. Hitoshi knows the camera is divided between himself and Eri, and he can't help but glare when he sees it, when he feels that camera's weight. Even if he can't stop smiling.

They have to make a snowman, which was what the other students were doing when they were rolling the snow into spheres. Even though this place, so close to the building where classes are held, was deserted when they arrived, it seems like either Bakugo's lingering or Eri's presence calls more students over. Yamada almost gets his wish for a snow angel that Hitoshi would make when Ashi nearly tackles him in a hug. "Shinny, it's snowing!"

He can't stop thinking about that name.

He watches the others make a big deal out of it, what seems like all of 1-A seems to gather here to make the largest snowman possible, something that he slowly backs away from. At first it was because Eri answers every question directed at a rolled up sphere with “Bigger!” Then Quirk Thief shows his ugly mug and starts taunting them about the ice sculptures Class B is making. They want to make a snowman bigger than the building to outdo them, somehow.

‘Shinny.’ It’s Ashi’s name for him. Ashi has always called him that. It’s his.

Not hers.

Not his mother’s. Not his mother, who has white hair like she constantly has these snowflakes caught on her scalp. Where his father’s quirk changed her. Her purple hair, the same shade as his, and he doesn’t know what his hair looks like now, if she’s seeing this same snow too-

He hears a clap over his head, and realizes that snow could be dangerous. He’s far less aware of when people are behind him for some reason, and now he’s staring at Todo who is lowering his hands back to his side slowly. He still doesn’t seem to blink enough. “It’s a spell. To sever the ties that bind you to other people, to your family. I just cut them.”

Todo might be fucking with him again, to think he actually believes in spells like that. At least this time, he’s not fucking with him with other people watching, since everyone else seems wrapped up in making this giant snowman.

“So now you can choose who is family to you, with a blank slate. And I can repeat it anytime you want,” Todo says, and Hitoshi wonders. He wonders if that really helps, because he’s sure he can do it himself. He’s sure it’s not magic.

But staring at Todo’s scar, feeling his own scars burn on his face, he wonders. “Does it work for you?” Hitoshi asks, and he didn’t entirely mean to. The words spilled out in the quiet of the snow and didn’t come out right, and he feels the quiet that follows too fully, even if it doesn’t last long.

“Yes,” Todo answers, and those unblinking eyes frost over into white without any of Hitoshi’s intentions. He didn’t feel the string, but he severs it anyway, and he glances around to see if anyone saw. To remember that he shouldn’t have asked in the first place. “You’re easy to talk to.”

Todo has a hand curled under his chin, and Hitoshi knows what that means. He’s going to say something that seems stupid on the surface, that sounds absurd, and defend the point at every opportunity, until it seems both pointless to argue or accept it.

“Like me,” Todo says, and that seems to be the end of it. Hitoshi is almost disappointed when he walks away to rejoin the others, Izuku shouting to ask if he could create more snow so that they don’t have to travel to a place that hasn’t been made barren by their efforts. The dead grass keeps stretching farther the more they pile the snow up.

They start to scatter to get more snow, three giant snowballs being merged into a base that’s taller than most of them, and judging by Aizawa and Yamada’s lack of participation, this probably won’t work. They’re probably being a bit too Plus Ultra.

But Bakugo bumps into his shoulder, his hand tugging on his elbow, signalling that he should join the search. “Let’s talk.”

The quiet way he says that is too loud, and Hitoshi follows, noticing that Bakugo is straying behind the more excited others, pulling off to the side. Hitoshi knows what he’s doing, knows that he saw it. He doesn’t know if he can trust it yet.

“IcyHot do some shit to you?” Bakugo asks, his narrow red eyes looking at him instead of ahead, that voice still too quiet. “I’ll end his shit and you know it.”

“No,” Hitoshi answers, wondering if Bakugo somehow caught Todo’s ability to pull weird assumptions out of nowhere. “He used a spell on me, but I don’t believe in magic.”

Bakugo narrows his eyes, a stutter in his steps, before he sighs. “You talked to All Might, didn’t you? Talking talking, ‘cause he ain’t that great at that sign shit.”

He knew. He already knew. But he holds his breath and tries to trust it.

Bakugo slaps his arm with the back of his hand. “No one’s gonna do any fucked up shit to you, alright? I garuan-fucking-tee it.”

“It’s different,” Hitoshi admits, because it is. Maybe nothing would change, maybe it would be easier. Maybe he would be more normal. It’s not entirely fear, but something else.

He just doesn’t want to talk anymore.

He wants to keep that excuse, for the people he can use it on, for the people who don’t expect otherwise. Maybe it’s wrong, but he doesn’t miss the mask. He just... likes that it’s different here. That there’s no expectation if he doesn’t set one.

Bakugo stares, long enough that he expects something else, or something different, before he scoffs. “You just want to use that shit to get what you want. Make everyone feel bad when you finally start talking to them.”

He’d be lying if he said that wasn’t true too, and he gets another light slap on his arm when Bakugo notices it in his smirk. Bakugo knows him a bit too well, but it’s fine. He’s a friend, and a good one.

Eri has a lot of good friends. When they come back, Hitoshi having to nearly shove Bakugo so he can roll the giant snowball too, the giant snowman is being completed. Floaty uses her quirk on the head and Neji uses her quirk to guide it to the top of the torso. The Spiny Lizard Quirk from 3-A used some spines to kind of make a nose for it, and there’s holes carved into it for the eyes and mouth.

It honestly looks a little creepy, but Hitoshi hopes they can make another one without involving the students. Maybe just him and Eri, but Yamada and Aizawa would be fine too.

Bakugo grumbles about dragging the snowball this far for nothing, until he sees Izuku and picks it up, his arms straining from the effort. Bakugo really seems to like throwing snow at other people, but that’s definitely not something that’s all his own. There are several students tossing snow at each other, and that’s not just reserved to the students. Aizawa is mostly dodging, probably trying to save face in front of his students, but Witching Hour and Yamada have their attacks divided between each other and him.

Eri is safe from all of that chaos on Mirio’s shoulders, cheering for her creepy but massive snowman once it’s completed for her. “Twenny! The snowman’s so big! It’s the biggest snowman ever! Plus Ultra!”

“Plus Ultra!” Mirio parrots exactly, even with his arms raised over his head like Eri’s. It would be almost insulting if Hitoshi wasn’t sure that Mirio taught her that in the first place. “The blizzard might really set in pretty soon, so if you want to make a snow angel-”

“Snow angel!” Eri demands, and it’s not like he can argue with her. Not like this, not with this. If Eri wants him to make a snow angel, he's going to make one for her.

And Yamada being distracted when Aizawa dodges his armful of snow, but tosses a handful of it into his face when he crouches, just makes it easier. He knows Yamada would want to take more pictures of him making it. "Sure."

There's a line of snow angels on the ground, some already trampled, some already half-buried in the drifts. There's a place that Eri saved next to hers for him, and there's a place close to that which Ashido claims when she sees him. It feels embarrassing for some reason to fall back at first, to look up at Mirio and Eri staring, but when he hears Ashido moving and kicking her arms and legs next to him, explaining how to do it, makes it easier. He moves his arms up and down, his legs side to side, but when he closes his eyes, he almost misses it.

There's a silence in the snowfall, and it's comforting. When he first fell back, he wanted to lay there, to just feel himself being swallowed and being buried in it. Every part of his body cradled in the soft cold snow, every part of him felt accepted by it. It felt like he wouldn't mind being buried in the snow, if it was this quiet and comfortable. If he could just stay still.

But Ashido almost somersaults over him to beat Mirio offering his hand, and he takes both so neither of them feel bad. It's just an angel on the ground, and it doesn't feel like it's particularly his. "Now Twenny's an angel too!"

'Twenny' is covered in snow, and it feels especially sharp on his ears. But he thinks of Yamada's promise, what he said would happen if a blizzard came, and can't help but smile. "We can make more of them tomorrow, but it's getting too cold."

Eri's rosy cheeks bitten by the cold makes that pout more potent, but Hitoshi knows if he's cold, Eri has to be too. Before he follows Mirio taking a reluctant Eri back to the dorm, he ducks down and ignores that Ashi was trying to grab him in a hug. It's quick, just a few strokes with his finger, and it makes this angel his. 'Hitoshi.'

Maybe Ashi sees, maybe she thinks it's odd. Maybe she worries, but he ignores that to brush off the snow stuck between her two horns. He's sure it's uncomfortably cold to her. She doesn't say anything, but there's a stillness that makes him think that he misstepped, before she snorts a bit and smiles.

She doesn't say it, but he remembers. He used to scratch around her horns when they were kids, and she used to scratch his head in return. He doesn't remember it, but there's a picture of them doing that, a picture that doesn't feel so distant from him. The young boy in that picture almost looks like him.

It might look more like him if he looks at it again.

Ashi ducks under his arm, winding one of hers around his back. Maybe it's supposed to keep him warm, but her closeness might incriminate her a bit. The name wasn't the only thing he took from the snow on the ground.

It's hard to pick his target, and it shouldn't be. He considers Yamada, but he's practically covered in snow by Witching Hour or Aizawa's hands. He considers Aizawa too, but he might dodge it.

He has to balance his books anyway. "OI!"

Bakugo isn't as good at catching the things Hitoshi throws sometimes.

Bakugo doesn't laugh, but Yamada does. Yamada looks like he wants to take his usual place by Hitoshi's side with an arm over his shoulder, but with all the snow still clinging to him, it wouldn't make him feel warm. But maybe it would.

He feels blisteringly warm when they get back to the dorm, when everything he imagined happens. He's seen Eri playing in the snow for the first time, he's built a snowman for the first time. He made a snow angel, and threw a snowball, but Yamada told him about other things that happen when it snows.

The hot chocolate tastes warmer, and the kotatsu feels warmer still. He didn't think he could feel this warm, when it has nothing to do with either of those things, and it hardly has to do with the snow and chill melting off his skin.

It's the people around him, Aizawa, Yamada, and Eri that make him feel warm. It has nothing to do with the cold outside, or the snow, but that cold only makes him realize how warm it is.

Eri likes it, even if she's probably exhausted herself. She leans heavily into his side, her eyelids look heavier, and even if she stares at her hot chocolate, it seems to be too far away for her to take another sip. Her horn has grown again, and he doesn't doubt it's due to the hero students' efforts. "Twenny, I love you."

Maybe he's wrong about love, that it doesn't have to be possessive. It doesn't have to be overwhelming, and it doesn't have to fill a void.

It can just be as warm as this.

*

"Snow. Can you say 'snow?' That's snow," Hiroto says, smiling down at his son who seems more interested in eating the stuff than trying to talk. Hitoshi is as bundled up as he can be, a baby Michelin Man with his mittens full of snow, mostly sucking on it. He hopes Ui gets back with the camera so he can record Hitoshi's first brain freeze. "Babe! You're gonna miss it!"

Ui pulls a face at him, trudging back with the vintage video camera that's just a bit more nostalgic for him than a cell phone. "Don't let him eat it off the ground, you don't know where it's been!"

Hiroto raises an eyebrow at his son, who just leans back and nearly topples over before he catches him. "Hey, Mom says you don't know where it's been. Do you know where that snow's been, Hitoshi? It came from the sky, and it's not even that yellow-"

He gets a swat, but he pulls Ui closer when she crouches down next to him, when they're both watching to see what happens next. Ui is a great mom, if a little overprotective thanks to that library she insisted she needed, books filled with all those rules that are utter nonsense. This is technically Hitoshi's third snow season, but Ui was sure that Hitoshi would freeze to death if he was out in the cold for longer than an hour or if a single snowflake got on him. "Hitoshi, can you say 'snow?'" Nope, but he can sure eat it. "Can you say... 'Cat?'"

"Cat," Hitoshi says, the one thing that can get his attention. He looks around with those handsome violet eyes, trying to find those elusive cats that he probably wants to fill his world. Those damn books say they should wait until Hitoshi is older to get a pet, when he understands how to treat a small animal, but he's sure Hitoshi wouldn't poke it in the eye. Too much. "At?"

Ui is recording to catch that high pitched squeal, something so excited Hiroto thinks one of the strays must have shown its face. But Hitoshi just grins up at him and finds something to giggle at, his giggly little boy. And another fistful of snow to eat. "Cat. Cuh-cuh-cat."

Ui's a little worried, but Hiroto knows it's nothing. He's closing in on two and a half, and still hasn't figured out sentences, but that's fine, everyone's different. Ui seems to think if they make him use his words, if they start ignoring grabby hands that communicate the need for being picked up or a finger pointing to his open mouth to ask for food, that he'd talk more. He's just a quiet kid, and he's plenty smart. He can already use Hiroto's phone to look at 'Hitoshi Pictures.' Or cat pictures.

It might be due to his quirk. It hasn't come in yet, but it's not unheard of for it to come in early sometimes. Hiroto was one of those 'precocious' types, and he's still got a few baby videos of himself sucking his worms out of his fingertips. "Oh, there it goes."

Hitoshi's face screws up, that mouthful of snow a bit too big for a little mouth, and what Hiroto thought would be funny really isn't when he starts to see tears. "Oh, sweetheart, it's okay."

Ui gives him the camera to pull poor Hitoshi into her arms, and there's no sniffles but plenty of grumpy whines. The lemons were worse. "Aw, buddy, it's okay. Maybe we ate too much, but it'll get better. It'll pass."

Despite the camera in his hands and the warm comfort from Mom, Hitoshi topples forward and faceplants into Hiroto's lap. Ui raises her eyebrows, and yes, he knows he's Hitoshi's favorite right now. But he had to put up with plenty of nights where only Mom's singing and rocking could put his precocious attempts at insomnia at an end. Hitoshi's doctor probably thinks they live next to a metal concert with all those bags under his eyes.

"Ya done with the snow?" Hiroto asks, smoothing a hand over Hitoshi's back, and he's not surprised by the pitiful nod. Snow has been ruled out, it's hurt him and these tiny little things are big hurts to a little guy. But Hitoshi is a trooper, because he doesn't even cry.

Hiroto carries him inside, and Ui looks a little disappointed that they only got a few minutes on camera when she had to go inside to get it. Hiroto isn't disappointed at all, he's grateful to have it. To have a chance to hold this little guy in his arms one more time.

He almost didn't.

He didn't tell Ui the real story, because it'd be the 'discussion' of all discussions. The dealership is having a rough spell, and even if getting into management gives him a base salary, he still has to oversee quotas and meet them to get a bonus that's livable. Pack Alpha is usually agreeable to 'part time, seasonal' work.

They weren't this time, and he made his intentions clear at the start. He doesn't want to get tangled up in anything more than a job, more than a gig. He doesn't want to get tangled up in 'loyalty' or 'You don't have anywhere else to go, you're nothing without us.' He just wanted to walk away and pretend he wouldn't know what would happen after he made sure that poor guy would say goodbye to his family and wind up at Pack Alpha's pick up location.

But Pack Alpha wanted him to go to their base too, and didn't even give him the chance to say goodbye. Didn't want to give him much of a choice either, not with the guns aimed at his head.

He was lucky, lucky that they didn't pull the trigger. Lucky that the heroes didn't ask too many questions. It felt sick to lie and say he didn't know how he got there either, just like his target was saying. His control broke when the world seemed to stop spinning, a whiz of hoverboards that suddenly set the world in motion too fast, some kid holding onto him with too scrawny arms. Hiroto honestly didn't know if he should hold onto the guy just to keep him from falling off, like this blonde kid wasn't operating the damn thing. "Hold tight, listener. That's a pretty tough crowd down there.”

Hiroto knew, he was still kind of a part of that crowd, even if he hated it. Even if it was always the same, even when he was ‘legally’ quirkless. Honest money doesn’t come as easily, even if he should be more grateful that he has a chance for it. Most reputable employers don’t want to employ someone with petty thefts on their juvenile record and a quirk that has done so much worse.

He probably shouldn’t have been up in the air, watching the fireworks below, and he couldn’t help but think that the kid holding him up shouldn’t be here either. The kid seemed oddly eager to get involved, he kept calling out names to make them aware of a new quirk coming out of the shadows to attack, but every huff seemed disappointed that he couldn’t jump in.

The ground came down eventually, and the questions. The police car left without all the criminals that night, but despite how shaken Hiroto was, he had to ask. “What’s your name?”

“Present Mic, the Voice Hero!” came an enthusiastic answer, a tug on a leather jacket that seemed to try too hard to be cool. “Just as soon as I graduate....”

Hiroto knew that heroes had to start somewhere, but he’s never seen a hero start that young. He looks as old as the part-time car washer who doesn’t show up half the time, and this high schooler just saved his life. “I’ll keep my eye out for you, pal. You’re gonna do great as a hero.”

He hopes Hitoshi never does that. He knows most kids consider being a hero at some point, and he wasn’t lucky enough to. The thought of taking control of some villain and making them dance into handcuffs was cut off pretty quick the first time that his mom couldn’t afford groceries, and needed him to grab the cashier’s face to put his quirk inside her. Every time that woman was on shift, it was grocery day.

He knows Hitoshi will probably have Ui’s quirk or something close to it, something that isn’t useful for heroics or anything else. Especially anything else, he doesn’t want Hitoshi to have to go through that.

But he’ll be there, if he does, to have that talk. The Talk, about how people make judgements and sometimes it can be easier to go with the flow, to find the only option that seems to be open to him. To tell him that his dear old dad took that easy way, and he’s regretted it ever since.

And to remind Mom that sometimes the grabby hands can slide when we’ve got a nasty brain freeze. “Hitoshi, use your words. Say, ‘Can I have milk?’”

Hiroto pouts alongside the miserable tot in his arms, and Ui shoots him a Look. “Mommy, my head hurts and snow is awful and I just want some warm milk-”

“Please,” Hitoshi begs, and he’s got the hands folded up and those big eyes begging. We’ve got proper enunciation and everything, more evidence that Ui’s just worrying over nothing. Hitoshi has these spells, he’s just a little man of very few words. And when he does want to talk, he proves that all the fuss is for nothing. He just knows he can get whatever he wants without trying too hard. “Yay!”

“Can we say ‘Thank you?’” Ui asks, even if Hitoshi is plenty busy with that cup of warm milk. Hiroto’s pretty sure this is how it is when he’s at work, Ui just telling Hitoshi what to say so he can meet those dumb benchmarks in her books. Hitoshi’s really fine, he’s a smart kid. He doesn’t have to worry about school for a couple years anyway.

“Wersi,” Hitoshi says, and grins like he knows his mom’s heart melts a bit. Ui can say all she wants that making him pick up some foreign languages now will make him into a little baby Einstein, but Hiroto knows what she's doing. She's probably hoping he picks up her quirk, so Hiroto can be left out of all their future secret conversations.

“Merci,” Ui says, and it's always pretty when she says it. She always gets a little blushy, a little glow to her. He fell in love with such a beautiful woman, and he has no idea how he fooled her into picking him.

There are a lot of ways Hiroto's unlucky, a lot of ways he made his own luck the wrong way, but he can't deny he's the luckiest guy on earth to have a family like this to come home to. A beautiful wife, and an amazing son.

As long as Shigaraki never finds him again, he'll get to keep this amazing piece of happiness.

Chapter End Notes

Just to be clear on 'Sato Hiroto's name, 'Sato' is a very common family name in Japan, and he's not related at all to Sato Rikido the 1-A student.

And for those who aren't fully caught up on the manga, 'Shigaraki' is All for One's family name, not just Shigaraki Tomura's name.

Out of Nowhere, We Appear!

Chapter Summary

Surprising visitors come to UA, with a new challenge for students and wards alike! Hitoshi grapples with Ashido's insistence to give him a fake birthday party before Eri's impending birthday, as well as the new worry that even if he's allowed to stay at UA after the investigation into The Miasma wraps up, that he may still find himself unprepared to leave when he becomes an adult. Monoma continues to struggle to win Shinsou's trust, and Bakugo faces yet another rescue training exercise.

The superstition of bad luck befalling Friday the 13th may cast a worse shadow than the curse of the Mondays.

Chapter Notes

Trigger warnings: None

Previously on Wards of UA: Eri's horn has been growing, and Eri wants to make sure that her horn grows from 'happiness,' as it tends to grow with overwhelming emotions. Todoroki showed Shinsou a 'spell' to clap his hands over his head to sever his family connections, so he can pick the ones that he wants. Ashido and Shinsou were 'married' when they were four years old, and never divorced. Shinsou headbutted Monoma after he tried to copy his quirk in Yamada's English class, and signed that Monoma was bullying him to try to get 1-B to turn against Monoma. Eri likes to hug people that are her size, from small children to (unsuccessfully) Nezu or Mimic's puppet. Ashido has been trying to make up for lost time for Shinsou, and threw him a '5 year old's sleepover' successfully with only the people Shinsou could talk to invited.

1-A Groupchat Usernames:

Birthday Boi - Shinsou Hitoshi
Keto Boi - Sato Rikido
Electroshock Pop - Kaminari Denki
Classy Prez - Iida Tenya
BakuBall - Bakugo Katsuki
No Snow Might - Midoriya Izuku
Shnsu's waifu - Ashido Mina

See the end of the chapter for more notes

“Toshi.”

Hitoshi pulls himself to roll over, rubbing at his eyes. He feels like he barely got to sleep, everything feels heavier for it, but he holds in the breath that wants to sigh when he sees Eri standing beside his bed with one of her unicorn plushies in her arms. ““Orn? Accident?”

Eri shakes her head, and starts pulling herself onto his bed to lay down next to him. She wanted to sleep by herself tonight, but he's not going to argue if she's changed her mind. It's always harder to fall asleep without her there.

But as soon as he gets comfortable, he pulls her close with an arm around her and his head angled away from her horn, she sighs.

"M' not sleepy."

He's sleepy. And it's hard to remind himself that he can't be anymore. "Want me to read a book? Or sing?" Eri shakes her head, and he gets both of her feet tapping at his knees.

A test kick.

He pulls his head off the pillow and props it up with his hand. "Bad dream?"

Eri nods, but he can already tell she doesn't want to talk about it. He can see the worry in her frown, in how she holds her unicorn tighter when he moves his hand to her horn to measure it for her. He wishes she wouldn't worry so much, Aizawa told her himself that she needs to learn to control it before she can use her quirk on Mirio. This time the horn doesn't have to be full of happiness.

Hitoshi shakes his head. "It didn't grow. It's okay, Eri. It's just a bad dream." Eri tucks her chin into the unicorn regardless, and he can feel her toes picking at him, feels that she's still uneasy. "Want me to get Aizawa?"

Eri shakes her head, and he wishes she wasn't like this right now. When she's quiet like this, he hates it. It wasn't like this at the 8 Precepts, she would always talk to him. She would at least hold him until she worked up the energy to cry.

But it's a good thing this isn't like the 8 Precepts. "Let's make some milk. Maybe it's close to breakfast. We can surprise Yamada."

Hitoshi checks the time on his phone, and it's not that close to breakfast. They still have an hour before they were supposed to wake up, but that probably wouldn't matter to him too much anyway. He feels like he's making good progress on the workbooks and lectures that the Rat Boss gave him, but he wishes that Yamada would tell him what 'grade' he's at in those subjects. He has to keep asking Bakugo.

Hitoshi pours the milk in the mug, before he microwaves it. There's a weird film at the top when it's done, but he scoops it out and hopes Eri doesn't see it. He knows he's never cooked anything that she likes, except for apple bunnies, which is just slicing up an apple a certain way. He's trying to get better at it.

Eri pouts right before he remembers, unfortunately after she takes a sip. "Honey." Hitoshi puts in the honey and mutters 'Sorry,' and after making sure it's right when Eri takes two sips, he starts making coffee. He really needs it. "What if my horn's an egg?"

He really needs it. "Something would hatch out of it if it was an egg. Did you have a dream about that?" Hitoshi asks, scratching the back of his head, and Eri nods, and he gets another test kick. It was probably a bad dream.

"But it was a bad egg. It just kept growing and growing until it was really big, and it was gonna be really stinky if it broke, so I had to make sure not to bump it, but then I broke it and everyone got mad." Eri hugs her unicorn tighter, leaning her head on top of its head, and he's pretty sure she's more tired than she thinks. She'll probably be a bit grumpy until Aizawa's free period when she can take a nap. "I don't want my horn to break, Twenny, and it feels breaky now. I messed it up."

Hitoshi leans over the counter and wraps his hand around her horn, feeling how the ridges are barely starting to flare. Her horn aches should start coming soon, it's odd that she hasn't complained about them yet. "It doesn't feel break-y to me. I know that was a scary dream, but it's not real. You can't mess up your horn, no matter what."

He finds himself tapping her forehead near the base of her horn, even if he knows she doesn't like it. It's probably something embarrassing to her now, now that Mirio and Yamada have started talking about how she's going to turn 6 years old this month. She's too old for all the things she used to love when she was a baby.

"And drinking milk makes your horn stronger, with all the calcium in it," Hitoshi says, and he smiles when she starts drinking it. Aizawa does little things like that too, little 'spells' like the one Todo showed him. If she can't convince herself not to worry, then making her think she can make whatever scares her go away with her own power seems to work. That seems to be the real magic. "Want me to make pancakes or rice cakes?"

"Cereal," Eri decides, and he tries to convince himself it's just because it has milk in it. He forgot to put butter in the pan the last time he made muffins, and he doesn't even want to remember that. Yamada said it was fine, that 'everyone has to learn these things.' He had to pretend to study in his room so he wouldn't cry in front of Yamada.

"Pancakes?" 27 makes himself ask, but if Eri says no, he'll give up on it. "We have cereal on the weekends, and I... kind of want to do something nice for Yamada."

Eri hums, and moves her unicorn a bit closer to the counter before she lays her head back on it. She might go to sleep if he takes her to bed soon, but she'll probably still be a bit grumpy. "Yama likes those fancy rice cakes. N' he wants you to call him 'Dad' to make him happy."

Eri's definitely getting sleepy. "I think I remember how to make those."

He's supposed to use a blender on the leftover rice, but that would be too noisy. Instead, he fills a pot with water, because maybe he can just make it really soft so it still mixes in with the flour to turn out like that batter. He turns his attention to washing and slicing the green onions and carrots, and deciding how many mini sausages to use. And thinking about how he's not going to call Yamada 'Dad.'

Hitoshi is a person, like Eri. Hitoshi uses his given name, like Eri, instead of his family name. Hitoshi gets to reject the family he was born with, he gets to ignore that they exist. Todo said something about picking his own family, and he's already done that. Eri is his family, and Yamada is....

Yamada. Not 'Dad.' That's just obvious.

Yamada isn't his father. Hitoshi was born with a father, but that father died. Hitoshi is 16 now, and that means he's almost an adult. Mirio is an adult now that he's 18, and that means Hitoshi has less than two years to learn everything he needs to so he can be just as capable as everyone else. As he should be.

Adults don't need parents, after all. Hitoshi has never really had that in the first place, but Mirio never talks about his parents, neither does Aizawa. Yamada talks about his mothers, but that might just be an oddity with him. Yamada doesn't live with his mothers, so-

So 27 just needs to make sure this coffee is made right this time, and that he doesn't mess up these rice cakes. And stop worrying about what could happen in less than two years, when it hasn't even been six weeks since he arrived to UA. If he wants to worry, he should worry about what he should do for Eri's birthday now that it's only 8 days away.

Hitoshi could go to his room and get the laptop, because he doesn't know how long the rice cakes should bake for, or how hot the oven should be. But that would mean leaving Eri alone, and while she seems to be trying to stay awake so she can finish her milk, she might fall asleep at the counter, and she might fall out of her chair when she does. But it's a good thing he brought his phone.

Birthday Boi: How long should leftover rice cakes bake for, and how hot should the oven be?

Birthday Boi: ...and it's not my birthday.

Keto Boi: Ashido still wants you to pick a cake flavor. And I've only ever fried them? That makes them more crispy like pancakes.

Birthday Boi: Is it like frying eggs?

Keto Boi: Uhhh like pancakes. I'll send you a video.

Keto Boi: <https://www.herotube.com/watch?v=CmAbSJQi53s>

Birthday Boi:There's a lot of water in mine right now. And I haven't added eggs.

Keto Boi: Try to drain it? Should still be okay.

Keto Boi: Send a pic?

Birthday Boi: Tap to download 22KB

Keto Boi: Do you have more rice?

Birthday Boi: It's fine. Eri wants cereal.

Electroshop Pop: NONonoNoo shinsy gimme some ur a good cook pls!!!

Classy Prez: It looks like you have the beginnings of a hearty rice porridge, Shinsou! I'm not sure that frying or baking it at this point is necessary, and I'm sure Eri will still enjoy it! It is a bit early for her to be awake at this hour, however.

Birthday Boi: I have flour in it. It's not porridge, it just looks like that. Supposed to be batter.

BakuBall: Season the shit out of it, all that flour and rice is fucking tasteless.

Keto Boi: Bakugo's right, probably 1.5 the seasonings that you were going to add for the batter to even it out.

No Snow Might: OH! Were you trying to make those breakfast bars? I don't have the recipe, but rice porridge is good too! Is Eri okay?

Birthday Boi: Yamada called it rice cakes. Eri's asleep now, just had a weird dream.

Birthday Boi: Tap to download 22KB

Electroshop Pop: TT_TT shisnu ur the best persun eber dis cute

Keto Boi: Aw! Tell us how it works out with the porridge!

Electroshop Pop: noooo gimmeee some! Ill bring my bowl 4 porrig

Keto Boi: Kaminari... I'm making breakfast rn

Electroshop Pop: wan shinsooooos

BakuBall: YOU'RE NOT GONNA FUCKING GET SHITSOU'S WHAT THE FUCK ARE YOU PLANNING TO DO? GO TO SHITSEI'S PLACE AND BEG FOR PORRIDGE LIKE SOME FUCKING VICTORIAN WAIF OR SOME SHIT?

Electroshop Pop: YES

Birthday Boi: It's not going to be good. Ashi can have some, since we're married.

BakuBall: STOP SAYING THAT SHIT YOU'RE NOT FUCKING MARRIED AND YOU KNOW THAT SHIT YOU'RE JUST FUCKING WITH US

He is, but it's fair, since they fuck with him a lot. They deserve it.

The porridge isn't that great, there's still a lot of clumps of flour that he finds every time that he stirs. He tastes it and he knows it isn't good, it isn't as good as Mirio's because the texture is off, and the seasonings still don't help.

And he knows that Yamada will still lie to him. "Coffee and breakfast already made? Jeez, what a lucky guy I am!"

Hitoshi knows he's not a lucky guy. Hitoshi knows what this porridge tastes like, how it turned into paste, and he knows there's no way that Yamada actually enjoys eating it. Even Eri only takes a few bites before she drags herself to her room to get ready for school.

Now that there's no time left to get any amount of sleep, Hitoshi washes down another clump of flour with his coffee, and debates whether he should rest his head on the table for a few minutes. He's already eaten breakfast, so he just needs to get dressed now. Maybe comb his hair, but he wonders if anyone would notice a difference. "Now that is some great home-cooking. Rice porridge just like my mother used to make--"

'Horrible,' Hitoshi signs, and looks up to see how well Yamada is trying to lie to him. He really doesn't have to, he can just tell him it's too thick and too bland and just because 27 is just that fucking terrible at it, it's too flavorful too. Bland and too flavorful. 'Bad. Don't eat it.'

Yamada takes another spoonful just to spite him, and somehow, he actually finished his bowl. 27 knows from eating it himself, that's a painful thing to accomplish. "It's really not, Hitoshi. It's nice and thick, and tastes like--"

'H-O-R-R-I-B-L-E,' Hitoshi signs, and glares like he's actually convinced that Yamada woke up today with no tastebuds and an inability to understand sign language. He doesn't have to lie, he can just tell him that it's horrible and anyone else could do this better than he can. That he's really just a hopeless cause at this point, because he doesn't know anything that anyone else does, and the things that he does know are worthless here. Aizawa hasn't asked him about The Miasma in weeks.

But Yamada just smiles at him, and pushes his chair closer to his with a loud screech, pressing his arm tight against Hitoshi's. "It's great, Hitoshi. There's a million and one recipes for rice porridge, and maybe most of them don't use flour, but it makes it really thick! Next time, we can work it out so it tastes amazing, alright?"

Hitoshi decides he's neither going to lay his head on the table or get ready, when Yamada's shoulder is right there. He's not dressed like Present Mic to go to school yet, so there's no spikes to stab his face. He's too tired to decide whether that's what he'd rather have happen. 'Wanted to bake. Couldn't remember. Hero students said porridge.'

"See? We can blame those herolets for cramping your culinary style. This could've been a fantastic breakfast rice cake mix," Yamada says, and he can still lie to him. It would be nicer if Yamada could lie to him and have a softer shoulder to rest his face on, and it would be nicer if Hitoshi could just fall asleep here. "We can get back at them when we grade the pop quiz that's coming for them today, or when Shou ruins their afterschool plans with that secret training sesh."

The 'secret training sesh' that he doesn't have to be a part of anymore, but Aizawa still seems worried about for some reason. Aizawa is just making a bigger deal of it than it has to be, he's not going to break down into tears or forget how to breathe over the sight of a few heroes. He can even handle messing up breakfast without crying today, even though he feels like he wants to go back to sleep and hide in his room until he can forget it happened. But blaming the hero students makes him feel a bit better. 'Want to use red pen.'

"But it makes them feel bad, they've gone nine years fearing that red pen of death, and blue is a more comforting color," Yamada tries to argue, and Hitoshi knows it's pointless. At least he can draw a face on Bakugo's test, so he nods. "Besides, you can't be too mad at the guys trying to throw you a birthday party this weekend."

Hitoshi rolls his eyes, because he's been avoiding it this long, nearly a month, but Yamada finally found out about it. Ashi is too insistent that it has to happen, for whatever reason, and that it has to happen on a weekend, probably because it's harder for him to escape. And while he's been able to avoid it by going to the radio station Saturday nights and hiding in the Safe Room Friday and Sunday nights with the excuse that Aizawa grounded him over something, Ashi complained to Yamada that he must be horribly mistreated by Aizawa to get grounded so much and now this happened. Now Yamada wants him to at least try to endure it, and he can leave if he doesn't like it.

Or he can tell Ashi to stop trying to throw him a birthday party to make up for all the ones he missed or doesn't remember, but Yamada clearly doesn't know Ashi at all if he thinks that would work.

He's going to have to write another essay at this point to convince Aizawa to defend him, to tell Ashi that he's done something so horrible that he's forbidden from having birthdays until his actual birthday in July. Or at least until the 21st, after Eri has her rightful birthday party. A birthday that requires a gift and he still doesn't know what to get for her.

But at least that birthday is 8 days away, and the weekend threat of his fake birthday can be avoided until after school. Maybe if the training session is grueling enough, he can avoid it for another day.

He forces himself to look at his phone when he feels two vibrations in quick succession, which usually means that one of the hero students mentioned him by name. And seeing the message that mentioned him feels especially foreboding when he's realized that he hasn't even started on that essay.

Shnsu's waifu: @Shinsou HAPPY BIRTHDAY SHINNNYYYYYYY!!!

*

Monoma wouldn't have known about it if Kendo didn't try to put an end to what he knows is the only method he has to end this unbearable situation he's been placed in. "What the hell is this?"

Kendo tries to hand him the advent calendar that she had 'confiscated' (used Honenuki for his Softening quirk on the lock of his dorm room in the dead of night, probably), but he's far more interested in this little piece of paper that was left out in the open on her desk, practically begging to be read.

After he might have copied Honenuki's quirk to get access to her locked dorm room.

"It's supposed to be a secret training exercise. Class A is only going first--"

"Of course they're going first, but what is this about getting volunteers?" Monoma asks, still trying to figure out why the numbers for volunteers are different for each class, why there's ten volunteers registered for Class 1-A already but only nine for Class B. The names listed aren't lined up symmetrically for each list.

"It's a rescue exercise, but they couldn't get the victim actors like they could at the--"

"The Provisional Licensing Exam that Class B already passed with flying colors, meaning this is all solely for Class A's benefit and only for that empty headed heir falling off his father's coattails and that wretched barbarian and why is Shinsou's name not on our list?" Monoma asks, asking the real questions, and thrusts the paper towards Kendo in hopes that he's simply overlooked that name in the grogginess of the early hour, and she can point it out with some fond ribbing.

But she doesn't. She sighs, and he gets the hand on hip pose as though she's already explained something she hasn't explained in the slightest. "You, Monoma. You're the reason that Shinsou wasn't going to volunteer to help us. Present Mic has already moved your seat and mine, and he's probably going to kick you out if you don't--"

"I don't stop sharing the wonders of the winter season with two wards in UA's care who have never experienced it?" Monoma asks, and wonders if she can smell the bullshit on his breath. While wintry decor suits his complexion far better, he enjoys the spring for its cherry blossom blooms far better than stifling family traditions even when weighed against the promise of gifts. And there were several gifts in that advent calendar that better not have gone missing. "I don't even talk to Shinsou, or look at him--"

"Monoma." Well, of course he looks at him, he needs to make sure that Shinsou isn't visibly dying, which is not a dramatic concern given how much school he's missed. Sure, he's been attending for nearly two weeks without issue, but that only seems to make it more likely that there's an invisible strain on his health waiting to come to the surface. "Vlad told us to ignore Shinsou. Shinsou wants to just be ignored. So just ignore him, because you're making him uncomfortable."

Kendo doesn't say it, this time. That horrible word that he's sure is the machination of some absolutely fiendish member of 1-A, one so intolerable that he can scarcely imagine even that foul mouthed cur Bakugo would be behind it. 'Bullying.'

Shinsou has been told to think that Monoma was bullying him, when he was just trying to make sure that his quirk wasn't bothering him anymore. There was an odd rumor that Shinsou's quirk was the reason he was sick a few weeks ago, which was clearly just the adjustment to his quirk suppressants that had made his quirk impossible for him to even copy because they were so strong. Shinsou reacted a bit poorly to his attempts to check that situation, he seemed to think that such a pure-hearted and well-intended gesture was an affront to his person, and called it bullying.

And no one seems to know what it really was, what it really is. Monoma is simply reaching out to a person who's clearly in need, he's behaving like an upstanding hero to someone who clearly needs one.

He will admit that Kendo and Vlad's long, long discussion with him and the points to that discussion had merit. There are people who are more sensitive to a friendly touch, and Shinsou might very well be one of them. Shinsou seems to be fine now, regardless of the state of his mysterious quirk, and Monoma is....

Fine with never knowing what that quirk is. Really, he's truly fine with that. Even if he never knows what that intangible piece of Shinsou looks like, how it relates to his personality, how it feels to be a little bit like him in the span of 10 minutes, he's fine with that.

He'd just like to know that Shinsou is actually, truly fine, and he can wash his hands of it. But that's the problem, because no one reputable will tell him that Shinsou is fine or that his quirk is fine, and as Present Mic still hasn't coughed up the name of the quirk specialist that Shinsou is seeing or the one that should be stripped of their license for medicating him to the point that he felt quirkless, so he's been forced into this course of action.

Making Shinsou and Eri both an advent calendar, and giving them a gift in accordance for the day. He honestly can't say which was more difficult, buying 31 small gifts that he was reasonably sure would be to the two wards' liking or having to set foot in Class 1-A's dorm to deliver those gifts on the weekend. At least his attempts to court Eri's favor seem to be working, as whenever he gets the chance to give them to her at the dorm, he earns a bright smile and a few reasons why she likes his efforts. He had thought that Shinsou would have warmed up to him through that clear demonstration that he is not the 'dark face of UA,' as Eri has finally been convinced, but that isn't the case.

Shinsou must be rejecting him even further if he's unwilling to aid Class B in a training exercise if he'll do so for Class A, just as Kendo surmised. But Kendo doesn't seem to understand the wasted potential there, something that he can't fully fathom the magnitude of himself.

"But if I save him in the rescue exercise, then--"

"Monoma." Kendo looks horrified, but Monoma can't shake the image now that it's still forming in his head. Shinsou, finally seeing who Monoma is, what a true hero looks like. He isn't privy to the details of Shinsou's initial rescue, the real rescue operation where he wasn't a pre-prepared volunteer. But the fact that Shinsou was placed in the custody of the police directly afterwards certainly seems to indicate that the heroes who responded were grossly incompetent, and the rumors that have since been proven fact that four members of Class A were involved only proves that.

"It's unfair that Class A has 10 volunteers and we don't," Monoma says, crossing his arms and wishing that he had the foresight to copy Tokage's Lizard Tail Splitter quirk. From this angle, it would be an easy thing to have his hand pop off for a bit, grab that pen on the desk, and correct the issue of Shinsou not being registered for Class B's exercise. Shinsou, while safe in the knowledge that the exercise was a mock one and not as dangerous as the one he experienced in real life, would clearly see the difference between Class B's professional attitude and whatever he silently suffered at the hands of Class A. Shinsou, looking up to see Phantom Thief smiling down at him, extending a hand and the reassuring demeanor that puts to rest the terror of field triage. Shinsou, realizing what a kind and intelligent and becoming hero Monoma is-

“They already got volunteers from Gen Ed, that was an old list,” Kendo says, and while that’s so beyond the point that it’s nearly off-topic, it’s just another horrible mistreatment of Class B that Kendo, their beloved class president, had to assist their beleaguered teacher Vlad to help cope with this injustice. “So now that you know about the secret training exercise that you shouldn’t, just act surprised when it happens, and don’t tell anyone else. And don’t.”

“Bring it up to Shinsou, of course not,” Monoma says, scratching that option off of a list that’s limited now, but he’s sure he has a few hours to brainstorm. “I haven’t said a word to him in weeks, and you know that.”

Kendo also knows that rule doesn’t include sign language, but since she probably wants to get ready for the school day ahead of them and thus get him out of her room, she doesn’t mention it. It doesn’t seem to help either.

There’s truly nothing as infuriating as trying to help someone who desperately needs it, especially when that person is already selectively mute and seems inclined to simulate the experience of being blind whenever Monoma tries to sign to him and he lays his head on his desk instead so he doesn’t see it.

*

Hitoshi made a promise to 50, before he ever touched a knife, before he ever picked his weapon of choice. 50 told him to never go that far, to never kill someone. That’s a step no one can come back from, to have blood on their hands and a life snuffed out of this world completely. It’s a heavy weight, and he’s never been forced to make that call, to strike with the intent to kill.

But sometimes he wonders how much Quirk Thief’s life really weighs. “Sailor Moon is dressed like a cat! I love Sailor Moon, and she’s so cute like a cat Mono!”

Hitoshi stares at his desk so he doesn’t see it, seeing Quirk Thief’s preening or Eri’s ever-increasing excitement to his daily offerings. It’s always interesting to see what tactic he comes up with to deliver these small tokens, and it’s always getting more difficult for him. Since Quirk Thief’s desk was moved to the front of the classroom with Kendo sitting directly behind him, he’s resorted to stealing the quirks of his classmates to dodge Kendo’s attempts to swat those gifts out of his hands. Today he used one of his favorite tactics, popping his hands off at the wrist and making them fly over to them like that Lizard themed hero student.

The sight of it makes Hitoshi feel queasy, and somehow it’s worse than the Lizard quirk student herself using it. Those hands should be bleeding where they’ve been cut off, instead of levitating in the air and petting the top of Eri’s head. Hitoshi is sure that Quirk Thief could steal her quirk like that. That Quirk Thief could steal his quirk like that.

Hitoshi glares out of the corner of his eye, watching those disgusting hands sign ‘Thank you’ without a body behind it to accurately place the gestures. Watching Quirk Thief earn another piece of Eri’s affection by giving her a gift she appreciates, some small thing that she enjoys. Quirk Thief has it easier because he got the idea to give 31 small gifts instead of a grand one on her birthday, and Hitoshi never fucking thought to do that.

Those hands slide in front of him, even though the offering is already placed on his desk. It’s a purple pillowcase with a cartoon cat on it, because Quirk Thief is truly the worst person that Hitoshi has ever met. It’s purple, and it has a cat sticking its tiny pink tongue out while its eyes are closed and it’s body is curled around the place that someone’s head would rest.

Quirk Thief is horrible, because he always finds tokens that Hitoshi can't find fault with. 'You like?' Hitoshi is only looking at the hands to make sure that they won't touch him to try to steal his quirk. He's only looking at Quirk Thief to confirm his suspicions that the bastard is too damn pleased with his efforts. 'Blushing.'

Hitoshi is not blushing. The cat is not that cute, he's not going to use this pillowcase, and Quirk Thief is a bastard. 'Go away.'

What Hitoshi wants to sign is 'go die in a fire,' but Yamada didn't really like that one. At least Quirk Thief goes away, he pulls those creepy levitating hands back to himself. Leaving him with this pillowcase.

He can't use it, it's creepy. He wouldn't be able to rest if he knew whose hands touched this adorable cat. And that just makes it worse.

Hitoshi sighs, and tries to forget about that. Sometimes, he'll work on his lectures, but usually in Yamada's classes, he listens to Yamada's lessons. He was worried that answering Yamada's questions that were directed to the students in sign would be distracting, but Yamada seems to enjoy it. Yamada nods if he got it right, but just tilts his head and looks to the students if he got it wrong. Yamada won't even tell him when he's messed up in this class.

And it just stings worse in this class. "Correct, Monoma! C uses both present and past tense, and A misspelled 'giraffe,' but B won out in both meanings of the word!"

Aizawa said he could start going to his other Hero Ethics class instead of this one, and Hitoshi considers it too much. He doesn't want to miss Yamada's class, and it seems unfair to give that up just because he hates Quirk Thief so much. But Yamada also said that he should tell Quirk Thief to stop bothering him, as if that would help. Yamada clearly doesn't know who Quirk Thief is as a person.

But there's a note hidden in the pillowcase that falls out when Hitoshi has to move it to his backpack. 'My chat is waiting.'

Hitoshi remembers that chat, and he's never used it, never had the intentions to use it. But the thought of putting to words exactly how he thinks Quirk Thief should meet his end is tempting right now. That might be a good use of his time during Aizawa's free period.

And that temptation almost makes him forget why they're not going to the teacher's lounge after Aizawa meets them for that free period.

"We're going to run through the final checks at USJ to make sure it's safe for the exercise," Aizawa says, because he probably noticed that Hitoshi forgot. That should be an indication that he really doesn't care about who they're going to meet, but. "You're free to do whatever you want while we run through it, it shouldn't take long. And Kota is... excited to meet you."

There's a hesitation that Hitoshi doesn't like. He knows that Eri should probably have more friends her own age, and that concern is more prominent with her impending birthday. All her other friends are siblings to the hero students, like Shoji's little sister Mizuno or Amphibian Fibber's little sister and brother. Kota is new, and he's probably being considered for an invitation to Eri's birthday party. And he'd better not be a deviation from Eri's other fast friends. "I want to meet him too! Izuku said he's really cool, and he has a cool quirk that shoots out water!"

Eri curls a hand over her horn after she says that, and he hates it. He hates that she's so concerned with her quirk now, that it seems to be haunting her dreams. Aizawa said she needs to learn to control it herself, and she needs to use it to do that. To get more comfortable with having it, and possess it entirely for herself.

But if Eri could stop having her quirk, and having all those worries, to have nothing to set herself apart from her friends, she would probably be happier for it.

“Kota is... a bit like Bakugo sometimes,” Aizawa says, his head tilting to the side like that’s a new observation to him, and it shouldn’t be. It’s bad enough that Eri has to deal with the real Bakugo. “If he’s a bit standoffish at first, it’s probably due to how he’s often brought along to these types of things. He’s only upset at that, not at you.”

Kota. Had better be as excited to meet Eri as she is to meet him. Or else.

And the little punk doesn’t look like he is, even if he looks frighteningly like Bakugo. That sneer, that glare under his oversized hat. Even his red shoes are too big. 27 wants to flip him. “With glittering eyes, rock on!”

With cat paws- “With cat paws, we’re here to help!”

“Out of nowhere, we appear!”

“Cutely catly, we sting!”

“The Wild Wild Pussycats!” Mandalay, Ragdoll, Tiger, and Pixie-Bob are posing, after jumping out from behind the columns in the entrance, after repeating their theme song, and Hitoshi wishes he wore a face mask today. His face feels hot for some reason, but he’s pretty sure he’s just embarrassed for them. That they’re doing all of that for Eri.

“Did you have to do that?” Aizawa asks, asking the real questions almost like he knows how badly Hitoshi wants to ask that. “The exercise isn’t for another-”

“Four hours, but,” Tiger says, and he’s much more muscular than he was in the cartoon. “Presentation is everything, nya?”

There’s a way that they’re staring at him that he doesn’t like. He doesn’t know how much Aizawa knows, and that’s always frightening, but this is even more so. Mandalay is looking at him, she’s real and in the flesh, and what he thought he could shrug off and ignore isn’t as easy to do now that he’s faced with that.

He doesn’t know what’s normal to do, if it would be easier to pretend that he doesn’t know them or that he’s not even here. That he’s only here to make sure that snot-nosed kid treats Eri well, and not that he’s dying to ask if Mandalay can use her quirk on him. He’s always wondered if she can really scream inside someone’s mind like she can on the show. [We need to make sure the surprise is perfect, right?]

It feels like that, then. Just a little echo behind each word, and the tickle in his skull that makes it clear that it’s not someone talking to him out loud. It’s Mandalay’s Telepathy quirk.

Hitoshi can die happy now.

Mandalay winks, but none of them seem likely to break their pose until they’ve earned some praise, which Aizawa isn’t going to give. Hitoshi can’t offer it himself, he’s sure he’d choke on his tongue if he tried, but Eri is there. “It’s so cool! Your ‘presentation’ is really cool!”

Eri is absolutely sincere, her arms lifted above her head, and that seems to be what they wanted as the heroes breathe easier and relax. That snot nosed brat in the middle scoffs and turns his head to the side, reprimanded far too gently with Mandalay's paw on his shoulder. "Thank you, Eri. This is my cousin Kota Izumi, and he's-"

"Tired," the kid cuts in, and Hitoshi is going to flip him. His stupid little flat-topped hat should balance him perfectly. "And I'm not gonna play babysitter."

The kid is only a little taller than Eri, and it's probably just the hat. He's still so perfectly flippable, it's so easy and Hitoshi feels exactly what he needs to do to grab the little shit and flip him in his arms when Eri walks over to the kid and grabs his hand out of the pocket he's stuffed it in. When she definitely gives him a smile he doesn't deserve, that Hitoshi can't see right now. "It's okay, 'cause Tw-oshi can babysit us! Right, Toshi?"

Hitoshi nods, and if the kid is scared of the scars on his face, he doesn't regret not wearing a face mask. "Right. This place could be dangerous if you're not careful." A warning.

He's not sure if the warning is heard, or if Eri's pure smile finally touches some part of that miniature gremlin's heart, but Kota ducks his head. "Fine." The brat stiffens when Eri wraps her arms around him to give him her usual hug, but he grits his teeth and bears it. 27 narrows his eyes, because if this kid isn't careful, if he hurts Eri's feelings, he will pay for it.

27 might not stoop to child murder, but he's pretty sure that tossing him into that pool would be acceptable. Almost like Aizawa has a stronger Telepathy quirk, he stares at Hitoshi too long, before he starts talking about sectors of this gym and how it hasn't been used in a few months.

That's odd, because this place looks like an amazing training ground. It's massive, but from what Hitoshi can see, there's every conceivable environmental danger that could be made into an advantage in this place. The pools of water, the mountains and ruined city buildings, and the domes that promise more extreme situations. The red domed area with painted fire licking around the edges of it looks the most interesting.

But the heroes are going to explore those areas, while Hitoshi 'babysits.' "Can we play hide and seek-"

"No," Aizawa says, a bit too sharply, but Hitoshi tries to reason that he was distracted with his conversation with Mandalay. That nervous tick when he folds a hand over the back of his neck seems to confirm it. "This is a dangerous area. You three should stay by the entrance. This won't take long."

Eri hums and nods, swinging Kota's captive hand, and seems to look towards her new potential friend for something to do. The brat seems to ignore that, seems to be glaring at the ground, and he'd better get over that quickly. "I...can show you my quirk... if you want to-"

"Yeah!" Eri cheers, and she's too excited about it. Izuku talking up this snot nosed kid placed her expectations too high, and they were too high to begin with. Eri seems to like seeing demonstrations of quirks far weaker than hers, evident by the way she kept cheering for the Asui siblings to show off their long tongues, even though she's not a stranger to Amphibian Fibber's. He imagines that she wishes she had one like that.

He imagines she knows her quirk caused her so much pain to begin with.

"Nya-at even a little Plus Ultra?" Pixie-Bob nearly yowls, her eyes looking wicked even if her face is a tense grin. "You know your snot nos- most of your students think they've already learned everything about rescue operations after that Provisional Licensing exam. Just a few of my golems could-”

“A few,” Aizawa says, even if he’s missing a huge opportunity. The hero students should be overwhelmed in a training situation, and Hitoshi can imagine that the large mountain that looked to be made out of loosely packed dirt would be challenging with an army of those golems bearing better footing than the students. “But twenty facing down three students is too much.”

Is it? When those heroes won’t be facing fair odds in real life? Villains won’t stop to ponder if their numbers are too much to overwhelm them, if the environments are too challenging. Aizawa is just being too soft on them, and he usually is, but today it almost seems worse.

“Ah, I’m getting a signal,” Ragdoll says, her eyes closed as she concentrates, her hands splayed out to frame her face as though her quirk needs that. “It seems like two children are running towards... the Flood Zone!”

27 turns to see Eri being convinced by that gremlin to keep running down the stairs. They’re nearly at the central plaza, but the direction they’re running towards is definitely the giant pool of water. The pool of water, that’s probably deep, probably has a lot of strong currents due to the giant pipe at one end of it.

And Eri can’t swim. “Hito-”

Aizawa shouldn’t worry so much, it’s faster to sprint and jump over these stairs instead of walking down them, it’s not like he’s so ill-trained that he’d slip. That’s a mistake you only make a few times with Bug, there’s no reason to have hard concrete breaking bones when she’d gladly do the same as soon as 10 was done healing the break. The exact same, which might have made the bones harder to break the next time.

That little shit Kota looks at him and tries to run faster, almost tugging Eri too hard, but before she slips and falls, 27 catches her by the back of her dress. “Do not run off like that.”

“But it’s tag!” Eri says, because she was cruelly manipulated into this. Her wide red eyes are still full of innocence, and that Kota kid looks like he still wants to run. 27 is not above shoving him into the pool to teach him a lesson. “Now I’m it!”

“Now, we’re going to go back to the entrance where Aizawa told us to stay,” Hitoshi says, and keeps his eyes on Kota so that he doesn’t run, and so that he doesn’t see the full force of Eri’s disappointed frown. But just knowing that it’s there makes his legs feel weak.

“I need to be by the water to use my quirk, idiot,” the little shit says, and Hitoshi doesn’t care. He doesn’t give a shit about his little weak water quirk, but if he needs to be by the water, he’ll gladly help him into it.

The thought of tossing the little shit in is too tempting to ignore, even if he tells himself that he can’t deny Eri something that she wants. “Fine, but don’t get too close.”

He’s only talking to Eri, but Kota doesn’t need to know that.

*

Aizawa doesn’t like using USJ as a training ground, but the Wild Wild Pussycats had been too excited to play in it. He reached out to them months ago to ask if they would visit so that the rescue training that was derailed at summer camp this year could actually take place, but understandably, they had their own issues to deal with after that training camp.

Ragdoll pretending that she still had Search in front of his wards was concerning, especially because he knows it's something that one of his students will remark on. They'll ask, because they won't truly realize how much losing her quirk must have impacted her as a hero.

And when Ragdoll finds him kicking the piles of shattered glass in the Ruins Zone, ruminating if it's too much and too dangerous for environmental awareness, he has to ask first. "It seems like you've taken point on organizing training sessions like these. Mandalay usually does it."

Ragdoll just tilts her head, winding her paw-covered hands behind her back. "Ah, y'know. Without my quirk, my hero license is suspended, so I'm just helping out however I can. As a receptionist."

There's a wink with that word. A wink, a cheeky grin, and something he knows would get her in trouble if the wrong person heard that.

He's not that person.

"Of course. All your years of experience in rescue operations are meaningless without your quirk, after all." He's goddamn proud, and he has no right to be. But he straightens and looks at her, and tries to impress the importance of this. "Do not tell my students anything about that."

"Of course! I don't want anyone to feel bad about it," Ragdoll says, spinning into a twirl that ends with her cat paws raised up in a pose. Sometimes, he wonders if they know how much he would let them get away with, despite knowing how irrational it is. He knows it's just a costume. "About that, though...."

But he won't let it go that far. "About what?"

About the investigation, he imagines, which might find a Nomu that has her quirk. That means talking about the leads that still won't talk, the hours that he's spent on the street in the dead of night tracking down any looser end that might talk about how Miasma offers their muscle when most imprisoned criminals have been burned through. The 'field interrogations' that he feels will only become closer to something unprofessional the longer this stalemate drags out.

He doesn't have answers for Ragdoll, and she knows it. How she knows it is still concerning, but Endeavor somehow found out, so Aizawa wouldn't put it past The Commission of Wardship Affairs to ask the Hero Commission to start filtering the existence of Hitoshi's case through the pro-hero ranks to find another placement for him if he doesn't turn up something.

"Hi-to-shi."

Ragdoll grins like the cat that got the cream, and Aizawa hates that he slipped up at that moment. Even if he knows seeing his ward hurtling himself down the stairs flight by flight is a logical reason for it.

He avoids addressing Hitoshi by name when they're not in private, because Hitoshi has made it clear that he wants to be addressed as 'Hitoshi.' That comes with implications that Hitoshi doesn't understand, and Aizawa doesn't see the point of explaining them. Especially to his students, who for some reason are permitted to call him 'Shinsou.' Aizawa doesn't want to know why that difference exists, even if he worries that he already does.

And that it's Hizashi's fault.

"I was his favorite, right? Right?!" Ragdoll asks, and that's not what Aizawa was anticipating. He was honestly sure that they were only showing off for Eri, that they wouldn't have known about that two minute phone call that he asked Mandalay to forget about when he made it more than a month ago. “C’mom, we have a betting pool and I put a lot of money on myself-”

“I don’t know,” Aizawa says, because he doesn’t. He wouldn’t ask Hitoshi that question, wouldn’t stir up more of his past with a question Hitoshi likely can’t answer. He probably doesn’t remember which hero was his favorite before he entered Miasma’s hands, and pieces of Hitoshi’s childhood like that are still too difficult to discuss. Too raw. “And you might regret asking him. It’s likely he only watched the show.”

“And they made me so whiny before Pixie-Bob joined us!” Ragdoll pouts, likely an old wound, but they were incredibly young when they were signed on for ‘Kawaii Kawaii Pussycats.’ Only Mandalay will talk about it, and talk about how they were able to educate children in age-appropriate first aid techniques, and what to do in a real life emergency to better aid the heroes dispatched to help them, but he’s sure the others have problems with their ‘characters.’ Mandalay was the star, after all. “But, you’re right, he was a little kid. He probably just watched the show, and he’s probably forgotten about it.”

There’s something more somber in her tone, the way she glances up at the ruined buildings above them as though she’s checking to make sure the shattered glass isn’t likely to fall. Something he’s already checked.

“We looked for him too, you know. Had to for a fan. Search could have...”

Aizawa, as a rule, doesn’t tolerate regrets like that. “He was likely far out of your range. They’re very good at what they do. Not being found.”

Not leaving a single trace.

It’s frustrating, but Aizawa reminds himself that the only reason they’ve gotten this far is because Hitoshi is there, giving a reason for their focus, an evident link in the supply chain that results in Nomus. Miasma silences all loose ends, and they’ve tried to kill Hitoshi twice. There’s a saying about a third time, but that’s all the more reason to be cautious.

In another sense, Aizawa will take the Shinketsu student who has no memory of taking the Provisional License exam as proof that there’s already been a third incident, and that it passed with far less casualties than expected. But his class this year has terrible luck with rescue training exercises, after USJ and the summer training camp.

“Any ladders we can walk under?” Ragdoll asks, somewhat out of the blue, but then he remembers that this zone is one of the few that would actually have that temptation of fate. “Looks like you’re trying to find a mirror anyway-”

Aizawa sighs, even if he knows it’s irrational. He doesn’t want to get into it. “I would like to make my job as easy as it can be, and keep Recovery Girl from having more reasons to retire. The Mountain Zone is fine?”

Ragdoll nods, then adds in a salute. “Pixie’s only adding four golems there, but the footholds are still stable. Mandalay is going to take some time in the Downpour Zone, y’know she’s just as thorough as you are.”

At least one of them is.

Tiger should also take his time in the Conflagration Zone, which meant that they could both patrol the Flood Zone. And not find Hitoshi or the two small children with him anywhere near it.

But while Aizawa was already on edge stepping onto the Central Plaza, looking up at the stairs to find the entrance barren made that worse. And from the edge of the flat Central Plaza, it was easy to see where his charges were.

Kota must have been training with his quirk in the past few months, much like he is right now. He's pulling the water in the Flood Zone pool into thin arches that hold shakily for a few seconds, then shooting a spray of water beneath them from his palms before they fall, to Eri's excited cheering. The volume of water that he can manipulate might be small, but the technique has become quite advanced. "That's really cool, Mi-Mi!"

"Izumi," Kota corrects grumpily, but allowing Eri to use his given name is still a greater concession on his part than Aizawa anticipated. "It's not really cool right now, but I'll get better at it. My... my parents were better at it. They were heroes."

"Mine too," Eri replies, and Aizawa pointedly doesn't look at Ragdoll. He knows what he'd see. "Heroes are really cool, and they have to work really hard to learn how to use their quirks. You're gonna be a great hero too, Zumi."

Aizawa sees both of his wards shuffle on their feet, for likely two different reasons. Hitoshi has been staring at Kota, his arms crossed, and from what Aizawa can see from this angle, an unimpressed look on his face bordering on irritation. Eri inching a bit closer to Kota, moving a bit behind him while his focus is on building another loop higher than the first. And while Aizawa knows what Eri is probably attempting to do, he imagines Kota wouldn't be a fan of it. "What's your quirk, anyway? Is it just your horn or-"

"Eri," Hitoshi warns instead, Eri's hands hovering over Kota's shoulders before they drop. "-'s quirk is none of your business. You're being nosy."

While Hitoshi seemed to have some grudge against Kota already, it's not entirely one-sided. Kota bristles, his concentration breaking the water he was manipulating falls with a splash. "I wasn't talking to you, idiot."

Kota punctuates that remark with a splash of water aimed at Hitoshi's feet, which Hitoshi steps back from. The quick glaring contest breaks when Eri steps between them, arms spread out in Hitoshi's defense. "Zumi, don't be mean to Toshi! Toshi's being really nice by talking to you!"

"I don't want him to talk to me, or look at me with his weird, tired, hag eyes," Kota retorts, and while Eri already provides an unnecessary defense for the teenager being somewhat bullied, Aizawa walks a bit faster to provide a better one. "He's weird for creeping around us, like some kind of-"

Hitoshi reaches over Eri, getting some form of retaliation by swatting Kota's hat down over his face, but Kota answers in kind with a spray of water from his hands. A juvenile fight doesn't have much opportunity to escalate further, though it claims an unintended victim. "Hey!"

Eri turns and tucks herself, and the soaked front of her dress into Hitoshi's quick and comforting crouch, and Aizawa shouldn't feel like he's coming to the defense of two children who don't get along with Kota. Kota, who sees the approaching adults first and devolves into predictable and frustrated explanations. "I didn't mean to splash her! That guy just- they're just weird! Why do I have to-"

"Izumi," Ragdoll interrupts, arms crossed and eyebrow raised. It's the perfect picture of parental disappointment. "You're not supposed to use your quirk on anyone. Remember what your teacher said? What Sasaki-"

“Using your quirk on civi-silions makes you a villain!” Eri cuts in, tossing a glare over her shoulder despite her teary eyes and sniffles. “And you can’t be a hero if you’re a villain!”

Kota honestly looks a bit struck by that, which doesn’t have the intended effect. Instead, he stomps and bares his teeth, frustration and anger deepening. “I’m not a villain! You don’t even know what that means! And you-” Another stomp, another attempt to call Kota’s attention by Ragdoll, but it blows over into a scream. “You’re weird! You keep grabbing me like some kind of weirdo, and he’s weird, and-”

“And we’re not behaving in a way Deku would like,” Mandalay interrupts, herself a bit drenched from the Downpour Zone, but she wields that firm tone with an authority that Kota doesn’t question, blanching at the sight. And the threat that Aizawa hadn’t considered. “Izumi, come here.”

Kota turns to look at Eri before he does, perhaps a bit of guilt setting in already, but Eri turns her face from him to press it against Hitoshi’s shirt. Aizawa would rather that Ragdoll not follow him when he approaches his wards, but she seems to respect Mandalay’s need for privacy with her charge more than his. “Are you alright, Eri?”

Eri shakes her head, and Hitoshi’s loose embrace around her tightens. “‘M not weird, ‘n Toshi’s not weird, and he’s mean, Zawa!” Eri’s hiccuping sobs are only growing stronger, and Aizawa can’t help the wince when Eri’s horn begins to grow. “He’s mean, he’s not like Ugo, an’ I don’t like him, an-an...”

“Maybe... you shouldn’t have hugged him so much,” Hitoshi mutters, something he’s clearly uncomfortable doing, while he runs a hand over the back of Eri’s head. “But, now that you know he’s mean, you don’t have to try to like-”

Eri pulls away from Hitoshi, breaking out of his hold and runs straight into Ragdoll’s legs for comfort. Aizawa doesn’t know who looks the most disheartened by that - the sobbing child, the stricken teenager crouching on the ground, or Aizawa himself who was passed over for a complete stranger. “Aw, there there! Rotten boys don’t know nothing about anything! Let’s take this to the girl’s room to get you cleaned up, okay?”

Eri nods, sniffing as Ragdoll pulls her into her arms and carries her off, and though Aizawa knows the tail part of Ragdoll’s costume shouldn’t move on its own, he swears it swishes. Like it won something.

Hitoshi is clearly more upset about it than he shows, and he shows quite a bit of it in a murderous glare directed at a small child. ‘Little shit. Not invited to birthday.’

“Yours or Eri’s?” Aizawa asks, trying to make light of the situation. Something that clearly doesn’t work as he catches the tail end of Hitoshi’s sour look before he retreats into his usual blankness. “Kota is a bit different from the other children Eri has met. A bit more like a typical boy her age.”

‘More normal,’ Hitoshi signs, but that sign is sharp and the anger behind his narrowed eyes deeper than Aizawa can see. He’s not entirely sure that it’s all on Eri’s behalf.

“Not entirely. Most children his age aren’t in the care of a team of pro-heroes,” Aizawa says, and he doesn’t miss Hitoshi’s flash of confusion before it settles. He imagines that Hitoshi already knows Eri’s situation isn’t typical in that regard, but the reminder of it caught him off guard. “It could have been a similarity that would help them see eye-to-eye, but Kota was probably already irritated with the situation. He was only speaking out of anger.”

Aizawa shouldn’t feel like he’s comforting a teenager after some harsh words from a six year old, but he does. And he shouldn't feel like he should step between Hitoshi and the six year old in question approaching with Mandalay's hand resting firmly on his shoulder, but he does.

"Sorry," Kota grumbles, staring pointedly at the ground until he glances up at his guardian, and seems to know that apology was lacking to Mandalay's eyes. "Sorry I called you weird, and splashed your sister. That's not heroic behavior."

Hitoshi glances at Aizawa, at first seeming to wordlessly ask what the proper response to that should be, before he signs. 'I want to make him feel worse.'

Aizawa only barely keeps himself from rolling his eyes, realizing that this indeed was not going to be an event where Hitoshi could be the responsible teenager who was above a petty feud with a child. "That means that he accepts your apology, and understands that you made a mistake."

'He splash Eri. Should toss into pool. Or flip upside down.'

"He hopes you understand that Eri was hoping to befriend you, and he might have been a bit overprotective of her in the beginning, which he apologizes for," Aizawa says, earning a flicker of a glare from Hitoshi from his efforts. But Hitoshi keeps forcing him to translate.

'Stupid hat. His hat is stupid. He's stupid.'

"And he's a fan of the Wild Wild Pussycats, and Mandalay is his favorite hero," Aizawa says, which draws a bright grin from Mandalay, just as he hoped. Hitoshi pointing so much at Kota and using a rather easily-translatable sign like 'stupid' would have made it too easy for Mandalay to figure out what he was really saying.

But from the way that Hitoshi freezes before he ducks his head, nearly hiding his face in his arm when he rubs the back of his neck, makes Aizawa think that he made an unfortunately accurate guess.

"And you two could have been gushing about how much you like me instead of fighting," Mandalay teases, earning some grouching and blushing in equal measure from Kota when she pinches at his cheek, and Aizawa isn't blind to the fact that Hitoshi is blushing too. "So, we can start all over with that, can't we? A handshake between Mandalay-fans!"

Instead of a handshake, a cat fight is more likely with the way the two boys glare at each other. But Hitoshi offers his hand, and Kota takes it, a limp-wristed shake that neither of them mean is made and broken quickly just to put Mandalay at ease.

"So, Kota can go first with his favorite thing about me," Mandalay says, a tail that shouldn't swish behind her does, but before Kota can bristle or Mandalay can insist further, the chanting begins and she turns to join in, Tiger and Pixie-Bob framing either side of Ragdoll as the group approaches.

"With glittering eyes, rock on! With cat paws, we're here to help! Out of nowhere, we appear! Cutely catly, we sting! The Wild Wild Pussycats!"

And Eri.

Dressed.

As a member.

Of The Wild Wild Pussycats.

Aizawa is beginning to understand the appeal for taking several pictures of every memorable event in Eri's life.

Eri poses in the center where Ragdoll placed her, smiling with her white cat-paw gloves, a radio communicator on her head that looks more like cat ears, wearing a dress rather than the skirt and midriff combo, which is a bit more practical for the snowy weather outside but not as much as what she had on before.

What she had been wearing before, the same long sleeves and leggings that she's worn practically since she was discharged from the hospital, is practical in more ways than one.

Aizawa doesn't want to disturb this, what he knows might be peace before the storm breaks. Eri might not have seen her scars yet, but the sight of them is often enough for a meltdown. He doesn't know if that's why Hitoshi seems eerily still with the sight, or if Kota's similar stillness will break with the clumsy words of a child and become the push over the edge, but that forces him to say it. "Cute."

Eri presses her paw-gloves together, beaming at that, and Aizawa appreciates that far more than Tiger, Pixie-Bob, and Ragdoll's flustered blushing, when they know he wasn't talking about them. "Eraserhead finally said it! And he was sober this time!"

Tiger didn't need to add that.

Eri walks over to Hitoshi, whose blush hasn't faded, and who still seems entirely stricken by the sight. "Toshi, 'm sorry that I got mad, but you're right. Some boys have 'toxic masc-linity' and can't handle cute girls and hugs, so I'm not gonna hug Kota anymore."

Aizawa knows he's reading into things seven years too early when he sees Kota begin to fluster with that.

"Just-I don't-don't do it so much and it's fine! You're not weird, and..." Kota glances away, even if Eri's cautious stare is impossible not to read. Despite the bravado that Aizawa is sure was all Ragdoll's engineering, possibly with encouragement from the others, Eri isn't quite so willing to write off Kota's friendship as she claims. "I'm sorry I splashed you. It was an accident, but... I shouldn't've been mean to a Deku fan."

Eri's cat-paw gloves seem dangerously adorable now, raised up and slightly curled in her excitement. "Izuku's the best! You didn't tell me you liked Izuku too!"

"I like-" Kota stops, his lips contorting in a frown he seems to be trying to fight. "You can't just call him 'Izuku' though! Calling people by their given name is a big thing! It's like saying you're best friends, or family, or boy...boy..."

He can't say it, and Aizawa worries.

"But everyone's my best friend," Eri says, with an sincerity that can only be tolerated from a child her age. "'Cause I've only got one name, so everyone has to call me 'Eri.' And Izuku and Mirio said it's okay if I call them that too."

That was more of Togata's idea than Midoriya's, but Midoriya would only fluster slightly when Eri first started calling him that. It's a habit that borders on inappropriate, something that Eri would have to learn eventually not to do. But she should have a family name that she picks herself before that time comes.

"If Deku... says it's okay, then," Kota says, kicking with his bright red and oversized shoes that Aizawa hadn't paid that much attention to before now. He dreads having to get the Problem Child's attention on the rescue training exercise when he knows his ever-attentive student will notice them and have an emotional crisis. "You can call me 'Izumi.' And we'll be friends."

"Best friends," Eri corrects, and makes another correction. "Zumi."

The glance to the side is the best sign of surrender that Eri will get, and she doesn't seem displeased by it. Hitoshi has been able to draw himself out of his spell enough to be displeased by all of this, still crouching on the ground and close enough to Eri to rest his arms on her shoulders in a way that can't be read as anything but possessive.

Aizawa will count it as a win given that Hitoshi doesn't act that way around most of the people in Eri's circle. And that it's something he's startled to find sympathy with.

"Wait!" Eri says, remembering something with widened eyes before she turns to face Hitoshi, and with some struggle, pulls the cat eared headband off her head to try to place it on Hitoshi's. "Tiger said this was for you, 'cause he knows you're a fan of him or maybe Miss Mandalay, but he's pretty sure it's him."

Hitoshi takes the red headband from Eri's oversized gloves, holding it in his hands to examine the dark red piece that doesn't quite match the Wild Wild Pussycat's costume, given that it doesn't vaguely resemble cat ears and instead looks more like cat-merch than hero merch. He presses his thumbs to either side of the plastic ears and drops his head when they move, somehow overwhelmed by the way that they wiggle.

"The ears are speakers, but there's little headphones tucked into the side so you can listen to stuff without anyone overhearing," Ragdoll explains, before she seems to devolve into a marketing spiel. "They're bluetooth compatible, aux compatible but the cord is sold separately, and lasts up to 8 hours between charges so you never have a music emergency!"

"We hope you like them," Mandalay says coolly, maturely, before that begins to wane. "And I can send you some stickers of my face paint so you can properly mark them with your favorite hero's decal, with some more merch of course."

"Thank you," Hitoshi whispers, barely more than a breath, but it's still surprising. Less so that he doesn't try to look up, or that he seems to like wiggling the ear speakers.

Aizawa simply tries to count this exercise as a win. USJ was properly checked, Eri had some trials with Kota's personality that couldn't be overcome, but all in all, his wards surprised him by weathering yet another challenging social interaction with visitors from outside UA.

He knows he's just being selfishly irrational when he thinks that Hitoshi's wardship could end, and the teenager could never say a single word to him.

*

Hitoshi has been getting out of practice.

Aizawa made sure they would avoid the hero students during lunch while Eri's dress was still being dried, by climbing into the teacher's lounge through a window. Aizawa didn't want Eri's costume to spoil this 'surprise' of the Wild Wild Pussycats visit, which meant that he couldn't wear the headphones either when they could be spotted. Eri pouted when she had to change back into her usual clothes, and nearly won when Yamada walked in and saw her like that.

Aizawa hadn't expected Yamada's entrance, and that's how he nearly lost. An unplanned influence tipped the game in his favor.

Hitoshi has honestly been stupid until this point.

Ashi took some time to counter him, but she did so brilliantly. Hiding behind Aizawa would eventually come to an end, and with Yamada on her side, Hitoshi knew Aizawa could be the shield that crumbles. His loyalty was to his husband before Hitoshi, Ashi had flipped two of his pieces in one fell swoop. But an unexpected pawn....

Was easy to win.

“Oh, so you have a new friend named Kota!” Mirio beams, once again dominating most of 3-A’s ‘five minutes to bother the wards’ time before their Hero Ethics class began.

Hitoshi doesn’t know if Eri’s growing horn is the reason that Mirio has been spending more time with them, or if he’s just entirely too enthusiastic about snow activities for the rest of his friends to tolerate. At least every other day, he stops by the dorm to build snow bunnies, snow men, snow angels, and try to teach Eri how to throw a snowball.

There were more than a few times Mirio wanted Hitoshi’s help to ‘demonstrate’ by having a snowball fight with him, which almost made Hitoshi feel guilty about how much he enjoyed it.

‘Worry.’ Mirio might be talking to Eri, but Hitoshi’s hands are in his line of sight. Eri’s attention is focused on Mirio unwaveringly, telling him all about the Wild Wild Pussycats and their gremlin, so Hitoshi doesn’t have to worry that she’ll see it. ‘Mean. Eri cry.’

It’s just a waver in Mirio’s smile, but a wink that isn’t entirely directed at Eri confirms it. “I’d really like to meet your new friend!”

A piece sliding into place.

Hitoshi should feel bad about being misleading but not dishonest. He’s worried, just not about the training exercise where that tiny gremlin would have access to Eri. The gremlin is mean, and he did make Eri cry.

But if Mirio crashes the training exercise, that’s a shield that Hitoshi can keep. He can convince Mirio to take them out to play in the snow afterwards, he might be able to convince Mirio to keep them out of 1-A’s dorm until curfew hits. After that, he’ll find some way to attach himself to Mirio all weekend, perhaps stirring up some rivalry for Eri’s affection with that Kota kid, but he’ll devolve into begging if he can just last one more week.

After Eri’s birthday, Ashi can do whatever she wants, but throwing him a fake birthday before Eri’s is just an insult. One that he’ll avoid at any cost.

If Yamada thinks he’s won, he doesn’t look like it. There’s a wincing smile that he seems to wear before he talks about something he doesn’t want to, but he never says anything. He just creates English exercises on the chalkboard for Hitoshi to answer, and Eri chimes in whenever she reads a word she recognizes. Learning these small English words will probably help her when she ‘goes to school.’

When she spends time with children who are less like her other friends, and more like Kota. When she’s away from Hitoshi for most of the day. When she’s more ‘normal.’

‘Normal’ comes quicker for Eri, which is always what he wanted, but realizing how close the precipice was for her makes it seem sour.

Maybe it's the snowfall that makes him realize how much he loves being at UA. Maybe it was that trip that Yamada took Mirio on to look at apartments, since he won't be able to live in the dorms after this school year ends. Maybe it's looking at Mirio, and knowing that they're different in every conceivable way, that even if Yamada says he'll stay after the investigation, that's still too vague a promise.

There are things that happen every year, that are supposed to happen, at least. Eri had a birthday even if it wasn't celebrated properly, but this one will be. She'll have 13 birthdays with her fathers, and each one will look more distant from the one before, from all those days that Eri passed that threshold in the dark, without him knowing it.

At best, Hitoshi has two birthdays to look forward to before he turns 18, and Ashi's efforts to give him a fake one are meaningless. He's on a precipice, and it only draws closer, this peace will never last. He could be found, he could be killed, he could be taken away if Yamada is lying and the investigation was all he was good for.

Or he could stay here, for less than two years, until he has to move on and try to be something utterly normal, which he's not. Which he can never hope to be, and he can't hope that the world outside of UA's walls will be any kinder if he's a person instead of a Number, or a Dog.

Eri will be prepared. He can't possibly be.

It's the barest relief that the shoe he's worried will drop isn't coming from Ashi.

*

"Y'know Shitsou doesn't fucking want this," Bakugo says, cutting in on Ashido pestering Sato about that bullshit coffee cake when they're supposed to be marching their asses to USJ. Dressed up in their hero gear, marching through this bullshit snow, which makes it feel like some kind of trench-warfare kind of bullshit, and Nezu could probably afford to shovel this shit out of the way with all the money he's got to run this school.

"He just doesn't know he really wants it," Ashido argues, because she's stuck on this shit exactly like some fucking wad of gum on a shoe. She's got this grand ass plan to give Shitsou a fucking childhood now that he's 16, and she's even made a lame-ass list about it. It's clear as fucking day that Shitsou's too chickenshit to tell her to fuck off, and that's probably why she likes the asshole. "We've got cake, and birthday hats, and pin-the-hair-on-All-Might games, and it's going to be fun! Even if it's a little lame at first-

"Fucking cringey as fuck," Bakugo argues, and he's not going to that shit despite all the nagging he'll have to put up with. If Shitsou would just get over his 'I'm gonna pretend I can't talk because that gets my needy ass all the attention' shit, he wouldn't be invited to this bullshit anyway. "Shit's going to waste when Shitsou gets 'grounded' again."

"I baked the cake," Sato says, putting his hands up because he's probably over this shit, and he should be. "And I'm not baking it again, until it's actually his birthday. Not that it's ever appreciated-

"Thank you, oh magnificent culinary master, oh deliverer of the food that fills our bellies, and the warmth that fills our hearts," Kaminari pipes up, because he can't fucking help himself. "But seriously, if we tried to make something ourselves, Shinsou's most belated birthday ever would be ruined, so you're the bomb. Almost as bomb as Bakugo."

Sato grins like he's fucking proud of that shit, now that his ego has been stroked enough. Fucking master of the culinary arts, fuck Kaminari if he ever wants to mooch off of Bakugo's cooking ever again.

"Ugo!" The pipsqueak has to hop over the snow like some fucking bunny, and she's going to trip eventually, which means Nezu needs to get on his shit.

"What?" Bakugo asks, and he's waiting for one of the extras to pick her up because her tiny fucking legs aren't built for this shit. She's got some shit to say, and she wants to say it bad enough to let go of 'Mommy's' hand and trudge through the snow with the rest of them, but when she gets close enough she just stops and fidgets with her tiny fucking hands. "What?"

"Hug me," Eri says, her arms out and waiting, and fuck no. No, everyone is fucking staring at him now, Kaminari is losing his shit, the brat knows the rules and this is against them. He'll do whatever the fuck she wants when no one's fucking looking, but he's not going to act like that with all these fucking extras around.

But the pipsqueak won't get out of his way until he does it, so he crouches down, hugs her for a second, before he picks her up and drops her in Ashido's arms so she won't get fucking stepped on. "There. Happy?"

Eri nods, and he can tell just from the wide-eyed look on her face she's got some startling fucking revelation to share. "Ugo, I'm glad you don't got toxic masc-linity. Kota kinda does, but he says he's gonna be nicer this time."

Whoever the fuck Kota was better get over whatever shit he's got stuck in his-

Wait.

Fuck, that's why they're heading over to USJ. Shitsei fucking hates the place, big fucking wonder why, but apparently that shit is out of his hands because they've all got to make up some summer camp bullshit. Fucking fantastic, Bakugo has nothing but fond memories of the summer camp bullshit.

The other extras probably haven't figured it out, even if Eri spilled the whole fucking bean field. Nope, they're all cooing and awwing over Eri like it's a fucking rarity that she's with them. Eri Obsessive Compulsion Disorder at fucking work.

"Yeah dude, that toxic masculinity isn't manly at all!" Shitty Hair says, because he's just twitching to yoinK Eri out of Acid Wash's arms, and he'll probably have to fight for it. "Yo, can I get a toxic masculinity check?"

Or, he actually has some brains in that thick skull that hasn't been bleached to shit.

Of course, Eri's never going to turn down a fucking hug, but Shitty Hair can yoinK her right out of Ashido's arms with that. That starts the fucking 'Toxic Masculinity Check' for all the fucking idiots who can't fucking help themselves, and they might as well just fucking toss her to get some fucking cuddles. Fucking idiots.

Even Eri catches on to their bullshit, giggling at fucking IcyHot when he keeps asking if she's sure, because he wants to cheat at that shit instead of sharing the fucking toddler. But it's cold and shit, he's a fucking heater when he wants to be, so not even shitty Deku's whining is going to get him a turn with the fucking brat.

And they have no idea they've got bigger shit to deal with. "With glittering eyes, rock on! With cat paws, we're here to help! Out of nowhere, we appear! Cutely catly, we sting! The Wild Wild Pussycats!”

Fucking lame as shit, and Shitsou and Shitsei are right in fucking center, taking the full fucking assault of this shit. And probably enjoying it, the stupid fucking cat addicts.

And no one can fucking help themselves, ooh-ing and aw-ing like these fuckers didn't toss them over a fucking mountainside within 10 minutes of doing that pose the first time they saw it. Deku and his shitty friends are right and fucking center, asking all these fucking invasive questions like the green haired bitch didn't lose her fucking quirk so she can't be a fucking hero.

And that fucking Kota brat is wearing Deku's stupid ass shoes. The hits just keep coming on this shitty fucking day.

He's fucking fine, it's fucking stupid, this fucking place doesn't get to him and he doesn't fucking care about these fucking furry freaks. So what, they were there and they didn't fucking stop him from getting snatched, so they weren't fucking there. He shouldn't feel so fucking twitchy about it and he should probably be paying attention to this fucking bullshit exercise Shitsei and the Four Fucking Furies are going over.

But Shitsou looks like he's worried about something. Probably. It's not a fucking excuse when Shitsou's always got issues, and Bakugo always has to deal with them because he's his only fucking friend and shit. “What?”

Shitsou gives him some fucking look, like Bakugo's the one acting weird for asking. But he knows something is giving Shitsou some fucking issues, he's developed some fucking spidey senses for it because the dumb fuck won't tell anyone about his issues half the time, and then he sees it when Eri toddles over to grab that little summer camp brat and drag him over to Deku to get properly cooed over.

Shitsou's fucking little sister complex. “Oi, if you've got some fucking problem with the twerp, fucking deal with it-”

“Bakugo,” Shitsei can fucking mind his own business and shit, he's got two fucking ears so he can listen to the exercise bullshit and deal with Shitsou's issues. Fucking multitasking. “Asui, and Tokoyami will take the Downpour Zone.”

Fucking Downpour Zone where his explosions will be worth positively fuck all. Fuck, he'll be fucking quirkless with all the fucking rain coming down, which is exactly what fucking Shitsei wants because he's a shitty fucking smartass. Yeah, he's had to deal with fucking Half and Half and the other fucking fail extras in the remedial classes for that stupid fucking provisional license, and this fucking rescue exercise is just rubbing salt in the fucking wound.

‘Too loud,’ Shitsou signs, and fucking fuck him then. He wasn't fucking being loud, like some shitty fucking kid in class who can't fucking shut up and gets everyone held back before recess. Fuck him, he can deal with his fucking issues himself.

‘Fuck you stupid dipshit. Choke and die,’ Bakugo signs back, and fuck Shitsei's eyeroll. Fucker is just setting him up, getting his fucking jollies off to this pointless fucking bullshit by trying to keep this shit secret. They just got out of All Might's Hero Practical class, that shit was fucking brutal, and this shit is going to take too long. ‘Fuck-’

Shitsou puts his hand over Bakugo's while he's signing, getting his fucking panties in a twist over some shit, and pulls his hand down to his side like he's trying to get him to shut up and behave or some shit. And he fucking holds his hand like that's fucking normal and then he just breathes at him.

Just making a big fucking deal about taking a deep breath in, then letting it out, and fuck him.

But fine, maybe he shouldn't be sparking over this shit. It's fucking bullshit, but he's a hero and he's supposed to deal with this bullshit. He's supposed to deal with worse bullshit, this is just year fucking one, and he can fucking deal with 'Surprise! We got these Nightmare Furies again!'

He's not going to associate with the cat fetish freaks in any way, so he's not going to associate them with his fucking trauma. He's going to put the kidnapping bullshit squarely with the kidnapping freaks, and his fucked up brain is going to have to deal with it.

"I wonder how the number one hero is going to rescue someone quirkless," Shitsou mutters under his breath, and it's fucking obnoxious because Bakugo can barely hear his tiny fucking mumbles. But he catches that shit eating smirk, and he knows what Shitsou's doing. Being a little shit.

"Watch and fucking learn," Bakugo baits back, because Shitsou has a point. Bakugo is going to be the number one hero, he's proven that shit before, and he'll prove it again. The real number one, All Might, has never backed down from this kind of shit, and even if he'd save all the rescue actors before Frog Bitch got a ribbit out or Hot Topic talked to his imaginary friend.

But Endeavor couldn't do this shit at all. Endeavor would be fucking quirkless in all that rain, so Bakugo beating the shit out of this exercise just proves he's fucking ready to go toe-to-toe with the pros and knock Flame Princess off his fucking pedestal.

Shitsou rolls his eyes and tips his head back, like he fucking will watch, but Bakugo knows as soon as the rest of them fuck off to do actual fucking training, he's going to go back to scaring the shit out of Kota with his crazy eyes. "Not that you fucking will, when you can contemplate murdering a tiny little kid because he's not going cuckoo for Eri puffs."

Shitsou raises an eyebrow, and for some fucking reason, he's side-eying Deku pretty hard. "No, it'll be interesting. Maybe Midoriya will learn how to save someone without using their quirk to do it."

That shit's cold, and it's a fucking shame Shitsou doesn't say that shit loud enough for Deku to hear it. He'd fucking cry if he knew that's what Shitsou thinks about his big fucking Eri rescue operation shit.

Teary eyed bitch is already getting snotty over the sight of the two little shits he saved being friendly and shit, even if Kota still looks fucking uncomfortable with all of it. Eri's really got to get over the hugging shit if she wants to make friends, shitty little boys don't like that shit. Bakugo probably would have bullied the shit out of her when he was a shitty little kid.

But if Kota does, he's fucking dead, and he knows it. Even IcyHot is staring at him too damn hard, waiting for something to happen like he's on Shitsou's level with freezing the little shit into an ice cube if he offends Eri's sensibilities and shit.

Bird Beak makes a big fucking deal of coughing into his hand, and he shouldn't because he can't properly cover that shit with the beak and all, and Shitsou's still holding his hand. "Let's get this shit over with," Bakugo says, tucking his hand into his pocket because it's been there the whole time as far as anyone knows. As far as anyone will say unless they want to die.

The quirkless bitch is the one that gets to lead them to their zone, which is real fucking reassuring. Some real fucking shit goes down and they're on their own, but that doesn't fucking matter, because Frog Bitch is made for this. Shitsei isn't even hiding how much she's the fucking teacher's pet.

"It's gonna be fucking dark, and fucking raining, so I'll be manning fucking med-station," Bakugo says, because he knows his shit. That's the tactical fucking answer, because rescue exercises are fucking bullshit. There should be actual fucking medics backing them up instead of making them learn that fucking bullshit.

"That's oddly considerate of you, Bakugo," Frog Bitch says, like she's fucking surprised he can do that easy fucking math. "But, it seems likely that there are at least three rescue actors in our zone, kero. Tokoyami and I can still cover more ground, but we shouldn't overlook that you might be required to save an actor to pass this exercise too. Or that there could be a villain attack, kero."

The cat freak fucking giggles, and if that shit wasn't obvious before, it is now. "20 actors, six zones! How many could there be, what could happen, nya?"

Fucking obvious.

"Then, we should find a base camp near the center of the zone to keep in somewhat communication," Tokoyami says, and that's the right fucking idea in some situations, but it might not be for this one.

"Depends on how dark that shit is in there, and if there's cover," Bakugo argues, because getting surrounded on all sides is a rookie fucking mistake. He's known this shit before he got his first Zombie Survival Guide.

And it's fucking dark. There's rain pouring down in sheets, it's loud as shit, but the zone's supposed to be modeled after some kind of fishing village. There's only a few huts those shits could be hiding in, and the northeast side looks like it has a beach and a tiny model ocean.

"Great, Froggy takes the water since you spent all that time on a boat, but that's probably where some pop-up villains are coming from so keep your eyes peeled," Bakugo says, and Froggy nods because she knows what's fucking what. "Which means there's extras hiding in their houses and down the hill over there at the southwest-"

"I can take the downslope," Beaker says, because he thinks he's being polite, but that shit's not flying on Bakugo's grade.

"Or the huts, so you can back up Froggy and scare the shit out of any opportunists hiding in those shitty huts," Bakugo argues, because he doesn't fucking need his quirk to be a goddamn hero, and this bullshit cold ass rain is fucking nothing compared to real ass villains. "I'm not hiding or some shit, I'll beat the shit out of any actor with my bare fucking fists-"

"Exactly," Donnie Beak-o says, but he looks like a drowned ass bird the more they stand there and his feathers get soaked, and it's fucking creepy to know he has skin under there. "But I'm just as useful in the field as I am in the houses, while the roofs would allow you to use your quirk. If there are opportunists hiding in wait, you would be just as adequate to scare them. Your explosions could also be a way of communicating an emergency, such as an opportunistic attack."

And Froggy would be running back to shore anyway if there's some swamp men in the water, which means they could still pull off a pincer attack if she leads them into a hut. "Fine."

Bakugo goes through two houses before he finds one of the Gen Ed extras taking this shit real seriously. If this dick is supposed to be hiding under the bed like a terrified victim, he's doing a shit job of it with his legs hanging out and his phone light grabbing Bakugo's attention. "I'm a hero here to save your ass, are you injured?"

"Oh shit," Dumbass hostage says, and that light disappears. "Uh, yeah, my leg's broken. There were some- I mean. Ahhh."

Why the fuck couldn't they get the rescue actors again?

Bakugo has to fucking carry this shithead to the hut with the weirdly big chimney, and put him on a bed and fucking act like he's got a broken leg. The idiot already let it slip that there was a villain attack that caused this, but he keeps shaking his head and trying to act like he's shaking, and it's fucking obnoxious. "I c-can't, I'm traumatized by these horrific events. I can't remember their quirks or what they looked like, or where they were going. I just blacked out and you were there. My hero."

It doesn't get better when Froggy pulls in some chick that was hiding in a boat, but Froggy takes care of the 'shock treatment' and wraps a blanket around her. That blanket's looking pretty fucking nice now that Bakugo's just on fucking standby and defense, and he's fucking soaked and shit.

And they're just waiting.

Tokoyami comes back empty handed, and that shit can't be right. There'd be at least three victims for each zone, that shit's easily divisible, and if they think they're being smart by keeping them off-guard, it's just stupid. The animal quirk assholes go off to play real heroes again, and both the Gen Ed extras are on their phones at this point. And it's fucking boring.

And when the fuck-off animal couple comes back, there's a fucking tarp trailing after them like they don't see that shit. "Oi, look fucking alive!"

Tokoyami and Asui turn and they'd probably do the real work if this was a fight, but the tarp flies off and quirkless cat bitch throws up peace signs. "And that's it! An unpredictable rescue mission indeed! You got all the rescue victims, treated their injuries, defending them instead of running off, and now reinforcements have arrived! It was-" She better not fucking say it. "Purr-fect!"

Fucking kill him. "That... was a bit easier than expected, kero," Asui says, and that's all that needs to be said about it. Fucking waste of time.

And when Bakugo gets back to report to Shitsei that this pointless bullshit was fucking stupid, he doesn't see Shitsou or Eri around, but he sees Deku, Shitty Hair, and Four Eyes also got off stupidly easy. "Oi, that shit was too fucking easy. Let me in on that Conflagration Zone shit-"

"Congratulations on passing this exercise," Shitsei says with a monotone that says he's phoning all this shit in. "You're free to leave now."

Fucking bullshit waste of time. "And where the fuck did Shitsou run off to?"

"Togata-sempai came by to take Eri and Kota to play in the snow for a bit," Deku says, and that sounds like some shit right up his alley. And he's probably not tagging along for that shit just because he feels like he needs to cheer for all the fucking extras once they're done with their bullshit training.

And the fucking snow is going to be fun now that he's fucking soaked. "Fucking great, no one fucking brought their uniform because we had to change before we came here, fucking amazing foresight right there."

If Shitsei can hear that shit, he doesn't fucking act like it, and he should because Frog Bitch is gonna die if she tries to leave right now.

"Ah, that was something I overlooked, so thank you for pointing it out, Bakugo," Iida says, because he's fucking dying to be useful when he really just wants to ditch but he can't because he takes that student president post too fucking seriously. "I'll return with everyone's uniforms so that our hero costumes can be properly stored until the next exercise!"

Hopefully he does that shit quick, because Bakugo has some snowballs to toss at Shitsou's dumbass purple head for running off like that, and maybe he can go to sleep before the birthday bullshit starts to go down.

*

It's not working as well as Hitoshi thought, because he misstepped in the beginning.

When Mirio arrived, it was clear to see that Eri was having a fun time with the flat-hat bastard. The gremlin had an All Might action figure that was painted green, and Eri still had that Cat Sailor Moon action figure from Quirk Thief. Kota was trying to make Sailor Moon into a villain he could fight, and Eri was trying to argue that this weird 'Deku' action figure wouldn't fight Sailor Moon, so Mirio stepped in and said they could find some snow villains and a snow fortress to play in.

And Hitoshi shouldn't have invited Mirio's attention so early, because he forgot that Eri can only stay out in the cold for so long. He should have somehow insisted that the gremlin be left behind, because they have to return him to the Wild Wild Pussycats, which means that he'll be in Ashi's crosshairs if she's done with training by that point.

And after watching all three of them play in the snow, Mirio pointed those two things out as the sun began to set, and now Hitoshi was walking back towards his doom if he didn't think of something else to say. Some reason to keep him out a bit longer, for just three more hours.

Hitoshi considers what to say, and how to say it. He could say it, but he won't not unless his situation gets that dire. Mirio is still learning sign language, and even if he seems to pick it up faster than Bakugo, Hitoshi can't risk it. And the lies that should get him what he wants can't be spoken on his phone app where Eri would hear it, even though she's still holding hands with Kota and walking in front of them, so Hitoshi pulls up his chat with Mirio.

Eri's Mom: Eri wants to spend time with you after this. She's missed you a lot.

Mirio puts his hand to his phone in his pocket, but doesn't check it until Hitoshi shows him what he wrote, which almost defeats the purpose. Mirio looks at it, and at Eri, a bit confused by the way his eyebrows work together, but then he pulls out his phone with a weird little smile.

Eri's Plushie Dealer: aw, didn't want to embarrass her??? Was planning to come by 2morrow. New plushies at the shop!

Hitoshi frowns, because he meant 'after you toss the little gremlin back to his caretakers' instead of 'at some point in the near future.' Tomorrow will not help him.

Eri's Mom: Eri has been having bad dreams. Might help if she spends time with you tonight.

Eri's Plushie Dealer: I can come by the dorm if u think it would help, but im p sure u n Aizawa got it covered :)

Mirio could not be this clueless. He could not be this stubborn, this reasonable. Hitoshi glances at him and only sees Mirio's smile, Mirio offering help, but not the help that Hitoshi needs. And as USJ only draws closer the further that they walk, Hitoshi turns to desperation.

Eri's Mom: I need you to kidnap me so I don't have to go to the dorm until curfew. They're trying to throw me a birthday party I don't want.

He hears a snort as soon as he sends the message, and looks over to see Mirio biting his lips, his smile odd for it before he tilts his head and smiles fully. "I guess if that's the case, I can help you out, Shinsou. As long as Aizawa-sensei agrees with the 'kidnapping' and all."

Aizawa should, and Hitoshi hopes that Mirio makes that argument. Aizawa might know what it means, but he's hopeful he can just wait outside until Mirio makes the deal in his favor, so he can keep away from Ashi's sight. He's sure she'd try to kidnap him first.

"But it is a little weird though," Mirio says, and it's more than 'a little weird,' because absolutely no one has ever had a fake birthday party and no one should. "If you can pick any day to have a birthday party, I definitely wouldn't pick Friday the 13th. It's kind of bad luck, you know?"

And 27's luck runs out.

He stops in his tracks, and doesn't know how he didn't notice it before, how he could have missed it, even if he knows exactly how he wouldn't. He can't force himself to move, he can't force himself to breathe. The seconds it takes for Mirio to notice stretch on in nigh-unending terror, and 27 doesn't want him to notice at all. Even if that was the first irrational thought in his mind.

He doesn't know if the blade pressing against his throat is pressing hard enough to reveal its existence, but he imagines it's invisible even when he can't bring himself to look. He just stares ahead, Mirio taking two more steps, Eri's back turned, Eri is here. And 27 wishes she were anywhere else.

"Happy birthday, little bro," 127 whispers, right beside 27's ear. He doesn't know if Mirio can hear it.

He doesn't want him to.

His moment of peace at UA has come to an end.

Chapter End Notes

I was unfortunately ill-informed when I wrote and published this chapter initially. I had seen online that Tiger was a transwoman, but corrected by a reader that Tiger is a transman. This version has been corrected.

Blood on The Snow

Chapter Summary

127 is on UA's campus, and the heroes struggle to respond to the situation, thwarted by the security protocols in place. The heroes attempt to respond to every threat that they find.

27 is faced with a choice, a decision that 50 wouldn't approve of.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: Bug mention, Dissociation

Previously on Wards of UA: The Wild Wild Pussycats are visiting UA to use USJ as the grounds for rescue training exercises. Shiori is an informant for Aizawa, a hacker who has hijacked his phone multiple times. The last chapter ended with 127 pressing a knife to Shinsou's throat, stopping him from following Mirio, Eri, and Kota back to USJ, and Mirio was telling Shinsou that Friday the 13th was a rather ominous date for a fake birthday. Shinsou can use his quirk to its fullest extent with Eri, not requiring questions and commanding her without speaking, after repeatedly using his quirk on her thousands of times. 127 stabbed Shinsou in the side when Shinsou had been placed in a juvenile corrections facility for his own protection, in an attempt to kill him before he was placed in a wardship. During the raid on the 8 Precepts, Shinsou was absorbed into Chisaki and later Nemoto was absorbed, and Shinsou's only awareness during that time was pain when Chisaki asked a question. Hari would torture Shinsou by pulling him by his hair into a bath that was treated with bleach. Midoriya, Iida, Asui, Tokoyami, Kirishima, and Bakugo were the students that finished their rescue exercise first. Shinsou brainwashed Midoriya when he attempted to escape UA in Chapter 49. The interest in The Miasma is mostly due to how The Miasma is suspected to provide 'parts' for Nomus. Aizawa spent most of his childhood with his grandfather, who paid for his tuition and board at UA, but Aizawa has been distant from his grandfather after he became engaged with Yamada. Shinsou has been selectively mute for the bulk of the story so far, but after he got sick, he believed he was not selectively mute anymore, but intended to keep acting like he was, and has never said a word to Aizawa though he has broken his silence with other characters such as Yamada or Mirio.

Despite how many times Aizawa has heard the lockdown protocols fall into place, doors and windows becoming barricades with reinforced steel plates and the lights dimming as non-essential power is cut and routed to robots and electrical and plasma fences on the perimeter, he nearly jumps this time. Not just flinching, not just startling, his feet nearly leave the ground and his scarf flares around his shoulders before he realizes that there are several students, a full class of Gen Ed volunteers, and a few visiting heroes waiting near him who don't know what's going on.

“An intruder was detected on campus,” Aizawa says, and he sees the palpable anxiety rise where it shouldn't in his students. It's enough that he feels it in himself, but knowing that they remember the USJ incident as fondly as he does makes him wish he could take more of it on himself. "Just at the perimeter. All buildings on campus will be on lockdown until Hound Dog responds."

Hound Dog is the first line of defense, and the security robots are trained to follow his lead. Heroes on staff are supposed to do a headcount, report back to Nezu how many students are in their charge, if any are missing. The students are the priority. The students in his charge are clearly on the verge of panicking, especially the Gen Ed students talking amongst themselves. His students are worried, but somewhat prepared. "Izumi."

Mandalay isn't the picture of heroic composure right now, her hands wringing in front of her, her eyes too wide and pleading at Aizawa. They've gone over the procedures before, just as protocol, but Aizawa pulls out his phone to call Nezu instead of reporting his headcount through the app that's already pulled up with a text box that would report directly to Nezu's little 'War Room.' "Eraserhead, USJ. 33 students, six may be unattended at 1-A dorm. Four guests accounted for. Kota, Eri, Mirio, and Hitoshi are outside, requesting access to leave."

Even his staff access badge can't override these security protocols without Nezu's permission, since the biometrics could be overridden if a villain with a shapeshifting quirk had gotten that badge. "Granting, allow..." Nezu goes silent, 'allow 10 seconds to process' goes unsaid, and Aizawa finds himself going unnaturally still, warring with the need to run to the door behind him and leave his remaining students in the Wild Wild Pussycats' more than capable hands. Instead, he hears an odd snort. "Allow 50 seconds, this is very odd."

Aizawa doesn't like that, the implication that all of these security protocols could be faulty at a time where they might actually be necessary. He tries to keep the image of some third year Gen Ed student sneaking someone over the wall for a weekend romance, some petty but ultimately pathetic criminal 'doing it for the Vine' again. But Hitoshi is out there, out of his line of sight, with Eri and Kota in tow and Mirio to defend them. And Mirio is...

"Ah, Hound Dog has made contact. One intruder, female, strong stench. Possibly homeless. Surrendering," Nezu recounts those things, and Aizawa breathes a sigh of relief. Why a vagrant would try to find a warm shelter on UA's grounds can only have illogical answers, but he doubts it's more than- "Oh, what luck. She's asking for you. A 'Miss Shiori?'"

Aizawa doesn't have time to consider apologies or promises that he'll deal with her, before Nezu somehow transfers him and he hears Hound Dog's growling in the background. "Eraserhead-"

"What the hell are you doing?" Aizawa demands, because there were billions of yen spent on these security protocols but still hundreds of students and staff panicking right now, and there's not a single answer Shiori could give that could explain why she's here. "There's no way I can keep you from getting trespassing charges-"

"I wouldn't be worried about me right now."

The line drops.

Aizawa pulls his phone away and confirms it, the small beep and silence due to the call dropping. Aizawa tries to call into Nezu's 'War Room' again, tries to call Nezu's personal line, his office. Every single call drops.

"Mandalay, I need you to dial this number to get in contact with Principal Nezu," Aizawa says, because his phone is just having an inconvenient error right now. Mandalay's phone wouldn't be affected. His phone has been having issues, he should have listened to Hizashi when he talked about getting an upgrade.

It's not due to Shiori, and Mandalay getting through to Nezu's personal line isn't because her phone wouldn't be affected if the security protocols were hijacked like all members of staff's phones would be. The method of communication that would be their lifeline in a real incident.

It's been more than 50 seconds, and Aizawa makes his way to the door, confident that Mandalay can manage the situation. USJ would be secure, his students protected by four pro-heroes, but there are six unaccounted for students who might be on campus grounds and locked out of any safe bunker, a group with two young children in a similar situation. There are supposed to be orders coming down from Nezu as to who would sweep the campus for those unfortunate enough to be locked out, to find the intruders and dispatch them, but those orders might not be coming down. "Sensei!"

Aizawa tries his badge again, and it doesn't work. The light remains red. "Yes?" Aizawa finds himself surprised that he can answer Jirou and only sound annoyed, rather than panicking.

Jirou hands him her cell phone, and Aizawa already knows he doesn't need to ask who 'Loudmouth' is, even if he eventually wants to know why Jirou has Hizashi's phone number. "Hey, couldn't get through to you, I know you're busy but just tell me the kids are okay?"

Hizashi is panicking, because he knows that Aizawa would be busy with the orders that still aren't coming through, and that he'd be searching for Hitoshi and Eri if this door would open. "They're locked out, but Mirio is with them. You'll likely be called back to campus for the meeting."

That's not according to protocol. Hizashi is on patrol and the after-incident meeting would take place with responding staff members, then mentioned again at the monthly staff meeting. And Hizashi knows that. "On my way. 10 minutes."

10 minutes, and Aizawa has no idea what he'll find when he gets close enough to campus. He can only hope that Hizashi can get on campus, that those security protocols won't lock him out as well. He hands Jirou's phone back to her, tries to keep himself from reacting. He's a hero, he's Eraserhead, he's their teacher. He's not worried.

"The rooftop has manual access, the key is in the breaker box," Mandalay reports, and the rest of her team is trying to reassure the students. His own students are among them, the students coming out of those zones where training had suddenly been cut short emerge into this darkened arena confused but their peers are going to meet them, to explain the situation. "40 students unaccounted for on the grounds, but Midnight, Thirteen, and Powerloader are outside."

Hound Dog isn't mentioned, and Aizawa doesn't want to think about that. As soon as he starts to move to the door that leads to the access stairwell, Mandalay grabs his arm and tries to hand him her phone, but he shakes his head. "You need to be in communication."

Mandalay's quirk would do just as well as the intercom announcements he still hasn't heard.

[Intruder detected on campus. All buildings are on lock down. Heroes are being dispatched for those who are locked outside. Please make your way to the nearest building to assist them.]

Mandalay's voice echoing in Aizawa's head sounds steady, professional, and he envies that now. Now that he feels the same panic under his skin, making the cold air outside duller with it, because he doesn't know where his charges are either.

Mirio stops and turns, his eyes going a little wider because he sees it. “Oh, I’m sure they’re not being mean, Shinsou! I just thought it was kind of funny. If you could pick whatever birthday you want, why that one, you know?”

Mirio’s smiling, so 27 tries to smile back. He tries to laugh, but the air is cut off in his throat, right below the knife. ‘Funny.’

The knife pulls a little tighter, and 27 knows he’ll see it. The knife placed right in the gap between two folds of his orange knit scarf. He’s already seen that 27 isn’t moving, that he’s stuck in place in a way that has everything to do with 127’s hand on the back of his neck, the cold scales of his fingers holding his shoulder and neck at the join. “And half-birthdays are a thing, you know! My dad would make super-fruity-tooty pancakes for my half-birthdays before I kind of grew out of them. And since your birthday is July 1st... That means New Year’s Day can be super special!”

27 won’t see it. “Get rid of them,” 127 rasps, so quietly, and 27 doesn’t know why he wants that. Why he won’t just do it, why he cares, why the scar on his side where 127’s blade should have done the job already stings.

But he knows it’s not worth questioning. He has to obey. “Hey Eri,” 27 calls, and he doesn’t want her to see it. He knows he has to use her, and it feels sick, it feels sicker than the cold numbness that’s enveloped him completely.

He’s just grateful he has the words this time.

“I love you,” 27 says, and hates he can’t just say those words. That Mirio has to find those words odd, even if he just smiles at it, at Eri. That he can’t just see her swinging Kota’s hand in hers, see her smiling at him, the snowflakes dancing in the air. He has to leave it.

“I love you too!” Eri answers, and he knew she would. He didn’t know if he’d be able to catch the string but he does, he doesn’t know if it will work but he has no idea what to do if it doesn’t.

Eri’s eyes turn white, and she drops Kota’s hand, but he forces the thought like he used to. Take Kota’s hand. Turn around. Eri does, she does it and it works, but he doesn’t feel any warmer from it. Run forward.

Eri runs, and Kota finds it odd. He tries to tug his hand away, shouting complaints, but he’s dragged behind her and forced to keep up. They’ll both be safe as long as they keep running.

“Wait, Eri!” Mirio looks confused, and he looks at him. He shouldn’t, he should just run after Eri, he should leave, he can’t stay here.

“T-tag,” 27 says, as soon as he thinks of it. Eri is running, Kota is running. This is just a game, and Mirio just has to chase after them. “You’re it.”

27 just keeps trying to smile, to say that everything is okay. It’s okay, he’ll follow if Mirio runs. He’s smiling, it’s fine. Just run.

But he can’t command Mirio with his quirk like that. He can’t do that to anyone but Eri. He just has to hope that Mirio will turn around, instead of smiling like that. Instead of snorting like this is funny.

“Tag, huh?” There’s a moment where 27 is sure Mirio sees it, the line he knows is drawn over his neck, where 127 has made his threat too clearly. Mirio walks forward, towards him, the wrong way, and despite how wrong it is, 27 nearly sees the red cape that he saw before, during the raid on the 8 Precepts. “You’re it!”

It's a blur, too many hands on him, tugging in too many ways he doesn't know which one to follow. Mirio's hand on his shoulder pulls away and wraps around 127's hand, something dragging him down and away, the gasped sounds of a struggle. 27 is on the ground, the snow is cold on his folded legs. He's just sitting there, staring at Mirio's back, his arms outward but bent, hands fisted, until he wipes his nose, blood smeared on the back of his white glove.

Mirio is crouched, and waiting, 127 is out of his reach and invisible but he made Mirio bleed.
"Shinsou, run."

27 can't breathe. Mirio can't fight this. "'Shinsou,' eh? You got found, got this cute little family now. 'I love you,' how sweet."

127 is invisible, nearby, but the only indication of his presence is that taunting voice. There's no breath, no footprints made in the snow. He sees Mirio's breath in clouds and thinks he can't do that. "Shinsou, I need you to move. Go and get Eri, get Aizawa—"

"Eri? Aizawa? Making all kinds of friends here," 127 says, and he's somewhere else. He's closer, to the side, closer to 27. "Oh, I'm not mad though! I'm proud of ya, kiddo. You were always such a quiet little kid back at Miasma."

27 feels the tremble in his chest, a puff of air from his mouth that feels more like vomit. Mirio can't know that name. "Shinsou!"

"It's been a while, you might not recognize me," 127 says, closer still. 27 hears footsteps but they aren't as loud as they should be. Mirio is pulling him up to stand on legs 27 barely has, and against his chest isn't warm at all, it's barely there. "Of course, anyone who sees my face gets...."

Killed. "Shinsou, look at me," Mirio isn't smiling, it's worse than when he looked at Chisaki. It's worse than the determined grin and eyebrows drawing tighter, more like a frustrated grimace with each dodge. "You need to go—"

If I go, you need to come with me, I can't let you die. Why won't you leave? "What can you possibly do without your quirk?"

"I can distract him so you can get away, and if I die, I'll die as a hero," Mirio answers, before his hands on 27's shoulders fall away, and his face turns blank, his eyes frosting over. That isn't what Mirio wanted to say, 27 imagines.

That's not what he wanted to say either. Those weren't his words. "Jeez, that's pretty messed up. What the hell have these guys been feeding you? Your eyes freakin' glowed..."

Not his words.

Those weren't his words.

Not his quirk.

Fingers snapping in his face. "Earth to 27, we back? We good? Yeah, let's get Tin-Tin out of here, we're on a tight schedule, alright? And my ass is freezing out here, literally. Cold blooded and all."

127 still isn't killing him, and it doesn't make sense. Not when he hears the knife slide back into its sheath.

"Look, it's fine, you're not in trouble anymore. Boss just wants to bring you back home. No hard feelings about last time, right? I'll just take some blood out of you, you'll come back home- hey, no mask this time! Isn't that nice? Bug said it herself!"

That doesn't make any sense.

"Look," 127 says, a hand resting on 27's shoulder, and he can't look at 127 anyway, he's invisible. "Things might have been fun here, with the... eating I guess, the friends. You can tell us all about it! But, you know this is the best way it can go, right? I'm not gonna kill you, those heroes don't have to know what you did. Because if this investigation ends with Miasma going topside, that means all those little compliment cards from your clients get found, and that's...."

Aizawa said he's not going to jail. He said it. He said he was forced to do it. He won't be in trouble. He'll stay.

"There's two ways this can go, little bro," 127 says, his voice growing firm along with the grip he has on his shoulder. "Either Tin-Tin leaves, and we make our way back to our merry little home, or... I make him leave, and then I'm looking at a disloyal little Number who doesn't like those nice second chances. Do you think Boss didn't tell me what to do if that happens?"

Disloyal little Numbers... disloyal little Numbers.... Are the tastiest to them. Cherry and Blossom. Bug's voice echoes in his head, she's almost here, but she's not. 27 tells himself she's not, those bugs aren't in his skin, even if the scars are burning, even if he can feel 127's eyes on him. He goes back, or Mirio dies, and then he dies.

The silence of the snow answers him, there are no heroes and no robots here. And they won't be coming.

An unexpected influence can tip the game.

What will happen? "Do you think you'll end up any differently from 148?" 27 asks, but he doesn't, it's not him asking. He's aware this time of that blindness that flashes before he finds the words pulling in his throat, how someone else possesses him like a ghost, like a Gengar. A piece deeper than skin, deeper than the tattoo that he took from Nemoto in that fusion.

"No, when it comes to that, I want them to put me in the same fucked up body he has," 127 answers, his words monotone and forced, as blank as his eyes probably are at this point. "It's romantic, being one like that. The only way we could ever escape."

27 forces himself to breathe, even if he wants to collapse and curl into himself, he can't. Mirio is still behind him, 127 is somewhere in front of him, even if his hand has fallen away from his shoulder. Three people under his control, Eri was running away with Kota but they might find someone.

Someone else might come and see this.

"Mirio, take two steps back." The crunching snow answers him, the barest feeling of warmth that 27 had at his back taken over by cold. "Turn to face the dorms."

He could leave it there. He could wait for someone to come. He could make 127 walk with them to USJ. He can't imagine the look on Aizawa's face, but he imagines he would be proud. Proud that 27 captured a real Number like that.

"Walk forward."

But 27 knows that won't work. 127 will never talk, and at the end of his time, he'll be pulled back, and 127 knows it. 127 will fail his job, but he'll tell Boss everything - where 27 is, where Eri and Mirio are. Who they are to them. To kill them.

Mirio's back is turned to him when he looks, and there's no objects that will stop him until he gets to the dorms, or the trees far beyond the dorm buildings. Even then, he might keep walking until he reaches the wall around campus.

Everything is silent and deserted. No one is coming. Yet.

The snow continues to fall, and 27 knows what he has to do. "De-deactivate your quirk-k."

127 is standing in front of him, his eyes focused on either side of his head, but he imagines they're glazed over. He wears the same black uniform, it seems oddly nostalgic to see it after so many years, the only change is the weird red button on 127's shoulder. But the trailing scars where his scales have been peeled away from his neck and over his chameleon face make him shudder. He failed, only once, only with 27, and Bug did that.

But he can't feel guilty now. "T-take your kn-nife out, and ha-hand it over."

127 has his katanas strapped to his back behind his small backpack, a row of throwing knives on his belt. There's two larger knives that he enjoys using the most, polished and gleaming and wickedly curved. There's a moment of hesitation because 27 wasn't specific, but 127's hand draws up and pulls out the one on the left. 27 can't ask if it's his favorite.

27 takes the knife carefully by the blade, wrapping his hand around the handle like it's his first time holding a weapon. He adjusts his grip pointlessly, tries to breathe out this trembling worry. He can't think of what will happen to the body, not when that thought is overwhelmed by where to strike to make sure 127 doesn't have long to fight after the control breaks. Severing his spinal cord at the back of his neck would be the best, but 127 was happy to brag that the flaring cartilage over the top of his head and down the back protected him against that. His scales also make it tough to get a good strike in.

50 told him to never do this. 50 said he wouldn't be able to come back the same way. Taking a life takes something from a person, something that can't be recovered. The Miasma would take enough, everything has taken too much. 27's skin is little more than scars, his mind is broken, he'll never be normal.

Not even his quirk is his.

27 has nothing left to him, nothing that's his own. He has a promise that for over a year, he can stay at UA, but promises are just stories. Nothing has been proven. There's just a chance he can keep this.

But there's more than a promise, there's a threat he knows The Miasma means now. 127 will take him back for whatever reason, or he'll kill him. Failing that, he'll bring back all the information that Miasma needs to kill Eri. To make him regret it. To sever any loose end that 27 has made because he talked about The Miasma. Aizawa, Yamada, Eri, Mirio, every student he's ever met. They'll all die, and all that blood will be on his hands.

27 raises the knife, ignoring how it's shaking, how he can't make himself hold it tight enough. His hands are refusing to obey him. He can see the twin valleys in 127's neck where his scales become smaller, turn white underneath his neck until it reaches the high collar of his black uniform. He imagines the front of 127's torso is like that, like a chameleon's. The small white scales look a bit softer on the underside.

There are too many things on the edges of 27's mind, how he shouldn't, how he shouldn't, the icy air around him nearly filled with other voices. 50 telling him not to, Bug's growl when he messed up in training, Boss' snort and the smell of his cigar smoke, things he left behind and things he intends to keep. His teeth are grinding, jaw too tight, he can feel the mask again and digging into his face to do more than create scars, to bleed.

The swing of the knife should have slit half of 127's throat, the tip angled to dig in deeper to hit that vein. The knife falls out of his hands afterwards and 27 watches the blood gush from the wound, 127 bends forward and pulls his hands around it. "Little shit-"

Little shit little shit little shit Cherry and Blossom 8 hours 12 hours

He holds a hand in front of himself, trying to shove 127 away when he charges, but there's a blinding blow to his jaw before the ground rises up to meet him. 127 holding his arm too tight behind his back, the strain and stretch in his shoulder is too painful, sharp knee in the middle of his back, snow instead of air in front of his face. He just needs to raise his head enough to talk, 127 will have to answer-

Hari's hand in his hair can't breathe can't breathe water is supposed to be warm it's cold it's not warm it's cold it's cold so he's not there, he's not there, he's not here either-

He only has time to gasp when 127 tugs his head back further, too rough and it feels like his neck will break, but his hand releases and cold

Cold metal digs in.

"Bug really thought of everything-" Click.

His old mask is back on his face, no bigger than it was before. His face is bigger, everything too tight, he can feel the blood warm on his skin more than the pain where his flesh is being sliced through. He doesn't miss this, it's not nostalgic even if this is the biggest piece of his childhood he could ever regain. He's long since learned not to try to open his mouth, that the metal will dig in deeper, but he does. And he screams.

He's losing pieces of his body in this cold, in this numb, in this red red anger. He thrashes, losing thought, the knowledge that there's some way out of this pin is only a thought he can't catch in his mind because he needs to get out. They can't take him, they can't take him, they can't take him back.

127 was always bigger than him, but he's smaller now. There's a blade at his throat, a tug at the strap of the mask, but 27 is able to roll with it. He thrashes and bucks, gets himself free despite the fingers still clawing at him, he claws through the snow until he can pull himself up, until he can run.

Until his hand finds the blade of that knife he dropped.

27 drags himself up, holds the knife, and the blade is no longer shaking. He's shaking at every edge, but inside the frenzy, there is steel inside himself. He knows 127 is better at knives, he's trained more, he's killed more, but 27 holds the knife in front of himself and doesn't flinch when 127 uses his quirk to disappear.

127's Chameleon quirk means that he's cold blooded. He can't count on any surveillance cameras to detect his body temperature, that's why 127 is so good at his job. But that means 127 is likely reaching a limit for what his body can handle in these cold conditions, like Asui would. The blood from the wound at his neck does more than better 27's chances, it gives him one.

He can see the droplets of blood on the snow. He can see the bigger smears where his face was pressed against it when 127 put on the mask, and he can feel that warm blood flowing down his neck, catching on the scarf.

27 was forced to wear this mask again, but this time, he's taking it off. His blood flows, and his blood sings, and the only thought in his mind is how to spill the last of 127's blood on this snow, to free himself from Miasma.

*

"Open the fuck up!" Kacchan screams, kicking at the door to the dorm, and Midoriya bites down the urge to tell him to calm down, because he knows that will only make Kacchan more angry. More worried.

They all heard Mandalay's voice through her quirk, that there was an intruder on campus and they needed to stay by the nearest building until the situation could be better assessed. That didn't include instructions for hero students with provisional licenses to help, but he's sure Iida feels the same pull he does. That they could help, they could at least find the others who are locked outside and probably scared.

Kirishima probably picks up that Kacchan might be in the same situation. "Hey bro, if we have to replace the door again, Sensei's so not gonna be happy with us—"

"Frog bitch is gonna freeze to death thanks to those fucking Herotube clout mongering fucks," Kacchan argues, and it's a little surprising. Midoriya didn't think he was paying attention at all when he talked about how it was kind of sad that Gentle and La Brava turned to petty villainy when they couldn't make it as heroes. And being worried about Tsuyu, even if he was still using that insulting nickname, was nice.

"I'm fine," Tsuyu argues, but she sounds a bit more irritated than usual, and leans a bit closer to Iida from where she's standing. Aizawa-sensei lets her wear leggings and long-sleeved shirts in the winter under her uniform, but she only has one set from the Support Department that has self-contained heating elements woven in to be truly effective from the cold. Kacchan might be exaggerating how dangerous the situation is, but it's still not entirely safe.

Midoriya steps closer to Tsuyu anyway, just in case. It might be a better use of Kacchan's frustration if they could all just huddle close around Tsuyu to make sure she's kept warm while they wait for more instructions. At least Tokoyami seems to agree, also wordlessly stepping forward to close Tsuyu in a bit more.

Looking at the other dorms, not a lot of students are locked out with them, and they mostly seem bored or frustrated with the situation. He can see Hadou and Amajiki on the front steps of the 3-A dorm, but he's not sure if it would be weird to call out to them. Hadou is still in her costume, probably coming back from a patrol. Amajiki looks oddly well-dressed, kind of like he's getting ready to go on a date.

Monoma, Tetsutesu, and Kendo had also been locked out, but Monoma shouted some things that were hard to hear from this distance, then started storming off. Tetsutetsu chased after him, but Kendo was still in front of the dorm, sitting on the steps all alone. Midoriya should probably invite her to join them in waiting, but he still hasn't worked up the nerve to do that yet.

Midoriya hears Hadou shouting, and looks over to see her running towards Togata. Mirio doesn't look like he's reacting to Hadou, he's walking in a very odd way. He doesn't have Eri or Kota or Shinsou with him either, and that doesn't make sense, because he wouldn't leave them at another building. "Togata-sempai!"

Midoriya runs, but Hadou reached Togata first, she saw the blood trailing down Togata's nose where it looked like he had been punched. Midoriya only caught a glance before Hadou shook his shoulder then slapped him, something he might be wrong about, but he was sure that Togata's eyes were glazed over and white.

What Kacchan said his eyes looked like when Shinsou used his quirk on him.

Togata jumps back from Hadou, like he hadn't noticed she was there, like he couldn't really see it before, and Midoriya stops in his tracks. He knows what that feels like, to have everything crashing back at once. "Shinso-Shinsou, he's being attacked!"

Togata tries to turn around and run back the way he came, but Hadou holds his arm. Midoriya hears the others running over, he feels the urge swell to run forward in his upperclassman's stead. "How many? Where, what quirks?" Hadou asks, and her voice is far more serious than it usually is when she asks less important questions.

"One, invisible with a knife, between the P.E. grounds and USJ," Togata answers, before he grits his teeth, tugging his arm out of Hadou's grasp to wipe at the blood under his nose. "Got a cheap shot- Eri and Kota were running towards USJ, Shinsou made them. Tried to get-get everyone to leave."

Amajiki and Hadou trade a look, a look that Midoriya only has to look back to confirm with the others. Eight heroes to respond to one villain, one rescue operation. To save Shinsou from the intruder that was attacking him.

Amajiki lays a hand on Togata's shoulder, and Midoriya almost wants to look away out of respect for his upperclassman. "Stay here-"

"No," Togata refuses, swatting his classmate's hand away. "Hell no, it's one guy, Shinsou is-"

"The teachers are going to come here first to check for students that are locked out," Amajiki argues. "We need someone to tell them what's going on. Just in case it's not just one person."

"Come on!" Kacchan yells, dragging Kirishima with him. Iida hesitates, but fires up his quirk and quickly pulls ahead of them, Tokoyami manifests Dark Shadow into wings and takes flight, Tsuyu drops to all fours because she can be quicker that way than standing. Midoriya knows he can catch up to them, that he will, but he can't ignore the pain so clear in Togata's eyes when he realizes what Amajiki really means.

That Lemillion can't respond to this.

"Sempai," Midoriya says, because he has to say it. He has to take responsibility for what he offered but was still denied, something that wouldn't have needed to be offered if All Might had never noticed him. Something that Midoriya reminds himself might have been lost to the quirk erasing bullet regardless. "Lemillion cleared the way."

Lemillion let them know what to expect, that the fight was taking place, and who to rescue. Midoriya doesn't doubt that Lemillion gave Shinsou a fighting chance, that he fought for Shinsou to have a chance to run, and that he was injured for that.

He worries that Shinsou turned around like Eri did, and tried to do something to protect them. Eri surrendered, asking Overhaul to take her back if everyone who had gotten hurt could be healed, and the hurting could stop.

Midoriya has no idea who this ‘Overhaul’ really is in this situation, if it’s a member of the ‘Villain School’ Shinsou talked about that Aizawa-sensei is investigating, or if it’s someone more familiar. Someone from the League of Villains.

But he won’t let them take Shinsou.

Midoriya activates Full Cowl to catch up with the others, to at least accompany Iida who should be first on the scene. He knows Hadou should catch up sooner if she uses her quirk to fly, that Amajiki will be the last to arrive. That if Amajiki wanted to stay behind with Togata, no one would fault him for it.

But Midoriya catches up to Tsuyu and Kirishima in time to see the others standing near a group of trees, and he can see Shinsou’s purple hair in the distance. He can see that Shinsou is moving a lot, as he gets closer he can see someone with black clothes and a green head moving around with him. Attacking him, and Midoriya can see that he’s fighting back. And he can see that Tetsutetsu is nearby, with his quirk activated and his skin metallic, but he’s waving his arms around like he can’t see where the fight is. “FUCK OFF-”

Kacchan lunges, his feet sparking off with an explosion, but something grabs him and throws him back to the ground. Midoriya sprints and arrives at the back of the group, where Monoma is standing in front of them with his arms raised up, blocking them. And Monoma meets his eyes with a sour look, before he glances behind him. “Yes, you can see them right now, but that invisibility quirk is affecting Shinsou too, it looks like it has a radius of about 16 meters. That means anyone who gets close enough to intervene goes in blind.”

“We only need to provide a distraction and defense for Shinsou,” Iida argues. “I can charge through-”

“And get sliced up by both of them because Shinsou isn’t retreating,” Monoma shouts, closer to how he normally talks with a derisive snort that Midoriya is sure will follow with a bunch of insults that won’t help the situation. “Tetsutetsu and I tried that tactic, we lost track of the fight-Frog girl, remind me how long your tongue is.”

“20... meters, kero,” Tsuyu answers, probably catching the same thing Midoriya does, that Monoma needs a reminder. Not an answer. And he’s probably copied Tsuyu’s quirk when they didn’t notice.

“Great, extraction. You need to pull Shinsou out, Hardening pairs nicely with Steel to provide a defensive wall, I’ll join in of course,” Monoma says, before his skin turns just as metallic as Tetsutetsu’s. “We’ll need distraction to break through the fight and know where it is, thank you Engine and Speed Strength enhancement quirks. Shadowy Shadow, I think you had enhanced durability but coordinating the wall and distraction would be swell, Blasty needs to fetch an adult-”

“Like fucking hell-”

“Because he doesn’t have a license and he’ll just get stabbed to shit,” Monoma says, and he sounds like he hasn’t sworn very much from the way he says that word. He’s glaring down at Kacchan, but that’s not an easy fight to win. “Shinsou is already hurt and needs medical attention and I’m not arguing, let’s go.”

“Eri,” Kirishima says, laying a hand on Kacchan’s shoulder that he only shrugs off. It’s only a look, and barely a nod, but Kacchan turns and starts running towards USJ, where Eri and Kota were last seen heading towards.

“Nejire-chan is coming too!” Midoriya adds, but Monoma just nods and gets into position with Kirishima to provide an initial defense for Tsuyu.

This isn’t the time or place for it, not when Midoriya is running shoulder to shoulder with Iida and trying to see which trees he can jump off of, whether he can reorient himself at a distance and jump forward to still enter the fray as fast as he can. This isn’t the time.

But he really needs to hang out with Monoma if he can take inventory of their quirks and have a plan like this figured out in seconds. “Now!”

*

Aizawa finds his breath caught in his throat as soon as he sees those two small figures. “Eri!”

He’s already running towards them, he can see that it’s only Eri and Kota, that Hitoshi and Mirio are still unaccounted for. He can see that Kota is digging his heels into the snow, that he’s shouting, but Eri isn’t reacting to him. Aizawa doesn’t need to get close enough to confirm her white eyes. “She’s not listening to me!”

Aizawa steps in front of Eri’s path, and she doesn’t react to it at all. Even when he tries to pick her up, he feels her legs still kicking, that her hold on Kota’s captive hand doesn’t loosen. Her expression is still blank and familiar. “Eri,” Aizawa has to say, and it’s illogical, but that small pinch he gives to her ear makes him feel guilty.

But pain is the only way to interrupt Hitoshi’s control when he’s not in Aizawa’s line of sight.

Eri jolts and seems surprised, looking around then at Aizawa’s arm around her, before Kota tugs his hand out of her grasp. “That weird guy was acting weird, then she ran off and didn’t let me go, and there-there was-”

“Twenny,” Eri says, quietly at first before her hands find Aizawa’s shoulder, nearly jolts out of his arms to try to find leverage to look around. “TWENNY!”

“Where were you two? Where is Hitoshi and Mirio?” Aizawa asks, pulling Eri closer to his chest while he looks at Kota. He knows Eri isn’t in a state to answer, knows by her panicked attempts to free herself from his grasp that something went wrong. Something is horribly wrong, and this is no benign intrusion.

“Next to some trees, and a big track,” Kota answers, his own eyes too wide, too panicked. But Mandalay taught him well, he knows how to help heroes in these situations. “There was a guy, he appeared out of nowhere when I looked back, he was standing behind the weird guy with a knife. Looked like a lizard.”

Near the P.E. field, a man with some lizard quirk was standing behind Hitoshi after Hitoshi used his quirk on Eri to make both children leave. And he had a knife.

And Hitoshi must have known him.

“You two...” Aizawa trails off, because he can’t abandon these two to the locked doors of USJ. They would be utterly defenseless, not even Mandalay could get to her charge, and these two are the most vulnerable children on campus.

But he doesn't know if Hitoshi is properly defended either. Even with Mirio's training, that was training to compliment a quirk he no longer has.

Eri has stopped fighting, but trembles in his arms, and he hears explosions in the distance. With a sigh of relief he feels guilty for immediately, he can see that they are indeed familiar. Bakugo spots them from where he was using successive blasts from his quirk to rocket towards them, and raises his hands up above his head to try to accelerate his descent to the ground with two more blasts.

He lands heavily a safe distance away, but wipes his nose and gives no indication of the rough impact when he jogs forward. "Invisibility quirk, P.E. grounds, Shitsou. Do the fucking math and hand her over."

Bakugo opens his arms for Eri, but when Aizawa tugs, she clings to him with small arms far heavier than his capture scarf. "No! He's safe, he's not scared, he's not scared, Zawa! 'S bad dream!"

Aizawa hears the sob, and he can feel the tears running warm over Eri's cheeks before he pulls her away enough to look at her properly. He can see how much this terrifies her, how unfair it is, how they should both be safe.

And he'll make them safe. "Eri, I need to go to Shinsou. I'm going to bring him back here. I need you to stay here with Bakugo so we know where to go, where to find you."

Eri nods, despite her tears and her sobbing, she sucks in her lip and nods because she wants to help them know where to go, even if she doesn't understand that instruction or that it's pointless. She wants to have some small part in saving Hitoshi, some power over that, and Aizawa will make sure she succeeds.

Bakugo takes Eri into his arms and she quickly buries her face in his shoulder, but he doesn't hesitate to take Kota's hand too. Kota didn't hesitate to offer it. "The doors are locked, but Mandalay can still hear you-"

"Go," Bakugo barks out, and Aizawa knows he can handle this much. Bakugo is his student, he knows he can defend these two children, and Bakugo already likely knows that permission to use his quirk to do so is already given. It was before at summer camp, and Aizawa will take any blame again to avoid casualties.

Aizawa runs towards the P.E. grounds, 'invisibility' running through his mind, and he dares not think of the efficient and highly-praised murderer 127. Not until he can see him with his own eyes.

*

27 can't see where he is, and no one can see him. 127 is hiding him too. "Shinsou! Over here!"

Quirk Thief and Metal tried to cut in, but they won't see it. Not until more blood flows on the snow, the last of it. It's getting easier to tell where 127 is. "Oh, Bug's gonna do a number on you, little brother, I guarantee it."

He still can't see 127's breath, but he hears how ragged it is. How long this has drawn out - lunge, strike or not, dodge, dodge, dodge. 127 can still see him. He can choose what's seen to others inside those 15 meters.

27 should feel more than the trickle of blood where he's been cut, but he doesn't. The only pain he feels is where the mask digs in. "Shinsou!"

He should hear the engines, but instead he hears too-quick, too loud footsteps. He turns to look, knowing that he's going to lose track of the blood on the snow, whose it is, but sees Iida and Midoriya charging for him. He sees too many of them, so many of them, they'll see it.

But Midoriya darts past him, the glow and crackle of his electric quirk a blur, and Iida grunts where he's been stabbed 127 stabbed him killed him blood on his hands

Something wraps around his stomach and pulls, nearly pulls him to the ground Aizawa's scarf but it pulls him to land in the snow, at a distance. He can see two Metals and Kirishima, their backs turned to him, standing close. "I have him!"

He turns to look, not Aizawa. Asui, crouching next to him, her tongue hanging too far out of her mouth. He looks down and it's wrapped around him. There's so much blood, his clothes are torn, he feels so much blood.

"Shinsou, it's alright-" Asui's hands hovered, not sure exactly where he was, and that's how he knew. And she should have known, he's shown him before. Her tongue is vulnerable to his knife, it only took a nick to loosen it with her pained yelp.

27 charges forth and knows that 127's quirk is still being used on him. He dives through a gap in the wall of durability quirks, feels hands grasping at him but missing, sees Iida kneeling alive not bleeding. He hears shouting, knows they're shouting again, but he just needs to find that blood on the snow, the trail.

He sees the shadow descend, leaps over it, and sees 127 running away. He's far enough into the trees that 27 can see him, and he charges after him, uneven ground made more dangerous with this blanket of snow, but there's droplets of blood. There's a knife in his hands aching for more.

127 asked for this. When they put that mask on him the first time, they wanted this. Everything that they wrought, everything that was ripped and warped from him. This is him, now. He'll take what can't be recovered from, and the trees will hide it from their sight. "Shinsou!"

127 was bending down, slowing, when Midoriya called out from his left. 27 keeps running, keeps track of where 127 was, there should be blood on the ground. There should be blood, will be blood, he'll dig this knife in and make it hurt, pay 127 back in kind from that cold blade that sank into 27's side the first time. 'No hard feelings,' he said.

There won't be, not after this. "Shinsou!"

The wind is knocked out of his ribs, the crackling of Midoriya's quirk, and he sees it glowing where Midoriya has grabbed him around his waist, his shoulder digging into his chest. The ground and snow has been taken from him, he's flying or falling, but he sees 127 come into view from the distance that swiftly comes. Sees that 127 wasn't as wounded as he seemed, but has drawn out his katana.

He feels the impact when Midoriya crouches and lands with his feet braced against a tree, feels the cold dig of the bark against his back after the blistering warmth of Midoriya's hand on his chest, pinning him there. He sees that Midoriya almost knows where to look him in the eye, and that determined frown has a harder edge to it. Almost as sharp as the edge of the blade he used to cut Asui's tongue.

"Lot of friends, got a lot of friends," 127 rasps in the distance, behind Midoriya's shoulder. Midoriya turns to look, his hand still braced on 27's chest. 27 looks too, and sees the exact moment when 127 disappears. "They know what you did, little bro? They know how much you loved it?"

How you're so good at being a good little Number when you want to be."

Lies. Bug never said that. He's never been good, not for anyone, but especially for them.

"You," Midoriya nearly growls, his voice almost foreign with that tone, his quirk seeming to glow brighter. "You... put that mask on--"

"Talked too much, sure was shit at listening," 127 says, closer now. Midoriya can't see him either, he doesn't know to look for the blood. 27 can't tell him, can't see it either. "You know there's no escape, no retirement. You're not getting out. There's only so many ways it can end, little bro, I've already told you how it goes. Those little friends you've got are dead, you're gonna wish you were dead, and I'm gonna carve that little girl up like a--"

The hand pinning his chest leaves, but 27's breath catches because Midoriya can't see him. He thinks Midoriya is charging to his doom, right into that blade, but he kicks into a tree, into the air, before he twists with a fist raised, with his quirk glowing and flickering. He's high enough in the air to see 127, if 127 doesn't move.

If 127 doesn't see him too, doesn't prepare for it. He will.

127 will kill Midoriya if 27 doesn't kill him first.

He sees more than blood, snow kicked up, and charges with the knife held tight in his fist. He doesn't know if 127 will take him out instead, but he can't let Midoriya be killed, he can't let him fall on that blade. He swings his knife forward and feels it connect, feels 127's arm against his collarbone and only has a second to think it should be sharper, should be his sword. "60%!"

27 loses his footing when he feels that wave, that forceful wall in front of him, and nearly slips, before something winds around his waist again. He's dragged back, his vision blurs, he only catches the sight of green hair and pink tongue before his head tips downwards.

He can't drag enough air into his mask, somehow he hasn't noticed this suffocation. His arms won't move, but they sting.

"Shinsou," Tamaki crouches next to him, there's a rustle of fabric then something light against his shoulders. "Froppy, let him go, he's going into shock."

There's a hum in the air, and it's all he hears or feels, he feels like he's being pulled into it. He raises his head, tries to see where he's going. Golden spirals are pressing 127 into the ground, flowing from someone with so much light blue, a speck of green. Midoriya is being held up in the air by them.

There's a sting, worse than the others, throbbing worse. 27 pulls his shaking hand to it, gritting his teeth, other hands are on him. There's muttering, muted, he can barely hear it. His head swims, but he tries to feel that throbbing on the top of his shoulder because he's sure he's been stabbed there, even if there's no tear.

"Suneater," Neji's voice is too distant, 27's head spins. Tamaki yells something back, he's been stabbed. This burning in his shoulder, he has to concentrate to make himself breathe. He's going to die, fall asleep maybe. It's just like falling asleep.

He forces his eyes open, because he's sure he's dreaming it. Aizawa stands in front of him, his hair straight above him instead of floating. 27 follows the white of his scarf twisting in the air above his shoulders, a line to a tree. A tree where 127 is bound by that scarf.

“Hitoshi.” 27 knows he’s dreaming now, everything too light. Yamada’s green eyes catch too much light, Yamada is there at his side, hand curling around his shoulder, pulling something around him. A blanket that won’t stretch.

“One. Twenty. Seven,” Aizawa growls, slowly. It’s menacing, it’s frightening, he’s never seen Aizawa sound or look that angry. 127 laughs, a wheezing cut short when the capture scarf tightens. There’s too many people around 27, making him feel light, he needs to be more solid. “You’re going to regret attacking UA.”

127 hacks, drawing more ragged, rapid breaths when he’s able to. 27 wonders when the blood will seep into the capture scarf, how red it will stain. How it will be 27’s fault. “Oh, no regrets here. Just doing my job. Those sedatives kicking in, little bro?”

Sedatives? Probably. He feels so tired, but it’s fine. Yamada and Aizawa are here. He didn’t kill anyone. “Hitoshi, it’s alright. Come on, we’ll-we’ll get that off of you.” Right, his mask. Still hurts.

127’s grin twists, his lips bloodied, but he twists his body and thrashes until that red button slips under the loops of the capture scarf. It’s flashing now. “Just needed a little blood, you know. Don’t worry, 10’ll patch you right up.”

Sedatives. Not the katana. Throbbing. Stinging. Syringe.

127’s eyes are focused on him. Despite the hands under 27’s knees and knowing whose they are, he tries to pull away from them, his body barely responding. 127 grins. “See you at home, little bro.”

127 disappears, and the capture scarf falls limply into the snow. Not 127’s quirk. Boss’.

The sedatives. A syringe. 127 has his blood. And he’s going ‘home.’ Boss.

“..shi.” 27 can hear screaming, but it’s muffled behind clenched teeth and metal, before everything goes black.

*

Three injured students, their wounds minor - Mirio’s bloodied nose, Iida’s shallow laceration down his back, Asui’s tongue. Authorization was quickly given for licensed students to sweep the campus grounds once control over the security protocols was recovered, USJ and the A and B class dorms opening up.

Aizawa received a call from Principal Nezu that he only barely remembers answering, remembers the instructions to escort anyone injured to the staff dorm where Recovery Girl was setting up a station in the common room, a more defensible position than her office in the expansive academic building with too many entrances to maintain. He remembers what Nezu said more than what he said, that Eri, Kota, and Bakugo had joined the Wild Wild Pussycats’ group and were escorting the Gen Ed students to their assigned dorms. That as soon as Hitoshi’s condition had stabilized, he needed to report to the principal in person.

Hizashi carried Hitoshi the entire way, and didn’t think to return Amajiki’s jacket nearly falling out of the cradle of his arms. Aizawa passed along the instructions for the nine hero students that responded to sweep the grounds, unsurprised that Midoriya had to be convinced to go to reassure Eri, unwilling to argue when Amajiki insisted on following Iida, Asui, and Hizashi to the staff dorm.

Just in case. The situation had improved with the reinstated command of the security protocols, but only the sweep would prove whether every Number had been dealt with. If they hadn't escaped into thin air.

Hizashi lays Hitoshi down on a cot already prepared with an IV and med cart, and Recovery Girl begins asking questions while pulling off his jacket and scarf, his clothes. Trying to make sure to see the extent of the wounds beneath the bloody tears. There's so much blood.

"Shouta," Hizashi calls, his voice too steady and firm, but Aizawa can see the trembling rage in the corner of his jaw, in his eyes. "Get that thing off of him."

The mask. Black, cruel, ill-fitting. Forced on Hitoshi's face on UA's grounds, weeping blood in trails down his neck and gathering at every edge. Aizawa moves to stand at the head of Hitoshi's cot, lifting his unresponsive head with one hand while his other pulls out his lockpick set from his uniform. He has to crouch when he finds the lock more convoluted than it should be, but gently pulls the metal bands out and away and lifts it off of his face before Recovery Girl finishes cutting the last seam of Hitoshi's shirt. The kid is a bloody mess, his lips are blue and skin too pale and spotted with sweat.

Recovery Girl doesn't hesitate to start on the IV, but the lacerations seem shallow. Hizashi works to help confirm that, sanitizing a paper towel to begin cleaning it up. To reveal the worst of it.

"-might have used a sedative on Shinsou, it might have been shock, kero," Asui says, has been talking while Aizawa only heard numbness. Has been giving a report, helping Iida out of his shirt so that Amajiki and herself can determine whether he needs stitches. "He had been fighting until Nejire-chan attacked, he... was fighting us to keep attacking."

Hizashi presses a pre-prepared gauze to each wound, there's too many to count. Fresh wounds over scars, Hitoshi's face is still a bloody mess. Aizawa is still stuck standing there, staring. His students are doing more for this situation than he is. "Shou-"

Aizawa turns and leaves, the cold air meets him with only a second's hesitation, but he grits his teeth and won't go to Eri. Hitoshi is in good hands, his students are safe, and Aizawa wants answers.

He sees a few pairs of students sweeping the grounds, still in casual clothes for the most part. Upperclassmen that didn't have training scheduled, that were safe in their dorms after an uneventful week of school, that are answering the call to keep their very school safe. Students that he would probably recognize if he forced himself to look at them, but he doesn't.

Nezu's 'War Room' is on the bottom floor of the Support Department's dedicated studio, where the bulk of support equipment is tested and produced, along with the exam robots and security measures. Aizawa sees a fleet of unused robots collecting dust on the first floor before he turns and finds the door to the access stairwell, swiping his badge. He descends two steps at a time, scarcely recognizing how dark it becomes.

He opens the door to see well over 30 screens of live video on campus, flicking through cameras in seconds. A team of Support Department instructors that work beneath Powerloader are watching the screens, typing on keyboards, ultimately being useless. Principal Nezu sits in his chair facing the door, paws folded in front of a cold cup of tea, and Mirio turns to look at him with a flinch. "Eraserhead-"

"The security measures failed," Aizawa says, and he means worse. Worse than failure, they were a hindrance, those minutes clawing his way to the access door meant everything to his wards' safety.

“Why?”

Nezu doesn't react, but turns to nod at an instructor who looks away from the screens to nod back, and Nezu pulls himself out of his chair before he waves a hand for Mirio to follow. Aizawa thinks pettily about refusing to let them through the doorway, to kick the animal principal and send him flying, but grits his teeth and follows into the hall. Somewhere that apparently has more privacy.

“Togata, for the next 48 hours, you cannot breathe a word of this. Can I hold your confidence for that long?” Principal Nezu asks, the permanent smile carved into his face by his animal features seems gone and his eyes are oddly wide, oddly searching for honesty or any hint of weakness when Mirio nods. He closes his eyes for too long when he folds his hands behind his back and sighs. “The traitor inside UA tipped their hand to do this. To devastating consequences, but they have been found. It's undeniable now.”

Aizawa had two lists of suspects, one that Principal Nezu and Hizashi both agreed with, and one that he kept to himself. There are similarities between those names, but there is one name now, and he wants it. “Who?”

Even when he asks, he practically hears Principal Nezu answer with ‘Shiori.’ His informant, his asset, the pain in his ass that had made a game of hacking into his cellphone more than once but he trusted her when he shouldn't have. He has no idea if it's possible for her to make a jump from his hijacked phone to the security measures on campus, but he should have been more careful. She was there, before the attack happened. I wouldn't be worried about me right now.

That's a tone he's never heard from Shiori before, and he wonders if he ever really knew her. If the gray he saw was an illusion, the thinnest coat of white over pure black. But Principal Nezu frowns and shakes his head.

“That would be my domain. You have other concerns,” Principal Nezu says, then tilts his head up to look at Togata, who startles, still too jumpy now. Still too unnerved by these events, and Aizawa feels that too keenly. “Apart from the woman, the ‘distraction’ as I gather that dispatched Hound Dog with a near-lethal taser, there were three other assailants. Midnight and Powerloader saw them disappear as well at the end of the fight, but it seems that the target of this assault was Shinsou. Togata, if you would.”

Mirio refuses to look at Aizawa. His hands are fisted at his side, eyes on the ground, too much like the student he had to inform was quirkless only months ago. Who stared too long at first, taking too long to take in those words, before the gasped pleas his smiling mouth tried to fashion into laughter turned to sobs too rigidly felt on Aizawa's shoulder.

“We were heading back, towards USJ, and Shinsou stopped for some reason. I knew something was off, maybe something was getting to him. He... called out to Eri, and told her he loved her. Eri said she loved him too, then she turned around and started running off with Kota. That... was too weird, and I saw... how scared he was.”

The assailant, 127, had an invisibility quirk that would work within a 15 meter radius. Hitoshi stopped suddenly, then verbally called out to Eri with something that he knew would get a verbal response, to brainwash her and make her and Kota leave the scene. Somehow, those commands were carried through nonverbally.

“He told me it was a game of tag, that I was ‘it.’ I knew something was wrong, Shinsou has talked to me before, but it's always when something's going on.” Hizashi has said the same thing. With the exception of those Hitoshi has brainwashed, he tends to speak during times of severe distress. “Then, I saw blood. On his neck, out of nowhere. Like a knife was being held at his throat and I couldn't see it. Shinsou was so scared and I couldn't help thinking that-that I wasn't wrong about that, that something was wrong, so I grabbed him and there was that guy. I tried to get Shinsou to run away, but that invisible guy was taunting him, threatening him. Something about 'anyone who sees my face,' and 'Miasma.' And Shinsou... was too scared to move, and he looked at me and... his eyes lit up for a second."

Despite the exhausted and defeated look on Mirio's face, despite knowing how that confrontation ended, Aizawa can only think that Hitoshi saw hope in that brief moment instead of what Mirio truly means.

"He asked me, 'What can you possibly do without your quirk?' and I told him that I'd die if that kept him safe," Mirio says, his fists tightening at his side, his teeth catching on his bottom lip in a flash of a grimace, and Aizawa knows that Mirio knows better reassurance tactics from his class. He barely fathoms the real answer before Mirio says it. "I had to answer him, like in the raid. It felt exactly like that Confession quirk. And then Shinsou took control of me."

Confession, which forces an honest verbal response, and Brainwashing, that requires a verbal response. Something that Aizawa imagines Chisaki was trying to accomplish as much as he was trying to extend his own life in that inhumane abomination, that fusion where he pulled Hitoshi and Nemoto into his own body. In Chisaki's utter desperation, in his disregard for human life, he stitched three bodies into one squirming mass with blackened tendrils carved over his skin, a mouth in his right hand.

Hitoshi's right hand, that Chisaki had Unmade in front of Eri during a traumatic event, that trembled and shook so much at the beginning of his wardship. A tremble that hasn't bothered him since Chisaki died. Every visible sign that something was wrong with Hitoshi's quirk from the brutal sickness to his selective mutism, they've known from the beginning.

Hitoshi came out of that fusion with Nemoto's tattoo, and something else beneath the surface. Something that took time to take root, those severe fevers and temperature fluctuations were a sign of infection. Something mutated with Shinsou's quirk and made it into something else. Something he refuses to name.

"Sensei," Mirio says, he sees the grimace and stiff bend at his waist, but he catches Mirio's shoulder and stops him. He's not going to tolerate apologies in this. Not from Mirio.

"You did everything you could. You had no choice," Aizawa says, too stiffly. He still refuses to name it, this horror churning under his ribs. What Shinsou has become under their watch, while they were completely unaware. "I need you to go to Eri. She's at the 1-C dorm. She's worried, but she can't see Shinsou yet."

There's a break in Mirio's expression, already riddled with too much guilt, and before he can put the question to words, Aizawa forces himself to answer it.

"He's safe, but injured. With Recovery Girl," Aizawa says, his words fracturing as he feels like he's drawn into a pit despite how he fights it. He won't believe it, despite logic, despite the inevitable conclusion of Mirio's words that he doesn't doubt. Multiple quirks in one body.

Mirio nods, shakily, but his eyes seem too full of concern for Aizawa. "She can't see him like that, blood and all. He's hurt and he needs-" Mirio looks away, the back of his hand rubbing beneath his reddened nose, an injury he probably hasn't given himself time to feel. "He needs to be safe. Healed. I'll tell Eri-"

"Take your time," Aizawa says, squeezing Mirio's shoulder. Shoulders that carry too much already, that he relies on too easily, still belong to a student of his who has done enough. Mirio nods, breathes out to try to force his relief and composure into being, and looks at Aizawa before he turns and begins walking up the stairs.

Principal Nezu waits until they hear the door close, before he fixes Aizawa with a stare that lets him know this discussion isn't at an end. "UA should have been a safe place for Shinsou. You're right that those security protocols that we placed our trust in failed him, and for that, you have not only my apologies, but a promise that I will amend this."

"The name," Aizawa demands, because he has half a mind to make it right far within the 48 hours that Principal Nezu requested. He needs to know, in more ways than one, and Principal Nezu's silent refusal with a shake of his head confirms his worst suspicions.

There were students who were suspected, and he can't rule them out.

"Shiori," Aizawa asks, because he needs that at least. He's one of very few people who knows where she lives, and the chance that she's still there is diminishing. She's involved in this, he knows it. There's just the faintest sliver of his mind that hopes she somehow knew about the attack beforehand and tried to warn him.

"Detective Tsukauchi was the first person I contacted. He'll be handling that aspect," Principal Nezu answers, infuriatingly doesn't answer him properly. Principal Nezu knows what he means, but he won't say it.

Aizawa realizes that he can't handle knowing either. Not until it's done.

"The next 72 hours pose the greatest threat to Shinsou's safety, with the risk of a second attack. Especially because it will take time to carefully extract the traitor and the methods that they used to bring down our system. That unfortunately means that Shinsou will need to be moved to a safe house, a place completely off the grid," Principal Nezu says, and Aizawa has no idea where that would be.

He knows he needs to contact The Commission of Wardship Affairs, and he can think of few things he'd rather not do right now. He'd eat molten glass if that was an option, rather than trust Shinsou's safety with them and admit that he failed here.

"Have you visited your grandfather recently?" Contacting The Commission is a far better option.

"How do you even know about that?" Aizawa asks, because he doesn't want Principal Nezu to know that he's known that he knows for years, ever since he read his own staff file. No one knows or should know about his grandfather, and Aizawa can only imagine the conniption the old man would have if he knew that a Principal Nezu, so close to a government official, knew that he lived on a remote mountainside in a shack with no proper mailing address. He imagines that would be the shock that ends his grandfather's life.

He honestly doesn't know if the man is alive at this point. "It was quite an ordeal, but I do need to know these things about my employees," Principal Nezu says, but he doesn't. He doesn't need to know that about him at all. "It's because of that difficulty that I believe a little family reunion would be in order. I can see to it that your position at the dorm is covered this weekend-"

"This isn't protocol," Aizawa says, a weak defense. The Commission needs to be informed, Shinsou isn't even allowed to go off campus and especially not spirited away to a shack without running water. He knows that comes with devastating consequences, with a demand to trust them with Shinsou's safety and he doesn't. Especially not now.

“Protocol can fail,” Principal Nezu reminds him, and there’s a sternness in his unbreaking stare that reminds Aizawa that Nezu has many reasons to be protective of his ward. Many similarities. “It’s quite convenient that I will be ensuring a quirk specialist visit that will be kept confidential. Protocol be damned.”

Aizawa has never heard Principal Nezu mutter a swear harsher than ‘goodness,’ but he understands where it comes from too easily. Shinsou was a key component to the Nomu investigation, but not like this. If they knew, and if they learned they had a reason to take him away from this wardship, Aizawa doubts he would be placed with another hero. Not when ‘examining’ him may lead to different answers, and those ‘examinations’ might lead to Mind Slice’s involvement. “I need a HAM radio.”

Principal Nezu nods, and leads him up the stairs, past those useless robots and into a dark studio that already has the radio set up on a long workbench. Once again, Principal Nezu seemed to know he would win that argument and planned accordingly.

Principal Nezu leaves afterwards, and Aizawa appreciates that too much. Left in a dimly lit room, hesitating before he dials the frequency he still remembers somehow. After everything he’s been through today, this shouldn’t rattle him so much. “This is Shouta.”

He waits, gets the crackle of static and non-answers. As far as he remembers, the HAM radio has always been set up in the ‘living room.’ There’s a chance that the old man is outside. There’s a chance that the old man has died in the last nine years and is decomposing on the floor right by the radio.

“This is Shouta, I need... your help,” Aizawa answers, and his age shames him. He never asked the old man for a thing when he was growing up, and now at 32, he’s nearly begging for it. He doesn’t know if Principal Nezu has a Plan C, but Plan B can’t happen.

There’s a growl and a puff of air blown into the receiver, and Aizawa amends his previous worry about a dead man to a drunk one. “You shouldn’t be on this damn frequency, whoever you are. You tell me how you know that name, or by God I’ll- I’ll have you.”

A terrifying threat from a deranged hermit in his nineties. “This is your grandson, Shouta. I’d offer to tell you something only I would know, but I doubt you’d be able to remember anything.” He hears a short pause, followed by a chuckle. “Right, that is you. This a goddamn welfare check or something? Or you leave that blonde whats-his-name?”

That was the perfect can of worms to open if Aizawa wanted to push right past his breaking point. He’s well aware he should have hit it before now, and the fact that he’s asking for this is evidence to the point that he already has. “I need to stay with you for a few days, with... someone in my protection. It’s part of my hero work, and it’s extremely important.”

The static sings on every last nerve Aizawa has, because if the old man turns him down, he has no idea what to do. Shinsou’s condition can’t be discovered right now, this attack needs to be covered up, and if this is the first option Aizawa barely wants to consider the next one. “Who? You can’t just bring anyone here and you know it. You can’t say you know them either, I need to know them - their contacts, their people. Shady enough stuff out there.”

Aizawa sighs, rubbing his eyes. He briefly considers forcing one of his fingers through his eye socket as a reprieve from having to answer that. “A teenage boy, my ward. That means that he’s in danger, I’m supposed to protect him from criminals that are trying to silence him. Your place is the best safe house I have right now.”

He hears another snort, drier this time. “Criminals. Meaning this kid probably is one.” If he says that again, Aizawa will ignore all semblance of respect for the man who practically raised him or any mercy for his old age, and make sure he never says it again. “Criminals are easier to deal with though, more predictable than those shady suits you work for. Fine. A few days, I’ll straighten out your old room. I’m not taking down the traps this time.”

An oddly thoughtful gesture on the old man’s part that happened exactly once, when Aizawa announced that he was going to be married and didn’t correct the old man when he asked to meet her. Aizawa made a mistake, and for that, he and Hizashi had to flee from crossbow bolts. “I know where they are. Tonight or tomorrow, I don’t know yet.”

He hears a grunt, the closest to acknowledgement that he’ll get at this point of the conversation, and turns off the radio. That is how their conversations usually end, once everything is said.

Aizawa drops his head to his hands, finding the silence of the room too open for too many things, but the one he tries to focus on is how he’ll be able to provide for his ward in a rickety shack on a mountainside with no plumbing, barely any electricity, and a deranged hermit that he’ll have to introduce as his relative.

Hizashi, once he caught his breath halfway down the mountainside, said that it explained a lot.

*

Yamada folds his hands over the bridge of his nose, sitting on the edge of the couch in the common room that’s closest to Hitoshi. Iida and Asui, the only two injured herolets were patched up by Recovery Girl and sent on their way in minutes, maybe. He should have paid attention, should have thanked them. Probably.

He just watches the scabs growing smaller and smaller on Hitoshi’s face and grinds his teeth at the thought that he’ll have more scars from that thing. That metal torture device laying on the floor, that Yamada would kick if he thought he could destroy it instead of just making a racket.

They put a knife to his kid’s throat, cut him more than a dozen times, put that thing on his face, then drugged him for good measure. All on campus grounds, all at UA while Yamada wasn’t even there. He was on patrol, a patrol he should return to or at least call in cover for Byte Sound if she hasn’t already done it herself. He just can’t move.

Not until Hitoshi wakes up.

Yamada catches the sight of long black hair in the corner of his eye, an arm winding over his shoulders, and for a second thinks it’s his husband. But it’s not.

“He’s going to be alright,” Kayama says, folding her legs beneath her as she sits as close as she can to Yamada, winding her other arm around the front of his chest to hold him close. He feels too rigid in her embrace. “Sweep ended a few minutes ago, everything’s safe. No one- no one else was hurt.”

Just Hitoshi. Their target. His kid.

“Babe,” Kayama says, like she can feel how he can’t fucking relax right now. He’s wired up and rooted all the same, he’s not going to leave like Shouta did just to feel like he’s done something because Hitoshi can’t wake up alone after this. “It’s not your fault-”

“He’s my ward,” Yamada argues, too sharp and he knows it. His hands move down and up, down and up, it doesn’t fucking matter. “I swore to him so many times... So many times. And he trusted that.”

He’ll be surprised if he sees even a ghost of the kid that would walk through his dorm like it was carpeted with eggshells. He’ll be surprised if he sees anything as trusting as the way Hitoshi acted in that damn interrogation room he had been living in, when he first met the kid. If Hitoshi wakes up and can bear to go on after he failed him this completely.

After Hitoshi trusted him to keep him safe.

Kayama runs a hand over his back, and he can feel her nails through the leather. It’s more soothing than the seductive way she teases with, and he feels like he doesn’t deserve soothing. Not after all he didn’t do. “These guys are serious, Hizashi. I’ve seen a lot, I’ve faced a lot. Coordinated, powerful. Three heroes against three of them, and they were just the distraction. Thirteen’s suit was damaged, and we barely got two of them down. And then they disappeared into thin air. With a push of a button. No trace.”

Shouta should have broken his ribs. Should have held him tighter. Yamada should have worked up the nerve to scream and damn the consequences instead of letting that guy get away.

“I don’t know... how Shinsou is here right now,” Kayama says, quietly against his shoulder. Yamada hasn’t looked away from his ward for a second, because he’s worried about that. Miasma has tried to kill Hitoshi, but this time they didn’t seem to try. The set up, the fight, the chase, the sedatives. The mask. They didn’t want to leave Hitoshi here.

See you at home, little bro. Yamada knows staring at the kid isn’t going to stop it, but he can’t do anything else. If Hitoshi just disappears-

Kayama jumps, but Yamada screams.

An IV drip needle bleeds on an empty cot.

*

Aizawa was walking towards the dorms, still unsure if he should go to the staff dorm or 1-C’s, which ward to return to first, when the decision was made for him.

He hears Yaoyorozu yelp and turns to see that she and Shoji were part of the paired off hero students who were returning to the dorms after sweeping the campus. A short distance away, he sees her run forward and kneel next to someone he first recognizes as shirtless, and second as Shinsou when he pulls himself from a crouch to grab her wrist and twist her arm painfully. “Shinsou!”

Shinsou is shaking, and he imagines it’s not entirely from the cold, but Shoji is still pulling his jacket off regardless. Yaoyorozu winces, but he hears her soft voice offering reassurances as Aizawa approaches. “Shinsou, it’s alright. You’re at-you’re at UA. It’s Momo-”

Yaoyorozu’s eyes close and her teeth bare with another sharp twist, but she still hasn’t tried to break his ward’s grip on her wrist. Aizawa gets close enough to hear his ward’s ragged breathing, how every scar on his back looks darker against his pale skin. “Shinsou.”

Shinsou drops Yaoyorozu’s wrist and turns to stand, his other arm still curled loosely against his stomach. His eyebrows drawn down sharply, his eyes narrowed and blazing. His face twisted in absolute fury. “119 hero students. 20 pro heroes. 2834 exam robots. 124 combat units. The most advanced security system in Japan next to Tartarus.”

Aizawa schools his face to show nothing, but he expected fury. He expected these words.

He didn't expect Shinsou to say them. "They. Can't touch you here."

He didn't expect the first words Shinsou would ever say to him would be his own words. His own promise. What he swore to Shinsou on the first day that he arrived to UA.

He didn't expect that promise to ever seem hollow. "And you let him get away."

Aizawa hears his ringtone, but can't think of anything but those angry words he has to meet, that he has to struggle to not meet with his own irritation. Things he can't say with an audience.

"Yaoyorozu, Shoji. You need to leave-"

"You need to tell me why you didn't just kill him!" Shinsou shouts, his free hand sweeping up and down at his side once before the one in front of his stomach, barely hiding the scars there, tightens with a fist and a flash of a weaker grimace. "He saw Eri-"

"You told me nothing," Aizawa snaps, too numb to anything but the twisting shock at the pit of his stomach when he thinks of how close to danger both of his wards were. He wanted to protect them both, care for them both. But he knows he has only the faintest idea of how to defend them from their worst enemies. "And that will change."

Shinsou told him that 127 had an invisibility quirk, but not that it was a Chameleon quirk, and the cold-blooded nature would allow him to bypass the thermal detection monitors set up on every security camera. Shinsou told him absolutely nothing about whatever quirk allowed 127 to disappear from his grasp like that, to dissolve into nothing.

He made another promise, but he can no longer keep it. Shinsou needs to tell him everything now.

And his students watching, looking stricken, need to leave.

He reminds them of that with a glare, but Shoji ducks his head and still offers the coat in his hands. Aizawa takes it from him, unwilling to argue the point, unsurprised that Shinsou pulls it from his hands and jerks himself into it with rough and angry tugs.

He's not surprised that Shinsou refuses to look at him after that, after his students sheepishly leave without another glance backwards.

"How did he disappear? Can he reappear from where he was taken?" Aizawa asks, because he's sure the call he's ignoring is important, and Shinsou still needs to be taken back inside, but he needs to know how at risk Shinsou is. If whatever quirk pulled 127 away could put him back on campus just as quickly.

"Boss' quirk. He can't," Shinsou answers between clenched teeth, the fury missing from his words and made too obvious for that. "Boss needs a vial of blood to pull someone back after their job is done, and now-"

Shinsou bends forward, his arm still pressed against his stomach. Aizawa knows he wasn't obviously wounded there, he wasn't stabbed, but the pained twist in his face that begins to break a still-healing scab over his scars makes him reach for his shoulder on instinct. "Shinsou-"

"Now if he'd like to stop trying to pull me back because it's not working," Shinsou's grimace and strain with those words seems to indicate that quirk is still doing something to him, that it might work and might explain how Shinsou traveled from the staff dorm into the snow.

Aizawa tightens his grip on Shinsou's shoulder, even if he knows it's illogical. But if Shinsou disappears right in front of his eyes, he doesn't know what he'll do. With another tremble through Shinsou's frame, Aizawa's ringtone goes silent, and when Shinsou's legs fold and he lands in the snow, it's silent enough to hear his laugh.

"Didn't take enough. Had one fucking job, and you fucked it up. You're so dead," Shinsou mutters, his arm pulling away from his stomach so he can run his hand through his hair, still quietly laughing. "Goodbye, 'big bro.' Second chances and all, you're just- you're so dead. Bet Memory won't do it."

The sight of his ward kneeling in the snow, wearing a jacket far too big for him, laughing more about a man who tried to kill him being dead than anything else that had ever amused Shinsou enough to huff or smile, makes Aizawa try to tug him up into standing. "You need to get inside."

Shinsou kicks out one leg and becomes dead weight, and when he finds that isn't enough to stop Aizawa, he jerks away from him just to fall. He twists while he does, and Aizawa can see the scowl, the glare in his eyes that he knows is deserved. Then how Shinsou's eyes gleam at his purple iris. "Why didn't you call me 'Hitoshi?'"

The monotone in Shinsou's deep voice makes it sound deeper, and the words reverberate through Aizawa's throat unnaturally. He tries with every inch of himself to close his teeth against the answer coming, something his mind is already turning static and numb to. "You might be a Nomu."

He feels sick to his core just to hear those words, something he refused to face with his mind was forced out of him all the same. The paralysis that comes afterwards, the hands he tries to make into fists to fight against have been severed of his control, and he watches the teenager in front of him stricken in confusion instead of rage, before he glares again. "Tell me where Eri is."

The sickness from the control turns to nauseating static inside his skull, what half of his mind he has is struggling to understand the words while the other half understands them completely. He wants nothing more than to end this sensation.

Shinsou turns his head to glare at the snow, a curl in his lip as something irritates him further. His mouth drops open to speak before it closes, a familiar sight that tugs through the numb and static to pull at his chest, before Shinsou pulls himself to stand and stare at Aizawa, a waning glare and the firmness of his frown the only traces of irritation.

Before the little shit pulls on his hand to dig a fingernail into the pressure point on his wrist below his thumb.

Hitoshi backs away once the control breaks and sensation floods Aizawa in full color, the glare gone and the frown turned further down at the edges, more like a guilty child. Or a frightened one.

Aizawa shakes his hand and curls it a few times, the ghost of pain singing a bit too clearly, and he has to look away when he sighs. "Eri is at the 1-C dorm with Bakugo and the others. She's safe. Hizashi is-" Probably the one calling him now, and was probably calling him before. "Worried."

Aizawa pulls out his phone, turning to keep eyes on his ward out of the corner of his eye because while he can't face Shinsou fully right now, he can't let him disappear either. By his own volition or not. "Shou, Hitoshi just disa-fucking-peared-"

"He's with me. He's fine," Aizawa says, and in the short pause that follows, he's sure that Hizashi isn't breathing judging by the pitch of his earlier panic. "We have a lot to talk about."

'Boss's' quirk, Shinsou's quirk. And how Hizashi will not agree to Shinsou being taken anywhere near Aizawa Shoga's 'home' in the slightest.

*

Even when they're back in the dorm, Eri refuses to let go of him, her arms wrapped tight around his neck and her legs wrapped around his stomach. "S' my fault."

"It's not your fault, Eri," 27 answers, his arms wrapped loosely around her. Yamada and Aizawa are talking in the living room, and maybe 27 should try to overhear what they're saying. They're definitely talking about him.

But Aizawa told him to pack for a few days.

27 closes his eyes, and lets himself hold Eri tighter, as tightly as she wants to be held by him. She was so scared, she was so much closer to The Miasma than he ever wanted her to be. 127 saw her and he threatened to-

He refuses to let himself think about those words. 127 better be dead now. "'Spoused to show you where to go, Zawa told me to. Zawa told me to stay there so you know where to go, and I didn't, and-"

"That's Aizawa's fault," 27 says, and he feels the anger vibrating inside his skin, has half a mind to go into the living room and deal it out himself. "Eri. I'm safe. You're safe. That was scary, and now it's over, and you're never going to have to go through that again. Okay?"

He bites his lip after he says that, after he asks, because that's a weapon now. One he can't control, shouldn't use. His words aren't his words when they're questions, they're his. Nemoto's. "Okay."

Eri's feet kick out from either side of him, a test kick. He forces himself to answer it with a smile she can't see, that he doesn't feel. He only feels the stretch of fresh scar tissue over old, familiar from when 10 would use his quirk and his new scars would just feel odd for a few hours. He would have to trace them with his fingers for a while before they started to settle and become his own. Become part of him.

Eri doesn't know what he's become, and he doesn't either.

"I need you to do something for me," 27 says, as he scans the room. So many little things he knew he was never going to keep, things he wants to keep with a selfish urge, wants to stuff them all into that stash box and somehow take it with him. The cat figurines, the books he hasn't even been able to touch. Things that he counted, he was in awe of, when he was stupid enough to think they were his. "I need you to keep him safe."

27 sits on the bed, careful of Eri's legs on either side of him, and pulls Mocha from the top of his pillows to tuck him against Eri's chest. Eri only lets go of him to wrap her arms tightly around his plushie, to look at him too seriously with her bright red eyes. He knows there's no one else he would trust with Mocha. "M' gonna protect him. N' you, Twenny. They're not coming back."

27 will do anything to make sure that doesn't happen. He tells himself that's the reason he should keep for going along with this. He needs to leave UA, because he's drawing danger here. Danger that will hurt Eri.

He hears Yamada talking louder, nearly shouting, before their voices go quiet and there's only loud footsteps down the hall. 27 tightens his grip around Eri because they can't do that now, they can't take him away from her this quickly. He doesn't know how to keep her from crying if they do that.

Another door opens and closes, and 27 is too relieved. Not yet, of course. He's going to be 'gone for a few days.' Yamada isn't happy about that, and that's too much relief in itself. A gift.

A gift he probably doesn't deserve, now that he's a 'Nomu.'

And he still doesn't know what that word means.

It's Going to Be Fun

Chapter Summary

After 127 was able to infiltrate UA and attack Shinsou, UA's security has been deemed compromised. Shinsou needs to go to a safe house, and Eri needs to remain close to Aizawa due to her growing horn and the traumatic events that unfolded mere hours ago.

Confessions in the mountains echo loudly in many hearts.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: Mild sexual harassment (Touching a male student's nipple with the intention to unnerve them)

Previously on Wards of UA: Aizawa called his grandfather to ask if he and Shinsou could stay at his remote cabin in order to use it as a safe house without informing the Commission of Wardship Affairs that Shinsou had been attacked at UA. Aizawa did this without informing Yamada about his plans, which is why Yamada does not agree with the plan and isn't happy with Aizawa. When Eri was first rescued, she tended to speak more 'properly,' but has gotten used to speaking more like a 5 year old and using cutesy nicknames for other people. Eri refused to let go of Aizawa so that Aizawa could respond to where 127 was last seen, so Aizawa asked her to stay with Bakugo so they could 'know where to go,' trying to give her empowerment in a terrifying situation, but Shinsou was too injured to return to that spot once he was rescued. Ms. Joke has previously met Eri, and Eri quickly became friends with her. Shinsou used Brainwash mixed with Confession to ask Mirio 'What can you possibly do without your quirk?' which was a question that Shinsou didn't want to ask, but Mirio is taking as a blow to his confidence.

Yamada is perfectly fine with this. Perfectly fine.

His ward, who had recently been attacked and nearly killed on UA's highly defensible campus, was going to stay with a deranged and armed and incredibly homophobic alcoholic on the side of a mountain that's littered with bear traps and tiger pits. With no plumbing, no edible food, and hardly any contact with the outside world.

It'll be a nice little nature experience.

And Shouta, of course, was going with him to meet the man that did pretty much raise him, but he hates spending time with or even talking about more than his own mother. And Shouta does not like his mother in the slightest.

Aizawa Shoga was getting older, these reunions should take place sooner than later, so that there's no regrets or things left unsaid.

Eri, his sweet little girl Eri, absolutely could not live in a shack with three men who would likely be using jars and pots not for their intended purposes, and Yamada was in whole-hearted agreement on that. However, because Eri's horn was on the growing side and all of these very eventful events were definitely going to have an effect once she realized they happened, she needed to be pretty close to Shouta and Hitoshi in case of an emergency, which was why she was going to crash the Ketsubutsu training camp that had been moved to the base of that mountain in the matter of a few hours. With her favorite Big Three, of course.

Eri's never been camping, and hanging out with Mirio, Amajiki, Hadou, and Ms. Joke all at once was sure to be a blast. She'd definitely not devolve into inconsolable terror without Yamada there to help in the slightest.

And of course, because Shouta was supposed to live at the 1-A dorm for half of the weekend before this happened, and Yamada so conveniently had patrols scheduled during those nights that he decided he'd rather gargle nails than go out to, he was going to be chaperoning the little herolets. It should be fun, they should be absolutely rattled and terrified after yet another attack on campus, especially with Shouta, Hitoshi, and Eri being spirited away in the dead of night.

Especially because one of them might be the traitor that caused all of this, and Yamada still doesn't know which one it could be, if it is one of them. It's going to be fun not to give them any indication that he suspects that. Yamada has a great poker face after all, and if the traitor gets the tip off and they flee, it will absolutely be Yamada's fault.

Needless to say, Yamada was perfectly fine waiting in the parking lot with his arms slung over Hitoshi's shoulders, the urge to pull him into a hug and not let go and the urge to look through his backpack and make sure he packed everything far easier to focus on than anything else going on. Especially with how he still can't look at Shouta.

It's late, and both kids should be asleep. All the kids should be, especially Eri who's fighting off a good doze by kicking her little feet in Shouta's arms. Hitoshi should be tired too after Recovery Girl's quirk but he almost never is.

The Big Three have already packed but they're standing at a distance amongst themselves, Hadou yawning and bracing herself against Mirio's arm. Amajiki is standing between Mirio and Yamada's little family, and even if he's still a pretty wiry guy, he makes a good defense it seems. Mirio looks like he needs a good talk, but Yamada knows he can't give him one right now, and it probably wouldn't help in the slightest.

Yamada expected the police escort, and expects that Naomasa and Sansa are in it with no other passengers. He expected the big white van too.

He didn't expect to see Fat Gum driving that van, or that familiar abomination fashioned out of three different cars with different paint jobs to be tailing it. "Oh, Byte's here!"

Byte Sound parks behind Fat Gum and gives him a look, and those looks always say more than words or sign language can. She tries to look like she's been put upon, but he knows she doesn't mean it in the slightest. Not with that flash of a worried smile that comes over her when she looks at Hitoshi.

Fat Gum steps out of the driver's side, and he put that weight back on quick. Maybe Amajiki isn't impressed, he's probably seen the process with his ongoing internship, but Hadou looks less sleepy and more bug eyed, even if Mirio can't manage anything more than a weary smile. "Someone called a taxi? Well, you guys are going a little outside my jurisdiction, but some Sanuki Udon sounds great to me!"

Amajiki looks relieved, and doesn't hesitate to approach his mentor, even if he picks up the rest of the Big Three's luggage to have an excuse. But Fat Gum pulls him into an embrace that could become a tactical hold with a little more pressure, and looks like it is from Amajiki's flailing. That seems to be the invitation Hadou needs to make Fat Gum into an upright bed and pull Mirio into it.

"Great to see you guys!" Fat Gum says, with a clap over three backs that echoes a little too much in this deserted parking lot, before he looks up and spots the little apple of his eye. "And of course, our little Miss Eri! It's good to see you too!"

Eri is awake, wide awake, way too awake. Holding onto Shouta's scarf with her tiny little hand and she totally doesn't recognize Fat Gum.

And Fat Gum realizes that when he stops in his tracks, looking horrified for a second. "You don't remember me? Mr. Fat Gum! Looking a little more like the 'Fat' right now though."

Fat Gum chuckles with a slap on his belly, and Eri straightens up. Still too awake, but at least she's not at all on edge with that excited grin. "Mr. Gum!"

Fat Gum looks a little surprised, before his face stretches into an even wider grin, and if Yamada didn't know any better, maybe a few tears budding at the corner of his eye. Yamada hasn't heard the 'misters' or 'miss' or that timid, too serious way that a 5 year old shouldn't talk in a long time, but Fat Gum hadn't been around for that time. He imagines that Fat Gum is more awed by that change than Eri is of his. "Mr. Gum, or Mr. Fat. Whatever you want to call me, sweetheart."

"Gummy!" Yamada thinks those tears aren't just budding and the pro hero in front of him might cry. "Gummy, you didn't get to meet Twenny but Twenny is really nice too! And Twenny needs to try your tasty takoyakis!"

Yamada can't see the look on his ward's face, but he can feel the tension in his shoulders rising underneath his arms. He didn't know that Principal Nezu would call on Fat Gum to be an escort, and he imagines that Hitoshi isn't exactly enthused to be reminded about the 8 Precepts raid. "Of course, I didn't really get a chance to meet you, but we can definitely make up for lost time—"

"We're losing time as it is," Shouta says, because he's in one of those moods. A mood that will make him snap at a fellow hero who has volunteered to drive eight hours through the night to take him and his ward out into the mountains. A measure that's a little ridiculous, as much as this surly mood is, because Shouta refuses to learn how to drive.

And Fat Gum can wave that off with a shrug, with the intention to say something else to Hitoshi, but as soon as his mouth drops open Hitoshi decides those moods are infectious. He walks away leaving Yamada's arms hanging loose, and makes a beeline for Byte's car to pull the rear door open and throw himself and his backpack inside.

Yamada just watches it happen, because a teenage mood cannot be happening right now. Not when Yamada has to say goodbye to him.

For a weekend, he reminds himself, a weekend that's sure to have plenty of misery to go around for everyone, but it feels so much worse than that right now and he can't stop it.

Yamada curls a hand over Eri's sweet little head and fights the urge to plant a kiss there harder than he's ever had to before. "You're gonna have a fun time with these guys, little bean. I'll call you every day to hear all about it, and tell you how Fishio, Fishie, and Beanie are doing, alright?" Eri nods, those big red eyes too wide, and if she asked if she could stay home instead, Yamada might have to fight Principal Nezu with his bare fists to make it happen. "I love you."

“I love you too!” Eri replies, and it’s truly telling of how much else is on his husband’s mind that he doesn’t get a single look from that. Shouta hasn’t joined in the ‘I love you’ ritual, but given that it took a couple of years to make it a habit for him to say it to his husband, Yamada can overlook that. For a little bit.

With Eri getting settled into the van along with the Big Three who are probably going to fight over who she gets to sleep on, Yamada makes his way to his sidekick’s car to check in with one little listener he’s going to miss way too much.

A little listener who cracks the barest smile thanks to Byte’s efforts to cheer him up. ‘Driver threaten to dump on road if he play song again. Play 4 times. Had to call taxi-’

“Yeah, Byte’s giving you the run down on what not to do on those really long car rides,” Yamada says, trying to find a place where he can have his arm casually propped on top of the car but not look too stupid when he leans down to catch whatever glimpse of his ward that he can before he leaves for a full weekend. “But hey, you’ve got good company for this one!”

Hitoshi hasn’t seemed too tired yet, and Yamada knows there’s a very distinct possibility that he won’t sleep after what he’s had to deal with today. He won’t find rest, he won’t feel safe enough to try, and he’s being taken away from the one place that was supposed to be safe for him. Hitoshi looks at him with his head leaned back on the headrest, his eyes showing every inch of misery that comes with.

“It’ll be fun, you know? Fresh air, full of nature,” Yamada says, and he’s well aware that he can’t get his head through the window with his hair gelled up like this, but he’s too tempted to dive right into the backseat and tag along for the ride. “I’ll call every day, and Shou can tell me what you two are up to, and... Just be safe, alright?”

Hitoshi nods, and looks away like he wants that to be the end of it. He knows Hitoshi isn’t happy with any of this, and surliness is quite deserved at this point. But he wishes he could pull the kid into his arms and squeeze it out of him.

“Love you,” Yamada says, tapping the hood of the car for good measure when he catches the look in Byte’s eye from her side mirror. He hasn’t told her, she practically knows already, and he’ll deal with the good natured ribbing when he can deal with it. And he can’t deal with a single thing apart from how this is probably the hardest thing he’s ever had to do in his life.

He barely catches it, that sign whisper from a teenager who still won’t look at him. ‘You too.’

And he has to stand up before the tears start firing up, clapping his hands for good measure, good distraction. Shouta makes his way to the passenger side of Byte’s car, barely looking at him either. “Too crowded in the van?”

Shouta does look at him, a look he doesn’t like and refuses to look into. One of those looks that says ‘I’d rather do that, but I don’t trust the kid not to use his newly empowered quirk to make a run for it.’

And Byte looks thrilled with the company of those two in her car for the next eight hours of fun. “Have fun out there! Mountains, wildlife, creatures, oh my!”

He checks to make sure it’s Sansa and Naomasa who are providing the police escort, makes sure they have the appropriate amounts of caffeine for the journey. Checks again with the loaded van to make sure Eri is properly sandwiched between Hadou and Mirio, and that everyone is buckled in properly with their snacks and drinks in place.

And he tries not to read too much into the fact that there was another bench of seats in that van for Shouta and Hitoshi to sit on, but they already decided to ride in the car that would make the longer leg of the journey. “Have fun!”

Yamada waves and feels like this is going to be the worst weekend of his life.

*

Aizawa would prefer that there would be no stops on this trip, but gas tanks unfortunately require that.

He would prefer that Shinsou get some rest instead of staring out the window, only seeming to alternate which window whenever his neck got sore. He would prefer that Shinsou sleep because he won't find the worn out cot that his grandfather probably still has very comfortable, he needs to sleep for the sake of his health, and Aizawa would be able to sleep if Shinsou did.

He would also be able to check on Eri if he could trust that Shinsou wouldn't try to unlock this car and run now that they're stopped at a gas station. “Do you want anything from inside?”

Hitoshi turns his head to face forward with a hard stare, something he hasn't done because he probably doesn't want to look at Aizawa right now, and he's still making an effort not to by staring into nothing. After a long pause, he shakes his head.

The greatest form of communication he's offered in the past five hours. Aizawa tries to stretch his legs in the cramped confines of Hizashi's sidekick's car, finding that his knees haven't straightened out during this entire ride and a hike up the mountain will be very fun because of that. “We won't stop until we get to the access road for the safe house. If you want to say goodbye to Eri, now is the time to do it.”

“Already did,” Shinsou answers, his voice rough from lack of sleep, lack of hydration, or lack of patience for this conversation. “Thanks for telling her it was her responsibility to keep me safe by telling her to stand there out in the snow. She's upset because of you.”

A barb he expected, and nods acknowledgement for. Shinsou was on edge about every aspect of this, and Aizawa expected that any words from him would be harsh. “I spoke before I understood the situation. She would have been more upset if she saw you before Recovery Girl's treatment.”

Treatment that worked well, despite the lack of rest. There's no difference in the scars already written on Hitoshi's face, but he hasn't seen the aftermath of his other wounds. “She'll be more upset-”

Byte Sound opens the door and tosses a bag into the backseat, a coffee for Aizawa and an energy drink for herself to replace the empty cups already in the cupholder. Then she grabs the aux cord for her sound system and tries to hand it to the backseat, only turning around to look when Shinsou doesn't take it.

“He doesn't have his phone,” Aizawa says, and despite explaining that it would be useless where they were going, he knows that Shinsou has enough reasons to be upset about that. Shinsou enjoys having possessions, he enjoys having his phone most of all. But that phone, along with Aizawa's, might be compromised by whatever methods were used to bring down UA's security system, and had to be left behind.

Byte gives him a look that looks more like an insulted teenager flabbergasted by this necessary security measure than the teenager it actually affects, and pulls the aux cord back to plug her own phone in. 'My music. Basically Present Mic but better. My playlist gets best reviews.'

She hands the phone to Aizawa with the implication that he's become the 'DJ,' but he finds a place to rest it on the console and at least close his eyes while Byte begins to drive again. He'll be able to hear Shinsou try to open the door or use his quirk while they're driving on the highway, and if he's not going to sleep, he at least needs to rest his eyes. He allowed himself to get carried away restraining 127, and he feels the ache despite the eyedrops.

"It'll be fun if Boss' quirk pulls me off the mountain and I die like that," Shinsou says, apparently far less interested in the music than he is in trying to get a reaction from Aizawa. Sarcasm, paired with the implication that death is preferable to this planned trip, is not a new reaction from a teenager under Aizawa's care.

"This mountain isn't steep enough," Aizawa says, because he measured the distance that Shinsou was pulled from previously and compared it to his memory of the surroundings. He wouldn't land close enough to the bear traps either. "Is there any warning before he does that?"

Aizawa glances in the rearview mirror to confirm that Shinsou had indeed escalated to glaring at him. "Must be fun to ask questions. I sure would like to do that."

Aizawa folds his arms and leans back in his seat as best he can, because that was a lure he wasn't going to tempt. Shinsou wanted a fight, and he wanted the escalation. But Aizawa wasn't going to give it to him.

"Oh, here's one—"

"Don't," Aizawa interrupts, because he needs to confirm whether his quirk can control Shinsou's, but he can't risk it while they're in a car with a driver who might be affected. And while it's tempting to use Byte as a test subject instead of his husband, as they were both deaf, he doesn't want the poor woman to be dragged into this anymore than she's invited herself to be.

"I wonder what my new owner is going to call me. That's always a fun question. Always exciting. Shinsou, one of my favorites," Shinsou says, crossing his arms and pulling his legs onto the other seats in the back. He'll either find this a more comfortable position, hopefully fall asleep, or try to kick Aizawa in the face now that it's more accessible. "Shinsou, the Nomu that needs to be dropped off the side of a mountain. I'm so glad that Now Music is the hero that was picked to keep me safe."

Byte Sound glances at Aizawa out of the corner of her too-wide eyes, her lips drawn in as she tugs off her headphones. Taking the opportunity to be completely deaf to this conversation. Aizawa envies that. "We are going to a safe house for three days, then returning to UA. This is all done in the interest of keeping you safe."

He hears Shinsou rustling the bag in the backseat, and he doesn't expect that he's partaking in any of the snacks or drinks. He glances back to see Shinsou move it behind himself, close to the door, then lay his head down to use it as a pillow. It's more than a little ridiculous.

"Hizashi would be the one escorting you, but it's a safe house he doesn't have access to," Aizawa says, a stripped down explanation of how his grandfather would probably attempt to kill him again, and Hizashi may have considered ending the old man's life in self defense, but he didn't voice that opinion. He just had a narrow eyed look that seemed like he was considering it. "He's unhappy with this, and obviously worried about you."

Shinsou struggles with the seatbelt before he finds a way to twist his body so that he's facing the backseat, completely blocking out the rising sun and Aizawa from his sight. It's going well, at least.

This is still not the worst car trip Aizawa has been on to get to his grandfather's house.

*

Amajiki took the passenger seat in the front without any argument, so that Eri could sit between Nejire and Mirio on the long drive. It's not just so he can be close to his mentor, to help with any directions or to turn down the music when Eri starts to doze. He just knows that Eri feels more attached to Nejire and especially Mirio, and she needs all the comfort she can get.

Amajiki doesn't feel bad about that small distance, how he's the least liked by Eri out of the Big Three. Possibly the entire rescue squad. He knows exactly why that is.

Mirio has said that he shouldn't have rushed ahead, but before he could go into whatever dumb reasons he had to believe that, Amajiki cut him off. Mirio's entire purpose in that raid was to rush ahead, to cut off and stall any escape that Chisaki was trying to make. Even before those changing walls came into play, they knew that Mirio was the best suited to pass through any obstacle to get to their goal - rescuing Eri and Shinsou.

Everyone had their purpose. Bubble Girl and Centepeder were supposed to stay on the backline, but with the appearance of Rikiya, the plan changed so that Team Ryukko was there to fight and defend. Bubble Girl and Centepeder stopped to manage the other yakuza, and then Amajiki volunteered himself to go against three of the Expendables, the elite force. To leave six known opponents up to the rest of his team, no matter the cost to stall them. His specialty as a hero is restraint.

But that's not all his tentacles can do.

Fat Gum put a choice in Amajiki's hand when he handed over the swordfish jerky, one he didn't use. It would have ended the fight quicker, if he had used it when the villains broke out of their restraints and made their intentions clear that they were willing to fight to the death. There's supposedly an escalation that he can use when he combines his tentacles with those swordfish beaks, he could incapacitate but there's a risk of lethal blood loss even with that measure. Villains aren't taken to the hospital as quickly as victims and heroes, which makes him more wary of using it.

He didn't use it. He found another option. He thought that he won, he felt proud to take out three villains at once like that, completely on his own. Until he realized he didn't win at all.

Eight minutes. They know when they started the raid, and when it stopped, but when they split up and the parts of the raid were compiled into a report on the operation in piecemeal, it's hard to be sure of some of the timeline. But Amajiki felt exactly when Mirio had been shot, and the difference between the beginning of his fight and that moment was about eight minutes.

He could have been there. He could have been the reinforcement clearing the way. He would have had to resort to drastic measures, but they weren't fighting villains that played fair. They were willing to die and willing to kill, and maybe they should have faced an opponent willing to do the same.

Mirio won't let him blame himself for his lost quirk either. Mirio says that the raid is over, and his future isn't. He just has to wait now.

Amajiki tries to wait, even when it's painful.

When they get to the training camp, three cabins on the edge of a cleared out field and barely defended by a wooden fence, Amajiki is completely unsurprised that Mirio takes Eri into his arms. Eri can use her legs to walk just fine, she's not exactly a toddler, but he knows there's a lot of people at UA that prefer to treat her like one. To treat her like the little princess that Amajiki can't deny that she is.

And she could probably use a bit more care like that after what had happened last night. And from the look of the people that are filing out or bursting out of those cabins, that care won't be coming solely from the Big Three.

Ms. Joke, as exaggerated as ever, is running through the snow with her arms outstretched, screaming Eri's name as though she's a mother newly reunited with her child. The students that have a right to this training camp are curious and following behind her, and Amajiki can't overlook how the blonde girl looks like she's stricken by Eri's cute appearance already. Nejire might find a rival with her.

But Amajiki can see that both Eri and Mirio can meet that excitement with weary smiles, as though the lack of sleep was the only thing that was affecting them. "Eri, my sweet child! You can meet my other children now, my little heroes-in-training! We can spend all weekend playing in the snow and chasing rabbits and-"

"Sorry for crashing on such short notice," Mirio says, blatantly ignoring that Ms. Joke's hands are grabbing around Eri looking for a trade off. He's using that grin that makes him look a little more oblivious than he is, and Amajiki realizes he's going to be watching heroes compete for the right to hold Eri all weekend.

"Ah, our apologies for making you believe an apology is necessary," one of the students with long black hair says, a red scarf so wide that it's almost a shawl draped over his shoulders. The blonde girl knocks an arm against his shoulder with a more excited grin.

"Itejiro, knock it off! You don't need to gush all over them just because they're UA's Big Three."

There's just something about the way she says that, the way her eyes cut and narrow at them, that reminds Amajiki this isn't entirely a friendly visit.

Ketsubutsu was a hero school that 'specialized' in smaller classes, but it was common knowledge that they just didn't have the budget for a large hero course. With the entrance exam being far easier, the standards arguably a bit lower, Ketsubutsu had a 'rivalry' against UA that was justifiable from all of those differences, and the resentment that was due because of that.

These students weren't even third years, they were just second years. They're not the students that their class faced for the Provisional License Exam. Their small class wanted to measure themselves against the best of the best at UA in this training camp, and maybe they owed them the opportunity in exchange for being here.

But the guy with shorter, fluffy black hair just sighs, and looks disappointed at his classmates before he lays a hand on the blonde girl's shoulder. "We should all be more than welcoming to these guys, and set aside those petty rivalries. The drive here isn't an easy one, and they've been through a lot."

Eri fidgets in Mirio's arms, almost disturbing Ms. Joke who seems to have settled for petting her head. That shorter haired guy walks forward, and from the way that the others watch him, he seems to be the leader. Maybe the class president in some official way, but their class size seems too small to need that.

The Presumed Class President's face lifts into a wide and friendly grin, something that makes him seem a little more like Deku. Maybe even brighter. "But I'm sure they've endured this far, because they have very big hearts!"

This guy. Was not touching. Mirio's 'heart.'

Mirio jolts back a bit, his face reddening and his lips twisting up as though he doesn't know how to react to that outright, blatant sexual harassment that this jerk did right in front of his teacher. It didn't look like he flicked Mirio's nipple, just touched it, but 'just touching' was just.... Just....

"Oh, a Vibration quirk!" Mirio says, trying to laugh it off, having to pull an arm away from holding Eri to hold Nejire back by her shoulder. A Vibration-

This guy vibrated Mirio's nipple.

"You know, the 'heart' thing makes you seem really fake, though. That's not really something that a normal person would say," Mirio says, trying to laugh it off with his hand behind his head, something he usually does when he's nervous. And he has a right to be, he's just been sexually harassed by some second year punk from a third rate hero school who didn't have the right to look at Mirio or touch him like that.

"Ha-ha! Yo-yo-yo, he called you out! He roasted you!" Ms. Joke says, pointing at her student and laughing and not expelling him on the spot. "Yo, you know, I enjoy roasting duck on an open fire...."

Something about that innocuous and completely random comment makes all of those Ketsubutsu students flinch, and the Sexual Harasser's weird squinty eyed grin falls off completely into barely restrained fear.

"I guess that means I like 'smoking quack!'" Ms. Joke says, with far too much confidence for that lame pun, but it's something that Sexual Harasser sputters at before he starts laughing. Laughing a lot. Too much.

Amajiki turns to look at the faint blue hue around the Sexual Harasser, how his eyes are too wide and pleading at Ms. Joke, and how the eager grin she was wearing before seems to narrow into something punitive.

Most teachers at UA don't use their quirks for punishment, and while Midnight could, it might be counter productive. But Amajiki imagines that a lot of them would envy Ms. Joke if they could see what Amajiki is watching with a bit too much glee, the embarrassing sight of this Ketsubutsu student heaving too-hearty laughs at such a bad joke.

It might be painful. But Amajiki doesn't care if it is.

"So, we can get some proper introductions out of the way! That's Yo Shindo, Tatami Nakagame, Itejiro Toteki, and Shikkui Makabe!" Ms. Joke says, and maybe she knows that she left an impression at their summer training camp two years ago because she doesn't introduce herself. Her students, excluding that Yo guy, add in their quirks, and when the blue faced Shikkui announces he has Stiffening, Amajiki starts to wonder if this class is aware of some...connotations with that. Mostly by the way that Vibration was introduced.

Yo has to keep laughing while the Big Three introduce themselves. There's a voice that Amajiki is very familiar with, already trying to convince him that Yo is laughing at him before he even speaks up. It's something that he clenches his fist and tries to fight down. "Amajiki Tamaki, Manifest. I...can manifest parts of...anything I eat."

Saying 'manifest' almost makes it redundant, it makes him sound like he's bragging, like he thinks they're all stupid so he has to spell it out for them and they probably think that way anyway and they already hate them for being at UA and already know he's the weakest member of the Big Three-

"Togata Mirio, Permeability! I can pass through any surface, and I've got a lot of fun tricks with that! But, I'm not feeling like showing it off to you guys," Mirio says with a wink, with something so fake it's almost insulting that he called Yo out for that. Maybe they shouldn't get to know the full story, but Mirio shouldn't feel like they should be fed such a blatant lie. It's only going to make them more resentful.

Not that they're not already resentful, after that introduction before the proper one.

"Jeez, you already seem to think that there's some ulterior motive for having you guys around!" Ms. Joke says, waving her hand at that even though training with the Ketsubutsu students was definitely something that was going to happen. It's the only real explanation for why they were there, apart from the honest one. "You guys just drove through the night, you should settle in first! Get ready to have some fun out here, because despite how UA does their training camps? We're here to have some fun!"

Amajiki wouldn't believe it until he saw it, because these guys didn't look like they were expecting any fun. Even that Yo guy who falls to his knees to gasp for breath once Ms. Joke releases him only grins like that because he's waiting for retribution. And he's staring at Mirio while he does, which means retribution for the retribution will be coming from Amajiki.

"Ah, there's only two girls here, so are we going to have a big sleepover? A sleepover with no boys, but what's the other cabin for? Is it just for food and showering and stuff? That's way different from a UA training camp!" Nejire rambles on, and she's going to get along great with Ms. Joke, who's already beaming at her. Amajiki is already on guard at the implication that Yo is going to share a room with Mirio and him, and how he'll have to toe the line between criminal assault and restraint.

"Cold," Eri mumbles, kicking her legs which makes Mirio hold her a bit tighter and try to tuck her into his jacket. Fat Gum walks over with their luggage packed in his stomach since it would be too much to carry on his own, and Amajiki should have recognized that and helped him. But it looks like Fat Gum is looking at Eri and considering whether it would help to stuff her into a Fat Restraint too.

And unfortunately, neither Mirio nor Fat Gum are helping.

"S cold, and I don't like it!" Eri whines, and Amajiki is sure that everything is catching up to her now. She seemed tired, but too quiet during the drive, she seemed too quiet when they stopped for breakfast at a local diner, but all of that quiet was only going to delay the inevitable outburst.

And considering how Eri's outbursts could end, and that Mirio was holding her in his arms, Amajiki was torn between what he wanted to happen from it.

"I hate it!" Nejire whines, pouting and stomping her feet. She raises her hands in the air and twirls, making sure that all of the guys who already hate them are staring at her. "This place is awful, these guys are awful, I want to go home instead of being in this crummy place! And I'm tired and hungry and-”

“You’re being mean!” Eri yells, leaning out of the cradle of Mirio’s arms to scold Nejire, and Amajiki appreciates that too much. He knows what Nejire is trying to do, but it’s making a scene, and Fat Gum already looks so worried about Eri’s bad mood. Mostly because he forgot to bring her any candy apples.

“Nope, she’s just expressing her feelings, and it’s completely understandable,” Ms. Joke says, her hands on her hips as she nods along. “A girl can’t keep that all bottled up, or else she’ll get wrinkles! So girls, let’s complain!”

“Wah, it’s so cold! I’ve got to carry all this stuff!” Tatami tosses in, even though she’s smiling at Fat Gum to take in Nejire and Eri’s things. Nejire takes Eri into her arms, joining a chorus about how it’s cold and they’re tired and they want to go home, and by the time that they’re halfway to their cabin, Amajiki can hear Eri’s little voice shyly join in.

Eri has been through a lot already, but just the long drive was enough for a little kid like her to be grumpy. And she still needed reassurance that it was okay to do that.

Amajiki would appreciate some reassurance from that Yo guy that he wouldn’t try anything, but when he tries to smile like he did before, to look so open and friendly like he wasn’t, Amajiki was sure that wouldn’t be the case. “Aw, what a good kid. We can show you two where you’ll be staying, luckily there’s enough room.

There’s not.

It’s almost worse than Amajiki imagined, and he knows that it’s selfish that he thinks that way. But the cabin that’s as far away from the ‘Girl’s Cabin’ as it can be, the Boy’s Cabin, doesn’t just have one room for all of them to cram into like he thought. There’s four rooms. Three taken up by the three male Ketsubutsu students.

He and Mirio would be sharing a room, with no one else there. And one bed.

“Ha, that is different from UA. There’s actually a bed!” Mirio says, and Amajiki can’t stop staring at the bed. The singular bed. With no one else in the room. No chaperone, except for Ms. Joke, who really wasn’t their teacher.

“Oh shoot, I left something in the car! Can you help me with that?” Fat Gum asks, a hand on his shoulder, and Amajiki feels like he could die of mortification because Fat Gum has seen there was one bed and he already feels dirty for all the things he tells himself won’t happen but even Fat Gum must think will happen.

Amajiki follows him to the van, knowing there’s nothing left behind in it, and almost wishes he could climb inside of it to go back to UA.

“So,” Fat Gum says, pretending that he’s rustling through the glove box for something he left behind. They didn’t put anything in there, and if he’s too embarrassed to look at Amajiki and know the awful thoughts he’s having, then he could just drive away before Amajiki dies of embarrassment. “It’s not my place for any judgement, but I want you to have this.”

This is what dying of embarrassment feels like. Amajiki can’t breathe, he can’t look away. He feels like he’s developing tunnel vision, how everything else seems to blur out. Except for the box of condoms that his mentor is holding. “That. That-that that’s not necessary-”

“Well, these things are... y’know, it’s not just for protection, I’ve read a lot of stuff about...” Fat

Gum is going to kill him, he's going to murder him by accident and Amajiki will just feel horribly guilty the entire time he's dying at this rate. Fat Gum doesn't see that at all, probably because he's looking off to the side like he doesn't want to look at Amajiki right now. "Wait. Have you still not told him?"

"No!" Amajiki blurts out, too loud, he knows it's too loud, he knows absolutely everyone is looking at him right now. Nejire is going to see the condoms, Eri is going to see the condoms and have questions and he knows Aizawa might kill him but Present Mic definitely will.

"Oh, jeez," Fat Gum tosses the condoms back into the car, and Amajiki hopes that this is over. That he's survived another brush with death. But it isn't, it's clear in the way his mentor's eyes are so wide and soft, how he rests a hand on his shoulder. "Tamaki, I thought you said you were gonna-"

"I was," Amajiki answers, still a bit too shrill.

Last night, he was going to confess to Mirio. He knows that graduation is a few months away, and for too long he thought he could put it off until then. That it might be better not to say anything until there was an escape already there, just so he wouldn't have to share the same dorm floor with the guy he confessed to but would absolutely tell him he just wanted to stay friends. Even if they wouldn't be friends if that happened.

But things are happening before then, preparations are being made. Mirio was already deciding between apartments in Mustafu, and before Amajiki made any decisions himself, he just needed to know. Even if it's awkward later, he doesn't want to feel like he let this chance slip by like a coward.

Fat Gum sighs, and claps his hand on his shoulder a few times, almost patting it but it's just a little too heavy to call it that. "Look, even if things are a little awkward with the close quarters, I think you should stick to your guns and let him know. The sooner the better, because this could have a big effect on your career, and you need to take it into consideration!"

Amajiki knows, he knows it's a big risk. But Mirio is worth taking it.

Fat Gum just smiles at him when he finally nods, and he gets another clap that almost makes him fall over. "I think you're worrying over nothing, kiddo. No one can do that as good as you can, of course! But Togata's a good egg, and I think you're working yourself up without taking that into account."

"I am pretty egg shaped!" Mirio calls out, walking closer but he's at the tail end of the van right now and Amajiki needs to make sure the condoms are out of sight. He doesn't know what Mirio has heard, and it's probably too much already, but if he's seen those condoms Amajiki is sure he'll have a panic attack and die in Mirio's arms and feel worse about all the things surrounding that. "Need any help?"

"Nope! Nope, we've got it, I think," Fat Gum says, and he won't say what he's 'got,' which means that Amajiki has to explain it, which means Fat Gum is setting him up for this. "You guys enjoy your little trip in the mountains! I'm sure it's going to be a lot of fun!"

There's a way that Fat Gum says that word. That word sounds like something it shouldn't be, can't be, absolutely won't be and the fact that his mentor is saying it makes the entire thing worse.

But when Mirio just stares at him with such a pure and bright expression, that easy smile, it makes everything so much more unfathomably worse.

Amajiki forces himself to go back to the room to unpack, settle in. Ignore the singular bed. Mirio has fallen asleep on his bed before, they used to have sleepovers as children. This is a perfectly normal situation that Amajiki is making into what it isn't. It's just a bed. A bed that has no intentions, no implications that Amajiki is putting on it. It's just a bed, and they're just going to sleep on it. And because they have to sleep on it, it would be much better if Amajiki didn't say anything-

"So, big career move?" Mirio asks, making Amajiki startle and drop his toothbrush into the sink. He looks to see Mirio has his back turned, laying his clothes out on the bed before he sorts them away. Amajiki can only imagine what kind of smile he's wearing, something that's supposed to hide what Mirio really feels, but never works with Amajiki. "I mean, Fat Gum's definitely going to give you a sidekick spot, but it sounds a bit bigger than that."

"I wouldn't take it," Amajiki says, almost feels like he's reminding Mirio of something he should already know. "Osaka's a three hour train ride, which is fine now, but not after-"

"But you're just gonna move there, right?" Mirio says, turning around with the best 'I'm confused, because this should be obvious' smile he can manage right now, a bit too wide and open, too much teeth. Too much like just saying that hurts him, and Amajiki doesn't want to take that for something it's not. "I mean, after you graduate, you can go anywhere you want! Pick any place. There's no reason to stick around Mustafu."

"I want to," Amajiki says, before he really thinks about it. This isn't how the conversation was supposed to go, now it's going to sound like Amajiki is some stalker boyfriend putting the weight of his career on Mirio's shoulders, and it wasn't supposed to sound like that. "What I mean is-"

"Mustafu has a lot of heroes already though," Mirio says, the smile is gone but he still looks confused. He knows that Amajiki knows that, it's tough to get a spot in big cities or well known ones like Mustafu, and competing for even a sidekick position there is difficult without any connections. "That... doesn't really make any sense for you, Tamaki."

"Maybe it doesn't," Amajiki says, leaning against the door frame to convince himself that he's fine, this is a normal conversation with his best friend. He tries to brush his hair behind his ear, tries not to feel like the bed is staring at him now. He just tries to imagine that Mirio will just look at him and shrug, and not get angry, not feel awkward. He looks at Mirio and accidentally tries to imagine him in his underwear to make this easier and it absolutely doesn't help. "But you're... You make me not... You're worth...."

He wrote out seven pages of different confessions. He made a flowchart of everything that could happen, highlighting the good ways Mirio could take it in bright yellow. He planned out everything that he could but he didn't even consider that singular bed.

"I like you!" Amajiki finally sputters, and he feels so cold afterwards, like those words held all of the warmth he had in his chest. Like he's blotting out the sun, right now, as he stands there, and he knows there's 43 ways that he'll never feel that warm or see that brightness again. "And I want to stay in Mustafu."

He only catches a glance of Mirio when he forces himself to look, and it's not pretty. Mirio just looks shocked, shocked means he doesn't feel the same way, he feels completely the opposite way, he's absolutely ruined everything and they still have to share that bed. "Tamaki, you... You can't just hold yourself back like that."

Amajiki can blame the bed for the very unbecoming way he took those words at first, before he realizes what Mirio is actually saying.

Mirio is staring at his clothes, his shoulders slumped and his eyes turned too downward, too dim for the sun that he embodies. That he outshines most of the time. “You don’t have to stick around and take care of me, and you don’t have to... say things like that, that you don’t mean. I’m going to be fine, and you’re going to do great things in Osaka.”

Amajiki stares for too long. Far too long. Before he realizes that Mirio is an idiot. “Do you think I just confessed... Because I think you’re weak and I need an excuse to stick around you? That weird... really weird- why?”

Amajiki isn’t sure if he’s waiting for Mirio to realize how ridiculous he’s being or realize what he said, but he honestly can’t force any more words out of his mouth until Mirio gets it. He confessed to the guy and somehow he turned it into.... What? “I mean, yeah, I am weaker without my quirk. I know you don’t want to say it, but it’s true, but you don’t have to worry. There’s plenty of heroes in Mustafu, so I don’t need you to... protect me, or whatever.”

Mirio. Could not be this stupid.

This definitely wasn’t on Amajiki’s flowchart. There’s a reason it wasn’t on his flowchart, because everything from Mirio admitting he felt the same way for a while and sweeping Amajiki into his arms to flipping the table in a rage because he somehow decided that Amajiki being gay was disgusting, all of those things were more understandable than Mirio suddenly becoming this stupid.

“Mirio,” Amajiki manages, even if he has to hide his face behind his hands. Even if he has to pretend he’s just talking into a dark room with no one around in order to say it. “I’m not confessing to you to protect you, I’m confessing because I like you and-and I’ve liked you for a long time, and....”

He had ideas, before he was faced with one of them. The Singular Bed that is mocking him even now, even when he can’t see it, is plenty of evidence that Tamaki could not move in with Mirio after graduation. He thought it would be fine, it would be an easy step after living in the same building and practically in each others’ at UA. It was a sensible escalation. It is not.

“I don’t want to be that far away, if you... feel the same way.”

Amajiki is handing Mirio the ball, the keys to his own demise. There’s no way that Mirio could take that the wrong way, that he could twist it into another thing it’s not. The flowchart is at hand now, Mirio should answer with one of those many scenarios and Amajiki has planned for his next response for most of them. He’s imagined what most of them look like.

He didn’t plan for the fingers brushing his ear at all, that was not in his plans (maybe three of them, at most), and when he pulls his hands away to look the way that Mirio looks so serious and so embarrassed at the same time wasn’t something he planned on, nor the determined look in his eye, and definitely not the-

The kiss was included in two outcomes, and Amajiki tries to stop thinking about the one where Mirio kisses him then laughs that it was all just a joke or that he wanted to try it and has now sworn off men forever.

The kiss is so soft, yet it feels like so much. Mirio’s lips are on his, and he’s felt Mirio’s hand on him before, even felt the way that Mirio is cupping his cheek and how his fingers card through his hair, but not like this. This feels so different, like Amajiki is filling with light and nearly unreality, that this has to be a dream.

Then someone clears their throat. And the world spins into a nightmare.

He sees Nejire standing in the open door, and only has a split second to think about how they should have closed or locked it, before he sees Eri standing there and he has to press his face against Mirio's chest to hide. Eri, pure sweet Eri had seen him kissing Mirio and she'll tell Aizawa and Present Mic and they will both definitely kill Amajiki for tainting her like that.

"You're... you're recording?" Mirio asks, a strain in his voice, and Amajiki spares a quick glance to see that Nejire was holding her phone out. That she was definitely, without a shadow of a doubt, recording that.

"Yep! It's your first kiss, right? That's gonna be great to play at your wedding," Nejire says, smiling like an airhead and giving them a thumbs up like an airhead and once again Amajiki wishes he never let Mirio talk him into letting her sit with them at lunch on their first day at UA. He had. No idea. It could come to this.

Eri walks closer to them, and Amajiki doesn't like how he's suddenly started thinking of this as some kind of sin, but he can blame the condoms he still can't stop thinking about when he almost wishes that she could step away from them instead of looking up with those pure, wide eyes. "Can I come to your wedding?"

They've only kissed. Once. Mirio hasn't even told him that he feels the same way, he's only kissed him, and now they're talking about weddings, his mentor tried to give him condoms, and Mirio laughs nervously and curls an arm around his back. And Amajiki almost wants him to snap his neck with his arms. "Of course! Can't have a wedding without the perfect flower girl there!"

Wedding. That... possibly means that Mirio feels the same way.

Amajiki knows that despite everything that feels like far too much right now will take a while to sink in. To really realize what had just happened, that he confessed and Mirio kissed him and feels the same way and they... They're probably in a relationship now? They're dating, possibly?

Amajiki presses his face just a bit harder to Mirio's chest, trying not to smile like an idiot. Maybe he was worrying over nothing, something that he's always been the best at doing. Something that Mirio knows better than anyone that he does, but never faults him for it. He was the one who pointed out flowcharts as a way to help with it.

And maybe he won't laugh too much if he keeps the flowchart he made for the confession, just.... In case there's a wedding, at some point. They really shouldn't rush into things.

Amajiki feels Eri wrapping her small arm around one of his legs, and looks down to see that she seems happy for them both, hugging both of them as best she can. She looks up at Amajiki and smiles so brightly, with one of those 'pure beams of sunlight' smiles that she had to learn from spending so much time with Mirio. "I'm so happy you love each other!"

It's really just 'like,' maybe, because 'love' is a pretty big word. A word that Amajiki feels, but he can't possibly think that Mirio feels that way. Yet. Love is something that grows, something that builds over time. Love is a third date word, and they haven't had one date, and that's... That's really rushing things.

But Mirio still not saying anything to that, still just blushing so much that his ears are bright red, makes Amajiki think... they've spent practically their entire lives together at this point. This is new, but in a big way, it's not.

"Thanks, Eri," Mirio says, returning her smile with one of his own. Amajiki doesn't think he can talk right now, that he's already said so much and still feels so much. He could honestly use some time to sit and stare at the wall and process things, but he's not sure he'll have time or space to do that. Until tonight. When they face the Singular Bed with all the changes that have happened.

"Mirio," Eri says, pulling her arms away to properly hold the stuffed cat that had been tucked against Mirio's leg. She has one of her serious requests, that are usually things that aren't serious. She might want to apologize for being a bit grumpy earlier, but when she holds out the stuffed cat, it doesn't seem like that. "Can you keep Mocha safe? M' sposed to, but... I can't. He needs a hero."

That wasn't Eri's stuffed cat then. Amajiki thought it looked a little familiar, but he recognizes it after Mirio does. It's Shinsou's cat.

Amajiki sees the look on Mirio's face, and he can practically hear all the things that are going through his mind. He curls an arm behind Mirio's back and wants to argue against all of them, all the things that Mirio hasn't said but he knows he still thinks about. Things that Shinsou forced him to say, things that Shinsou thinks about Mirio. And how much that hurts Mirio to know that.

Amajiki wasn't there when Shinsou asked Mirio how he could possibly defend him from that intruder, but if he was, he would have shouted down reasons that Mirio himself might not believe. If he was there, he could have ended that fight, he could have kept them both from getting hurt. But he wasn't.

But he's here, here to remind Mirio of what's true when Mirio himself believes in lies.

"There's no better hero to keep Mocha safe," Amajiki says, taking the plushie from Eri's hands to press it against Mirio's chest, to force him to take it. Mirio is a hero, quirk or no quirk, he could have defended Shinsou if he was given the chance. If no one else believes in Mirio, not even himself, then Amajiki will.

Amajiki will inspire that shaky smile that comes when Mirio curls his hand around that plushie, when he nods and tries to make it wider for Eri's sake. "Yep, I can keep this little guy safe during our trip! You don't have to worry about that!"

Amajiki knows that it might not have been the time to make his confession, not when Mirio was so tangled up in other things. But they've been tangled in their own issues, and sorted them out together before. Amajiki can wait, but maybe it's more courageous not to. To have everything out in the open, because the hand stroking Mirio's back hasn't changed. The voice reassuring him of everything that's true, that Mirio finds himself blind to, hasn't changed one bit.

And maybe, having a plushie in protected custody will make the Singular Bed a bit easier to face, knowing that nothing can happen before its time with that stuffed animal in the room.

*

Aizawa sees a snow covered rock that looks perfectly inviting for him to freeze his ass on, and pulls off the poorly defined trail to take another break, and enforce one for his ward.

Shinsou honestly shouldn't be doing as well as he seems to be on this hike, hardly recovered from the attack and with two hours at most of sleep during the car ride. But he's recovered in other ways, more long term ones. Shinsou is still thin, but the barest hints of adolescent youth are beginning to fill his face out a bit more, his body is less skeletal and more like some of his more gangly students on their first day.

Shinsou rolls his eyes when Aizawa shrugs off his backpack to find that their water bottles were half frozen, and the lunch that Hizashi had packed was probably affected as well. He hands Shinsou's half of these rations over, having to shake the bento box with a bit of insistence. "Once we arrive, there's likely not going to be food like this. Military rations at best."

Aizawa Shoga described himself as a hunter, and that might have been true in the past. But the old man probably didn't check his traps regularly at his advanced age, and despite the snow offering the basest attempt at preservation for the meat, Aizawa wouldn't trust it.

Shinsou takes his lunch with another sullen look, picks at the edges of it long before he eats anything. The lunch is too cold to be truly enjoyable, but Aizawa takes the appreciation for his husband's cooking more heartily knowing that he's never forgotten the taste of those boiled MREs.

Shinsou has eaten barely a quarter of his food before he puts the lid on it again, leaning back against another rock as he sits in the snow. He crosses his arms, and Aizawa finds himself tempted to start counting down until he gets another smart remark from a kid who honestly has no other means to express how unbearable he finds this. This time, whatever Shinsou finds for antagonizing him is amusing enough for him to snort. "You're really spoiled."

That word has never applied to Aizawa. Especially given that his first task upon arriving to his grandfather's shack will be to dig out a new outhouse pit. He's sure the old man hasn't been able to dig one out himself in nearly a decade.

"I used to think Eri was spoiled, after Overhaul first bought me," Shinsou says, and the food in Aizawa's mouth turns rancid as he realizes that Shinsou has never referred to Chisaki with that name. With the name that the mobster wanted to be called. "I think I cried the first time I ate jell-o. At The Miasma, you get oatmeal soup, twice a day if you're lucky. Even when we had oatmeal at the 8 Precepts of Death, it wasn't as watery."

Aizawa had imagined that food had been scarce in Miasma's compound, a privilege even. 'Twice a day, if you're lucky' probably had a more personal meaning to Shinsou, given that he probably wore a mask that needed to be unlocked for him to eat. "Every day?"

Shinsou nods, still looking into the surrounding wilderness rather than at Aizawa. "Every. Day. They must buy a lot of it. I guess you could find them like that."

If this case breaks on finding unusually large shipments of oatmeal mix being delivered to a location that has no need for it, Aizawa will eat his hero license.

Aizawa isn't sure if he should share that with Hizashi. They were aware that both wards probably hadn't encountered proper nutrition, that it was a miracle neither of them hoarded food once the opportunity presented itself. With how much importance Hizashi places on food as a means to provide for those he cares about in deeper ways than the biological, he would probably find himself a wreck to know how Shinsou had eaten before he was rescued. He would probably find their usual cooking times more meaningful, and break into tears when he remembered that Shinsou willingly ate oatmeal prepared by Hizashi.

If this is true. Shinsou wouldn't be the first teenager to exaggerate in an already displeased state, and a single source of nutrition, as scarce as it seemed to be with the implication it was withheld, should have killed him before taking his training into account.

But Shinsou should have been killed long before this point. Aizawa imagines that he was born with far more than nine lives to be able to get this far.

Aizawa sees Shinsou startle, his eyes going wider and his hands scrambling against the snow to pull himself out of his miserable slouch to his feet, and Aizawa stands to look at the threat, his capture scarf already rising.

Only to fall when he sees a very familiar sight. “It’s a deer.”

A deer that Shinsou was still holding his stolen knife in front of him to defend himself from. Aizawa hadn’t seen him take it - again - but the military issue blade he found a bit too cumbersome for his costume wasn’t something that Hizashi asked Shinsou to pack. He hasn’t taken the knife from the kid since it was the first thing he stole after arriving at UA, his first matter of business seemed to be to get proper defense for himself as a measure of safety, but Aizawa probably should have taken it back before now.

And he should probably explain what a deer was. “It’s a serow, a herbivore. It eats grass. It’s not going to approach us, or attack.”

The long haired beast only continues trudging through the snow, glimpses of it visible behind the treeline. This one walked alone, like most do, but Aizawa has seen them paired up just as often. Sometimes in family groups. “I’m not stupid,” Shinsou says, tucking the knife back into its sheath which was tucked inside his pants, only the clip visible. “I know what a herbivore is.”

Shinsou was likely going to learn a great deal about the animal kingdom out here. And he seems to have some interest in doing so.

When Shinsou sits back down, he watches the deer, his eyes slowly ceasing to be so narrowed and displeased. He almost looks relaxed enough to feel the exhaustion that Aizawa had no doubt was below the surface to keep spurring this sour mood on, before he tilted his head to the side.

“Ugly,” Shinsou decides, if it seemed like it wasn’t a confident vote. Aizawa huffs and nearly laughs, because he’s had that similar debate in his youth. The noble serow was definitely an interesting creature, a mixture of a goat and a deer with tiny horns that seemed to push it closer to the ‘ugly’ category. And yet, it was still hard to make that decision.

“Looks like my grandfather,” Aizawa says, which was his eventual outcome on the issue. The white flared out fur on the underside of the serow’s neck to resemble a beard, its short and boarish stature - if its eyes could look a bit more like a goat, or a bit more unhinged, Aizawa might have tried to introduce the wandering creature as his relative.

The silence of the winter wilderness answers him instead of any thoughts Shinsou might have on that. Aizawa packs everything back up and continues on with the hike, knowing they’d soon approach two of the biggest dangers on this outing. The traps that Aizawa Shoga thought were perfectly legal trespasser deterrents, and the old man himself.

Aizawa keeps aware of his surroundings, trying to find the tell-tale signs of those hidden traps, but that makes him aware of other things. The rustle of some small creature on the ground, too quick to point out or identify. Birds also call out and fly too quickly, but out of the corner of his eye he can see Shinsou flinch at times with the noise. It would be unfair to call him a ‘city slicker’ when he was probably only barely more familiar with city life.

Aizawa spots a slightly more rare sight when he catches a flash of red fur to his right, a pair of red foxes that were tussling on the ground, chasing each others’ tails before one reared back and pounced on the other to distant growls.

Aizawa takes on his new responsibility as a nature guide with only a small degree of apprehension.

“Foxes. They’re also skittish.”

Omnivores seems to be a fact that might invite contention.

He sees Shinsou stop, observing the sight with more blatant wonder than he’s seen so far on this hike. Most children take regular trips to zoos to see these animals, as different as they are in captivity. Aizawa wasn’t one of those children, he grew up with these creatures at the edges of his grandfather’s shack, calling out loudly in the night. In the traps he had to help the old man clear out at an early age.

Shinsou also wasn’t a child who saw these animals in captivity, but he still looks like a child with his awe in seeing them for the first time.

“Fox faced bastard.” Or, Aizawa could stand corrected. Shinsou was still indeed a teenager.

With a yelp, one of the foxes decides the game is no longer fun and darts away, only to be pursued downhill. Aizawa tugs on the strap of his backpack as he continues to lead the trek, noticing that Shinsou’s stare is lingering on him, waiting for some answer to that. “I don’t believe I’ve ever been called that before now. My face isn’t very narrow-”

“I meant-” Aizawa hears Shinsou huff, and he can imagine the eyeroll, even if he doesn’t see it. “I don’t know why... that’s insulting.”

Aizawa spares a glance over his shoulder, seeing frustration in Shinsou’s scowl. Seeing that the kid was asking an honest question in the most convoluted way possible, in a way that was easy to misinterpret. And Shinsou probably knew that.

Shinsou continuing to avoid asking questions to this degree, especially with that pause, was evidence to an assumption that Aizawa already had. Shinsou couldn’t control his quirk.

“In old legends, fox spirits are tricksters, beings that you can’t trust,” Aizawa explains. “Someone with narrow eyes or a sharp face who seems to be deceptive would be referred to as a ‘fox faced bastard.’”

Shinsou says nothing to that, simply following Aizawa through the snow. Aizawa keeps an eye out for a roosting owl in the tree branches, as much as he’s looking for those twigs and split bark that are signs of danger. “Like logical deceptions.”

It’s not a question, and one that Shinsou answers for himself.

“Delete Faced bastard,” Shinsou mutters under his breath, and Aizawa is beginning to wonder why the silence of wilderness isn’t exactly silent.

Just in time to see that first marker for the range of traps. A Y-shaped stick jutted out of the snow, beneath a bear trap that would be rusted and more dangerous as a result. Half-hacked limbs would mark the spiked pits, three deep gouges in the trunk of a tree for leg snares. Perfect for guiding a ward who was already distressed enough to talk so much.

Aizawa stops and shrugs off the backpack, listening for another irritated huff. He knows there’s no remedy for this situation - absolutely everything that could set off his ward has happened in quick succession in the past 24 hours. He was attacked and nearly killed, nearly taken back to his previous captors on UA’s campus which was meant to be his safe haven. He had that mask forced on him again. He’s been uprooted with little warning from familiar surroundings, his possessions have been taken. He’s been separated from Eri and Hizashi, and forced into close quarters with Aizawa.

But Shinsou has usually broken his silence in moments of severe distress, and these biting comments are a sign that if Aizawa doesn't put him slightly at ease, he could bolt and trigger a trap. And Aizawa can think of few worse outcomes. "I'm aware that you're not happy about this situation. It's completely understandable," Aizawa says, looking at Shinsou's stiff posture, how his gaze is focused on the backpack on the ground instead of attempting to meet his eyes. "But this is temporary. Once we get to the safe house, you'll be able to talk to Eri through the radio. Before we get there, we have to get through the defensive measures, and you'll need a clear mind to do that."

"Perfectly clear," Shinsou says, his eyes cutting across the snow in front of them, as though he's trying to see those 'defensive measures,' and doesn't see them at all. "So we can keep going."

When Aizawa doesn't move, he gets an eye roll that Shinsou's head tips to the side with.

"If you're angry about the Delete Face-"

"I'm not," Aizawa says, still unsure how to say it when Shinsou didn't seem to want to recognize it himself. "You're on edge, and if you panic, you will get hurt. So we're going to stop here until you're ready to move forward."

"I'm ready," Shinsou says, further proving that he's not.

"Hizashi has noticed that you talk when you're on edge," Aizawa says, forced to say it. Forced to recognize what a saving grace that could have been if Shinsou were alone when he was attacked, that he had some way of defending himself with his quirk if nothing else. If only he could have used that to his benefit instead of making the situation more dire for himself by forcing Mirio to leave.

Shinsou tucks his hands into his pockets, staring at the snow around his feet. His shoulders rise, and with an exhale, everything spills out. "I've been able to talk since I got sick. It doesn't mean anything."

Aizawa nearly swears the snow beneath his feet turns to ice. "You've been able to talk... for two weeks. And you haven't?"

Shinsou digs the toe of his shoe deeper into the snow, a nervous fidget that's too easy to recognize from a child being scolded. Even if that's not entirely Aizawa's intention. Shinsou sighs again, this time turning into a mocking sound. "Yep, and you didn't notice at all. I could have Brainwashed anyone I wanted to while your back was turned. Couldn't do your little 'test' with Now Music if you didn't know."

Beyond Shinsou pretending to be mute when he wasn't, for an extended amount of time like that, and insinuating that he had ulterior motives to do so, Aizawa doubts that he did. He imagines that Shinsou hadn't used his quirk during that time, or else he would have seen some sign that it had put Shinsou on edge, after discovering how it had changed. "That 'test' is a requirement for your wardship with Hizashi. The Commission of Wardship Affairs needs proof that you can't use your quirk on him."

Instead of just digging into the snow, Shinsou kicks at it, turning his head up to look at the sky. "Great. So after this 'temporary measure,' you're going to make me use my quirk on him." Shinsou's head tips down lazily, a half-lidded stare becoming one of the better visages of sullen disappointment that Aizawa is quickly becoming adjusted to. "Only, it's not my quirk anymore. Whatever I ask, he'll answer, and I can make him say something really fucked up just to be the cherry on top of getting kicked out-"

“Then, I suggest asking him something that isn't ‘fucked up,’” Aizawa says, and knows that Shinsou’s quirk mutating like this complicates the matter completely.

It wasn’t something Aizawa considered often, but The Commission would have had no way of knowing whether Shinsou’s quirk was ineffective with Hizashi or not if Shinsou only pretended to try to use it. In the few instances where Shinsou did use his quirk, it was difficult to say if each time he was able to consciously control it, or if he simply allowed his quirk to take hold once he asked a question.

They would have tested it before The Commission sent a representative to witness it, and Aizawa had considered making sure that test would pass. If Shinsou had forgotten how to control his quirk, or never had that level of control in the first place, Aizawa could make sure that Shinsou would have a choice when he would demonstrate for The Commission. A choice that Aizawa was willing to trust with Shinsou, even if it was dishonest.

A choice that would be harder to give, now that Confession could take that away from Shinsou.

Only practice and training would tell, and Aizawa now needed Shinsou to do that. “We’ve gone to great lengths to hide all of this from The Commission. That gives us time to know what we’re working with, how your quirk has changed.”

Aizawa shifts so that he’s fully facing Shinsou. So that he’s an easy target for his own quirk.

“Ask me a question-”

“No,” Shinsou nearly shouts, his voice almost breaking like a much younger adolescent. “Hell no, you can’t make me do that.”

Great, if Shinsou wasn’t distressed before this, he definitely was now. “If you can’t control your quirk, you need to learn how-”

“It’s not mine,” Shinsou argues, seething and glaring down Aizawa with a hand raised up, unconsciously signing ‘Stop’ when he turns to look back down the trail, and Aizawa accepts that this isn’t the time or place. The revelation is too new, and Shinsou isn’t ready to accept it. Even if he will need to do so in time.

“Fine,” Aizawa says, and hopes it is. He’s supposed to report incidents like these, and he never has. He should have filed a report when Shinsou took control of Midoriya the night he tried to escape, and Principal Nezu should have filed a similar one. Neither of them did, but any of the members on staff could report to The Commission of Wardship Affairs.

Any leak could put Shinsou’s wardship in jeopardy, and possibly his life now that his quirk has mutated in a way that the Hero Commission would be very interested in examining.

Aizawa turns to face the trail ahead, but sees a squirrel dart in front of the trap marker. There’s only a split second where he knows what happens next, what he’s seen often enough, but he barely hears the metallic creak before the squirrel jumps away, and the trap triggers with a snap that nearly catches the animal, but doesn’t.

But it caught his ward off guard. “Wha-t are you willing to do to keep me safe?”

Aizawa can’t even turn around to face his ward, already paralyzed as his throat forces the words out of his mouth. “Break the law, risk my hero license, see my grandfather for the first time in nine years. Anything to keep you safe, and keep The Commission from taking you out of Hizashi’s custody.”

Aizawa expects the paralysis this time, the static that fills his head and makes it difficult to think. It's difficult to even feel connected to his body at this point, now that he's lost control of it. He fights against the urge to fight against it, because he knows it's useless. He has to wait until Shinsou releases his quirk's hold or breaks it, and he tries to hold on to the thought that he needs to watch the traps ahead, that somehow watching if Shinsou presses forward will stop him from getting hurt from those traps he's barely aware of.

Instead, he hears Shinsou pacing behind him, the crunch of snow marking his footsteps. Instead of worrying that Shinsou will walk ahead, he's worried with each footstep that seems to walk away that Shinsou will attempt to flee from this. He could get lost in the woods, and Aizawa has no idea if this control will break in time to keep Shinsou from freezing to death. Or himself from meeting that fate.

He hears Shinsou approach, then hears the rustle of fabric, a sharper noise of nylon. He hears the fabric being flared out, hitting the snow, and realizes that Shinsou has taken out his sleeping bag.

He hears a grunt, then two crunches on the snow. He wonders if Shinsou is attempting the barest means of being considerate by taking off his shoes before zipping himself inside the sleeping bag. In the silence that follows, there's the barest sigh, and Shinsou must have been feeling cold for a while on this long trek.

Aizawa is also cold. And he'd like to get to his grandfather's house to remedy that.

Time drags on, and Aizawa realizes the distinct possibility that Shinsou is planning to fall asleep out here, leaving Aizawa to develop frostbite that might eventually break his quirk's hold. He doesn't know what he'll do at that point, but there's certainly a temptation to trap Shinsou in that sleeping bag, carry him to the shack, and keep him trapped there for the entire weekend in hopes that it will make any part of this venture easier.

Eventually, he hears another sigh. "Great." Whatever Shinsou mockingly calls 'great' about this, Aizawa agrees wholeheartedly. "By the way, I'm not enjoying this."

He hears the zipper, and only has a moment to wonder how Shinsou is going to break the control given that it seems he can't do it himself, before there's something cold and hard smacking into the back of his head.

Aizawa turns to look at one of Shinsou's shoes resting on the snow behind him, before he hears the zipper again and sees his ward attempting to roll himself down the trail in the saddest escape attempt Aizawa has ever seen.

Aizawa sighs, picks up the shoe, and throws his capture scarf to wrap around Shinsou to stop him. Once the scarf goes taut, he hears a grunt and sees Shinsou bend around it, the end of the sleeping bag kicking back and forth. Aizawa walks forward and picks up the other shoe, tying the laces around the straps of his backpack before he shoulders it on. Then starts to reel in his 'catch.'

He purposefully made sure to place the capture scarf in a way that even if Shinsou tried to unzip himself and escape, he wouldn't have enough room to shimmy out of it. He looks at his ward long enough to confirm that's the case, unfortunately catching another look of sullen defeat on Shinsou's face, before he bends and hefts the kid up to be braced on the back of his shoulder, holding onto the bottom of the opening of the sleeping bag where the zipper rests.

Shinsou drops until his feet reach the bottom of the sleeping bag, and Aizawa glances back to confirm that only the black knit hat and a few wisps of purple hair were visible now. He imagines there's quite a glare behind that growl. "Let me out."

“You seem cold,” Aizawa says plainly, kicking the trap out of the way as he spots a leg snare up ahead, far to his left. Even with the added weight, this will probably make for a quicker journey.

Even if it won’t be as silent.

Shinsou huffs and kicks, likely trying to find the ground. If he notices he could make a nuisance of himself by digging his feet in against the snow, he at least doesn’t use it immediately.

“You never wear gloves.”

The padded black gloves that were far more sensible for this hike, that Shinsou probably noticed now that one was keeping him trapped in the sleeping bag, was an odd thing to comment on. Until Aizawa realized it was a question. “Not when I’m around Eri.”

It was an easier thing to avoid when the temperature was milder, October’s chill being pleasant. But Aizawa had made up his mind in October, when that fear and trepidation was still so present in Eri at times, when he was making every effort to reassure her that he was nothing like Chisaki. Even when the temperature started dropping in November, despite all of the changes that have happened since December began, he had made up his mind. It might be illogical, but he wouldn’t risk it. “Because she always holds your hand when you don’t.”

Aizawa fights a grin, because that might have something to do with it. And that grin is an easy thing to fight when he sees what’s in front of him, crouched knee-deep in the snow with a crossbow that should honestly be too heavy for the old man to hold. And it seemed to be by the way his arms and the weapon were shaking.

“Took too damn long, thought I’d find you in one of those traps! City boy like you probably got lost out here,” Aizawa’s grandfather grumbles, still holding the crossbow like he’s ready to use it. Aizawa would rather he didn’t. “Where’s that ward business you were talking about?”

Aizawa lifts the sleeping bag up a bit in answer, and he can feel Shinsou grabbing at the lining to pull himself out to look. He can hear the tearing inside, and he has to remind himself he has another sleeping bag at home. “Thanks for having us.”

Aizawa Shoga scoffs, letting the crossbow drop to face the snow. Reminding Aizawa that such pleasantries aren’t a part of how he was raised. “Sure as shit is short notice.”

Short notice, and a long, uncomfortable stay awaits them.

Three Generations Under One Roof

Chapter Summary

Aizawa will be living with his grandfather for the first time since he was 14, after nine years of no contact after Aizawa Shoga disapproved so violently over Aizawa and Hizashi's engagement. While his most pressing issue is Shinsou's safety and peace of mind, new developments quickly arise to put Aizawa's own mental health in peril.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: Bug mention

Previously on Wards of UA: Aizawa used to live with his grandfather for extended periods of time when he was a child, as his mother was paranoid that Aizawa would use his quirk on her and temporarily blind her. In the previous chapter, Shinsou attempted to escape by getting inside Aizawa's sleeping bag and rolling down the trail, and Aizawa stopped him from escaping or getting out of the sleeping bag by carrying him within it. Eri's sixth birthday is coming soon. Shinsou has started calling Chisaki 'Overhaul' recently, since he was attacked at UA. Shinsou was attacked on Friday the 13th. As Aizawa and Shinsou's phones were left at UA, since they could be hacked and compromised, the only means of communication they have are through Shoga's HAM radio. Shinsou and Eri have made a habit of telling each other that they love each other, but Aizawa hasn't told either that he loves them, even when Eri tells him that she does. Eri's horn is growing, and in the event that she does have her quirk build up and release, Aizawa will have to be there in case she can't control it. Eri saw Mirio and Tamaki sharing their first kiss in the last chapter. After the attack at UA, Aizawa told Shinsou that Shinsou had 'told him nothing, and that will change.' Shinsou does not know what a Nomu is beyond how he qualifies as one, since his quirk has mutated with Confession, and he knows that he will have to use his quirk on Yamada because he's Yamada's ward, and Yamada was assigned to be his hero because Yamada's deafness might mean that he's immune to Shinsou's quirk. Shinsou picks mock hero names to mock people, such as 'Delete Face,' which is a name that does have merchandise for Eraserhead. Aizawa told Shinsou that the serow they saw on the hike looked like his grandfather. 127 threatened to kill Eri before he was taken down at UA. Shinsou has only requested one song from Yamada's radio show, and it was a song from the album that Jirou's family made, that Yamada trashed on his show and caused Jirou to hate him. Yamada will be watching Class 1-A at their dorm this weekend to cover for Aizawa's dorm shifts.

Aizawa Shoga and the American Unabomber have a great deal in common with each other, but Aizawa has always been a bit bitter about the fact that the Unabomber lived in a much better cabin.

Aizawa Shoga's current residence cannot be referred to as a 'cabin,' and a 'shack' can be a bit too kind. Aizawa hadn't been born yet when his grandfather decided to cash in his pension earned from being a factory foreman and retreat into the mountains, but he imagines that Aizawa Shoga showed up with various pieces of lumber barely meant for his intentions and set out to make it work.

There are planks that clearly need to be replaced, the spacing between rotted wear and serviceable lumber is evidence that the shack has been rebuilt in piecemeal for decades. The spaces between the boards shows the blue tarp that lines the walls in the winter to trap in the heat from the wood furnace inside, tarp that is removed in mild springs and autumns, but might be put back up in summer to defend against an invasion of bugs. If the old man feels up to it.

Aizawa gives a withering glance to the outhouse, before he forces himself to check the stability of the roof. The old sheets of tin metal that were barely weighted down by rocks seem to be replaced with corrugated steel sheets, and angled upwards to a point. It actually looks like a roof, which is surprising.

“Y’done gawking?” Shoga asks, a twitch of his head that’s neither a shake or a nod but entirely dismissive. He shoulders open the door of the shack, an actual door that he picked up somewhere, long ago. Aizawa used to be oddly proud that he had that door when he was a child, even if there was nothing to catch on the bolt or latch. Shoga invites them inside with a rough jerk of the crossbow in his hand, and Aizawa doesn’t even consider the usual pleasantries on his entrance. Attempting to shake off the snow from his boots is considerate enough.

But he still finds himself staring at a mat on the floor, in the doorway. Rough brown bristles barely worn, perfect for cleaning off the bottom of a shoe. Certainly new, and certainly not something that his grandfather should have. It had to have come from a store, and everything that requires a brief visit to civilization was brought up to this mountain decades ago.

Shoga grunts, and Aizawa forces himself to step inside, taking some comfort in how little else has changed. The same tarps lining the walls, still creased from where they’re folded up for months on end, weighted down with stones lining the bottom and rusted nails next to the ceiling where they’re hooked. The black wood furnace with its smoke stack too short to reach the ceiling, a dryer foil taped to the top of it and angled into a hole in the tarp instead keeps the room from filling with smoke. It causes too much wear on the wood outside, and those foils are burned through more often because of the angle, but that’s an argument Aizawa has never won.

Wooden crates are stacked and scattered along the walls, collecting various pieces of junk that might serve a purpose one day, or multiple purposes they’re barely useful for. The same worn table is in the center of the room, the HAM radio rests on another in the corner, on top of a compact generator that rests on the floor. His grandfather at least spent enough money to have a reliable solar-powered source of electricity before he swore off all other forms of technology, and even if he could replace the wood stove as a heat source for an electric heater, he hasn’t. But what looks like an electric blanket is folded up beside the generator, something that’s definitely new.

There’s some wear in the floorboards as well, and the tarp that sections off Aizawa’s old room is tattered and shredded. Some of those tears look intentional, and that makes Aizawa realize that he shouldn’t be looking for projects to help improve his grandfather’s living situation. The old man chose this life, and he doesn’t appreciate any threat to his supposed self-sufficiency.

And an attempt at a proper greeting might be in order, now that Shinsou is kicking in the sleeping bag, trying to get loose.

Aizawa sets him down to stand on the floor and starts shrugging off his backpack, hoping that it won’t take too long for him to be able to feel the warmth of the stove when he starts peeling off layers of his winter wear. “This is Shinsou Hitoshi. This is my grandfather, Aizawa Shoga.”

Aizawa Shoga takes a moment to glance at Shinsou, before making his way to the ‘kitchen’ surrounding the stove. There’s no meat on the hooks meant to preserve it outside, but a lot more MREs stacked in the corner than usual. Aizawa Shoga picks up a pot from the assorted kitchenware lying on the floor, and Aizawa can’t stop wondering why so much of it looks new.

“Don’t make trouble here,” his grandfather commands gruffly, his usual greeting. As much as the smell of that wood smoke and those words are nostalgic, the changes here are unnerving. His grandfather especially has always been old, always been a bit short, but his long white beard and hair looks more sparse. His face bears more wrinkles, seems thinner. Everything about him seems thinner and weak, especially the shake in his hands that used to be the very image of strength that Aizawa grew up with.

Shinsou stares at his new surroundings and a great deal at Shoga, who seems to be playing quite a gracious host when he dips the pot into the nearby water barrel to presumably start making lunch. A boiled MRE, but Aizawa isn’t sure if he won’t find the taste nostalgic. “A heavy debt, old man.”

Shoga stops before he sets the pot on top of the furnace, a hesitation that doesn’t make sense, and neither does Shinsou’s words, until Aizawa realizes there’s a very noticeable difference in Aizawa Shoga’s right hand compared to most people’s. And it’s something that Shinsou’s previous circumstances would lead him to assume certain things. “It was a factory accident-”

“Who the hell did you bring here?” Aizawa’s grandfather demands, his voice deeper and more threatening than it should be at his advanced age. The crossbow he had politely placed against the wall is picked up with his three fingered right hand, aimed with his left at Aizawa’s ward, and balanced with some difficulty due to those two fingers that have always been missing at the last knuckle, for Aizawa’s entire childhood.

Aizawa didn’t want to explain the specifics of Shinsou’s circumstances, not his history. But his grandfather is staring down his ward while wielding a weapon, and the old man’s previous claims that he found the company of criminals better because they were ‘more predictable’ seems to have been a bit of bravado on the old man’s part. “Shinsou is familiar with the yakuza, but-”

“No shit, who the hell do you work for?” Shoga demands, the crossbow shaking so much that if he did pull the trigger, it would be unlikely to hit Shinsou at all. “Marutomi-rengo? Kochiya-Kai?”

“Shie Hassaikai,” Shinsou says coolly, sounds too much unlike himself with that confidence. Too much like someone who believes that. “You’ve been away for a long time, Elder. Those families are long gone.”

“Shie Hassaikai,” Shoga repeats, leaning the crossbow against his shoulder so he can use his left hand to set it back down. “Never had trouble with them, and they wouldn’t send a snot nosed kid like you out here for underhanded vengeance. Too honorable.”

“Been out for a long time,” Shinsou mutters, staring at the singular piece of decor that has always hung up on a tarp or on the wooden walls. A framed painting of the god of war, Hachiman, in a traditional inked style where the armor-clad man rides a white horse forward, wreathed in flame with a completely blank expression. It was just an oddity, maybe the old man trying to repay the Shinto monastery based further down the mountain that was willing to provide food for him as a way of giving charity.

Something that couldn’t have been a sign of this. “The... machine accident... cut off your fingers.”

Shoga huffs, shaking his head, but pointedly doesn’t look at Aizawa before he returns to watching the pot boil. “Too old to believe in stories like that, Shouta. Bet you still believe I got bitten by a cricket on my elbow too.”

Aizawa had long since sorted out that it was an odd lie to cover up the fact that his grandfather had surgery there, the stitches healing into a long scar with smaller tracks crossing over it. But his grandfather, the man that practically raised him, that was far more involved with his upbringing than his mother was, was saying.... That he was a yakuza.

“I paid my debt, and I got out. I don’t want to hear anything about that, no Elder business,” Shoga growls, his long white eyebrows drawing closer to his eyes when he stares down Aizawa’s ward to make his words have more meaning than were spoken. “A ‘ward’ ‘sposed to be away from that junk anyway. So I’ve heard.”

Aizawa doesn’t know who he’s heard it from, as he doesn’t think he said that when he called last night. But he sees his ward walk over to the low table to sit, pulling off his knitted black hat to place it on top. “Shie Hassaikai is basically extinct, but I never paid back my debt properly as severance. The current head still owns my allegiance, freely given.”

Eri was not the current head of a mafia, despite Shinsou’s words and Hizashi’s teasing. “You’re not bound to a five year old-”

“Almost six,” Shinsou argues, his eyes a little wider than usual, his eyebrows drawn up. Not entirely surprise, but he seemed oddly pleased with this turn of events. “I don’t think you know how it works, but I took sakazuki from Overhaul. I’m bound to the head of Shie Hassaikai until death or severance of that, and since Overhaul didn’t release me before he died, I would have to broker that with Eri.” Shinsou pulls off one of his gloves, flaring his fingers out as though to show them off to Aizawa. “And I don’t want her to cut off any of my fingers.”

Then he was showing them off. And Aizawa had a lot to think about with that. With everything that just happened.

“Six year old head, and an active gangster you brought to my doorstep,” Shoga says with a nod, before he bends and reaches for a very familiar bottle. “Suppose you don’t want this tea, then-”

“Shinsou is not active, he’s 16, and you’re not going to give him that,” Aizawa says, because the last thing he needs is to keep his ward from underage drinking. “And you have tea?”

Aizawa Shoga has only drank two liquids as far as Aizawa knows - sake, and water. Sake far more than water, far more, and tea made as much sense as the floor mat. “I have tea, it’s cold as shit outside, and if you want any you’ll sit down and shut up about it.”

Shinsou’s eyebrows raise a little higher, he seems entirely too amused about the prospect of Aizawa obeying his grandfather’s command, and Aizawa wants none of this. “Where’s the shovel?” His grandfather turns to stare, his usual method of asking for clarification. “The outhouse.” Aizawa’s usual method of clarifying, using as few words as needed.

Shoga raises a hand up just to drop it. “Forget that, it’s... dumb kid did it. Stupid thing won’t leave me alone. Now sit down, you’re wearing through that spot.”

Aizawa moves to sit down, those familiar words worrying about the state of those wooden boards still ringing in a body that’s far outgrown that kind of obedience. Shinsou seems entirely too amused by this, and Aizawa is unfortunately going to bear the full force of that twitching smirk when he sits in front of him, so that he’s between his grandfather and his ward. And the closest to the crossbow.

And now that Aizawa is sitting down, he can't look away from the floor mat. "This 'kid' fixed the roof for you?"

He hears his grandfather huff and grumble. "Wasn't broke in the first place." Aizawa's distinct memories of having to dump buckets full of water into the well behind the shack during summer storms begged to differ. "Already ate, so fend for yourself."

Aizawa doesn't feel hungry yet after eating Hizashi's packed lunch, and Shinsou still has most of his portion still packed in his backpack. But given that Shinsou's curiosity was a much easier thing to stomach than this too pleased smirk, and he should be introduced to the meals he'll be getting starting tonight, Aizawa reaches behind himself to pull out one of the MREs.

The same silver-metallic plastic surrounds the 'meal,' but the font on the label has changed. And with a slow blink, Aizawa realizes that this is quite an upgrade from his grandfather's usual fare. "The 'kid' buys your-"

"Shut up about the kid," Shoga grouses, and Aizawa will let the old man have his secrets. They seem to be good for him, from the roof to the barest pieces of civilized life leaking through into this shack. He doubts his grandfather will ever abandon this way of life, he'd rather die out here than do something sensible like moving down the mountain so he can get adequate food or medical care for his advanced age. Or even take down his hazardous traps.

But whoever that kid is, Aizawa is grateful for them. Aizawa wants better for his grandfather, and possibly better than he deserves. Better than Aizawa is honestly willing to give him.

Aizawa puts the MRE on the table, and notices that Shinsou stares with an eyebrow raised. He seems oddly expressive now, to go along with his sudden revelation that he's not mute and hasn't been in weeks. "Type 1, Number 13. Chicken and two sides of rice. Always make sure to chew the gum that comes with it."

As curious as Shinsou seems with his eyes locked on the plastic package, turning it over in his hands, Aizawa is glad he doesn't try to ask about the gum. He doesn't want to explain it. "Hm. Never really had a 13. Un...lucky."

The pause is unnatural, and the attempt at such a joke is something that Aizawa hopes doesn't become a habit. But when Shinsou glances down, his fingers gripping the plastic too hard, Aizawa remembers what day it is. What day it was, when he was worried about an omen that came true in the worst way, the way he least expected.

"All of these are very unlucky," Aizawa says, trying to make a joke of his own. Trying to break his ward out of whatever thought or memory that was trying to take hold of him, and he succeeds even if Shinsou's head snaps up to look at him with too-wide eyes. "Especially the Sardine plate. Type 2, Number 1. I still can't eat that fish-"

"Ya wanna complain the whole time about how awful it was that I fed your sorry ass?" Shoga snaps, picking the pot up just to drop it. At least not throwing it, yet, but Aizawa doubts the old man has the strength to. "Stop being ashamed of where you come from. I heard fish oil is good for some stuff. You're welcome."

And those sardines were certainly oily.

Shinsou hums, still looking at the package, but with a more sedated interest. It's really not that interesting in the first place. "There's a Number 10."

A sudden interest in ‘numbers’ bodes as well as this habit of referring to Chisaki as ‘Overhaul,’ or how easily Shinsou had slipped into some role of being a willing member of a mafia. But Aizawa has heard enough about ‘Ten’ the healer to justify answering that question. “Two types, duck stew or stamina bowl. The stamina bowl is one of the better rice meals, and both come with two sides of rice. Neither are bad options.”

Shinsou nods, seeming somehow pleased with that. He flips the seam on the back of the foil and finds the directions on these newer and improved rations, eyes just a bit wider in the same sad curiosity. “ ‘Snap along seam and allow 15 minutes to cook.’ “

“Only tried it once. Might be better than boiling,” Aizawa says, still not sure what he was trying to find when he willingly picked up that ration nearly a decade ago. Whether it was a slight difference or just that his tastebuds had become adjusted to better food, it wasn’t what he was looking for in that moment. He threw the meal away, but developed an affinity for the jelly pouches that were on sale next to it.

“Cool,” Shinsou mutters, but seems embarrassed afterwards by that near-compliment, placing the package back down. He only glances at the radio, but that seems to bring it to life, two clicks coming from the speakers to indicate that someone was trying to make contact, but unwilling to give their name.

With two possibilities, Aizawa found himself hoping that it was Eri, even if he knows that his husband will also try to use this as a means of communication. He just doesn’t want to get into that with his grandfather in the room.

“Been doing that for hours. You give someone my frequency?” Shoga asks, but Shinsou seems to piece out what that means without explanation, rising to dart across the room, still staring at the knobs and buttons when Aizawa crouches down beside him.

“Aizawa and Shinsou,” Aizawa answers, holding the button down for the receiver, and holding his breath hoping for one of two voices that he wants to answer.

“Eri!” Eri answers, seeming to think that this was part of a fun game where she needed to introduce herself with her name. Aizawa can hear distant giggles through the static, what must be Ms. Joke’s amusement. “Are you guys okay?”

“Yeah,” Shinsou answers, forced to when Aizawa angles the receiver towards him, to give Eri the reassuring sign of life. “You’re okay.”

“Okay and having fun!” Mirio answers, laughing at perhaps some shyness on Eri’s part from the other end of the frequency. “We made sure to eat breakfast and lunch, and we’ll be having a blast down here with all the snow and new people to meet.”

Aizawa isn’t entirely surprised that Shinsou backs away once he hears Mirio’s voice, but he doesn’t retreat entirely from hearing Eri’s voice. “I’m sure that Ms. Joke will be a good host, but let us know if there’s any trouble.”

“Roger!” Mirio says, and Eri repeats after a brief pause. There’s another pause, where Aizawa imagines that Eri has found little else to say, now that her worries about them have been satisfied. He imagines he won’t get one of her full ‘reports’ until this weekend draws to an end, and they can be reunited properly.

“I love you,” Eri says, a little shyly it sounds. As much as her initial amazement had to excite her about this radio system, it seems to be waning, and Aizawa has no doubt that she’s not entirely herself with all that has happened in the last 24 hours.

“I love you too,” Shinsou says, after taking the receiver from Aizawa’s hand. Aizawa holds his hand out to take it back, and though he hesitates, he already knows what he needs to say.

“If anything happens, I’ll be there. We’ll be able to answer at any time,” Aizawa says, and he hopes that it won’t come to that. Eri had to be moved on this venture just in case of emergency, and as much as he wishes she could be closer, his trek down the mountainside would have to be a fast one if worse came to worse.

“Okay! We’re gonna have a big snowball fight, and Mirio said we’re gonna win! So it’s okay if you can’t help,” Eri says, and he recognizes with a pang in his chest that she’s still confused about this. “And Emi says she loves you and wants to marry you. Oh, and Mirio-”

“Oh, yep! We’re gonna have a lot of fun, but we’ll call if there’s any problems! Stay safe!” Mirio says, a quick dismissal. An odd dismissal, but Aizawa tries to reason with himself that it’s not worth checking out in person. He certainly can’t leave Shinsou and his grandfather alone for anything less than the most dire situation.

“Hmph, some ‘Emi’ girl,” his grandfather grunts, ‘pouring’ tea by way of dipping the cups right into the pot on the stove. And Aizawa would rather avoid any part of that, at any cost.

“Eri,” Shinsou corrects, and Aizawa breathes easier with that misunderstanding he can use as a shield. Shinsou leans back on his hands braced behind him, probably wondering exactly what Aizawa Shoga was doing as he stared. “The head of Shie Hassaikai. Though you’ve forsaken the way, should she ever ask it of you-”

“I’ll give. Just to shut you up about it,” Shoga grouses, before he bends with a sigh again and tries to find that sake bottle. “Make it official and everything-”

“You will not,” Aizawa interrupts sternly, resisting the urge to fall on his back and ignore this was apparently going to be a habit. His grandfather trying to find some flimsy excuse to drink by way of his ward, who was trying to impress his grandfather by acting like a gangster.

Of all the things he expected to have to deal with on this trip, none of this was part of it.

*

27 waited, and it seemed like Aizawa was waiting too. Despite the cramped quarters, the nothing to do other than counting the stones lining the walls, 27 had no reason to want to venture outside into the cold unless it was necessary. After that hike, he’d had more than enough of it.

27 laid on the floor in front of the radio, counting how many times the little red line would pass ‘100’ on the dial that went up to 1000, monitoring some part of this device. Eri called, just to make sure that they had arrived, that they were fine.

Yamada said he was going to call too. Every night.

Aizawa and the old man sit at the same table, drinking that same tasteless, bitter tea. Aizawa is back to his usual habit of melting into the floor whenever he’s allowed to sit still long enough. The old man just grunts every so often, then takes a drink. It’s the most awkward conversation 27 has ever had to witness.

Counting. Waiting. A singular room he can’t escape, and despite the company, he doesn’t find it different enough in that regard. He feels the blood boiling and itching under his skin, almost waiting for Bug to grab him and drag him out for training.

“I’m getting tired of waiting,” 27 says, his words far too loud in this silence. He sees the old man look over, a dark scowl like he’s insulted. Aizawa just looks like he’s barely awake, and he’s not at all interested in what 27 has to say. Only how to make him shut up. ‘M-I-A-S-M-A. Told nothing. Will change.’

Aizawa looked so serious when he said that, furious like 27 had never imagined he could be. And yet, the bastard wanted to ignore him after dumping him out into the wilderness. Even a few rounds of torture for information extraction might be a good distraction from this waiting game.

27 stares at the ceiling, instead of the radio dial. He’s not waiting for anything in particular, when he has no idea what will happen to him next. Just vague things, vague threats. He’s a Nomu now, and that means something. Something that Aizawa hates. Aizawa said this will only last a few days, to keep him safe, and then he’ll be forced to use his quirk on Yamada and 27 can only imagine how badly that will go. Every question he asks warps into what he doesn’t want to know, the answers that no one wants to know. And now he can’t even break the control himself, like a child. He can’t even remember when he was that ill-trained.

“We’ll check the traps,” Aizawa mutters, his voice gravely from being woken up. He’s a horrible interrogator, and 27 is almost insulted by his lack of professionalism. Aizawa shrugs his jacket and gloves back on, which presumably means that 27 should get off the floor and get dressed too.

He’d rather just lay on the floor, let the wood dig deeper into the back of his skull. He’d at least feel closer to warm if not quite, and he could ignore how heavy his body is.

But 27 pulls himself up, because he won’t miss anything from that silent radio, and pulls on the jacket, hat, and gloves before he shoves his feet into his shoes. The top part of the shoe wrinkles and digs into the top of his foot, but he can’t bring himself to do anything about that mild discomfort.

After Aizawa opens the door and walks out, 27 follows and feels the cold air slapping him in the face like it missed him. The snow falls in thicker clumps, and 27 can’t imagine any that he would catch would be like those snowflakes that Eri likes to draw now.

The sun is setting, an orange hue falling over the ground, and 27 can’t help but remember how the sunset looked yesterday. How it seemed to match with the dress on Eri’s Sailor Moon doll that she was playing with, while she waved the doll around to turn snow villains into snow bunnies, while Kota’s Deku doll would just smash them.

Maybe it wasn’t worth the effort of sculpting them into bunnies. Maybe they just should have been smashed.

Aizawa just keeps walking, like there’s actually some purpose or patrol they’re supposed to do. 27 would rather be done with this farce, just tell Aizawa the complete nothing that he knows so he can get the shovel out and bury him already. The old man might be crazy enough to forget he was ever there to begin with.

“Delete Face-”

“There’s a place further ahead,” Aizawa says, and 27 imagines it’s a place comfortable to sleep in with all of Aizawa’s energetic spirit on display. His shoulders are slumped forward like always, and 27 follows him, watching the snowflakes gather on his long dark hair. It looks like dandruff. “You could stand to be a bit more creative.”

That's only a challenge, and 27 fights not to take it as an insult to his pride. "Eradicate Brain. Destroy Skull."

"Hm, I would have liked that one," Aizawa says, taking this far too lightly. Like 27 is just a kitten nipping at his fingers, amusing because it's not hurtful. Yet. "Hizashi picked-

"I heard. You were so invested in being a hero that you couldn't be bothered to pick your own hero name," 27 says, because he can imagine it. Aizawa probably spent all his time in school like he does now - sleeping, and doing the bare minimum when it's forced out of him. "Must be nice to do that."

Some kind of hellish bellow seems to want to punish him for that statement, 27 flinches and finds himself hunched over, as though he were waiting for some kind of Bull quirk to rush him from the woods. Instead he sees something worse, Aizawa turned to look at him over his shoulder, his face blank as usual except for a raise in his eyebrow that seems too amused. "A serow. That's what it sounds like."

And it sounds nothing like Aizawa's grandfather, just like it doesn't look like him. Aizawa looked a great deal like him though. If Aizawa were starved until he shrank inside his skin, and Yamada never forced him to shave or trim his hair, he'd look a lot like his grandfather.

27 has no idea what his own grandparents look like. Maybe he looks even more like his grandfather than he does his mother. Maybe he should be able to picture what his grandparents look like, now that he's seen a picture of his father and has a fresher memory of his mother's appearance.

But when he thinks of what they should look like, all he can see is 10. And as much as he hated even thinking about 127 succeeding in bringing him back to The Miasma, he would at least know if 10 is still alive or not. People can only live so long, older people are closer to a more 'peaceful' death.

If 10 is dead, 27 hopes it was peaceful. He hopes that just once, the old man found peace.

Aizawa stops, and 27 doesn't know what sets this place apart from any other. There's a tree that stands apart from the treeline, some snow covered bits of wood around it. There's an outcropping of rocks, boulders stacked like a primitive entrance with smaller rocks that seem to be purposefully stacked on top of it.

Aizawa makes his way to the rocks, and 27 can see there's a small cave dug out from it. It doesn't look natural, and he realizes it isn't when he can see faded etchings scratched white into the surface of one of the boulders that supports the side. Aizawa sits down in front of that one, as though to hide it, and an argument to take some shelter from the snow is only loud inside 27's head.

He sits, but not that close. He sits in front of the opposite boulder, enough that there's barely relief from the snowfall, but he doesn't want to be that close to add discomfort on top of what Aizawa wants to talk about. He'd rather find some place where neither of them see each other, he doesn't feel Aizawa's stare and he doesn't have to see any way that his face changes.

"How many Numbers are there?" Aizawa asks, and 27 finds that he can stare through him. He can look at Aizawa's chest, where his arms are folded, and feel like he's not seeing Aizawa at all.

"Infinite numbers. There's even a negative infinity to show all of them," 27 says, to not answer Aizawa's question even if he asked for that question in the first place. He thought that was interesting when he learned about it, that all positive numbers can be written just by putting down

'0 to infinity.' That all negative numbers are 'negative infinity to 0.'

He wonders if dead Numbers are negative ones.

"It changes," 27 says, even if he feels the air too cold on his throat, as though he would rather sign these things than say them. That's a weakness that Aizawa will spot, become suspicious of. He doesn't know whether he wants this game to end earlier or not. "Maybe 40 at most. 12 at least. People... die a lot."

It's a rule at The Miasma, that Numbers aren't 'people.' When Numbers talk to each other, they're supposed to only call each other by their number. Not 'he,' not 'she.' Boss, Memory, and Bug would say 'it' or 'the asset,' but 50 would never talk that way to him. She would call him 'kiddo,' or 'buddy' when they were alone. 127 would call him 'little brother,' because he was the only Number who could get away with that.

127 had Bug's quirk used on him, on his face. Bug would brag that she could kill someone like that, that she had and she would. And 127 is dead now, but not by 27's hands.

"Is it common for a Number to be trafficked? Or sold?" Aizawa says, like he thinks 27 doesn't know what 'trafficked' means. Like he doesn't know what exactly to call what happened to him.

"Never. Until me," 27 says, and he makes a mistake when he thinks about why. His wrist burns, the scars beginning there sting. Three sessions with Bug before he was sold, when he must have only been 12 years old. Wear and tear too quick, he just couldn't learn. There are so few like him that are taken in young, and they burn out quicker, usually finished off in a training accident so they don't cut into anyone else's job market.

"You might be lucky, then," Aizawa mutters, too quiet for words that ring too sharp inside 27's skin. He's lucky? He's lucky to have these scars? "We suspect that Miasma may have changed their strategy. That they're working with some of the most dangerous villains on record."

Boss is supposed to be more careful than that, but he only barely considers longevity compared to profit. Memory is actually supposed to keep him more careful than that, but she might be dead.

27 has never considered it, but 127 might be the last Number that he knows that was alive until yesterday. It might only be Boss and Bug, and only new faces that 27 never wants to meet. "Have you ever heard the name 'All for One?'"

27 starts to shake his head, but it's a lie. "Chisaki. Not them."

Aizawa must be starting to see it, the fraying in the lies 27 didn't have to say to hide behind. They think he's so useful to the investigation, that he's the key to bringing The Miasma down. He tried his best to forget everything after he was sold, everything about them, and it's been more than three years since he was truly there. Everything might have changed, and he would be completely useless. "I wonder if the old man tore it down."

27 looks up to see Aizawa staring at that tree, and it seems like everything about him is sharper only because 27 hadn't been looking at him properly. His beard is already longer than it should be, a little more like a proper beard rather than sparse bristles. There's an odd look in his eye, even if he isn't properly looking back at 27.

"I built a treehouse out here, when I was younger," Aizawa explains, pointing at the bits of wood that stick out of the snow, that now have an explanation. "My grandfather and I haven't spoken in years due to a... disagreement. About Hizashi."

27 imagines that Yamada's loud rambling voice and his near-constant smiles would probably irritate the old man who seemed to seek misery wherever he could find it, much like Aizawa. It seemed to run in the family, and only makes Aizawa choosing to live with Yamada even more odd.

But Aizawa pulls his legs a bit closer, sitting up straighter, and that discomfort seems to mean it's something else. "About marrying Hizashi, specifically. Against all logic, the old man seems to believe in 'traditional marriage.' He was angry then, and I imagine Hizashi trying to call his frequency won't end well."

"So, he needs to die," 27 says, not entirely aware that the words are slipping out of him. Aizawa turns to look at him almost like he's shocked, and 27 isn't sure how he can explain it. He knows Yamada doesn't need to talk to him every day, he knows there's a slim possibility that Yamada will talk to him after this 'temporary measure' is done, after he's forced to use his quirk on him.

He just feels like he wouldn't feel so irritated if Yamada would keep his word and call him.

"He's... old. Bothering you," 27 says, weak weak lies that he can't even bring himself to say to Aizawa's face. He's staring at the wrecked treehouse instead, and maybe he should try to look angry at it. Angry on Aizawa's behalf.

He's not, because the treehouse looks like it would look stupid if it was properly on the tree. This little 'cave' looks stupid too. Whatever reason he had to drag 27 out to this place was probably stupid too. "I can put up with it. The old man... likely won't be around for much longer, anyway."

Aizawa still sounds uncomfortable with that, like escaping that uncomfortable disagreement isn't enough to outweigh wanting the old man to live. Like there's something about a person that Aizawa clearly doesn't like that makes him still want him to continue on in this life.

27 felt like 127 deserved to die, when he was faced with that choice. Even when that choice was in his own hands. And now, now that he has to sit with the very real possibility that 127 is dead, he feels like he doesn't deserve it. Even if that means that 127 might try to kill him again, might succeed, 27 can't bring himself to want that.

Unless 127 means his threat against Eri. Then, he definitely needs to die, and he should hope Bug does it instead of 27.

"You've never killed anyone?" Aizawa asks, but it barely sounds like a question, and more like a question that 27 used to ask. When that used to work to avoid using his quirk.

"Promised 50 not to," 27 answers, and her name sounds like an admonishment. He thinks she would have accepted it. She wouldn't be happy, she wouldn't be proud, but she would have just understood. He had to kill 127 to keep everyone safe, including himself, and the weight of that action is nothing compared to what could happen through inaction.

He wishes he could just know, that he could just ask. "Have you ever... come close to that?" Aizawa asks, and there's a way his voice changes after the pause, like 'come close' has another word he doesn't want to say.

27 doesn't want to say it either. "With 127. Tried to. Wanted to."

He wanted to hurt 127, so much that he felt like nothing would be enough. Every hiss that 27 earned with a blind movement of his blade felt weightless, he felt angry that he couldn't see the wound. He wanted to tear 127 apart, and no matter how he fell and no matter what he looked like when he could no longer use his quirk to camouflage himself, 27 wasn't sure if he would ever see enough blood to stop.

He doesn't know what that makes him. A murderer who simply didn't have the strength to commit the act, but a monster all the same, the stain hardly lighter for it. A monster, like a Nomu seems to be.

"That's understandable," Aizawa says, two quiet words that don't make sense, that Aizawa clearly doesn't believe from the way he stares at his own hands, barely folded in front of him. It's still so odd to see him wearing gloves. "To be angry, after being hurt. To want to defend yourself to that degree. To feel it's justified."

"It's not," 27 says, because he knows this itch under his skin that won't freeze, that won't go away, is a punishment for it. He feels like he's still holding that knife, midswing, but he can't finish him off. "Killing someone takes something you can't get back."

Aizawa doesn't answer that, for a bit too long. 27 follows his still hands to his chest to his face, how tired Aizawa looks despite something odd in his eyes. Something that looks like a question Hitoshi doesn't want to ask. "That kind of situation doesn't follow reason. It's... it can be more overwhelming because of that. Because it's different from how you usually think, or act."

27 looks at the capture scarf, always looped around Aizawa's shoulders. He's held that scarf in his hands, felt the difference where it's fabric and how it's not. How sturdy it is, and how not even the most desperate fingers could rip it away from where Aizawa placed it to wrap around someone. Aizawa had it around 127's body, and his neck.

And he could have snapped 127's neck with just a pull.

"You want to know where they are," 27 says, trying to think from Aizawa's perspective. If he were hunting down The Miasma, if he were stupid enough to do that, the most burning question in his mind would be where to find them to face them in person, on their own ground. "I don't know where that is. Not an address or city."

"I expected that," Aizawa says, not the words 27 expected to hear. "Whatever you remember about the surrounding area would be helpful. What kind of building it is." Aizawa is asking questions without asking them, and 27 doesn't want to answer them if they're not asked. "How they do business. If there's a way we can meet them, pretending to be a volunteer or someone seeking to hire them."

"Memory," 27 says, and forces himself to shrug. "Handles that. I don't..." He doesn't know how she does, the singular thing that Aizawa wants from him is something he's admitting he doesn't have. He's useless, and he can't even be angry that Aizawa put that expectation on him, because he's benefited too much from it and he wants to keep it.

"That's fine," Aizawa says, his words too strange for 27 to know what they mean at first, and he has to look again at his face to see that nothing has changed. That maybe he means that, even if it's a lie. He doesn't want to know the truth anyway. "You... don't know anything about the Nomus. How they... come about."

"I am one," 27 says, repeating what Aizawa told him. Asking a question, really, but it's one he doesn't want Aizawa to recognize. "Because of..."

Aizawa doesn't seem to want to answer it either, his folded hands curling before they straighten, before he pulls himself up to stand, trying to brush the snow out of his hair. It's pointless. "We've seen Nomus that can choose to utilize one quirk or another. It might be possible for you to do that too.”

Nomus have multiple quirks, then. 27 has never heard of that happening, except, maybe he did. Maybe during the worst quirk training sessions with Chisaki, but 27 doesn't remember those so clearly. He knows Chisaki would have been interested in that, in fashioning the quirks he hated so much but needed into more devastating tools for him to use. Fusion was something that Chisaki practiced beforehand.

But never like he did during the raid. “My quirk... doesn't seem to be effective with that. Not that I've practiced a great deal.”

Nomus are rare, then. Nomus are something that the heroes are interested in, and that's why they're interested in The Miasma.

And why Aizawa is still interested in him.

27 stands up, even if it doesn't make a difference. Aizawa's idea of training isn't the usual way. Even when 27 was supposed to be training with his quirk, he still had to focus on hand-to-hand combat with other Numbers. Maybe it would help if Aizawa did that. “Nemoto... could use his quirk in different ways. He could make someone answer a question he prepared, or he could just... let the question come to him. Whatever that person didn't want to answer.”

Aizawa nods, tucking his hands into his pockets. “It's hard to say which came first in his quirk development, but probably the latter. Is there any difference you've noticed?”

“It's more annoying-” 27 stops, trying to tuck his hair back under his hat or at least behind his ear. He's not sure if it's worth voicing this childish complaint, something he felt far harsher than before he tried to say it and that anger seemed to freeze. “When you ask questions.”

Aizawa looks towards the tree, but it looks like he's rolling his eyes. “That could be a number of things.” 27 wonders how he could remind Aizawa that he's also a Number... of things, but he can't figure out anything that wouldn't sound stupid. “When I activate my quirk, ask me a question. Concentrate on how your quirk feels. And if I answer, try to learn how to end the control yourself. I'm not a fan of having shoes thrown at my head.”

“My feet would get cold,” 27 points out, but he doesn't want to think of what happens after that point. Not when he's too stupidly hopeful that this works. Aizawa turns to him and activates his quirk, his eyes glowing red and his hair floating. Just floating, not straight on end, which might mean he's not pushing himself. Did Yamada tell you he wasn't going to call? “Why do you think I'm irritated by hearing you ask questions?”

“It could be a new quirk compulsion, an itch to use your own quirk that you're repressing because you've rejected your quirk again,” Aizawa answers, a forced monotone barely different from his usual way of speaking. There's no change in his face to show whether he's uncomfortable with this. “Or you're irritated with the investigation, despite how you asked me to come out here.”

Aizawa's eyes glaze over white, his arms bending more once they're relaxed but his hands are still tucked in his pockets. 27 knows it's unprofessional, but he turns around and kicks the snow in front of him. Of course, he'd rather forget the investigation like Aizawa promised him he could. His only chance of that actually happening would be to find out whether being a Nomu is more important to the investigation than being a Number.

27 closes his eyes, trying to feel where his quirk rests. He always imagined it like a string, but now there's nothing. He knows that's because he doesn't control his quirk, it's not his quirk. A ghost of Nemoto probably holds Aizawa under now, in a place that 27 doesn't know to look for.

He knows it's not because he's cold, or distracted. He just can't find it.

27 turns around to face Aizawa, before he bends and picks up a handful of snow to mold into a ball. He's due for an interrogation. And target practice.

Aizawa blinks and spits like the snow got into his closed mouth, even if it covers the bottom half of his face. He rubs it off and glares at 27, but 27 just shrugs. "Not a shoe."

Aizawa has nothing to say to that, and once the snow is off his face, he activates his quirk again, this time his hair stands on end. It makes him look angrier.

Why do you want to know about Nomus? "What will happen if The Commission finds out about my quirk?"

"They'll want to study it. They'll take you away. To a lab." 27 sees Aizawa's eyebrows twitch down, his face warps for only a second, trying to fight this quirk. "I don't want to know what will happen after that."

White. Glazed white eyes, pure stillness. 27 feels it in himself, when he knows what that means.

Like Eri.

What Chisaki did to Eri, with his tests, when he harvested blood and bone from her body, he did that so he would understand how Eri's quirk worked. How to use it. He thought the heroes wanted to know that too, but it's not the same. They won't hurt Eri like that, they seem to want her to know how to use her quirk for herself, and for Mirio too.

But with him, it's different. They don't care about him like they care about Eri. He'll be in that chair, they'll run those tests. On his body, and he's only felt the muted fear from Eri what that will feel like. He wanted to take that pain on himself, once.

But only to keep it away from Eri. And he won't even see Eri once they find out.

And he knows Aizawa can't lie to him.

He feels his hands shaking, and it's not from the cold, his breathing is too quick and he feels like he needs to run. He can't run away, not from this, not from his own quirk. After everything, this is how it ends up? This is what he deserves?

"Hitosh-shit," Aizawa swears, balanced on one kneeling leg while his other seems to be unwilling to move, still straight. Hitoshi, he's Hitoshi now. But he's not, he's a Nomu, and Aizawa said it himself.

"Fuck you," 27 says, forcing the words past the catch in his teeth. He doesn't have the mask, he turns to look at Aizawa looking stupid crouched in the snow. He feels like he could kill him, he feels terrified that he could. He feels like he's ripping apart and bleeding into the snow, and he just wishes it could end.

Aizawa pulls himself to a kneel, then to stand, his hands raising up like 27 is a threat to him.

"We're done-"

"We're not done," 27 says, rubbing a glove across his face hard enough to hurt, for each clump of snow to burn on his skin. He drops his head to look at the sky, unable to look at Aizawa right now, and he can't stop from laughing. "We're not done, you need to know everything, that's all I'm fucking good for and how fucking lucky is it that I'm like this?!"

"Shi-" Aizawa stops, and 27 looks, only to see his hair falling back to his shoulders. Aizawa must have tried to use his quirk, but his eyes aren't red or glowing now. Glazed over and white.

Aizawa's quirk had some effect this time, maybe. His words were his own. It was almost like his own quirk, just a question being enough, but even when Hitoshi tries, he can't feel a string to control his own control. There's nothing but a blur in his mind, a smudge he can only feel from being wrong. 27 breathes out and closes his eyes, trying to feel for it, before he realizes he doesn't want to.

He thinks he should take advantage of Aizawa being forced into stillness like this, until his gut turns at how much he doesn't want to. Even for freedom, even for his own life, he feels sick from just the thought of it.

27 feels cold relief afterwards, something that feels lukewarm after that, before he tries to tell himself not to think about it. If Aizawa could do that, take away that part of his quirk, strip Confession out just enough. He wants to believe that.

But he drops his hands, because he still doesn't want to talk to Aizawa. "Follow me."

27 is grateful that they didn't travel too far, that they didn't go too far into the woods. His body seems hollow and too heavy, he feels too much like the ghost that haunts him as he makes his way back to the shack. He would probably get lost all the same, but the stars and the moon are so bright out here, and sometimes he nearly stops just to stare at how many stars there are.

He's read books that use the phrase 'More than the stars in the sky.' Someone probably tried to count how many stars there were. Far more stars than there are numbers. Or Numbers.

He hears that stupid bellow again and it startles him, for a moment he hopes that he dropped his control. But looking over his shoulder confirmed that Aizawa was still following him with whitened eyes, forced to do it.

27 hesitates for just a step when he sees the shack come into view, but ignores it. He doesn't care what the old man has to say about this, or what he thinks. 27 knows he can take him down if he needs to.

"-I'd like to start off this special little show with a special little shout out to a few of my favorite listeners who are tuning in. Or not tuning in, but I hope they're tuning-" Yamada's voice is unmistakeable, and 27 stops in his tracks as soon as he hears it, like a wall of too many things he can't name has hit him.

The old man scrambles to turn off the radio, and 27 rushes forward to stop him. He hasn't decided how, but when the old man seems satisfied to pull away after flipping the switch, 27 just turns it back on.

"-Baby Shark, to open and close. Just like those little hand dances! Ba-by Shark! Doo-doo-doot doot!" The old man hisses and glares where he seems crumpled up on the ground, and 27 meets that dominance display with a glare. He's not going to turn this radio off, even if Hitoshi has heard this song a million times.

Then the old man looks at Aizawa, still standing just past the open door, and looks back at 27. "The hell did you do to him?!"

“My quirk,” 27 answers, lowering himself from a crouch he doesn’t need to rest on his heels. He doesn’t need to move fast to threaten this old man, even if he looks angry, he can’t threaten 27 now. “Brainwashing. He’ll do anything I tell him to do now. Anything.”

The old man raises his eyebrows before he huffs, finding something amusing in that threat. “Shit, that’s... that’s a quirk. Hell, Shouta never tells me anything.” The old man looks between Aizawa and 27, as though he’s trying to figure out which one will attack him. Neither, as long as he behaves, and 27 might leave this to his own hands instead of making Aizawa feel guilty for it. “He doesn’t have a clue what’s going on right now, right? Bulb’s completely out of the socket?”

27 nods, slowly. Even if he won’t use Aizawa as a weapon, the old man can think he will.

“Good,” the old man decides, oddly. His voice gets quieter as he nods. “You tell him about this and I’ll pickle your goddamn fingers and eat them, I swear I will.”

27 finds himself shocked, at the colorful threat he wants to use as soon as possible, and how this old man seemed to have something he wanted to hide more than he wanted to keep his pride.

27 looks back at the radio, remembering what Aizawa said, and realizes how little sense it makes. “Tell him to close the damn door then, he was raised better than that!”

27 does, and Aizawa obeys, before 27 orders him to sit at the table. The old man watches out of the corner of his eye, as though he’s not entirely convinced that 27 won’t use Aizawa to attack him. Or he’s just this wary over a stupid secret being revealed. “You listen to Yamada’s show.”

The old man scowls at him, hard to tell by the way his white hair covers up so much of his face, before he glances back at Aizawa and seems to settle into a more comfortable sitting position. “You tell him and you’re dead, you got that?”

27 sits down fully as well, crossing his legs. Grampa Shark is singing now, before the hunt starts. “You got angry after they decided to get married.”

The old man glares again, what 27 can see of his lips puckering up like he’s tasted something awful by hearing those words. 27 could try to force him to answer honestly, but he’s not sure what he’ll be forcing him to answer. “I don’t know who the hell you are to know that, but you can mind your own business. Sure as hell could learn how to do that from Shouta.”

Learning things with, or from Aizawa, never bodes well. 27 decides to ignore the old man, since he doesn’t want him to know. He wonders if Yamada is going to pick a song for him.

The old man grunts, and he needs to shut up, but he won’t. “I was there for the kid when his mom was... having her spells. Maybe that was all my fault, but... punk could’ve told me something. Not just showing up here and leaving, not saying a damn word about... any of that. Could’ve-”

“Shh,” 27 hisses, because he hears what he expected, a record scratch instead of a commercial break. Maybe it’s the song he plays for Aizawa, maybe it’s something else. Hitoshi hopes it’s not that stupid song from that Seken Suns album. He hopes Yamada knows he didn’t really like any of those songs, he just wanted to force Yamada to make amends with the hero student that hated him.

“We’re still working on translating those lyrics, but I think we’ll have it down in no time! Doots and doo’s and doot-doot-doots,” Yamada says, and even if something sounds off about the sound. Maybe it’s just the radio, but Yamada’s voice sounds somehow more muted than it is when he listens to the radio show at the dorm. “This one goes out to my favorite, and a little bit of a picky listener. Almost had to take the group vote for Nyan Cat."

"You're welcome," a familiar voice says, with its familiar cold sarcasm. Jirou was on the radio now. Jirou was probably sitting in the seat that 27 usually sits.

"Oi, that's what-" There's a weird bleep that 27 can't figure out, even if he's still confused why Bakugo was at the radio station too. "-would-" Bleep. "Want, weird-" Bleep. "Cat addict."

Byte Sound doesn't like having to censor people on the radio show, and it sounds like Bakugo will be getting on her bad side. "But we hope you like this one!" Midoriya says, and why was Midoriya at the radio station too?!

"Thank you, guest stars of UA's Class 1-A," Yamada says, but it doesn't sound like he's really thankful. "For the listener this song is for, my favorite listener, who I hope is still listening, I think you'll like this band, and like this song. And I hope you know the same stars are shining over all of us tonight. Hoshie by Sajou no Hana!"

Yamada didn't call, but. He said all of that. He hopes he's still listening.

He's playing this song. For him.

Hitoshi feels the same way that he felt looking at those bright stars as he listens to the words, as he realizes they're for him. On that 'national stage' on those 'big time airwaves,' Yamada is playing a song to reach out to him. And he feels smaller with that, like the music and this gesture is so much bigger than he is, that it could crush him. And he feels the words pull in his chest hard enough to stop him from breathing, as much as he felt like those stars were too pure for him to touch, instead of just being so far away.

He wonders what Eri thinks of this song. If she thinks of him too while she listens to it.

"Who the hell are those punks?" The old man asks, but he could just shut up and go back to grunting instead of being so loud.

"My students," Aizawa answers, and he shouldn't. 27 turns around to look before he thinks of it, but Aizawa is still sitting at the table, pulling his gloves off of his own free will. Not under his control. "Hizashi is in charge of them for the weekend, so he's probably doing the radio show from the dorm. The control broke a few minutes ago."

27 wonders if Aizawa has more to say about it, why it would have broken in the first place. If hearing music was enough, or feeling the itch under his skin that hasn't settled in so long finally disappearing.

Or if it was just getting an answer to the real question he wanted. Hearing Yamada's voice again, even in this place. "So, tell me whatcha think of that, my favorite listener. And to the listener who has listened to me for the second-longest ever, the only listener who has listened almost as much as my mom, and probably wishes he could be a whole lot like her in the hearing impairment department because of that, you know this one. Lovecats!"

27 hums, wondering if Todoroki will accept that Yamada and Aizawa are married now that Yamada has all but said it. That song wouldn't go out to anyone else.

The old man grunts, hissing between his teeth when he pulls himself up off the floor, walking over to his crossbow. Maybe he'll actually check the traps, since he and Aizawa didn't. "American bullshit."

That's not a nice thing to say about Aizawa's song, and it's not bullshit. It's a nice song about cats, even if the singer sings about them in a kind of weird way. Like the cats are actually people who like drinking cream and licking themselves clean.

Hitoshi doesn't hate this song, and he doesn't like it either. But he appreciates that it's familiar, because Yamada almost always plays it.

Right Person, Right Place, Right Time

Chapter Summary

Shinsou and Aizawa attempt to share the same room in Aizawa Shoga's shack, which makes for late night conversation and early mornings. Shoga shows Shinsou the traps that provide security for his shack, to terrible consequences. Yamada tries to cope with his situation, being alone at UA in the company of 1-A.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warning: Animal cruelty and death (the lizard is unharmed, the deer... less so), Ableism in regards to ADHD, Bug Sessions

Previously on Wards of UA: Aizawa captured 127 in his capture scarf when 127 attacked UA, and Shinsou recently realized how deadly the capture scarf could be. Shinsou has a habit of digging his nails into his Bug scars when something reminds him of the Bug sessions, or the dark room torture. When Shinsou first arrived to The Miasma after being sold, he was kept in a pitch-black room and only taken out to test whether he would not speak, and would respond to the name '27.' During the hike to the shack, Shinsou was startled by a species of deer known as a 'serow,' which Aizawa identified while he was trying to be a bit of a nature guide. Aizawa told his grandfather that he and Shinsou would check the traps, when Shinsou offered to tell Aizawa more about The Miasma, and Shinsou is pettily reminding Aizawa that he lied about that to his grandfather. Yamada is watching the 1-A dorm this weekend in Aizawa's place, and ran his radio show with the hero students as guest stars. Yamada and Aizawa have known Iida Tenya since he was a child, since they're friends with Iida Tensei. Bakugo has referred to Present Mic with his hair down as 'Flaccid Mic' frequently in his POVs. The UA traitor's identity was revealed to Nezu after the attack, and the arrest will take place this weekend. Kaminari has ADHD, and has struggled academically with that, and Yamada has previously expressed frustrations that Kaminari won't accept any help with that. Yamada has previously mentioned in Now! That's What I Call Music that an unnamed news anchor questioned whether he was really deaf if he ran a radio show, and that Aizawa had blackmail material on her. Aizawa was incredibly disturbed to see the scars on Shinsou's stomach, knowing that while the ones on his arms were long, the scars there were circular, meaning that whatever caused those scars had caused deeper internal damage. 50's legal name is Furokage Mizuki.

Aizawa was 8 years old the first time he tried to be a hero.

October's chill was harsher in the mountains, and he was on one of his many 'vacations' from his mother, wandering the forest with a stick in his hand and a mind made up to avoid his grandfather and his unfinished correspondence education project. He saw a lizard at the base of a tree, not moving, and after earning an irritated twitch of the tail after a few pokes, realized the creature was going to die if it wasn't rescued from the cold.

He made his way to his grandfather's shack with the lizard tucked under his jacket, quiet prayers whispered under his breath and promises to the lizard that it was going to be okay. Looking back, he can see that he missed a fair bit of field triage and that he could have found a better way to carry it. His grandfather seemed to be in a better mood than when he left, surprisingly courteous to find a box for his 'new pet' and allowed the wood furnace to be lit, but only if Aizawa chopped more wood for it.

Aizawa watched and waited for more signs of life, breathing easier as the lizard seemed to, as he saw it adjust its feet. And he squealed at the top of his lungs when the lizard thawed out enough to lunge at him. He has a distinct memory of it hissing even when he knows now that species isn't able to.

His grandfather marched heavily to the stove and grabbed the lizard, shouting about 'gratefulness' with mumbles less clearly defined. His anger was all that Aizawa could hear as well as the slurring in his voice.

Aizawa heard a thunk after the old man stepped outside, stomps that followed, and Aizawa couldn't bring himself to look at the walls outside for the next few days. And when he did, he was nearly moved to offer a prayer of gratitude that it wasn't stained red, and that the lizard had been able to get away, even without his protection.

Heroes don't act in search of gratitude, which is not what drove Aizawa to save that lizard. Heroes don't act out of loneliness either. Heroes act for a myriad of personal reasons, but one should unify them all - 'it's the right thing to do.' They are the right person, in the right place, at the right time, with the right training and skill for what is at hand.

But that's just theory. Application is always messier.

"An informant for The Miasma infiltrated Shie Hassaikai," Shinsou says, his voice a stark difference from the sounds of nature outside, a near constant noise since night fell and Aizawa insisted that he try to sleep. Unfortunately sharing the same room. "Once. Overhaul killed him to deliver a message. Overhaul protected me better than you."

Shinsou seems to want to make this a habit, nipping at Aizawa's nerves in search of a response he wants. Aizawa can't believe he was on good behavior in front of his grandfather.

"You could have snapped his neck, but oh no, the Hero's Mantle. Hero syndrome." Aizawa was once so moved that Shinsou paid attention in his class. "If my dear big brother 127 didn't mess up taking my blood, I'd be dead right now. Existing Amplifier would lose his job-"

"Why big brother?" Aizawa asks, because if Shinsou wants to talk, he clearly wants a conversation. It might be relevant to the investigation, but Aizawa honestly doesn't give a damn. He'd rather get some sleep, but he needs quiet to do that.

Shinsou does go quiet, but only long enough that Aizawa hopes he's decided this game isn't fun anymore. "27. 127. You're not supposed to be stupid, but maybe I haven't been paying attention."

An easy and predictable insult. Aizawa is almost disappointed. "You're supposed to be asleep."

Aizawa tugs a hand out of his sleeping bag to rub at his eyes, the ache from using his quirk still not fading. There's only a slight chill from what the tarp lining the walls can't catch, but the brighter moon and stars only illuminate where the tarp is worn thin. The darkness and the call of owls and fox chirps could lull him to sleep like nothing else.

If only he could hear them.

“You’re supposed to be a hero. Protecting your so-very-important witness. Of course, now you need more information because you can’t do your job. It’s so convenient that we’re out in the middle of nowhere so that no one can hear me scream. Of course, I got over that. Break my bones, burn me, drown me, kill me. That one just makes me nauseous, and you’re not anything like Overhaul-”

“Stop calling him that,” Aizawa says, turning his head to try to see the outline of Shinsou on the oddly nice futon his grandfather provided in this darkness. He can see a shoulder, that Shinsou’s back is turned to him. “You can be angry that I wasn’t there. You could reflect on the reasons why I wasn’t, after you forced Mirio to leave when he was trying to defend you-”

“To get killed,” Shinsou hisses, a bit too loud, and Aizawa doesn’t want to invite his grandfather’s attention to this petty spat. “Sure, you want his death on my hands. Fitting. 127 uses knives. If he left me behind, you’d think I killed him myself.”

“I wouldn’t,” Aizawa answers, without hesitation. After the initial shock, he knew exactly why Shinsou used his quirk on Mirio to make him leave. Even if he didn’t appreciate it. “I know you were trying to protect him, but Mirio is a trained hero. He had the situation under control, and if you left, you would have been able to alert me sooner.”

The problem with turning those situations over and over to find better outcomes, is that there’s still too much chance at play. Aizawa still had to overcome USJ’s lockdown in order to get outside, and though Mirio was trained, he was trained to fight to compliment a quirk. He knew how to counter invisibility quirks like 127’s, but there was a great deal of chance as to whether he could when he wasn’t suited for the situation.

Mirio wasn’t the target, and whether that would have fared better for him or worse is left to another turn of fate that didn’t happen. Aizawa would like to move past it, do better going forward, but he knows that his ward will not forget that night for a long time.

Aizawa notices that Shinsou has been too quiet for too long, something he thought he would be overjoyed with before now, but something prickles at the back of his neck and makes it seem unnerving. He rolls on his side, and sees that nothing has changed about Shinsou. Nothing that he can see from his back, except for the fingers he notices are clawing into his own arm.

Dark....

Aizawa nearly swears, pulling himself from the sleeping bag to stumble to the corner of the room where their bags were set. Aizawa finds the flashlight that Hizashi insisted that he bring, that Aizawa found completely unnecessary but was unwilling to put up a fight, and turns it on to actually look at his ward.

Shinsou was curled into a ball, his arms wrapped tight around his legs and head ducked down, shaking. Too much like Eri would when she was first placed with them, when she felt nothing but terror and couldn’t trust that fear with anyone around her. Whether Shinsou was trying to provoke him in order to hide his own terror, or to just beg for a familiar voice with those barbed words, Aizawa should have known.

Shinsou only said ‘dark’ in that interview, but Aizawa made himself familiar with certain tactics that might have been used to achieve Miasma’s goal. A child who firmly believed their name was ‘27.’

The age he suspects that those tactics were used, soon after Shinsou was sold, was something that he forced himself to only see as a number. He didn't want to imagine Shinsou at four years old, trapped in a dark room and shaking like this. But now he sees it.

Shinsou sees the light in his hand, looking up with too wide eyes, the scars on his face were a familiar sight before this moment, but somehow they seem fresher. They seem more painful.

Aizawa places the flashlight on its end to point towards the ceiling, set between their two sleeping places. He glances to see that Shinsou is still staring at him, but not shaking. "You can tell me when something is bothering you—"

"It doesn't—" Shinsou curls back around himself, stopping himself mid-shout. Aizawa no longer sees a young child trembling in the dark, but a teenager who still fears it. Who sees himself as a teenager that shouldn't be afraid of what isn't a childish fear for him. "I'm not scared of the dark. Eri isn't either."

Eri might not be, but Aizawa and his husband never took that chance. Especially Hizashi, who included no less than 10 nightlights in a very long shopping list as soon as Aizawa asked for his opinion on the matter. "Eri didn't experience what you did."

Aizawa imagines that Eri has never had the chance to fear the dark like another child her age would. Darkness was a lonely thing for his childhood, in some ways unique, but in others it wasn't. Most children are alone in their rooms at night, but Eri wasn't. The only protector she ever knew was always with her, Shinsou was there for her.

And Aizawa can imagine that no one was ever there for Shinsou.

Aizawa pulls himself back into his sleeping bag, resting his arms on top rather than zipping himself back in. He imagines despite the light, despite the silence from Shinsou, he's still not at ease. Despite what Aizawa has learned from those tactics, how white torture like that has driven stable adults completely insane, there's nothing that he's learned that could help Shinsou right now. Nothing that he's learned.

But there's one thing that Hizashi told him. "This used to be my room," Aizawa says, feeling the callouses on his fingers catch on the yellow nylon when he absently flexes them.

Hizashi said that talking to Shinsou seemed to help him calm down sometimes, just talking about pointless things. Distraction. Possibly something to do with his quirk, and how it relies on conversation.

"I had a cot in that corner. A bucket for clothes that needed to be washed." The change for a futon and the addition of a large jar that might be the old man's attempt to give them a 'guest bathroom' are rather grand gestures of hospitality from his grandfather. "Not much else. Even though I spent most of my childhood here."

"The Eld... he said something about your mother," Shinsou says, and Aizawa struggles to appreciate Shinsou not referring to his grandfather as a respected yakuza, when he knows that statement is a question he'd rather not answer.

"My mother and I didn't do well with living together," Aizawa answers, carefully. He's aware that there are similarities between himself and Shinsou, that for a myriad of different reasons, their quirks caused a strain in the relationship between mother and child. Shinsou Ui claimed she tried to give her son to Social Services after he developed his quirk, for his own well-being. Aizawa's own mother would never risk that. She would never see the situation for what it was. "We argued a lot."

Constantly. She thought that being out here would reform me.”

You need to stay with your grandfather for a while, you need to learn not to do that. He doubts that his mother truly thought that helping his grandfather hunt game, forage, and live off the land as a squatter with all the laborious work that entails would stop him from taking off his eyepatch that was meant to keep him from using his quirk.

She likely just wanted a ‘vacation’ from him, and called it reformatory for her own pride. It was, if just for the fact that his grandfather never forced him to wear that damn eyepatch.

“Didn’t work,” Shinsou says, slowly uncurling his legs as a shield, even if he’s still speaking to a wall instead of looking at Aizawa. “It won’t work for me either.”

Aizawa rolls his eyes. There’s no wonder that Shinsou gets along far too well with his grandfather, given that they both have an irrational and immovable seam of paranoia stitched in their spines. But Aizawa is relieved that he’s convinced Shinsou that his goal for this venture wasn’t to torture or kill him for information, just ‘reform’ him in some way. “Probably not, given that you’re terrified of deer.”

“A serow,” Shinsou argues, obviously testing his new vocabulary. “Some crazy guy in the woods told me that. You should watch out for him when you’re not checking the traps.”

“I’ll keep my eyes peeled. Crazy woodsmen and those bloodthirsty serow,” Aizawa answers, fighting a grin when he hears an irritated huff, and sees out of the corner of his eye that Shinsou has rolled himself on his stomach, face turned into the pillow to likely follow a juvenile instinct to smother himself. Aizawa is pretty sure that means he’s won. “Any other terrifying animals you’d like to see?”

“The Loch Ness monster,” Shinsou grumbles, muffled into his pillow. Aizawa finds himself confused at first, before he realizes that Shinsou probably only knows that creature from Eri’s frequent Sailor Moon marathons. He’s not sure how to let him down gently. “I’m joking. You really think I’m stupid.”

“I don’t,” Aizawa answers. “It’s just new to you. New experiences.”

Aizawa watches Shinsou curl his arms under his pillow, something more comfortable, but still hiding his expression as well as the dark room did before the flashlight was lit. Aizawa doesn’t know if that’s cold comfort, to acknowledge that Aizawa knew as well as Hitoshi did that he was out of his depth here. That he would probably be completely at home in an organized crime ring, but in the real world, he was completely ill-equipped. But not stupid. “They live next to the sea... not the mountains....”

The quiet mumbled words seem to promise that Shinsou will fall asleep soon, and Aizawa will take that assumption as an excuse not to answer him.

If the news that the Loch Ness monster doesn’t exist needs to be broken, Aizawa will gladly let Hizashi be the one to tell him.

*

Yamada was having a great morning.

Aside from the paralyzing fear that Eri was in inconsolable terror every second and Hitoshi might have been eaten by bears without his knowledge, Yamada was having fun looking after the little 1-A herolets. They were rattled, yes, and they kept asking where Eri and Hitoshi were and if they were okay, which Yamada had to answer with non-specifics and confidence that he didn't feel in the slightest. But they made a pretty good playlist for him, and working from the 1-A dorm kept him from any memos informing him what his station manager thought about the changes, which only made the idea of having an independent broadcast more tempting.

HAM radio broadcasts are interesting, and Yamada has dabbled in it a bit when he was younger. It's so interesting, that just dialing into a certain frequency can let you talk to people all over the world. So handy, and Yamada can see why Aizawa Shoga decided to do away with landlines and cell phones to just use that.

And it's just so interesting that his sweet loving husband of nearly 10 years didn't give him the radio frequency for his grandfather before he left his phone at UA to go incommunicado.

Maybe it's unfair for Yamada to blame him for it, he knows that as rattled as he was, Shouta was too. But Yamada didn't think to ask, Shouta didn't think to tell him, and Yamada can't get over how shifty Principal Nezu looked when Yamada asked if he had that information. He definitely has it, since he's somehow found out where exactly Aizawa Shoga has been living off the grid, when that's exactly what people who live off the grid don't want.

Yamada tries not to think about how Principal Nezu has a vested interest in making Hitoshi talk about Miasma, and how sudden isolation, especially after a traumatic event, can make people 'open up' about certain things a bit more easily. And he tries not to think about what Shouta is doing now, if he's ignoring how absolutely shaken Hitoshi is to do the 'rational' thing to keep him safe, when Yamada knows that Hitoshi is scared. He's scared, he's terrified, and there's not a thing Yamada can do about it because even when he gets Hitoshi back home, he can't find the words to apologize for fucking up the single thing he was assigned to Hitoshi to do.

Yamada was supposed to keep Hitoshi safe from Miasma, and they attacked him. And there's nothing that Yamada can do to take that back.

After a night of barely sleeping well enough to call it that, Yamada takes a brisk shower and makes his way downstairs to make sure the little herolets have a community breakfast this Sunday, even if none of them feel up to cooking it.

Even if he doesn't feel particularly up to cooking it either, since Hitoshi has made it a habit of cooking with him for every meal. But Yamada makes his way to the common room to see quite a few more herolets downstairs than usual, almost all of them.

Not surprisingly, Sato is the only one in the kitchen, but at least it looks like Kirishima, Ashido, Iida, and Midoriya are sitting rather strategically around Bakugo, who has his hands folded up around a coffee mug like he knows that. Bakugo is another herolet that's talented in the kitchen, but his palate tends to be on the unbearably spicy side when he's in a foul mood.

And Yamada is pretty sure that all of them are in a mood, despite any polite smiles returned or any odd gawking, which is a little given since he hasn't had a dorm shift with these guys in a while. They're probably much more used to Shouta rising at the crack of noon. "Good morning, herloets! Wakey wakey for some eggs and bac-y!"

Yamada doesn't get much response, even if the kids seem pretty awake, but when Yamada strolls up to Sato's side and starts pulling his hair into a ponytail to work on those eggs and bacon, he realizes it. Most of these kids have never seen him with his hair down and unsculpted, and it might be rocking their worlds a bit.

Jirou, the sweetheart that she is that has absolutely not made him regret giving her his personal number, sputters a giggle at something, but when Yamada turns his head over his shoulder, he sees too many wide-eyed stares and too-tight smiles. It's something he hasn't seen since that girl with the Accuracy quirk stuck a classic 'Kick me' sticky note on his back during class. Yamada was going to brush that off as a bit of harmless delinquency, but Shouta expelled her as soon as Kayama told him about it. Which was great given that the student was in Kan's class.

Yamada just turns around, and starts wondering if he woke up with some such sticky note on his back when he hears a few more giggles, which cut out as soon as he turns around again. He knocks some eggs into a pan, but he knows he won't be able to work his magic until he knows what the punchline is, so he turns around to see Sero kicking Kirishima from the couch across from him and trying not to laugh. Iida looks a particular shade of white while he tries to play the Responsible Class President, and Yamada imagines that's pretty complicated when he's sure most of the other students don't know Iida has seen Yamada with his hair tangled in a ceiling fan before.

"Okay, what's so funny guys? Is there something on my face?" Yamada asks, rubbing his mustache which has usually been his husband's sarcastic answer to that question, and too many tight grins are shaking their heads and trying to keep this little joke from his ears.

Except for one herolet who's not having such a happy morning.

"You're flaccid," Bakugo says flatly, which makes Ashido try to cover his mouth with her hand and Kirishima turn a bit whiter and deer-eyed, and it makes a lot of sense.

As does the horror that comes over these kids, because while sexual innuendos are hilarious at their age, it's probably not appropriate when directed at an authority figure like him, and definitely not appropriate to let him know about it. Shouta has expelled for far less.

But, Shouta's not here when he's dicking around in the mountains, and Yamada can take a good joke. And roll with it. "Oh yeah, my hair's down! I've gotta give it time to rest, it's not healthy to have it up and ready for action all day every day."

Aoyama chokes on his sparkling water, and Shoji is looking a little red-faced where he's sitting with all six arms crossed. Yaoyorozu doesn't seem to get it, glancing at Todoroki who seems to be in the same boat. When Yamada catches Uraraka leaning a little closer to Asui and sees that Asui seems to catch that there's an explanation to be had, he turns around to avoid any sign of that little study group.

"So, seven sunny side up but four firm and three runny, eleven scrambled, tofu scramble for one?" Yamada asks to make sure, and while Koda tries to tell him that he can handle making his vegan option, it's really no trouble to just heat up some tofu and break it into chunks. Even if the kid won't mention it himself and just pick around any food that's not in line with his diet, Shouta caught on to it before the end of the second week and made it a personal mission for Lunch Rush to advertise his vegan options a bit more clearly on the menu. "Coffee brewing, OJ squeezed, Sugar Rush himself is laying out some honey and buns, so we've got ourselves a grrrreat start to a beautiful day!"

He's laying it on thick, and it's not just for their sakes. Even if it's plenty for their sakes right now, since Principal Nezu and a couple police officers are going to be making their way to the traitor any minute now. Yamada has his phone at his side, on standby if there's any trouble just like everyone else on staff, but he hopes he's not called into it.

Even knowing what that person did, what they did specifically to put Hitoshi's life in danger, Yamada just wants to turn a blind eye to it so that maybe it can hurt a bit less.

Yamada tries to get the other frying pan out of Sato's hands, but Shoji is the dark horse that keeps Sato from making practically the entire breakfast spread by pitching in on the meat station. Bacon, sausages, it's hearty if not healthy and practically dripping in comfort food. And it's an unspoken truth that everyone could use that right now. "14, 15, 16, I'm missing a few herolets down in the nest, and Uraraka, you're not flying out just yet!"

Uraraka flusters a bit and tries to shake off her attempt to ditch as an attempt to get an unnamed something from her room, but with the students missing in the headcount not exactly being in her social stratosphere, as far as Yamada knows, he sends her to the table with a sharp whistle and a wag of his spatula, before he lets the herolets dig into the first serving.

"Sounds like it's time for a wake-up call from the Alarm Clock Hero himself!" Yamada says, jogging up to the staircase to collect some strays who at least need to show their faces long enough to tell him to piss off.

The three missing are on the third floor, and with a bit of deliberation, he heads over to the girl's side to get the missing lady from the trio - Miss Hagakure - up and at 'em. And if he sees that a certain someone from the boy's side was already in her room, he pays no mind to it, given that this meeting didn't happen last night or else he would have gotten an alert for it. Even if he's dying to tell Shouta just to see him die a little inside at the very obvious implications of that, and how Shouta's probably going to be roped into watching that teen drama play out over the next two years.

With Hagakure and Ojiro heading down at an embarrassed sprint for breakfast, Yamada heads over to the boy's side to meet his final challenger. "Yo-yo-yo, got some sunny-side up to charge up that Chargebolt!"

Yamada hears a thunk, which is always promising, before a messy-haired Kaminari shows himself and shows off an impressive collection of open textbooks flung on the floor. But if those under-eye circles are signs that there was little sleep to be had last night, Kaminari doesn't show it with that thousand-watt grin. "Good morning, teacher! Thank you for egg!"

Yamada can appreciate the effort, because 'baby words' like 'the' and plurals like 'eggs' are pretty easy to forget in the morning. "Good morning to you too, Kaminari! Looks like you've been hitting those books 'til they're knocked out!"

Yamada throws a few shadow punches for effect, but he doesn't overlook a little bit of nervous panic dawning on one ambitious herolet's features. It seems there was a little plan to impress by going fully fluent in English while Yamada's in town, and translating off the fly is pretty tricky. "Yeah, yeah, hero work! Work hard! Fight on!"

Yamada doesn't even know if he shows any sign of it, because Kaminari pulls a wince all on his own, a defeated sigh escaping one defeated looking kid. "Hey-o, you're doing great Kaminari. It's the weekend and all, you really don't have to--"

"But I'm not stupid," Kaminari insists, and that's really not needed because Yamada knows that and he's never thought that. But it looks like this is a little crack under the pressure that's probably been a chip for too long, and Kaminari casting another glance at those textbooks like he really wants to punch them is just disheartening. "It's... just seemed easier when I was looking at it, I really was studying--"

"Yeah, I know you study, kiddo," Yamada says, because he knows. He knows the kid is kind of a mess about this stuff, and he's honestly surprised that Kaminari is letting him know that he tries, when he usually settles into the 'Oh, I'm not trying at all, I really don't care that I've got the lowest grades in class' routine.

Maybe that's an easier face to wear, but it's the hardest to deal with on either side of the teacher's desk.

"If you're looking to work on your English, I'm absolutely the right tutor, and we can have a little sesh after breakfast to catch you up. We can try out that timing method I was reading about! Have you ever tried that? Make your brain wire in for just five minutes, and then that bad boy won't want to look away from those conjugations!"

Weary, bloodshot eyes that wouldn't look out of place on Shouta's face look up at him, with a frown to match. "That's not really working for me. Bakugo tried and... Y'know, I just need to get over it? This is UA and all, and-"

"And UA is fantastic about academic accommodations when they're used," Yamada says, grinning so much that he can practically feel the pain in his cheeks. Kaminari has never filed for those accommodations, even when Yamada and other teachers have practically shoved those forms in his face. Everyone got a copy of his Middle school record, it was from a good enough school and Kaminari did well there, but the dip from B to D can't all be written off on how UA is notoriously difficult.

"But I'm going to be a hero?" Kaminari says, quirking his eyebrow like Yamada has just told him that accommodations are only for Gen Ed kids, and Yamada hopes it's anything but what he expects. "Like, I don't want to have it easier when being a hero isn't going to be easy. This is the place to just get over it, you know? It's just school."

Yamada honestly finds himself speechless. He pulls one hand behind his head to pull at his ponytail, the other drumming his fingers on the doorframe. He's been aware that this is a thing, but to hear it like that.

It feels like he's looking at his 8 year old self.

"So, you know that's not a problem, right? You've already earned your provisional license, they're not going to yank that back just because you have an attention disorder, right? There's just...." Yamada pulls his hands together in a clap, because he can't even pick a single way how that's not a problem when there's too many. "Kaminari, are you taking any medication?"

Kaminari doesn't say it, but that glance to the side and smallest shrug makes Yamada's gradebooks both sing and groan with the wasted time and potential.

"And, I'm going to assume that you were before the start of this year, because that entrance exam has told a very different tale from what we've all seen since," Yamada says, unspooling a mystery that he has been beating his head against the wall to figure out, because he only considered this but didn't want to believe it could be that easy.

A bigger, moodier shrug answers him. "Yeah, it's been harder, but I just need to try more-"

"You need to give yourself the best place to try, not spend all that effort fighting against it," Yamada says, and he could throttle the kid if only to pull him into a hug afterwards. "So, you know I'm deaf, right? Pull these hearing aids out and I've got no audio, just visual, and it'd be pretty stupid if I tried to go into a fight without hearing anything, right?"

Kaminari's lips purse up, eyes a little wider before he nods, a bit slowly. That might be news, and that might be a teensy bit of blow to his pride. It'd be nice to believe that all of his students admire him enough as a hero to get the basic fact sheet about him, but it's honestly never happened.

"And that's something that the Hero Commission definitely knows about! I've got specially made hearing aids for when I'm working, to make sure they don't just pop out in the middle of a fight, which you know would be really bad, and a pretty big risk," Yamada says, because the foam fitting has to be changed out frequently to make sure that doesn't happen, because it has happened. And it wasn't fun. "But that's not stopping me from being a hero. I need hearing aids, but I can still do my job, and there's no shame in that."

The herolet looks like he's plenty ashamed, for the wrong reasons, and that just makes it easier to see a kid who didn't have his hearing aids fitted properly and hated to ask to sit closer to the chalkboard. Who thought he should just get better at reading lips, because he didn't want to ask to be treated special.

"There's a big difference between what heroes look like on the big screen and how they are, kiddo. It's not like we're less strong, but we're only stronger when we're ready to fight," Yamada says, and he aches to let Kaminari know names behind that fact. "We all need support equipment, and I... guess I don't understand how this is any different."

Kaminari pulls a hand to rub his elbow, he looks like he might get it, but Yamada still wants to know that poisoned seed that started this. "It's just different, because.... Heroes are just supposed to be like that, y'know? The strongest, the smartest...."

"The best," Yamada sums up, because he works at the best hero school in the country and he knows that all his students are the best for what they want to do. "Are only the best when they're the right people, with the right skills, doing the right job, in the right spot, and you do not have to force yourself to be something you're not to fit that mold, kiddo. You're going to be an amazing hero, and you're going to be a much happier hero student when you've got the right support equipment for the job. And we're going to get that set up today."

Yamada will print off the forms for all of his coworkers, get that staff meeting done at lunch, and have everything in place for Tuesday to be the start of Kaminari's new academic career. He'll drive the kid to the soonest available appointment to get back on his medication, and take him out for ice cream afterwards.

And if Kaminari looks like he's unsure about that, he's going to have to get over that quick, because Yamada has made his decision about it, and it's final. He cannot let this kid go into his second year like this.

"So, that interviewer lady was wrong about Best Jeanist retiring because he was, like, depressed and stuff?" Kaminari asks. He genuinely asks.

And Yamada can't fight the hug coming on, so he pulls the sparky little devil against his chest and tries to resist the temptation to give him a noogie. "Kid. Don't listen to her. She is... literally the worst person alive, and on television."

Yamada thought he had a vendetta about the anchor from channel 8 before, but he's pretty sure Shouta needs to ruin her career now. Now that she's given one of his little herolets so much grief, so much shame, and made his job as a teacher so much more difficult.

Yamada is still smiling like he's not contemplating murder at all as he watches his little herolets eat their fill, to wander off to their rooms or make plans to have a little trip off campus to blow off some steam with retail therapy. Yamada just tries to not feel jealous when there's a crepe shop he'd like to visit, a few places that might make missing his family a bit easier to bear.

Yamada has figured that holding a little voluntary English tutor session might be distracting enough, and even if attendance might be disappointing with ‘voluntary’ and ‘on a weekend’ in the mix, taking some herolets under his wing sounds like a great use of his time.

But when Principal Nezu texts him with a name, with a question as to where that herolet was, Yamada can hardly believe it.

He just made a sunny side up egg for the UA traitor.

*

“Hey little bro.”

27 jolts up, his hands searching for the knife, for the snow, his jaw clenched tight.

He finds soft fabric under his grasp, he sees the blue tarps around him. He turns his head to see Aizawa, the light of the flashlight drawing sharp shadows from his nose, from his jaw. 27 can see his teeth from how his mouth is parted, how he’s sleeping that deeply on his back. 27 stares, long enough to start counting how many seconds go by. How long it will take until he forces himself to move, to kick Aizawa or something if he doesn’t wake up.

To realize that Aizawa wasn’t going to wake up, and didn’t have to. It was a dream, even if it seemed real. Even if he could hear that voice so clearly, 127 rasping in his ear. He knew exactly where the knife was even if he couldn’t see it, that it was raised to kill him.

27 tries to force it out of his mind, forcing himself to kneel, to run his hands through his hair despite how his fingers tangle easily. He’s not going to wake Aizawa over this, it’s stupid, Aizawa won’t be able to help him. He’ll just want him to go back to sleep.

27 feels his eyes fall closed, he feels himself slump forward, but he stops himself. He can’t sleep, he can’t face that again. It’s too much, even if he aches to rest.

27 pulls himself to his feet, and walks to his bag set against the wall and feels the fabric of his other clothes but for a moment mistakes it for Mocha. Mocha isn’t here, and that’s another selfish ache inside his chest. It’s stupid, and Mocha wouldn’t help him either.

He pulls the picture from the bottom of the bag, something that he knew he would need. Something that he wouldn’t risk losing. He took the two pictures he refused to lose, even if everything else was stripped away from him, but he needs this one more.

27 rubs at his eye, his eyes so dry and the skin around them feels looser, his hands feel half-numb too. 50 just smiles at him, the same as ever. Her wide brim hat, her long green hair like a veil around her shoulders. Bad dream, kiddo?

He runs a hand through his hair, just like she would if she were here. He wishes he could find more words to twist into her voice, he wishes she was just here. He knows she would keep him safe, and make this darkness just fall away into safety. If only he could imagine her quirk being the darkness that surrounds him.

27 feels his head tip down, his eyes closing again, and he puts the picture back in his bag before he grabs his jacket from the floor. He can’t fall asleep again, but he still wants to find some way to escape this pull and buzz under his skin, and he knows how to do that.

He doesn’t let his gaze linger on the old man’s bed next to the fire, and he can’t tell if there is an old man under that tangle of blankets. He walks carefully, to avoid waking either Aizawa, but the door closes more noisily than he meant to behind himself.

The sky is gray with early morning, the sun hasn't risen yet, or it hasn't grown powerful enough to force its way through the thick clouds. A haze of fog creeps through the trees, and there's no snow falling from the sky. 27 breathes out and sees a plume from his breath, his hands already stinging from the cold, but he lets his eyes fall on a place on the ground and walks over to it, before he lets himself fall backwards.

The snow crunches and seems to squeal against his jacket, but everything goes quiet soon enough. 27 forces his eyes open just enough, just to watch the fog from his breath and imagine each tree in the forest doing the same to create that fog. To just breathe, to just rest. To just live, when there's no point to it.

27 forces his eyes open enough to stare at the sky, knowing that it's close to 5 AM. If his job was extended past its usual time, he would see glimpses of this, the sky growing steadily lighter and brighter but he never stayed out long enough to see the sunrise. He was pulled back before then.

He feels another twitch in his gut, but it's too weak for him to work up the panic for it. He just lays his hand on his stomach and wishes he could laugh, that Boss was still trying to pull him back. 127 had a syringe, he was supposed to fill up another vial with his blood to replace the one Chisaki stole. Maybe he didn't take enough, or maybe it was broken.

Maybe Aizawa broke it when he captured 127 with his scarf.

27 feels exactly what he wanted to find in this snow, in this quiet. The cold that surrounds and accepts him is molded to his shape, and he could lay here forever. Just staring at the sky until he freezes to death. Thanks to Aizawa.

Hey kid.

27 hears 50's voice, distant and blurred before those last two words, before he forces his eyes open and winces at the sunlight. Wincing at the shadow over his head. "I've got a damn bed for you, ungrateful punk."

27 winces again at the smell of the old man's breath, something he's unable to avoid with the geezer crouching over him, and he resolves to never get close enough to smell it again. 148's breath was at least somewhat fragrant like the sweeter notes of a corpse's smell is. "Don't want to sleep."

The old man huffs, running his hands over the top layer of his threadbare jackets. 27 still wonders which mafia took his two fingers off. "Good. Help me do some work out here, since you ain't sleeping out in the snow. Some looney bin Shouta dragged up here."

27 pulls himself to sit, though it's harder to pull himself to stand. His hands sting where he feels them, and they look red and swollen. As he follows the old man into the woods, he tries to blow on them to thaw them out, but it hurts.

"Young for Shie Hassaikai," the old man grumbles, the end of his crossbow dragging in the snow. The old man talks a lot, except when Aizawa is there. "Pretty banged up for them too."

27 spares a glance at his hands again, like he doesn't know exactly why the old man would have noticed the scars there. Then he sees the old man lift a hand to scratch the side of his cheek, still not looking at him, but 27 knows what he means. "I wore a mask before I was sold to them. To keep me from talking."

The old man turns to look at him, and he seems terrified for some reason, before he turns to start shaking his head. “Shit, that sure isn’t the Shie Hassaikai I knew.” 27 has heard that things changed a lot when Chisaki succeeded in his coup. That it wasn’t for the better. “That’s your quirk, huh? Talk to people, they do what you tell ‘em to.”

“Sure,” 27 says, and he enjoys too much how he can answer with guarded anger in his words. A threat in a singular word, to warn the old man not to ask more about it. That’s impossible to do with just sign language.

“Hmph, that sure is one that would get you in trouble,” the old man grumbles. He hears that serow calling out in the distance, and it sounds different somehow. He stops before he turns to the left, walking that way for some reason. “Watch your step. My grandson’s ‘sposed to keep you out of trouble, eh? Doing a right shit job of it.”

“Basically,” 27 agrees, even if he’s not entirely sure of how much he means that. His eyes nearly fall shut again, the cold air making it seem too tempting to just stop walking and let the snow take hold of him again, every step that he forces himself to take seems like it’s rocking him further towards sleep.

“Probably because you’re doing a shit job of that ‘ward’ business,” the old man grouches, tossing a glare over his shoulder. His eyes look just a little crazier than Aizawa’s, but the glare is so similar it’s startling. “My grandson’s a damn fine hero. Stop making trouble for him.”

27 narrows his eyes at the noisy, stupid old geezer. “He asked for it. I didn’t. You could learn to mind your own business, Elder.”

The old man scoffs, and 27 sees a curl in his lip showing his teeth before he looks ahead again. “Told you to cut that shit. Paid my debt and I got out, I don’t want to hear that word again from you.”

“Must be nice,” 27 muses. ‘Getting out.’

That’s impossible for him now, even if Chisaki is gone. The Miasma has only made their intentions to kill him clearer, and even if Aizawa could keep him safe from them, he’s a Nomu now. Now, The Commission wants to dissect him, and they will as soon as they find out what he is.

And since The Commission will force him to use his quirk on Yamada to see if his quirk will affect him, his days of freedom are incredibly numbered.

And he wishes he could find that funny. As a Number, his days have always been numbered, but somehow he’s forgotten that.

That loud bellow startles him this time, because it’s closer. Because there’s something in that pitch that sounds like a pained scream. The old man swears and steps carefully between two trees, taking too wide of a step, and when 27 follows, he sees the animal much closer than he ever has before.

And he sees blood drowning the white of the snow around a bear trap that’s mangled the animal’s leg. “Damn thing’s supposed to know where these traps are, I don’t move ‘em anymore. Stupid....”

The serow is breathing hard, its mouth opening for another low cry. It’s in pain, it has to be.

The old man lifts his crossbow but drops it, and starts patting down his jacket. “Shit, you’ve got a knife? Gonna have to carry it back to the shack too. Dress it-”

“No,” 27 refuses, when he realizes what the old man means. “Hell no, this is- you’re doing this to these animals, and it’s-it’s fucked up, you’re fucking crazy-”

“Shut it!” The old man is yelling at him, glaring at him. “You can cut that yuppie shit until this stupid thing becomes a hot stew. If you’ve got a knife, hand it over. Damn thing’s gonna die slower or quicker, you make the damn call.”

27 steps back, a hand pressed over the knife clipped to his pants to make sure the old man can’t take it, before he hears a cord being dragged and the old man swear, and the world flips into a blur with his ankle becoming a blinding point of pain.

27’s side hits a tree trunk before gathers himself enough to breathe, to open his eyes. He’s strung upside down by his ankle that’s captured in a loop of rope, and the pressure is making the pain worse. “Goddammit, I told you to watch your step!”

27 glares at the old man and tries to bring an arm out to hit him now that he’s moving closer, but the movement makes him swing on the rope and he hisses between his teeth as the pain flares. It feels like a break, and he feels like he’d like his foot to break off at that point so he can get down.

The old man crouches down, and 27 turns his head painfully to look down and see the old man pick up his knife that had fallen out. His knife, that the old man is touching with his three-fingered hand, that he’s going to use to kill that deer.

“Hey, stop! Don’t-” 27 sucks in another hiss when he tries to make his arms move the way he wants, to swipe the knife out of the old man’s hands, but he can’t see where he is from this angle.

“Shut it, you stupid-” The old man glares and seethes at him, he holds the knife like he might use it on him, now that he knows 27 can’t fight back properly. Dissect him. Cut him open, dress him like dressing game, like this guy’s looking like a dressed deer after what we did, but he still won’t talk. You’ll help us out with that, won’tcha kid?

“Stop,” 27 says, barely hearing the break in his voice when he can’t open his eyes enough to know whether he’s talking to Honzo or the old man. He feels his chest moving too quickly and his throat screaming in pain at the cold air being roughly dragged over it, more than he’s aware of his own hands moving and reaching pointlessly for the point that he’s bound.

But eventually the panic dies down just enough, his arms drop back down without the strength to fight, and he’s slowly pulled out of the numb buzzing inside his skull by Aizawa’s voice.

“Shinsou!” Aizawa sounds like too many things, angry and worried and it’s almost foreign enough for Hitoshi to almost mistake him for someone else. Aizawa is looking for him, and Aizawa will see him like this. He kicks out his leg trying to get free without thinking and regrets it with another pang lacing down his leg, his eyes squeezed tight, and he hears the deer utter a weaker bellow.

“He-here! Over here! He-help,” 27 isn’t sure if he’s loud enough, if he can force enough air inside his chest to call out for help. He hears the deer crying out louder, and the sound drags on. 27 screws his eyes shut so he can’t see what’s happening to that deer, how the old bastard must be killing it, until he feels pressure around his calf and bends up to fight it.

Only to see Aizawa looking down at him, his long hair seems longer as it fans out over his shoulders. His hands are wrapped around 27’s leg right under his knee. “Breathe.”

There’s just a firmness in Aizawa’s gaze, how his frown deepens, that makes 27 think he means ‘breathe out,’ a trick that he learned quickly to keep from screaming. 27 breathes out and fights to hold that in his chest until Aizawa lifts him by his leg and the pain in his ankle flares white, bright enough that it's hard to notice that Aizawa squeezes his leg harder to move a hand up to the snare, but he notices when his hand barely brushes his shoe and that pain flares again. "Fuck."

Aizawa slowly lowers him to the ground, crouching next to his foot, and 27 brings his hands next to him in the snow and folds up his uninjured leg to make sure he can get away if he needs to. Aizawa's hand starts pulling his pant leg up. "You spend too much time with Bakugo."

27 wants to find some retort to that, wants to voice this burning offense at everything from thinking that 27 hadn't learned worse swears from Rikiya to how Aizawa's grandfather was a goddamn lunatic, but Aizawa gently pressing on his ankle makes him flinch. "Broken. The deer-"

27 turns his head to look but what he sees makes him still. The deer was panting, laid out against the snow and past the point of fighting, but the old man was standing there with his arms at his sides, eyes glazed over. The knife dropped on the ground. "You shouldn't have been out here-"

"You shouldn't-" 27 bites off words that don't make sense. He wants to blame Aizawa for this but he can't find any reason to. The heat boils under his skin and itches, and he feels so cold that he hates that he decided to go outside in the first place. He can't look at Aizawa, but he stares at his ankle and frowns. "Don't kill it."

A weak plea, probably nonsense. He has nothing to offer Aizawa in return, no reason to make him agree to it. It might be kinder to kill that deer and end its suffering, but 27 can't stomach that. He can't find it anything less than unbearably cruel that the deer was forced into this situation when even the crazy old bastard had no use for it. Aizawa just sighs, harsh and irritated. "Shouldn't have taken you out here."

27 digs his hands deeper into the snow, chasing the sting from that. Trying not to flinch. Of course Aizawa regretted it.

"He shouldn't have," Aizawa says, barely less irritated. Far more tired, when he pulls himself up to stand. 27 turns his head just enough to watch out of the corner of his eye as Aizawa approaches the deer, giving his grandfather a wide berth as he passes him.

The deer gives a loud groan when Aizawa gets closer, trying to warn him away, but Aizawa steps on something that makes a loud creaking whine, and the deer struggles against the snow to right itself. 27 can see how mangled and bloody its leg is, but the deer manages to keep it bent to avoid using it as it stands. It walks forward, then turns around and jogs away, slowly but it escapes.

Aizawa turns around to look at him, that same deep frown, and 27 finds himself envious of the deer. "Do not leave like that again. You are here, at this safe house, to stay safe. Am I understood?"

"Can't exactly ru-un," 27 winces, making a mistake of trying to pull his other leg closer, aggravating the break. "Run off right now."

Aizawa rolls his eyes up, staring at the sky for an absurdly long time, before his arms move out just to drop at his sides. "We'll have to see if the old man has a splint or not. But you're right, you won't be running off anytime soon, since Recovery Girl isn't exactly in walking distance."

Aizawa rubs his eyes, and 27 thinks this is probably the most irritated he's ever seen Aizawa. He wondered what would make him angry, and he never imagined it would be breaking his own leg.

Aizawa glances at his grandfather, before he walks towards him and picks up the knife to tuck the handle into his pocket, before he walks back to 27. “Try to work on letting the old man go on your own while we go back.”

27 huffs, sure that will make for an even more fun walk while he tries to find a way to stand up without irritating his injury, until he realizes that Aizawa is crouching too close to him. “Fine, I’ll-hey!”

Aizawa’s arms are already under his knees and behind his back, 27’s hand clenching in the fabric of his shirt when he’s lifted up, unsure whether he should try to fight his way out of this hold. “You can’t walk like this. Just...” The underside of 27’s knees, his back, his side where he’s touching Aizawa doesn’t sting, but he feels an uncomfortable buzz that he wants to escape from. He can feel the sigh in Aizawa’s chest before he sees it in a plume of fog that’s far too close to him. “Put up with it until we get there.”

27 grinds his teeth, because he doesn’t want to put up with it. But he doesn’t have much choice in the matter, since Aizawa probably won’t put him down. At least he can ignore Aizawa’s instructions and he won’t know about it.

Maybe Aizawa walks slower because he wants to make 27 find a way to release his control over the old man. Maybe it’s because 27 is suddenly heavier than he expected. 27 has been carried around by Yamada a few times, and Mirio once, and it makes him wonder if they’re just far stronger than they should be or if 27 is so much lighter than he realizes.

Then again, 27 has been flung across a training room enough times to know that he’s pretty weightless.

After they reach the shack, Aizawa turns around to shove his back against the door, and just the escape from the cold is almost smothering, making every inch of 27’s exposed skin prickle. Aizawa kicks the door closed, and carries him closer to the fire, putting him down on the edge of the old man’s filthy blankets before he stands up and starts poking around some wooden boxes stacked against the wall.

“The control?” Aizawa asks, and 27 busies himself with looking at the fire, watching the wood chips crackle and burn, holding his still reddened hands up to it.

“I can’t feel it the same way,” 27 admits, even if he doesn’t want to. It feels like a better trade, or at least that’s what he convinces himself it is. This slow turn in the pit of his stomach tells him it’s different, it’s something to do with the ghost of Nemoto haunting more than his quirk, but telling him that it’s wrong to lie. Confession and everything, it’s even turning on himself.

Aizawa just hums. “I’ll deal with him later, then.”

The way Aizawa shoves that box back into place seems to promise that the old man won’t like the way that Aizawa deals with him. He turns around with something in his hands, what 27 can recognize as fabric but it seems like there’s something else. 27 just stares at the fire, and tries not to count all the ways he’s irritated Aizawa or how Bug would ‘test’ whether he’d really gotten injured during training.

Aizawa sits down next to his broken ankle, and 27 bites down on his inner lip to keep himself from saying anything. “If you’d rather....” Aizawa stops, and 27 waits, trying not to look, but just the slightest pressure from Aizawa touching the bottom of his shoe makes him flinch. “Put up with it a bit longer. This would be difficult for you to do yourself.”

27 bites down a bit too hard when Aizawa pulls his shoe off after pulling out the laces, and winces when his fingers touch his ankle, pulling off his sock. 27 only looks when he feels something cold pressed against his skin, and sees a flat piece of metal held against his ankle, Aizawa placing a ruler on the other side. He holds both with one hand before he picks up some bandages, glancing up at him.

"I'm not angry at you," Aizawa says, something that he says often, but 27 feels like this has to be the time he's lying to him. "I was worried when you weren't here. And I'm honestly impressed that you manage to get injured so often, every time my back is turned."

"Don't turn your back on me, then," 27 says, and he's not sure how much he means that, why it feels like he means it more than he wants to. "Could stab you there."

Aizawa looks up at him from where he's winding the bandages around his ankles, his bloodshot eyes are red enough to make it look like he's using his quirk. 27 regrets saying anything. "That's not very convincing given your concern for the deer."

"A serow," 27 corrects, because he just can't keep his mouth shut. He should be quiet, he shouldn't be irritating Aizawa right now, not when he's holding an ankle that he could snap into a 90 degree angle more easily than he could before. But he likes that word for the deer, ever since Aizawa told him its name.

"A serow," Aizawa repeats, the corner of his mouth turning up in a smirk. "I'm even less convinced that you would do that."

Aizawa winds the bandage down until he pulls it under the bottom of his foot to give him some support there. 27 did that for Eri a few times, after she became so curious about shoes. Chisaki never gave her a pair, but she used to try to wear his when she was younger.

"You need to sleep," Aizawa says, in a quiet, odd way, a way that 27 hates hearing. "Three hours, maybe last night. Two the night before. Hizashi said you were awake early the night before that--"

"I don't need to. I'm not tired," 27 says, even if the warm fire makes his body betray him. He wishes he could roll his ankle to ignore the worn weight of his bones, how much effort it's taking just to hold himself upright on his arms. "I know I'm going to see him again if I sleep."

Aizawa glances up at him, tucking the end of the bandage under to keep it secure. 27 just watches his hand hovering over his ankle, his blunt fingers hesitating before they pull away. He knows that Aizawa is staring at him, but he doesn't know what he wants to hear, or if 27 can say it. "Tell me something that reminds you of UA. Of Eri, or Hizashi."

Something that he can recreate, Hitoshi imagines. Something to cling to as a lie to convince himself that 127 isn't real, and isn't going to kill him if he hasn't been killed by Bug. Some thin veil to cover his eyes to the reality of his situation. "There's nothing here."

Eri isn't here to demand that he make a snow angel. Yamada isn't here to invite him to help make breakfast, on a stove that they don't have and with food that isn't here either. This place is a safe house and only that, isolation that is supposed to provide safety and cover.

27 wishes that he could believe it's safe, but he knows it's as temporary as any lie that Aizawa wants him to believe in so that he can sleep, and stop bothering Aizawa.

"There's nothing," Aizawa repeats, leaning back, braced on his arms. "But you still need to sleep. "You're going to start hearing things if you keep up with this."

That's good, because 27 isn't afraid to start hearing things. To start hearing 50's voice again.

Aizawa leans forward again, he should just make up his mind instead of startling 27 when his mind feels so muddled and everything is too sharp. “Are you hurt anywhere else?”

Aizawa reaches out his hand, but 27 looks down at the bark dusting the side of his jacket, brushing it away. “Hit a tree. It’s fine.”

27 knows when he’s injured, he knows bruised ribs, broken ribs, shattered ribs, and he doubts he’s even bruised with how thick this jacket is padded, but Aizawa’s hovering hand and his lingering gaze snaps at something behind 27’s eyes. Calling him stupid.

27 pulls his jacket off, then his shirt, staring at the fire but staring through it. He can practically feel how much distance there is between this place and UA, the hours that it took to travel here by car and how difficult it would be to make that distance on foot, especially now.

“Pick a scar,” 27 says, because he doesn’t have to look to know that he’s not injured, that Aizawa should see he’s not even bruised even if he can see anything that isn’t scars. 27 waits, waits for whatever conversation Aizawa wants to have, whichever story 27 might remember. There’s too many of them now.

Instead, he sees Aizawa moving out of the corner of his eye, he can see a flash of black fabric. He glances and catches a flash of Aizawa folding his arms across his bare chest. “Pick one.”

27 glances again, and with the way Aizawa’s arms are folded, he can see the most interesting one. 27 doesn’t let his gaze linger, but he can see knife wounds, he can see burns. He’s never seen that many scars outside of what would peek out from under Miasma’s uniform, on hands and necks and faces, and he knows from his own body what ways most scars are laid down on skin. There’s one he can’t identify. “Elbow.”

Aizawa is too quiet beneath the crackling of the fire, and 27 knows this is just a game to him. He can decide not to play. “Decaying quirk. Disintegrated my skin, blood vessels in seconds. It would have spread if I didn’t cancel it.”

‘Spread’ seems to mean that if it wasn’t specifically Aizawa’s quirk being used on it, Aizawa’s entire arm would be gone in minutes. If he survived that long, something far more vital would be next, his chest or his head.

“I was protecting my students,” Aizawa says, even if he says it quietly.

Aizawa told him about a nightmare that he has often, one he started having after he was trying to protect a group of people but he was knocked out by a strength enhanced opponent, and didn’t know if they were safe until he woke up. He doesn’t know if that was the same situation, and for some reason, Aizawa didn’t want to tell him that he nearly failed to protect his students.

As though he didn’t want 27 to know he might not be able to protect him. 27 has known that.

“50 died,” 27 says, tapping the shortest scar on the arm closest to Aizawa, and he doesn’t need to look away from the fire to know which one it is. “First time training with my quirk. Unlocked my mask. I took control of 98 and 65. Tried to escape.”

Take me safely out of the compound. That was what he asked for, what he commanded. What a stupid kid, pulling that stunt in front of Bug during training.

“8 hours,” 27 says, even if it barely feels like he’s saying it. He doesn’t remember exactly, the first time was the hardest to remember. He hadn’t learned how to properly panic in the restraints, to not thrash so much, to just let his eyes close and his chest heave and try not to think about why the walls were so red. The conversations he heard in the hallways about whether it was paint or not. “First real job, after I was numbered. It was a setup. I tried to run. First time with Cherry and...”

Blossom. 27’s jaw snaps shut at that, his hand squeezing tighter when he remembers to move his fingers to the second scar.

“8 hours.” 27’s hand moves to his neck, and even now he can’t remember when Bug removed them. He was just so sure with every inch of progress after those maggots crossed his collarbone that it would be it for him. The end. Just a dream of freedom. “Sold to Chisaki. 12 hours-”

“Shinsou,” Aizawa says, just the suddenness of his voice sounds like a reprimand, just the way he leans forward seems like a threat.

“Right, your favorite. I messed up with a client,” 27 says, his voice foreign to his own ears, his fingers shaking when he can only stand to touch the edges of the scars on his stomach. His eyes squint from the fire, from the smoke it seems, and he rubs at his nose just as an excuse to pull away his hand. His nose is dripping and wet. “Bodyguard job. He nearly died. Decided to see if I’d die too. Leave it to chance-”

“Shinsou, you don-”

“Tell me I’m safe,” 27 demands, looking away from the fire to stare at Aizawa, to pin him down and force him to tell a lie instead of truth for a change. He stares and he can’t even tell what Aizawa looks like right now. “Every time I’ve tried to get out, they’ve been there. I’m not getting out! As soon as-”

27 turns away, hands making useless fists, as though he could fight it. As though he could even try, a broken ankle making it difficult for him to stand, the pain an easy weakness for anyone to recognize and take advantage of. He’s weak and useless.

“As soon as your back is turned, they’ll take me back. Strapped into the Red Room. B-Bug’s maggots.” 27’s fingernails drag against the wood, the barest sensation he can feel, and he wants nothing more than to make Bug’s job easier for her. Start tearing his own scars open again for her. He just can’t move his hands.

“I’m not turning my back on you.”

27 squints as his vision blurs, he can’t believe that in the slightest. He knows Aizawa doesn’t care, he wants one simple thing from 27, and 27 has only made it this far because he hasn’t given that up. He’s dragged this stalemate out long enough, he’s irritated Aizawa this far because he’s been allowed to. But that’s coming to an end, his days are numbered.

But he drags himself to look at Aizawa, to believe some placid lie that’s supposed to settle him. The firm determination in Aizawa’s frown, the way his eyes pin 27 down makes him at least believe that Aizawa doesn’t want that. For whatever reason. “They will never touch you again. You will never go through that again. You have escaped.”

Escaped The Miasma, maybe. Only to be dissected by the heroes instead. “They’re going to turn me into Eri. Cut me apart because I’m a Nomu-”

“They’re not,” Aizawa says, the rough growl of his voice snaps Hitoshi’s jaw shut as firmly as a mask closing around his jaw. He can’t believe that, Aizawa is a hero. He knows where his allegiances lie, and it’s not with whatever a Nomu is. “Hizashi and I are going to keep you safe, at any cost.”

“When,” Hitoshi asks, as flatly as he can. Still feeling the buzz and pull under his skin when he realizes what he said, how it should work, pulling his hands to scrub at his face and collect the tears running over scars. He can’t feel his hands as much over that scarred skin. “I was alone, and I...”

He was going to do it. He drew back the knife with the intent to kill, and that stain lingers on his hands even if he didn’t succeed. He can’t pull away from that.

“I’m not going back,” 27 says, and he feels hollow after he makes it real like that. This ‘safe house’ isn’t a temporary measure, he can’t go back to UA now. He’ll never be able to look at that snow where he stained it, to feel anything but the stain on his hands. To feel the ghost of Nemoto haunting him, something he can’t rip out, stealing his voice. “I can’t.”

27 hides his face against his bent knee, his hands folded around his nose like he’s ashamed that he’s crying. It’s so much worse than that, it’s so much worse and Aizawa doesn’t know. He can’t possibly know how pitch black this stain is. “You’re not going back to them. They were able to attack because of... a flaw, in the security system. When we go back to UA, you won’t be unescorted anymore-”

“That won’t help!” 27 snaps, his hands drawing away as the heat of the fire in front of him seems to swell, only to die out as soon as he looks at Aizawa. But Aizawa doesn’t understand. “They’re going to kill me, and anyone who’s trying to protect me, and I don’t want....”

He can’t let them die.

Whoever he’s with, he’s a danger to. Their blood on his hands, that stain. He won’t take it, he can’t live with that.

“We will keep you safe,” Aizawa says, another promise. Another baseless lie to believe in. “They’re not going to kill me, or Hizashi, or anyone. That’s what we’re trained to do as heroes, protect you, and you need to trust us that much.”

Trust. Trust that somehow, Aizawa and Yamada and everyone he cares about is beyond that inevitable death, beyond The Miasma’s reach. That they would be willing to-

I’ll die as a hero. That’s what Mirio said.

That’s what 27 doesn’t want.

“We have all faced villains, criminals, people trying to kill and willing to kill us. We have not failed,” Aizawa says, but he hasn’t faced The Miasma. Only 127, and even then he had help. “We will not fail you.”

27 breathes out, pressing his face back to his bent knee. He’s just so tired, so tired of fighting it. Fighting alone. If Aizawa wants him to believe in this pleasant lie, to be convinced just enough, he can take these weary bones. 27 doesn’t want them. “I’m tired.”

Aizawa pulls himself to stand, the sound of him pulling his shirt back on is the only indication that he is, when 27 won’t bring himself to look at him. When he hears Aizawa walk away, hears him brush the tarp that serves as a door aside, 27 just clenches his fists.

I’m not turning my back on you.

Aizawa comes back, holding his sleeping bag, and he lays it out on top of the old man’s bedding behind 27. “I’ll stay here with you, while you sleep.”

27 glances at the sleeping bag, watching Aizawa settle to sit against the wall. 27 grabs his discarded shirt in a fist, staring at the shoe he still needs to take off. “Creepy.”

27 only hears Aizawa grunt, something that sounds amused while 27 pulls his shirt on and his shoe off, pulling the sleeping bag closer to the fire before he starts tucking himself inside. “Only if I watch you sleep.”

Hitoshi huffs, zipping himself inside. He can’t really find an angle where his ankle doesn’t hurt from his foot pressing against the inside of the sleeping bag, the weight of it on top of him feels smothering. At least it’s a little soothing. “You’re going to leave the old man to die outside.”

“Maybe,” Aizawa says, something about that tone sounds teasing, but something else about it sounds like he’s fine with that possibility. It’s a bit heartless. “Frostbite should wake him up, if you falling asleep doesn’t. Your safety is my priority, either way.”

“I’m fine,” Hitoshi says, the cold that had soaked him to the bone finally fading under this warmth, more fully than the fire could manage. “You can leave.”

“I won’t.”

Hitoshi feels the darkness pulling at the edges of his mind, and he can’t possibly fight to open his eyes right now. He knows if he could move his foot, twist his ankle enough, he could stay awake. Stay alert. Stay away from 127 haunting him.

But he’s never been told a bedtime story like Eri has, and the idea of Aizawa keeping watch over him while he sleeps is a good one.

*

8 hours. Cherry. Bug’s maggots.

Aizawa agreed that it would be creepy if he watched Hitoshi sleep, but he can’t stop himself. Watching his eyes work back and forth under his eyelids, wondering what he sees in his sleep. If he can possibly fight it for him.

Aizawa folds his hands, only to rub his eyes with them. He knew there was torture involved in the creation of those scars, but to hear it like that.

Maggots. For hours. Furokage Mizuki died when Hitoshi was nine. He hasn’t forgotten that.

When Aizawa was nine years old, he was still young enough to be upset about outgrowing his favorite Ganriki Neko sweatshirt. He was still losing baby teeth. Hitoshi was being tortured.

Aizawa has known this would be difficult. He wanted to stop peeling back the scars to see the useful information in Hitoshi’s history long ago. He wishes he could stop knowing, stop thinking about it, half as much as he wishes it never happened in the first place.

Hitoshi is terrified, and he has reasons to have that fear. Aizawa won’t let any of those reasons come true, not Miasma, not The Commission, he won’t let any of that hurt Hitoshi. If it’s the last thing he does, he will give this child peace. He will give Hitoshi safety, for the first time in his life.

He will protect him, and he will give him that final escape. A true one.

He can’t help but be proud that Hitoshi has never given up from chasing it on his own, by himself. That he’s never given up, not once. Even if he deserved better. To never be faced with something to fight that hard.

Aizawa gives the door a weary look when it opens, and can't barely bring himself to recognize his grandfather's entrance. The door closes, and Aizawa wishes he didn't have to deal with whatever mood his grandfather is bringing in with him. "Kid alright?"

That question, the weak way it was asked, is as surprising as the sight of the old man kicking his shoes against the floor mat to clean them. "His ankle is sprained. From your trap."

The old man shouldn't have taken Hitoshi out there to begin with, because of that danger. He probably didn't tell him how to see the markers for those traps. Neither did Aizawa. "And you let that deer loose, to die a slow, painful, cruel death. You know better than to—"

"He was hysterical, because he shouldn't have seen that," Aizawa says, bristling with those familiar words. He does know better, and he should have known better than to bring Hitoshi to this place, when he knows the old man so well. Better than anyone else. "You don't know what he's been through."

Shoga kicks his shoes off against the wall, making Hitoshi stir with the noise, but not wake. The old man makes his way to the fire, and Aizawa doesn't see any reason to let him, even if it's his. "So, when are you leaving? Running off again, like you always do when you never tell anyone anything worth shit?"

The implication there, that fond memory of the last time he'd laid eyes on his grandfather, makes that option incredibly tempting. "Tomorrow. It can't come sooner."

Shoga at least sits far enough away from Hitoshi that it doesn't rattle something Aizawa is trying to keep down, pulling threadbare and dirty blankets around himself. Aizawa has had more pity for strangers, for vagrants he's seen in alleyways. He knows there's a better possibility that they're better people, that don't deserve it. "Then, you're trapped here with me, and tomorrow you're leaving for another nine years. And I won't be alive to see that."

Aizawa can't tell if the numbness from that thought, that near inevitability and logical conclusion given how old the man is and how he lives, is something that he truly feels or if it's something he thinks he should. His grandfather saying it so bluntly makes him feel guilty for believing it won't make a difference. "Come down to visit for Christmas, then. You can apologize for the things you said to Hizashi then. My husband."

He's calling the old man's bluff, because he won't do any of that. If his grandfather wants some reconciliation in his twilight years, he'll have to earn it. Aizawa won't just hand it to him based on blood or history. He has to change. "Nine years. Seems he's good for you, then. Kept your ass alive this long."

Aizawa has to look, has to see if there's some indication that this is some Shapeshifter quirk that's taken his grandfather's identity. Instead, he just sees an old man shivering under his blankets, rubbing his thin and wrinkled hands, staring ahead as obstinately as he's always been. Unwilling to change his views for anyone, or any evidence that he should.

"You didn't tell me a thing, about that or... anything. Hell, I raised you, I paid for your fancy school," his grandfather grumbles, as if the money he had buried under this shack was wasted at UA, as if the rest of it hadn't rotted by now. As if that's the only reason Aizawa should have told him. It's the reason he didn't.

"You didn't come with me," Aizawa says, still finding that irrational and childish pang in his chest hasn't died as much as he thought, after all these years. "You decided to stay here, despite everything. I was alone in that apartment to discover these things, to realize... And I didn't think it would matter."

"It doesn't," Shoga answers, with the irrational stubbornness that cannot be tolerated from a man who chased Hizashi out of his shack while firing a weapon. "But you didn't tell me. Shit, knowing you, I thought you were only getting married because you knocked some girl up or something. You just... aren't like that. Being like that, around people. Changed so much. In those years."

Aizawa had been busy after he graduated, after he became a hero. Before that, it seemed rational to spend his extended breaks at Hizashi's house rather than trekking through the mountains. Going years without seeing each other wasn't new, but leaving without the vague promise to visit again was. And Aizawa wasn't going to make that promise when he was trying to hold back the urge to kill the man who was trying to hurt Hizashi.

"I know I should have done better. Taken responsibility instead of being a miserable drunk. It's my fault that Misaki is like that. Defective quirk," Shoga says, and he's never said anything about this before. But he's never been this sober either, given that Aizawa hasn't seen him drink a single drop since he arrived to this shack. "They say drinking increases the chances of it--"

"For pregnant women," Aizawa has to clarify, because he remembers his grandmother was a saint who never would have done that, and he knows his grandfather is just unhinged enough to take that fact differently.

And he's unsurprised the old man huffs and shakes his head. "I had my part in it! Shit, I was young and... little swimmers were soaked in it, I bet. Had to have had an effect on it."

Aizawa just sighs, leaning his head back against the wall to stare at the ceiling. He's not going to give a man in his nineties a biology lesson. "Just because she needs her quirk to see doesn't give her an excuse. It doesn't justify it."

And just because her son was born with the only quirk that could erase hers, and make her blind in the short time that he could have used it on her before he blinked, was no excuse for the way Aizawa Misaki acted as a mother. Despite her thousands of claims to the contrary, and despite that stupid fucking eyepatch she forced him to wear, he never erased his mother's quirk. Not even once.

And Aizawa wouldn't be surprised if his mother knows that. She just wanted a convenient way to escape the son she bore with the intention to trap a man who would never marry her. A gamble with permanent consequences she never thought out fully.

Giving birth to him didn't make her a mother. And making sure that Aizawa lived until he was self-sufficient didn't make his grandfather into a father.

But there was a time that Aizawa saw it that way, when he could even be proud to be related to the old fool. When he wished that his grandfather was there at his wedding, even with that bitter parting still fresh in his memory that day.

The sake that he drank during the ceremony was especially bitter because of it. "I don't know how to help him. Hitoshi."

Aizawa finds himself staring again, watching Hitoshi sleep like the dead, too weary after the lack of sleep to even move or stir. The circles of exhaustion under his eyes are the worst Aizawa has ever seen then, his eyes bloodshot when they're open. Red and irritated when he cried. He's terrified. "It's your hero job to protect him, but it seems like you're getting into more than that."

‘Hitoshi.’”

“It’s what he wants me to call him. It’s...complicated,” Aizawa says, the fewest words that could never describe how many names Hitoshi has been forced to be called, to be named, when he has only ever deserved to answer to his own. ‘Hitoshi’ is what a parent would call this child, anyone who had the right and burden to protect him, to keep him well and raise him well until he was self-sufficient.

That’s not the whole of what Aizawa wants to do for Hitoshi, but that’s the closest name it can be called. Even if it’s temporary. “And you’re not going to tell me how it’s ‘complicated,’ or shit else about it. You just want your ego stroked.”

Aizawa glances out of the corner of his eye to remind his grandfather he doesn’t want that, he’s never needed or received some baseless praise. He doesn’t want false reassurance.

He honestly doesn’t know what he wants to hear. “In case you forgot, you’re a damn fine hero. You didn’t go into it for money or attention or praise, you decided to do the right thing however you can, wherever you can find it, at whatever cost. You turned out better than you were raised.”

He doesn’t want thinly veiled self-deprecation from the old man either. If the old man had such regrets, he could have said them sooner, or acted on them. When it might have mattered.

“Whatever this kid is going through, gone through, seen or not seen, he just needs a good person in his corner, to be there through it. And he’s got you,” his grandfather says, pulling his blankets closer around himself. “And you’re not the type to run off when it gets hard, when it really counts. That’s what he needs.”

Hitoshi needs so many more things, things that Aizawa can’t give him as easily as he can want to. He can claw at the restrictions that the wardship and investigation impose all he wants, Hitoshi won’t get what he needs until Miasma has been dealt with.

But he has Aizawa, at least, and he’s not running away. He’s not turning his back on Hitoshi.

If it can be as simple as being there for him, through the terror and anger and gut-wrenching pain, Aizawa will be there.

He just wishes he could do more.

Trust Fall

Chapter Summary

The possibility of Eri's quirk becoming active again caused her to be taken to the mountains along with Aizawa and Shinsou, and that risk comes true. Aizawa and Shinsou scramble to deal with it, but when Shinsou finds himself trapped in overwhelming memories, he looks towards a poor source of help. Eri's power blooms, when she moves forward with the strength of those surrounding her, and with her own strength recognized.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: Painful sensory flashbacks, Distressed Eri, Underage drinking, Vague and unconfirmed implications of sexual assault (an unnamed character targeted by criminals because she was the daughter of a yakuza Head)

Previously on Wards of UA: The Big Three and Eri are staying with the Ketsubutsu training camp close to the mountain shack where Aizawa and Shinsou are staying, and Yo Shindo has made his rivalry with UA and Mirio specifically known previously. Shinsou sprained his ankle after being caught in a leg snare, and revealed to Aizawa that he was still afraid of what would happen if he were attacked again. Shinsou's quirk has mutated with Nemoto's Confession quirk, and now any question that Shinsou asks warps into one that the target doesn't want to answer, but they will be forced to answer truthfully. When Eri's quirk wouldn't activate for Chisaki, he would show Eri videos of Shinsou fighting and being hurt in the pit fights he arranged. When 127 attacked Shinsou at UA, Eri was placed with Bakugo ('Ugo') with Aizawa's instructions to stay with him so that 'he and Shinsou would know where to go to be safe,' but with Shinsou's injuries, Aizawa couldn't complete that. Chisaki would clap next to Eri's ear when she misspoke. When Shinsou would have to take Eri to the chair, he would ask her a question, which Eri used to answer with 'uh-huh' when she was younger. Eri Rewound the fusion of Chisaki, Nemoto, and Shinsou during the raid before she jumped to grab onto Midoriya. Eri remembers the 'Sakazuki' game fondly, but Shinsou doesn't, as during that 'game' Shinsou would have to give Eri doses of drugged milk and promise to give her nice things or good experiences, 'as long as they obey Chisaki.' While Shinsou, Yamada, and Eri can tell each other that they love each other, Aizawa hasn't told either ward that he loves them too. Before Shinsou was attacked by 127, he had been able to ask questions freely to Eri, but when he tried to ask Mirio if he would run too in order to escape 127, the question warped with Confession. Shinsou's tattoos were removed or altered by a tattoo artist who had a quirk that specialized in removal, in an earlier chapter.

Mirio grins and waves as the rest of the training camp members make their way haggardly down from the 5 kilometer hiking trail, finding it easier to grin when he almost timed it perfectly today. "Just in time for lunch!"

Yo had made a better effort of trying to catch up to him today, but Mirio has been the winner of the 'not competitive at all' hiking trails, push-ups, weight lifts, and almost all of the other training events. Yo emerges from the boy's cabin after cleaning up, still breathing a bit too hard, and still too exhausted to look anything but that when he glares at the lunch spread. "You bastard."

Mirio just smiles at him, cupping his hands around Eri's innocent little ears as a reminder, which doesn't stop her from raising her hands and cheering for everyone else's return. "We made lunch! I helped!"

"Sustenance," Shikikui sighs, sounding completely winded before he slumps onto one of the waiting benches to start digging in. "Made by tiny, capable hands. It's more filling."

"Mom," Tatami groans, slung over Ms. Joke's shoulder. It's definitely telling what a smaller class size can do for teacher-student relations, because Mirio has heard the Ketsubutsu students call Ms. Joke that a couple times. And he's pretty sure he'd die if he called Ecto-sensei 'Dad.' "I want one. Please."

"I know, I know, UA's hero course has the best mascot ever," Ms. Joke says with her own groan, pulling herself and Tatami onto a bench. "That's why we've got to steal her, alright? Because getting lunch from Eri everyday is just a dream come true, isn't it?!"

Mirio just smiles, because it's easy to take for granted what Eri means to the hero students at UA. Even if it's as small as seeing her walk through the hallway, just being a happy little kid, it means something. Victory, over the worst villains. Rescuing someone from their darkest moments, and carrying them through to safety.

He doesn't mind it at all if Eri takes all the credit. "That's actually the secret to why I've been beating you guys down the mountain! Eating snacks with Eri is my secret power-up!"

Tamaki rolls his eyes, but he doesn't point out that he's just been training his body more physically, instead of quirk training. Mirio appreciates it.

He's been able to pull off most of these training activities without being put in a corner due to his lack of a quirk, even if he's had to take some losses. It's not as easy, he would definitely represent UA better if he had it. But Ms. Joke keeps the training kind of chill, like it's just an opportunity to train, but there's no pressure coming from anyone but themselves.

And he thinks it actually made Yo angrier to win in that sparring match when Yo had him trapped waist deep in dirt and snow, even if it took Mirio a minute to work up a smile knowing how easily he could have gotten out of it.

After lunch, Ms. Joke announces they have an hour to digest and rest before they have dedicated quirk training, followed by a lumberjack competition. Mirio is sure that this time, that means the Ketsubutsu students are going to rest in their rooms for a bit, and Eri and himself can work on their snow bunny village, but that's not the case at all.

"Snowball fight!" Nejire yells, catching the back of Itejiro's head while he was walking to the Boy's Cabin to rest, and that's really the best way to set off a war zone.

Itejiro's Boomerang quirk made him the best snowball fighter by far, and Nejire didn't take that challenge to her crown lightly when they first dueled it out. Playfully, and all.

Now Mirio is just trying to run for cover. Eri is giggling in his arms now, but he knows things can turn just a bit more bloodthirsty any minute now with the snow flying and the quirks starting to enter the mix. Nejire uses her quirk to send a wave of snow, only for Yo to counter her completely with his hands braced on the ground, settling that wave bit by bit until it dies out at his friends' feet. Tamaki has already sprung wings to drop behind the Ketsubutsu students and try to get the drop on their snipers, but Tatami is nowhere to be found, and she's a brutally efficient flanker.

Mirio ducks into another roll with Eri cradled tight to his chest, and he wonders if they could just slip out of this for some more quiet fun. Especially when he looks down at her, and she looks like she's getting a little sick without the time for lunch to settle. "Maybe we should get out of here for a bit, they're getting kind of rowdy. We can find a safer place to make some snow bunnies...."

Mirio trails off, watching Eri look less sick and more terrified for some reason, one that starts with just a flicker from her horn.

He doesn't know if it's selfish that he hesitates before he pulls her to stand up on her own and backs away. "Eri, it's okay-"

"No!" Eri screams, and she reaches for him, but he sees the moment that she realizes what's happening fully when she drops her hands, just to hold herself and crumple to the ground. Shaking.

It's so hard not to pull her into his arms again. "Eri, you're safe. You're not going to get hurt. I'm here, okay?"

It's not like he can do anything else but tell her that. To keep anyone running over to keep their distance, just for their own safety.

What a hero, Lemillion is, when Eri is shaking and screaming on the ground, her quirk blazing around her, and there's nothing he can do to help.

*

Aizawa had been looking through his grandfather's MREs, pondering which one would be the most edible option with some unnecessary input from the old man whenever he caught him frowning, when the radio cut on. "Aizawa-sensei, it's happening."

Aizawa barely remembered crossing the distance to the radio to answer Hadou's panic, his mind trapped in needing confirmation when in the back of his mind, he knew he was wasting precious time. "Where? And when did it start?"

"At camp, just now. She's not... she's not listening to us at all." Aizawa clenches his jaw, because while Emi was trained as well as any other hero course teacher in quirk training, including the basics such as activation and deactivation, he knew Eri's case was different from any other young child.

After what she had endured because of her quirk, what she had experienced while her quirk was active, she needed every piece of safety and reassurance in this moment to make such an advance forward. To reclaim control of her quirk. She needed the reassurance that his own quirk provides, that she won't be able to Rewind someone accidentally, that she would have that escape of Erasure if it were too much.

But Hitoshi needs him as well. "Give it."

Aizawa looks over his shoulder to see Hitoshi limping across the floor, his purple hair more of a mess, and his eyes still bleary and tired from being awoken at some point in the interruption. His hand is reaching for the receiver, and Aizawa hands it over with some trepidation. "Have you ever done this over a phone, or a loud speaker?"

He sees Hitoshi look down, confirmation in that shake of his head.

That was what Aizawa had suspected, and given that they don't know the full limitations of Hitoshi's quirk, this might be one of them. Hizashi's quirk is also weakened when directed into electronic communication devices, which he uses with his speakers to fine tune the control over his quirk.

"Take the radio to Eri," Hitoshi commands into the receiver, with a breathless 'Roger' in answer from Hadou, the sounds of another student in the background helping her locate a longer power strip to bring the radio to where Eri is. "You need to go."

Aizawa meets Hitoshi's bloodshot eyes, and he sees how much Hitoshi is worried, how much he knows this situation is dangerous for everyone involved. If Eri's quirk remains out of control for too long, without something to siphon off its power, it could hurt Eri, just as much as drawing out its active time could strain against her limits.

But that subtle shake in Hitoshi's hand, growing worse, reminds Aizawa of what he promised. That he wouldn't turn his back on Hitoshi, especially now, now when he was so terrified of being attacked again.

"You can guide her through the radio. She needs to know you're there," Aizawa says, even if that rends at him in his chest. He wants nothing more than to rush to Eri's side, to give her the control that he promised her, to give her the reassurance she needs, to do what he promised to do when Eri became a ward specifically because of his quirk.

Two children need him, and he can't abandon both fully. "She's here."

"Eri," Hitoshi calls, his voice full of panic, his teeth clenched after the word. Aizawa knows this rends at Hitoshi too, that they both should be there, and Aizawa doesn't know if he could be enough for Eri to feel safe if he's alone because of that.

"Twenny!" Eri's voice is strained and high, terror in answer to panic. Aizawa knows the sight that accompanies that scream is a heartbreaking one, to see the fears Aizawa can only mitigate to a point coming to life.

"Aizawa is-"

"You need to try it," Aizawa says, clinging to this single logical option remaining to them. Eri seems to be in no place to attempt to regain control for herself, and that's understandable given the events that drove them to this separation. But if Hitoshi's quirk could be used, Hitoshi could placate Eri's quirk himself. Aizawa wouldn't have to abandon either ward that's in need.

"It's going to be him," Hitoshi says, his voice cracking, and Aizawa's gut twists when he remembers other 'him's from a much younger ward. "It's not my quirk-"

"I need you to try," Aizawa argues. He knows there's a risk that this will fall into many ruins, but this is the best avenue he can pursue.

"I need you to go," Hitoshi says, his voice cracking more, desperate panic breaking through at the seams. His eyes too wide now. "Please."

Hitoshi felt the same worry Aizawa did, perhaps even more. He didn't want to trust in one avenue when Eri's safety was at risk, and Aizawa didn't either. Even at this cost. "I still need you to buy me time."

He sees Hitoshi nod from the corner of his eye while Aizawa runs to the door, only pausing long enough to kick into his shoes and make sure he has his capture scarf, which he should be able to use to make a much swifter descent down the mountain. "Aizawa is on his way. You're going to be okay, Eri."

Aizawa can't ignore that Hitoshi's voice only sounds barely reassured with that, with a promise that Aizawa will be there for Eri. As though any threat to Hitoshi's own life is still meaningless compared to any suffering on Eri's part.

Hitoshi has been a terrified child, only grounded in his care for Eri, for long enough. The only change is that Hitoshi has someone else to trust to care for Eri.

And Aizawa will meet that task.

*

Mirio has carried Eri a lot of times. He's smiled at her with his face really close too.

But when Mirio smiled at her, just for a little bit, he looked different. Not really different, but it was like everything else changed, and he wasn't smiling because he was protecting her from the snow.

He was protecting her from that bullet.

Eri felt it happening again. She felt how her horn felt so hot that she could feel it on her face, how her arms and legs felt twitchy, and how someone needed to take that feeling out of her. They're supposed to. She knows it's going to hurt, but someone needs to stop her quirk before she hurts someone.

She's not a good person with her quirk. Heroes need to stop her.

But Mirio puts her down on the snow, because he's afraid of her. "Eri, it's okay-"

"No!" Eri yells, because it's cold, and her legs and arms feel bad, and she knows this bad feeling won't stop. Mirio needs to get away, but she doesn't want him to get away. She doesn't want him to leave her there, but she's.

She's cursed. With a cursed quirk. A quirk that will hurt everyone. "Eri, you're safe. You're not going to get hurt...."

Eri hears the sounds that Twenny made in those videos He showed her, even if He's not here. Twenny's not here. Twenny's getting hurt.

And she can't protect him. She can't keep him safe. He got hurt, even at UA, with all the heroes, because Ugo made her leave and they didn't know where to go to find her, to be safe. She left Twenny, and he was so scared.

Just like it used to be with Him.

When Eri was with Twenny, Hari could say mean things, and He could say mean things, but they couldn't hurt him. But when she had to go to The Chair because of her quirk, Twenny got hurt. Twenny got hurt because she couldn't protect him.

Eri just hurts people. She's a bad person. She's worse than that, she's cursed.

“Eri,” Emi talks to her really nice, because she doesn’t know who Eri is, and Eri looks up from her arms and legs where she’s trying to be really small so she doesn’t hurt anyone, and sees Emi looks really small too. Emi is almost laying on the snow in front of her, and Eri is scared because it looks like she’s on fire. She’s going to hurt Emi.

“Don’t! Stop it!” Eri says, trying to make herself too small, trying to keep everyone safe. She can’t. If she uses her quirk on them, she’s a villain.

“Eri, we’re going to keep away from you so your quirk can’t affect us. See? You’re okay, and nothing is going to change unless you change it,” Emi says, still talking so nice. Eri looks up, just to make sure, and she sees the heroes standing behind Emi. She sees Mirio looks so sad. But she can’t be sure if they’re not on fire too with her quirk. “I want you to just close your eyes, and try to tell me how your quirk feels to you. We can work together to help you stop it on your own, okay?”

Eri shakes her head, she doesn’t want to. Someone just needs to stop it, it’s scary. It’s cursed, her quirk is cursed, and she doesn’t want it.

“It might feel like mine,” Yo-yo says, and he crouches down small, and puts his hand on his chest. He looks nice right now, but Eri knows he can be mean. “I can feel my head vibrating all the time, but I had to learn how to let that vibration travel down to my arms and legs, and how to stop it. I imagine it like a wave that I can let fall, or make it fall back up. We can help you imagine your quirk too.”

Eri’s quirk feels like red. Like blood. Like sharp needles stabbing her, all the time, even if she knows she’s not in The Chair. She doesn’t know if she wants to be, but she just wants this feeling to stop.

Eri closes her eyes, and holds her arms and legs really close, and tries to hold her breath instead of breathing like Twenny told her to. She’s crying, and she’s supposed to calm down, but she just wants this feeling to stop.

“Eri.” Eri looks up because she can hear Twenny’s voice, even if it’s crinkly. Tami and Shiki are holding the radio so Twenny can talk to her through it, and Eri almost forgets that she can’t get close because she knows she needs to talk through the part of it that’s dangling in the snow, because she needs Twenny to use his quirk on her.

Kinda Zawa sees that she’s trying to reach for it, and he picks it up and throws it to her, and she pushes down the button. “Twenny!”

She wants to ask Twenny to help her, to use his quirk to put her in the Safe Place where her quirk doesn’t hurt anyone, but she’s crying too much. She just needs to answer Twenny when he asks the question, and that’s always the easiest part. “Aizawa is...” Twenny stops for a long time, and he sounds a little angry when he talks again. “Aizawa is on his way. You’re going to be okay, Eri.”

Eri bites on her lip, and she feels where her lost tooth isn’t, but she wants Zawa here now. She wants him to stop her quirk from making her feel this sad and scared, and she wants Twenny to help. “Uh...Uh-huh-uh.”

Eri can hear Him clapping, because she didn’t say it right. That’s why Twenny hasn’t asked her a question.

“Yes! Twenny, p-please! Please! Twenny!” Eri hides her face in the snow, her horn is so hot it feels like it’s burning her, it hurts, and she needs Twenny to take her away from it.

Twenny sounds really sad and scared, and quiet, even through the crinkles. “Do you want to go back?”

“Yes!” Eri yells, until her throat hurts. It’s not supposed to hurt anymore, because she answered the question, and it’s the same question that always took the hurt away. She’s supposed to feel floaty, she’s supposed to feel safe, and she’s supposed to feel Twenny’s quirk but she doesn’t.

Eri’s horn gets so hot that she has to close her eyes, and the twitchy feeling in her arms and legs hurts even more. It hurts so bad, she puts her face back against the snow so she can try to scream the feeling out like Yama taught her to scream out her mad, but it doesn’t help. It just hurts worse.

“Twenny!” Eri yells, because he can’t just leave her with this feeling, Twenny can’t just leave her.

“Eri, it’s okay,” Twenny says, but he sounds so sad. Eri really wants to hug him, to make him hug her, to make all the bad things stop because she needs him here. “Aizawa is on his way. He’s going to help you-”

“I don’t want it! I hate it! I don’t want... my c-cursed...” Eri feels her tears running hot over her face, and no one is going to brush them away for her. No one is going to hold her and make her feel better, not even the heroes.

Because she’s cursed.

“Your quirk isn’t cursed, Eri,” Mirio says, and he crouches down too close. Eri knows she needs to fix his quirk, he only lost it to protect a cursed person like her, so she needs to fix it to be good.

But she’s scared.

“Your quirk made sure that Deku won that fight. You beat him, Eri,” Mirio says, but he doesn’t know how scary that was. “Don’t forget what you did, with your own strength.”

She didn’t want to hurt Izuku. She didn’t want Izuku to get hurt. She didn’t know if Twenny was okay, he fell down and didn’t get up but he looked so scared when he was falling. And she just wanted to go back, to when she at least had Twenny, but for a moment.

When Izuku raised his fist, and Chisaki looked afraid, she wanted to go somewhere else. Somewhere, where it felt warm. Where it felt safe.

“Twenny,” Eri asks, and she curls up really close to Twenny, because her legs still hurt. Twenny’s arm might hurt too, because He showed him how that mean person made thorns go into it before he threw Twenny on the ground. But Twenny is reading her a story, like always, like it didn’t happen. “What are flowers like?”

Twenny looks at the book, and moves his thumb until he can flip the page back to where Ferdinand the nice bull was smelling a flower. “They look like that. They come out of the ground, and they have petals. And the yellow stuff inside them can make people sneeze. Or Ferdinand.”

Eri shakes her head, because that wasn’t what she was asking. “What about a field of them? What’s that like?”

Twenny looks up at the ceiling, and Eri can feel that his chest doesn’t move from where her head is laying on it. Then he breathes out, and the mask that he wears makes it sound louder. “I-It’s nice. I read about it in one of my books. Flowers smell nice, like your soap, and together they smell really powerful. And the petals are soft. But they break....”

Twenny's arm holds her tighter, and Eri didn't want to hurt Twenny by asking about flowers. But the story he told him when they played Sakazuki made her have a nice dream, thinking of really big flowers that look just like in her books. And she could hold Twenny's hand and walk around under them.

She wanted to have that dream tonight, and dream it so good that Twenny has that dream too. "You can touch them first, when we find those flowers. In that field."

"If we're good," Eri says, because that's the rule. If they're good, He'll give them nice things, and Eri only wants to be good so Twenny can be happy.

"You'll see them," Twenny says, even if his voice is shaky. "I promise."

When Izuku raised his fist, and when Chisaki looked afraid, Eri felt like she could feel how a flower would. It might break, but before it breaks, it makes people happy with how powerful it is, how good it smells when there's a whole bunch of them.

When that flower isn't alone.

Eri closes her eyes, even when her legs hurt in the same places they used to make it hurt the worst, when her ugly spots hurt like they're bleeding, because flowers don't break. Not in her dream, they never break in her dream, and when Tama showed her how flowers grow by making one grow out of his hand, it just bloomed.

It grew, more and more, until the top part spread out into pretty petals. And even when she touched the petals, they just felt soft.

They didn't break.

"M-Mirio," Eri says, and she wants him to pick her up, she wants to stop being alone, but her head hurts a whole lot, but she closes her eyes tighter and imagines it's just a flower. It's just a flower coming out of her head, and it hurts, but she can make it go back inside.

"If I use my quirk to retract, and then Itejiro ties a rope around me, maybe she can let off some steam—" Tami says, but Emi pops up and doesn't like that idea. Because even Emi knows her quirk is dangerous.

Because Eri can't use it. "Eri!"

"ZAWA!" Eri yells, and she sees Zawa coming around the other heroes, and she worries he's not going to stop, he's going to get too close, but she wants him to pick her up. To make her quirk go away.

Zawa sits down on the snow instead, and he looks sad, and worried, before he stops looking like that and just looks like Zawa. "I'm here now. I can cancel your quirk when you're afraid." Eri is afraid, and she wants Zawa to help her stop. "But I want to help you stop it yourself, like we talked about. Do you want to do that?"

Eri doesn't know. She holds her arms, because they still hurt, but not as much. Everything still feels too hot, and she doesn't like it, and she wants it to stop.

But heroes need to learn to use their quirks. All of Eri's friends are heroes. And she wants to be....

You're my hero. Izuku said that. And Twenny said that.

And Eri wants to be that. So she nods.

Zawa pulls on his scarf, and makes it fall on the snow around her in a circle. “My scarf is surrounding where your quirk is right now. We’re going to start shrinking it,” Zawa says, and Eri nods, even if she’s scared. She doesn’t want Zawa’s scarf to move out, she doesn’t want to hurt anyone. She doesn’t want to hurt Zawa. “It starts with deep breaths. I want you to imagine your quirk getting smaller and smaller, with every breath.”

“And we can breathe with you to help!” Mirio says, and it does help. Eri wipes away her tears, and wipes the snow and snot off her face, even if it gets on her mittens, and tries to breathe like everyone else is. Like she’s a flower.

Like they’re all flowers, in this field, and just like Mizzy, they can make everything smell really nice.

Eri watches the scarf move tighter and tighter on the snow, and she looks up to see Zawa smiling at her. The scarf gets closer to her, and when it curls around her feet, she looks down at her arms and legs and sees the green fire going away, and feels like her horn isn’t as hot anymore. Even if it still feels big when she touches it.

She stands up and runs to Zawa, because if it’s not okay, he’ll stop her from hurting him, but he just smiles really nice and holds her, really tight so she’s really safe. “I’m very proud of you, Eri.”

Eri smiles so much she has to hide her face on Zawa’s chest, and she feels like she needs to kick her feet because Zawa sounds really happy. And she’s really happy too.

And the heroes sound really happy, when they start cheering and clapping for her. “Eri! You did it!”

Emi does a cartwheel, just like she was teaching Eri to do, and Mirio wipes at his eyes, but when he walks closer, Eri can see he’s crying. “I’m so proud of you, Eri! I know it was hard, and scary, but you did it all on your own!”

But Eri shakes her head, and reaches out for Mirio’s hand. It’s still so much bigger than hers, even with his big gloves and her big gloves. “I needed everyone’s help, so we could do it together. And I....”

She wanted to fix Mirio’s quirk, so he wouldn’t have to be like the sad reindeer who doesn’t get to play reindeer games with the heroes. Mirio has been sad since they came to this camp, because he can’t play hero games with the heroes without his quirk.

“Hey,” Mirio says, and he holds Eri’s hand with both of his, and his smile isn’t as big, but it makes her feel warmer. “I’m proud of you. I don’t want you to worry about that stuff. Because we’re all just....” Mirio closes his eyes real tight, even though he’s still smiling. “Really proud of you, Eri.”

“We are,” Tama says, putting a hand around Mirio’s back, and smiling just like Yama smiles at Zawa when he sees Zawa sleeping. “Learning to control your quirk is one of the hardest parts of growing up. This is a very important moment for you.”

“Learning not to be a crybaby is a big thing too!” Neji says, before she starts poking at Mirio’s face a lot, which makes him swat her away, and try to rub his face. “It should be a whole party by itself! A quirk birthday! And we can get you all the presents from all the heroes who are proud of you!”

“But I just really want....” Eri wants a lot of things, and none of them are presents. She wants to stay in Zawa's arms, so she's warm and safe, and she wants to fix Mirio's quirk. And she really wants Twenny to be here, and for Twenny to be safe. "Twenny...."

Zawa holds her a little tighter, before he tries to push her hair away from her face, but he can't really do that with his gloves on, so he takes it off with his teeth. "Hitoshi misses you, and he'll be able to tell you how proud he is tomorrow, when we go back to UA. I'll tell him as soon as I get back."

Eri holds Zawa's shirt, so maybe he can forget that he's holding her, and take her back to where he's staying with Twenny. "Is Twenny okay?"

Zawa nods, and smiles at her, before he gets an itch on the back of his head. "He's worried about you too, but he wanted me to tell you... 'I love you.'"

Eri doesn't know why Zawa gets kind of red on his face when he says that, but it makes him look kind of pouty. And he looks really pouty and kind of scared when Eri pops out behind him. "Aw, Eraserhead! I knew you-"

"Joke," Zawa says, in his Teacher Voice, but it's kind of like he's scared or he's got a scratchy throat. Eri just wraps her arms around Zawa because he feels so warm. "Do you feel tired, Eri? Does anything hurt?"

Eri shakes her head. "No, but... I want to stay with you."

Zawa nods, and his hair tickles around her horn. "You can tell me about all the fun things you've been doing. Hopefully Ms. Joke has been behaving herself-"

"We're learning cartwheels! And making snow bunnies! And food for heroes!" Eri says, and she has a lot of things to tell Zawa, so maybe she can make him stay longer. Maybe Zawa will stay so long that he falls asleep, and she can sleep on top of him.

Because that's her favorite way to sleep, and she can't sleep good without Twenny or Zawa with her. And that's what she wants for her Quirk Birthday.

*

27 takes a shuddering breath as he pulls back from the radio, folding his hands in front of his face, as everything suddenly becomes cold.

Why did he ask her that?

He thought his quirk would work. He didn't want to use it because he knew how it would work, how he would draw out some poisoned thing from Eri's mind because Nemoto would ask it, but he didn't even think of the question when he knew what she looked like, how she sounded, how terrified and afraid.

Do you want to go back? The question keeps circling his mind, like a shadow he can't escape. How many times he's seen her hurt and bleeding before he asked, before he pulled that string, before he took that pain on himself.

At the start, before he was bought, he asked her if she wanted to go somewhere safe. He didn't take her to that place-

Aizawa said. That Eri calls his quirk 'The Safe Place.'

And he can't do that for her anymore.

He's asked Eri questions before, he asked her questions so freely, that very day. Nothing changed between that morning and when he asked Mirio that poisoned question, Nemoto must not be able to touch her.

But he might never be able to use his quirk on Eri either. If she loses control again, he'll be worthless. He can do nothing but listen to her scream. Again.

He's worthless to her.

"That 'Eri' girl can't control her quirk?" the old man asks, breaking 27 out of his blank thoughts and back into this cold shack, blisteringly quick. "The same girl-"

"My Boss, yes," 27 answers, and he doesn't know why he gives that away. Why it slips out of him that easily, but he feels it like a buzz under his skin that wants to run, even if his splinted ankle throbs and reminds him not to. It was hard enough to pull himself out of the sleeping bag and across the room to answer the radio, harder than it should have been to convince Aizawa to go. "Aizawa takes care of her because of that."

And now that's being stripped away.

Even if he believes that Yamada and Aizawa wouldn't do that to Eri, Eri is losing her purpose at UA with this too. Controlling her quirk means that once Mirio's quirk is restored, there's only trust left that Eri won't be taken away. That she will have fathers. That she will have this happy, normal life.

The old man sits down next to him, a heavy thunk from a bottle set beside him. "You're a pain in the ass when you want to be, kid, but he's still coming back up that mountain. Back to 'Hitoshi.' Stop worrying about-"

"I'm not worried," 27 bites back, his hands falling to his lap and he sees that they're shaking. He's not worried, he knows that Aizawa is going to come back, that he had to leave to help Eri. Because 27 couldn't help her. "It's fine."

There's too much. He can't wrap his mind around all the horrible ways this fell too quickly to ruin. He never even considered what this means for Eri, that Eri would be at risk, but she's at risk and he can't hope to stop it. "A toast."

27 looks at the sake cup, held between shaking and gnarled fingers. Three of them, at least.

The old man holds another cup, and his eyes seem oddly powerful. It's as though he's seeing through 27, and 27 realizes that he doesn't know his quirk. It's powerful, since he's a retired yakuza, and since he's related to Aizawa, he probably does have powerful eyes. "To the success of your Boss, and so we have something to do while Shouta walks his ass back up here to chew us out."

27 takes the cup with shaking hands, and thinks of the other sake cups he's handled. This one is full, it's so different from the first one he took with Chisaki, swearing his loyalty to him after being bought. He can't sit properly with his legs tucked under himself with his ankle splinted and aching, but he manages to balance himself on one with the other curled loosely at his side. "Take this lowly kobun into your esteem."

27 doesn't know why he picked those words, when they're not the right ones. He just feels like something needs to stitch itself into his side, to fuse into him. He doesn't care what parts he walks away with, what's broken. "Take this old and haggard kobun, to do with what you will, as the benefactor of the great head of Shie Hassaikai. May this be the first of her many successes."

27 tries not to wince. As Eri's stand-in, he shouldn't in order to respect her, but the taste is still bitter and sharp.

It makes him thirsty, so he prods the old man for another. "Feh, Shouta said you can't drink. Just a little to take the edge off--"

"Need more than that," 27 because if he can chase down some pleasant numbness that Deidoro would drool over, that he could only give a nauseating, watered down version of through his quirk, then he wants that. Anything to peel him out of his skin for a while, chase the buzzing of his thoughts away.

The old man gives him a sour look, like 27 is really forcing him to, but he pours another toast, and this one is silent. It's not supposed to be, there's supposed to be a vow or an agreement or celebration to go with this.

27 will settle for a conversation. "Kochiya Kai," 27 asks, taking a guess when he folds his last two fingers down on his right hand. He's curious, too curious to really stop from asking.

The old man looks like 27 just spat on him, his bushy white eyebrows furrowing with a flash of his teeth in his beard. "Don't want to talk about that. I'm promised to a new family anyway, Shie Hassaikai."

27 tips his head, feeling a smirk when he thinks about how easy it would be to build up Eri's empire for her. Even if this old man has nothing to offer her, but plenty for himself, as her right hand. "As your Boss, then...."

27 doesn't ask, doesn't want to force the old man any more than that. After he said it, he remembers that people deserve to have secrets. Even if he doesn't. "Kochiya Kai. Right on the money."

The old man sounds odd, the rough growl of his voice stripped away. He looks odd, staring at the sake cup still raised in his three fingered hand too intently. Maybe 27 shouldn't have asked.

But the old man pours him another round, another chance to chase oblivion, and 27 wants that more than caring about the old man. "It was back when everything was only on the brink. Families were dying out, but they were stupid. Left power up for grabs, as long as you knew how to take advantage, quietly. I was young, had a... good quirk for that."

27 looks up, meets the old man's eyes for only a second before they change. Before they start glowing red, so much like Aizawa's, but 27's breath catches in his throat because he can't move.

He can't even breathe. "Paralysis is rare, but not as rare as mine. Takes about 7 minutes for someone to actually die when they can't breathe."

27 can't even see whether the old man blinks or just stops using his quirk, because he doubles over in a cough before he's gasping for air. The old man could have killed him.

"I can't keep my eyes open that long, but try telling them that," the old man says, and 27 doesn't want to know how few seconds he lasted. 27 knows torture, he knows information extraction techniques. And that is a good one. "So, I climbed the ranks pretty fast. From Boss to Boss, father to father. By the time my daughter was born, I was serving beneath the right hand. I had four lieutenants and nearly 100 men that would jump when I said jump, who would drive me and my wife to the ritziest fucking place on the block, who would harrass the waitress until the owner came out and just stood there gaping like a strung fish because no one would fuck with me.”

27 can't imagine having that kind of power, or giving it up. He's never seen that kind of wealth, that kind of respect for a yakuza, but he knows that's because of the time he lives in. Chisaki was the Head and didn't have 100 men to command. But the old man was from another time. So different from the wrinkled, small thing that lives alone in this shack and grumbles so uselessly.

“But, you want to know about my debt. The fall,” the old man says, and 27 can't argue that he doesn't. He could reason that he needs to know, to know where the old man betrayed his last family, but he knows this old man is only playing along in this drinking game.

27 will settle for any story. Anything that isn't his, that isn't here. Where too many days are numbered now, and Aizawa isn't here to lie to him.

“A feud, of course. Nasty one. Men lost on both sides, peace ironed out then broken. Two Heads that were going to war, even when they knew that would just draw the wrong attention, drag them both into ruin,” the old man says, with another round. 27 knocks it back and doesn't wince anymore, and he can feel just the barest haze at his mind. Like it could knock him fully into this story. “My Boss wanted to end it before it came to that, save our side from it. But that would only come with a heavy blow to their pride, something to humiliate them too bad to want vengeance. Break them.”

He doesn't say the name, but 27 imagines it's Marutomi-rengo. That's the first group that the old man thought he was from, and they must want him dead for some reason.

“Their Head had a daughter. She was precious to him. And she was the same age as my own. Misaki.” The old man's hand shakes too much over the sake bottle, so 27 takes it from him. He pours - badly - for them both, too much in both cups and it spills. But 27 holds his cup and doesn't drink it yet. The old man doesn't touch his. “They needed me, and I said no.”

That's not something you can say to a Head, 27 imagines. He's never tried it himself. But he's heard that Shie Hassaikai was more than 100 men strong before Chisaki took over. And that they loved their Head before Chisaki took over.

“Happened anyway,” the old man says, tossing back his drink with his eyes barely opened, fixed beneath the table where the radio sits. “Badly. I was in a bar that night, just... rattling with whether I should. What I should. Just passed out in the end.”

“6,000,000,” 27 asks, as quietly and flatly as he can. 1,000,000 is the going rate for each knuckle, as far as he's heard. It might have changed. He knows he would lose all of his fingers and still not pay back his debt, that 28 million yen that Chisaki paid to own him. Chisaki would have to grow them back several times to fully cover it. Or Eri could Rewind them, but she wouldn't. Shouldn't.

27 feels like a child for asking, when the old man looks back at him, but through him with those eyes. “My wife. Haruka.”

A wife, that he took on lavish dates, that he treasured. A wife that might not be so different from Yamada or Aizawa, and 27 can't imagine how they would feel if they lost the other. 27 doesn't even know how he would feel about that either, he doesn't want to feel that.

“Lost 12 men, one of the Head's favorites, and got arrested. They had done... things the police wouldn't look away from. They were going to be little songbirds in that cell, something the Head didn't like,” the old man says, and it sounds more like he's telling a story. A story where he knows how it ends, and he hates it. But he has to tell it the same way. “While I was getting scrapped off of a bar top, 12 of my men just.... Same lieutenant as the ones that were putting me in a hotel for the night, telling me I couldn’t go home to Haruka because she hated when I drank.”

And the old man still drinks. He pours another round, for himself, and swats away 27’s hand when he tries to help.

“It was clean. Looked like suicide. I’d given everyone enough reason to believe it. Misaki... just knew it, as soon as she looked at me. She believed it.” The old man’s lips twitch, before he swallows, before he rubs at his nose. “As soon as everything was taken care of, I left her with her aunt. Came here, for her own safety. Stayed up here... out of shame.”

27 starts to reach for the sake bottle again, finding he hasn’t found that pleasant oblivion yet, but he stops and rubs his hands. The last two fingers. Those were missing in this story too.

Maybe the old man sees that, because he huffs, settling his elbows on his knees before he folds his hands the best that he can, staring through 27 again. His eyes are watering. “Before all that, Boss asked me to prove how much I disapproved of it. He gave me a knife. I cut my fingers myself, right there. But that was just to get an out for that mission.”

Did the Boss want him to kill his own wife? His own daughter?

“If I took that knife to my eyes, he would know that I was truly against it. That a father would do anything, be driven to that desperation, even if it wasn’t his daughter. The Head wouldn’t be broken, he would be angry enough not to stop, for any cost. I don’t even think I would have had to do it, just to try, and he would have taken my word for it. I was still useful to them.”

The old man had a powerful quirk. And he didn’t want to lose it. He had a choice whether to become useless, and he wouldn’t risk it. 27 envies that, and wonders if he would have made the same decision. If he had it.

“Six knuckles instead, for six of our men that had been beaten to death the week before. Blood paying blood, and that wasn’t enough,” the old man slurs. “And I didn’t know how to tell my wife what I had done. If I could... make it any better by telling a father to protect his daughter. If that was somehow honorable enough.”

And he couldn’t tell her, in the end. The old man’s shame was his own. And since he found that he had nothing but danger to bring to his loved ones, he hid in the mountains with it. Thinking that he deserved it after all he had lost.

“Shouta would’ve gouged his eyes out on the spot,” the old man says, looking at the bottle again with an odd smirk on his face. “Shit, he wouldn’t’ve gotten tangled up in any of that, that money and power. Or women, apparently.” But the smirk drops, even if the stare doesn’t break at the sake bottle. “He’s better than he was raised. And he’ll be good for you.”

27 pours again, slower and better this time. He can’t tell if something is pulling under his skin, just from Aizawa’s given name, but he wants to crush it all the same. “Elders have more tattoos, I’ve heard.”

The old man lifts his head, one eye squinting and his face looks flabbergasted from what 27 can see under all that white stringy hair. “Punk! I’ve got enough of them to get kicked out of a bath house, not that I go to those places. Ain’t stripping for you or nothing.”

27 huffs and tries to hide his laughter behind his hand, then behind the sake cup. His face feels hot, and the idea of seeing that wrinkled old man is ridiculous. “I only have one- two, maybe. They covered up the first one with the second, but... it counts.”

The old man lifts his eyebrows, giving him an odd look when he nods. “Getcha kicked out of a bath house, but there’s none up here.”

Wanna see? That’s a question that dies on his tongue, barely making it to his teeth, before he tugs his arm out of his sleeve then out of his shirt. Then takes his shirt off, because it feels ridiculous. “Two names here. ‘27,’ then they covered it up with ‘Dog.’ Got ‘Dog’ removed. The old guy kind of looked like you.”

27 pulls at the black band around his arm, like he needs to be reminded that ‘Dog’ hasn’t reappeared, that no other tattoos have sprung up again. He looks under both elbows too, looking for Nemoto’s red faced demon to bleed back into his skin, and sees nothing but the edges of a few Bug scars. Before he looks up at the old man, who looks at the sake bottle instead before he pours. “Trade you some stories, instead of tattoos. Tell me a few of yours.”

“Need more than that,” Hitoshi says, finding it too easy to smirk when his face feels this soft and pliable, just barely dizzy. He thinks it’s easier to talk when his tongue feels too thick in his mouth, everything feels loose enough that he can just lean his head against the table where the radio sits.

When he can forget about Aizawa coming back, unless he tries to remember, and just listens to some stories.

The Rotten Core Of It

Chapter Summary

Before Aizawa leaves the Ketsubutsu training camp, he needs to have an important discussion with Mirio. And when Aizawa returns to his grandfather's shack hours later, he finds himself repeating himself when Shinsou needs those words too.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: Underage drinking, Ambiguously serious suicide threats (Shinsou says that he'll kill himself if something happens, but he is drunk at the time.), Several mentions of 50's death, Puking

Previously on Wards of UA: Aizawa left the shack in the last chapter because Eri's quirk had become uncontrollable. The reason that Aizawa didn't arrange for Yamada to stay with his grandfather in the safe house is because the first and last time that Yamada and Shoga met, Shoga fired his crossbow at him and seemed to be trying to kill him. Aizawa told Eri that he loves her for the first time, in a somewhat disguised way, in the last chapter. Mirio and Amajiki recently entered a romantic relationship, and they have been sharing the same room at the Ketsubutsu training camp, with one bed. Mirio teared up when Eri was able to control her quirk by herself to stop it. Shinsou's father's quirk allowed him to create small worms that could burrow into a person's brain and control them, which he used on Shinsou's mother, which caused her severe neurological problems after his death. Shinsou sprained his ankle after being trapped in a leg snare the day prior. Aizawa plans to adopt Eri in a year's time, but still wants Shinsou to move to another home after The Miasma has been brought down, and the wardship is over.

Aizawa can't pull away from this strain, this tug that's trying to tear him apart across a mountain. He knows that's why he would have preferred Eri to stay at UA, with Hizashi, but when they were right about her quirk erupting this weekend, that still brings him little solace. Because he knows that Hitoshi is still alone, the more he lingers here.

"And this is my room, but it's only for my stuff, because we have sleepovers instead!" Eri says, announcing her room in this cabin and quickly clarifying for Aizawa that she wasn't sleeping alone here. He imagines it would be terrifying for her to try something that brave, in a place so new, but Eri seems to have gathered that instinctively with those 'sleepovers.'

"I'm glad you're having fun," Aizawa says, unable to ignore the warm reassurance in his chest. Of course he's worried about Eri while he was away from her, when he knows that she needs faces more familiar and reassuring than the Big Three after the terror of that attack on Hitoshi. He would have rather had Hizashi stay with his ward, and he stay with his own, but his damned fool of a grandfather left him convinced that would only lead to manslaughter charges. "And there's only one more 'sleep over' before we all go home tomorrow."

He doesn't usually call the dorm 'home,' but somehow it fits more easily than he thought. Like too many things do, when he's too overwhelmed to have time to question it. When he finds himself inspired to be braver than he is.

Eri walks back to him, clinging to his leg, but he draws a full pout when he runs a hand over her head and she must notice how his hand lingers near her horn. It only shrank slightly.

But it's enough that he might have to risk going back to Hitoshi too soon. If Eri's quirk erupts again, he will have to make that trek back, but he can't linger much longer. He knows that Eri is in good hands, for just another night.

"Is Twenny sleeping okay?" Eri asks, her mumbled worries are heartbreakingly accurate. Eri might have done better with this sudden separation than Hitoshi did, and she might even know that already.

"He doesn't have anyone fun to have a 'sleep over with,'" Aizawa answers, the memory of last night's 'sleep over' where Hitoshi sung Overhaul's praises and strung out every insult he could just to have Aizawa's voice in the dark anchoring from his own terrors is still fresh. Despite knowing what poor company Aizawa is, he wants to rectify that.

It seems like Eri does too. "He needs Mocha back!"

Eri takes him by his hand, dragging him along for her mission. Aizawa only briefly wonders why 'Mocha' is in Eri's possession, then wonders why it technically isn't, before he realizes the answers to both of those questions would be disheartening. Hitoshi would want to give something precious of himself to Eri to keep before they parted ways, and Eri wouldn't want to trust herself to keep it safe. Eri trusts others far more than herself, and especially the hero students she spends the most time with.

Especially Mirio. "Mirio!"

Especially hero students who seemed to be doing well on this excursion off campus.

Eri opened the door and called out in quick succession, leaving Amajiki with apparently no other choice than to fling himself to the side and off the bed, rolling to the side where the bed will hide his presence. Mirio springs up quite readily, his face bright red, and Aizawa has no doubt that's due to the very close proximity that comes when one student is lying on top of another, on a bed.

But Aizawa catches Mirio rubbing the corner of his eye, and wonders if he could make this any less painful for the kid, when the situation seemed far more difficult than what he was led to believe at first.

"Hey, Eri! I just got a snowflake in my eye, and Tamaki was helping me with it," Mirio says, his voice odd from his nose still being congested. Another thing to easily blame on the winter weather, even if Aizawa doubts that's the case. "Whatcha need? Just showing Aizawa-sensei around?"

"Twenny needs Mocha back, 'cause he's not sleeping good," Eri says, and again it's confirmed that Eri knew Hitoshi that well to not be surprised by that. "And he can have a sleepover with Mocha!"

"Right, Mocha's been sleeping over with us-I mean, just me for too long! Just me," Mirio says, a hand running through his short blonde hair, and Aizawa is far from surprised from any truth beneath that lie. Nothing would surprise him.

And given they're both legally adults, there's nothing that he can disapprove of.

Mocha has been sitting in an odd place of honor, on a dresser against the wall that faces the bed. Aizawa doesn't know if that was something Eri would have insisted on, for Mirio to have his eyes on Mocha at all times during the night, or if that's a responsibility his student took too seriously and insisted on himself. Or if that plushie had other reasons to face a shared bed, with its beady, innocent eyes.

But when Mirio hands the plushie to Eri, who hands it to Aizawa, he takes it with what solemnity he can spare before he tries to find a strategy to move all pieces into place. "Eri, do you think that you could ask Ms. Joke for a lunch to bring for Mocha? We didn't pack enough for him."

Eri nods, too seriously, and a bit too eagerly he notes. "We gotta have some milk, 'cause Mocha's a cat!"

While he watches his ward turn and leave, Aizawa only barely considers that Eri could take this as a cause to drag out his stay a bit longer, but it needs to lengthen regardless. "Togata, come with me."

Aizawa has to carry this plushie, and trust for too long that Mirio will follow him before he hears answering footsteps, but while he'd rather have this conversation in Mirio's room, that would mean addressing the fact that Amajiki is still hiding on the floor. And Aizawa would rather not do that.

So Aizawa finds the next best thing behind the Boy's Cabin, leaning against the wall before he crosses his arms and half-hides the stuffed animal in his elbow. And faces a student who likely doesn't want to talk to him about these things. "This is a bigger step forward than you realize. Eri controlled her quirk, but her horn isn't shrinking. It might be a sign that she's more comfortable with it, and there would be less time--"

"I'm not worried about that, Sensei!" Mirio argues, flustering immediately with his hands raised. He almost looks insulted, which means that he is, so Aizawa crosses that item off the list. "I'm really proud of her, I am, and I know that...."

That pause is the pain. Whatever Mirio tried to hide behind his smile earlier, whatever he was only able to share with Amajiki before they were interrupted, whatever had drew Mirio to tears both times - Aizawa wants to know it.

"Sir Nighteye... would be really proud of her too. To see her beat him like that," Mirio says, and it feels like the drip of a freshly excised wound. That's only the palatable part of the infection, and even that, Aizawa knows is something that his student only barely trusts with Hizashi. But with his eyes downcast, Mirio continues on. "And I... couldn't really do anything to help. Again."

Again, stings harshly. "You did help. You kept Eri calm enough while I arrived, and there's no one else who I would trust with her right now. You did everything you could that night, and it saved Hitoshi's life."

Mirio shakes his head, the rotten facsimile of a smile in his grimace. "That's not all I can do. Everyone thinks that I can't, and they're right, but I just--"

"A quirk doesn't make the hero, otherwise everyone with a capable quirk would be called that," Aizawa interrupts, thinking of Ragdoll, how she's still perfectly capable of organizing resources on missions when she's done it for years, or Toshinori, who still inspires enough reassurance and calm and awe that most of his students go to him with their troubles. And when he thinks of Mirio, he sees far more than that. "That quirk made you answer with your deepest insecurities, making you answer what you didn't want to face. And Hitoshi used it...."

They're going to kill me, and anyone who's trying to protect me, and I don't want....

"Because he couldn't stand the thought of risking your life," Aizawa says, as quietly as the gravity of that statement deserves.

Hitoshi would die, willingly, instead of letting anyone he was close to get hurt protecting him. Especially Mirio, the first hero he saw in that raid. The only one he saw coming to save himself and Eri.

Aizawa honestly doubts whether Hitoshi even considers that Mirio was trying to save him too, and only admires him for his efforts to save Eri.

He still doesn't see his own life as worth saving. "But I would have.... Even if it-"

"That's not what being a hero is about," Aizawa reminds, even if a lecture is a poor way to reassure a student still fighting tears. A student who wanted to throw themselves into danger turns his stomach into a pit of tar, and he wonders how blind his own homeroom teacher was to have not given him these words. "The goal is to save every life possible, including your own, and that risk is meant to be avoided. You are very young, Togata, and you haven't graduated yet."

But it'll be worth it, Aizawa had told himself, too many times. It'll be worth it if I save them. That's what a hero does, I'm willing to lay down my life at this moment, if it's meaningful.

"Your life matters, to Eri, to Shinsou, to Hizashi, to so many others and to me," Aizawa says, even if there's a sharp numbness in his chest when he speaks those truths. He schools his face against showing it. "You have too much potential to throw it away."

It was a bad match up from the start, 127's invisibility against Mirio. Even with his quirk, he wouldn't know exactly when to use his quirk to dodge it. Aizawa should have been by Hitoshi's side, and he will be. But he needs Mirio to understand this first.

"There's only so much you can learn from turning these situations over in your head. You have to put them to rest before they become regrets," Aizawa says, like a hypocrite. He barely does, when he can spend hours awake thinking of his own bad matches, his own casualties. Even casualties that weren't his own, that sting worse for it. "They're both here, because of you, and don't forget that. That's entirely due to Lemillion."

"Just... clearing the way," Mirio argues, quietly. Shakily, and if Mirio is anything like Hizashi, Aizawa knows to step forward, to place a hand on his shoulder. It's not reassurance, but invitation, that might be necessary here.

"By being there, then and in the future," Aizawa says, unsurprised by the watery gasp, or how Mirio's broad shoulders bend and shake. "I'm sure Amajiki has told you that himself. He has a more rational way of seeing things."

"It's-s... just..." Mirio fights against a chest that doesn't want to breathe, a torrent waiting for the damn to give way. "W-would he be p-proud of me-e?"

A dead man can't answer that. But Aizawa can. "Yes. And I am too."

Aizawa finds that he's far more comfortable with his students at arm's length, when he does find that the need to reassure them needs to come from some physical proof. He's broken that rule with Mirio before, and it feels no different now.

He'll have to ask about Amajiki at some point, if he can't leave that up to Hizashi, and he'll need to convince Eri that she's packed enough of a lunch, and that he needs to return to the shack despite how much she wants to keep him.

But for now, Aizawa bears the trembling sobs on his shoulder, and offers an arm around Mirio's shoulders this time. In the hospital, he couldn't quite go that far.

But this wound is a deeper one, and he needs to meet it to its core. And he imagines that Sir Nighteye would do the same in his place.

*

27 has a lot of limbs. A lot of himself, and they're all comfortable. This floor is really comfortable.

Deidoro was an ass for never letting him feel like this.

"So... so," 27 says, moving his hands to try to get his words out. He just lost them. "Fuck, oh- a fuckin' robbery. Noo, I stole people more. Kidnap. Three times."

He messes up his fingers at first, and starts to laugh. Does it even matter if he can't do it right? He's just stupid. The old man rubs his own face, making it redder before he sighs. "Oh fuck, you're drunk. Didn't wanna do that. Shouta's gonna be pissed."

"N' he can drink with us!" 27 says, because that's a fun idea! Aizawa won't be mad, he'll just be drunk! Drunk means happy and floaty, and it's nice. "Get 'im drunk, n' he's not mad. He'll talk to me too! He'll be happy, and talk-y. Shhh, it's a good plan. Let's get 'im drunk."

The old man tries to get up, and falls a little, but then he gets the bottle, and no he can't take it. "I'm just getting more, don't look at me like that. Tell me about one of those kidnappings."

27 lets his head fall to the floor, staring at the ceiling. It looks cold, but he can't touch it, even when he tries, so he's not sure it's cold. "Uh... Kidnapping. One of those. Huh. Oh, Croak! Assholes."

Croak is always assholes. Always. That's why 27 had to go help them a lot, for a lot of stuff. Lot of frogs and swamp things and people who looked like bloated dead bodies. They were alive and all, but smelled bad. Bad quirks. Swamp quirks.

"Wanted this frog guy. 'Cause they like frogs. Had to wait at his house, then he came outside. I was in the yard, 'sposed to be a lost little kid. Asked him... something. Prolly 'where's my mommy' or somethin'. Kinda fucked up, my mom sold me an' all. 'Cause she got fucky brain. From my dad. He's got brain worms, 'n they're small."

Fuck, if he had brain worms too, that'd be weird. Don't wanna put brain worms in Eri, why would he do that? Damn, Chisaki would've killed him for not putting worms in Eri's brain. He'd be dead.

"An' frog guy's nice, wants to help me. Hate those jobs, they always wanna help, n' can't. Croak got 'im in the car. Dunno what happened to 'im. He didn't show up in their gang. Maybe, he didn't work out. Had to kill 'im," 27 says, because he knows how it goes. 'Be useful, or die,' that's how things fuckin' go.

The old man comes back with more sake, and pours him some. 27 has to wriggle around so he can drink it, and it's hard to lift his head, but it's sake. Just tastes funny. "Maybe they just wanted to chat with him. If they like 'frog quirks,' maybe he was an ex-member. Make sure he's not telling stories if he's on the straight and narrow."

“Yeah,” 27 says, too loud, but the old man pours him another round. Holy shit, he loves telling stories. “Fuck, I’ve told stories. They wanna kill me now. I didn’t even tell them nothin’ but they wanna kill me. That’s fucked up, they always wanna kill me when I didn’t do nothing.”

“Sure is,” the old man says, and he’s just gonna keep pouring? Wow, 27’s gonna get fucked up. “Shouta’s gonna keep you safe though. And if you wanna kick off, sleep it off, I’ll-”

“Hoo nooo,” 27 says, then he laughs, because the old man doesn’t know, does he? “No, no sleep. When you got nightmares, don’t sleep. Bakugo told me, don’t sleep ‘til brain mushy. Takes care of it. Don’t wanna see ‘im. He’s gonna kill me.”

127’s gonna kill him, because he’s a dick. Even when he’s dead, he’s gonna try to kill 27 in his sleep. In his dreams. 127’s dead, so it’s not even his job anymore. He’s just a dick.

“Mm, stabbed me. A lot. Put the... mask on. That’s bad,” 27 says, rubbing at his face. He was trying to just touch his scars, but his hand is pulling on his face, and it feels weird. “Ol’ man, you don’t got a mask. Wanna stay with you.”

“Hell no,” the old man says, because he’s a dick. 27 frowns at him, and his face is so hairy and wrinkly weird. “Hell no, I’m too old to put up with you. You’re going with Shouta tomorrow, to wherever that is. UA, isn’t it?”

“But I tried to kill people there,” 27 whines, because he doesn’t wanna see it. They’re all gonna know he’s a monster. “An’ here’s nice. So nice! No people, ever! No... no talking, just... quiet. Like it. Not dangerous.”

“You’ll miss people,” the old man says, and he sounds serious. 27 tries to look at him, but the floor’s comfy on his chin. Should hurt, but it just feels weird. “You’ve got an obligation to your boss, after all.”

“Eri don’ need me. Always needed me, but don’t,” 27 says, and feels sad about it. He’s got to lay down better to feel sad, so he tries to get on his back again, but it doesn’t work out. He’s just twisty. “She loves me n’ stuff, n’ I love ‘er. But, gotta do things for her. Tha’s how it works. Gotta help ‘er, she doesn’ need help. Can’t keep ‘er safe. And Yamada.”

Yamada could’ve died. 27 would wanna be dead if he did. 27 would make himself dead if that happened.

“Yamada... don’ wanna kill ‘im. He’s 50, but not 50. Don’ wan’ him to die like 50. If he does, ‘m just gonna kill myself. ‘Cause it’s my fault good people die,” 27 says, and maybe he should’ve fucking done that before. All of this wouldn’t happen. He’d just be asleep.

“You lose people, and it’s not your fault. Don’t do something stupid like that,” the old man says, and he makes 27 drink some more. This sake still tastes weird, it doesn’t make him feel fuzzy-drunk. “I’ve got a long story, so get comfortable. And close your eyes, so you can imagine it better or something.”

27 sighs and gets comfortable, one arm over his eyes while the other is stretched over his head, and one of his legs stretched out as far as it can. His ankle is starting to hurt, but he hasn’t even hit it in a while.

Maybe Aizawa’s not coming back, because he got smart. He’s gonna take Eri, and go back to UA, and leave 27 in the mountains.

And 27 is going to drink a whole lot if that happens, so he might as fuckin’ well.

*

Aizawa was returning to his grandfather's shack, with an important possession he probably shouldn't feel so uncomfortable carrying.

Aizawa has been shifting Mocha around while he carries the plushie, under his arms or in his hands, but for some reason it feels uncomfortable to hold it in any position. Aizawa knows it's a stuffed animal, it's not capable of being offended if Aizawa holds it by its head, but given how much this stuffed animal means to Hitoshi, he doesn't want to damage it in any way.

He'd rather have it in a backpack, but he left his own at the shack. The lunch that Eri packed for 'Mocha' also has to shift each time Aizawa shifts the stuffed animal, and Aizawa hopes these two things can help comfort Hitoshi somehow. It's getting close to the end of the second day on this venture, but Hitoshi's vulnerability has only festered deeper with this isolation. Aizawa doesn't know if he'll be in any shape to return to school on Tuesday.

And with Aizawa's cargo, he can't make the same trip up the mountains that he did before, as he'd lose one or both items if he were using his capture scarf to throw himself through the treeline. By the time he comes into view of the shack, the sun is beginning to set, turning the snow shades of gold while day dwelling creatures become silent, and the louder nocturnal ones begin to stir.

He hears the chirps of foxes nearby, and wonders if it would be a good idea to try to catch sight of them despite the cold and despite Hitoshi's injury. Perhaps a better display of being a nature guide could help Hitoshi take his mind off of his fears.

But when Aizawa opens the door, surprised to hear Hitoshi laughing, he looks at the scene before him and takes too long to comprehend it.

When he should have known.

"So, m' little kid, got the mask, n' if a cop shows up, m' sposed to do the 'I'm lost, can you help me' thing, bam quirk 'em," Hitoshi says, laying on his back with his shirt off for some reason, slurring his words with a flush on his cheeks, too far gone to actually make contact when he tries to clap his hands to punctuate his words.

"And hell, what I'd do for that kind of security, back in my day," his grandfather says, oddly less drunk than Aizawa expected, sitting with his back turned to the door while he faces Aizawa's ward. "You'd be eating kobe beef every day if you were one of my men."

"Noo, m' stupid. They're stupid, the clients're so... stupid," Hitoshi tries waving a hand, but too quickly it falls heavily. "M' just distraction, they're gonna rob the place, but they come out and they're scared and tell me to get 'n the car. They want me to drive. I can't fuckin' drive! M' small! Legs don't work."

"Hitoshi," Aizawa calls, because he can't even look at his grandfather right now. He can't believe the old man did this, either allowing but probably encouraging his very underage ward to get drunk.

Hitoshi tilts his head up, neck straining as he presses his purple hair against the floor. He's surprised the old man isn't whining about that. "Zawa, shit. Come drink with us! M' talking about the investigation, it's fun now, this is a good story."

Aizawa doesn't know if that was his grandfather's intentions, if he thought that getting Hitoshi drunk enough to talk about Miasma would be helpful at all, but he places the lunch and stuffed animal on the table so he can carry Hitoshi to their borrowed room and find some way to deal with this. “Shouta, I only gave him a bit, but he should be coming down at this point-”

“So, can’t drive. Dunno how. I push the buttons, ‘cause it’s got buttons, right? But that jus’ makes ‘em mad, ‘stupid fuckin’ kid,’ an’ I fly in the back. Pshurk.” Aizawa doesn’t want to know what that slurred sound effect felt like, for Hitoshi to be a child young and small enough to press the buttons on a radio console thinking it would start a car, then ‘fly’ into the backseat as he was thrown. “An’ they’re mad. Guy back there’s mad, an’ he’s got a quirk-hey! S’ important for the-”

“It’s not,” Aizawa argues, Hitoshi thrashing weakly in his arms when he gathers the teen from the floor, too uncoordinated to actually put up a fight. “You’re going to hurt your-”

“Zawa, come on,” Hitoshi groans, dropping limp and sullen, too much like Hizashi when he’s had too much to drink “Drink! Makes you happy!”

“It will not,” Aizawa argues, turning to the side so that Hitoshi won’t hit his sprained ankle on the doorway, and not for the first time, wishes this room had a door instead of a tarp that he could slam shut on his grandfather.

Hitoshi just sighs, rolling his eyes when Aizawa looks. And his eyes are very unfocused, meaning that he’s had much more than the ‘little bit’ his grandfather claimed. “Kay, so mask is locked. And guy has a quirk that makes people throw up. An’ he’s mad at me, ‘cause his friend died. Maybe. Dunno.”

Aizawa kneels down and puts Hitoshi on the futon while he continues to tell this story, even if the mirth of it seems to be removed now. Hitoshi seems to actually think this story is useful for the investigation, without mentioning names or places or when it happened, things that Aizawa doubts Hitoshi could remember sober. He’ll have to get water from the barrel for Hitoshi to drink, have to convince him to sleep this off. Have to deal with a hungover teenager who’s already dealing with too much, which will make the hike down the mountain and the car ride back to UA incredibly fun tomorrow.

“An’ he uses it on me. Gotta throw up, but mask is closed. Can’t get out, just a... just a lil. S’ bad n’ I’m gonna....” Aizawa looks at Hitoshi’s flushed face, suddenly turning paler, and thinks this is not a good story to tell in any sense when the alcohol seems to be revolting against him. “M’ gonna die, but Boss’ quirk-”

“Hitoshi, stop talking and stay like that,” Aizawa says, pulling Hitoshi by his bare shoulder to lay on his side, as the last thing Aizawa needs is for his ward to asphyxiate on his own vomit. He has to take his eyes off of Hitoshi to grab the bucket by the wall and spill his dirty laundry out of it. Hitoshi had been folding his, before placing it under his backpack, something that Aizawa should have noticed before now as yet another sign that Hitoshi was regressing to old habits from the beginning of his wardship. Another step back that he can’t do anything about.

“Boss opens, an’ I-” Hitoshi is cut off by a gagging belch, and he pulls his hand in front of his mouth like he’s finally realized what’s coming. His arm curls around his stomach and his legs curl tighter around him, and when Aizawa offers the bucket in front of his face, he shakes his head with watering, unfocused eyes.

“Hitoshi, it’s alright,” Aizawa offers, and has to put a hand between Hitoshi’s shoulderblades just in case he tries to turn away and on his back. He’s proven right when he feels pressure against his palm, before another pang of nausea makes the teenager curl again, and soon enough nature guides Hitoshi forward to grip the rim of the bucket too and nearly push his face into it as the vomiting begins.

Aizawa pushes on his back and lowers the bucket on the floor, rubbing in circles on uncomfortably bare and scarred skin as Hitoshi chokes and coughs between heaves, the acrid smell being unpleasant enough. Aizawa doesn't want Hitoshi to choke back on something that needs to come out, and he knows that's difficult enough to manage in an inebriated state. From experience.

"It's alright," Aizawa mutters, when the heaving seems to taper off, the gasping breaths don't sound any more steady for it. He feels Hitoshi's arms shaking from where he also holds the bucket, and he knows that this violent spell has taken everything the teenager didn't have in terms of strength or coordination to hold himself up. He moves his hand to Hitoshi's shoulder to help lay him back down, but Hitoshi lifts his head with tears streaming down his face. Not just from the vomiting.

"I don' wanna die," Hitoshi chokes out, his irregular gasps turning to sobs now that the nausea seems to have taken away the more pleasant sensation from drinking. Now that he's left with too sober thoughts, and too much pain behind them.

But despite that, despite the sobs shuddering through Hitoshi's frame as he continues to curl into himself, pulling his still shaking arms in front of his chest like a shield, Aizawa finds himself stunned that he would say it. That Hitoshi would admit that he wanted to live, after he nearly threw his life away only two nights ago. "You're not going to die, Hitoshi. I'm going to keep you safe-"

"You're gonna-" Hitoshi shakes his head, even when it falls to tip on the ground as his neck no longer supports him, hiding his expression still wrought in pain. "No!"

Hitoshi didn't want to die. But he found losing someone, even like Aizawa, to be more painful.

Aizawa pushes on Hitoshi's shoulder, pulling the bucket behind himself and as far away as he could manage before using his other arm to gather Hitoshi up under his head, trying to lay him back down.

Trying to make Hitoshi look at him, and believe him this time.

Hitoshi pulls a hand to fist in Aizawa's sleeve, clinging to him with his tear-wrought and desperate expression. All of his anxieties made bare to the rotten core, how much loss Hitoshi has gone through, and how much he doesn't want to go through it again.

"You're not going to lose me, Hitoshi," Aizawa says, watching another shuddering sob punctuated by a curl of the teen's lip, showing his clenched teeth, how desperate he is to believe that despite the pain convincing him otherwise. "You're not going to lose Eri, or Hizashi, or anyone. You're not going to die. You're going to be safe. I swear to you, I'm not going to let you die."

"Don' be 50," Hitoshi pleads, his eyes finally focusing on Aizawa's, his teeth digging into his own lip afterwards. Aizawa doesn't answer quickly enough for his liking, pulling and pushing on Aizawa's captured sleeve with closed eyes and a tantrum that doesn't entirely fit a teenage boy. "Please, please-"

"I'm not going to die, Hitoshi," Aizawa answers, guiding the teenager to lay back on the futon so he can use his hand to try to remove Hitoshi's from his sleeve. Hitoshi just tightens his grip, shaking his head. "I'm not going to leave you like that."

Hitoshi stares at him, his red and irritated eyes narrowed as his face is still twisted in that pain. As much as Aizawa wants to soothe it, he needs to see it. He needs Hitoshi to bear the weight of it too, and accept it.

Hitoshi deserves to live, at the very least. He deserves more than that, but as much as Aizawa wants that for him, and as much as Aizawa plans to take the option out of his hands, he wants Hitoshi to want to live. To put forth trust that the worst is over for him, and that the fear of loss might hurt, it might linger with evidence he'll never forget, but he needs to try to move forward. To forge those new bonds, and want them, selfishly.

Instead of being ready to throw his life away at any provocation for it.

And Hitoshi nods. There's an audible, gulping sob when he does, when his eyes fall shut and somehow he trusts that he doesn't need to see right now, he trusts that Aizawa won't hurt him, and won't allow him to be hurt. And more than all of that, what Aizawa can only hope to call it in this moment, he's awed by a more real reason to believe this acceptance is honest.

Hitoshi never cries this loudly.

After that interrogation that forced Hitoshi to answer questions honestly, to forcefully break his silence and name Miasma, Hitoshi curled into himself and wept without hardly making a sound. He had tried to bite off his tongue, and had bitten Aizawa's hand instead, he had been forced into that desperate act and still didn't let himself cry freely in the horrible aftermath of it.

But his gasps are hardly bitten, from his throat is the aching wail of loss and pain stuttered from his breaths, and Aizawa can't just hover over him and watch it. He gathers Hitoshi in his arms again, the teen's grip on his sleeve finally loosening, to bring him to his chest and hold in him this pain. There's only a pause that reminds Aizawa that this could be a misstep, that Hitoshi does not like being touched and has reminded him of that every time he's had to carry him since his ankle sprain, but Hitoshi fists both of his hands on Aizawa's shirt with his face pressed to the collar, and with that assent, Aizawa knows what to do.

He traces circles on Hitoshi's back, just as he would for Eri, muttering assurances with each new cry. No one has ever done this for Hitoshi, he imagines. No one has ever been trusted with this pain, or allowed to see it when Hitoshi knows too well to hide it.

When Hitoshi finally quiets down to sniffing, his grip loosening but fidgeting all the same, like he doesn't want Aizawa to let go, Aizawa lowers him again to lay on the futon, only hesitating before he decides to trust the teenager to wipe away his own tears. "You need to drink some-"

Aizawa feels more than sees Hitoshi reaching out to grab his side and pull, feeling his leg try to kick Aizawa's from his kneeling position. He sees Hitoshi's frustrated pout in sharp orange hues, as the sun has set fully outside, and only the flames from the open wood furnace in the living room provides light.

"You can't flip me that easily," Aizawa has to add, because he's heard something about that from Hizashi, and he's even more doubtful that Hitoshi actually overpowered him after he was so violently sick. "I'm just going to the next room-"

"Nah leaving," Hitoshi answers in a rough and slurred voice, another fruitless tug accentuating his demand. Aizawa is surprised Hitoshi can overlook the taste of vomit that has to still be in his mouth, how his throat must be sore after that much crying, and how Hitoshi seems convinced that he can toss Aizawa over himself to lay down next to him.

Aizawa knows Hitoshi's stubbornness well enough not to argue, and he's also heard from Hizashi what will happen if he does lay down. But he sighs, and does flip himself over his ward, given that it seems unlikely that Hitoshi will let go of him for any less.

And he's not surprised by the ensuing tackle, Hitoshi's head thudding against his chest with an arm splayed over it, his hand apparently reaching for an arm to pin down. Or at least, pretend to, given that there's no way his husband was actually pinned down by a starving, sickly teenager who needed an IV drip just hours before.

Hitoshi's sigh of contentment is audible when Aizawa kicks at the blankets folded up at the end, managing to pull them over his ward with only one barely-free arm. Hitoshi should put on a shirt given the freezing temperatures outside, and how the furnace in the living room won't do much. There's a lot of things that Hitoshi should do, and that Aizawa should do as well, such as dealing with a bucket of vomit still in the middle of the room, or turning on the flashlight to prevent Hitoshi from remembering the dark torture he went through at such a young age.

But Hitoshi's greatest need right now seems to be to have Aizawa close to him, evidence that they're both alive, and they're both safe. And perhaps, Hitoshi can believe in the protection Aizawa has promised, in ways deeper than he first promised to do.

He swore that he would keep Hitoshi safe from Miasma, and again he swore that the Hero Commission wouldn't hurt him, when it seems likely that they will be interested in how Hitoshi's quirk has changed, how it's mutated with Nemoto's and how that could be similar to how Nomus are created. And he will keep those promises, up to and including fleeing the country with a forged passport.

But Aizawa hasn't truly promised that he wouldn't die to keep those promises. He's never considered it fully, but in the back of his mind, he let himself accept that it would be for a worthy cause to lay his life down for Hitoshi's future. A habit that he might have fought down, that flares up too often in a meaningful fight, such as at USJ, but he knows in the back of his mind that he's accepted the possibility very early in Hitoshi's wardship.

He can't do that now. He has people that won't accept that loss, Eri and Hizashi don't deserve that, and Hitoshi has only reminded him of that fact. Hitoshi has become one of the people who will need him in the future, who don't deserve to grieve him.

"You're 50," Hitoshi mutters sleepily, patting the futon when he still hasn't found Aizawa's arm, and before Aizawa can argue that, he adds, "N' I'm Eri."

A drunk, sleep-deprived, and incoherent thought from a teenager who should be none of those things, but Aizawa sighs and tries to pull the pillow under his head properly, trying to answer to it. "I'm not a woman, and you're not a 5 year old."

"Almos' 6," Hitoshi argues, because even drunk, sleep-deprived, and incoherent, he feels the need to argue that fact. "Don' leave her. 'Cause her quirk...."

Aizawa pulls the blanket further over Hitoshi's shoulder, finding his hand resting there afterwards. Unsure exactly how to say it. "I won't. Eri gaining control of her quirk won't change things."

The barest truths to that, which can hide a more uncomfortable one. One Aizawa doesn't want to broach until it's necessary, until Miasma and all of these other dangers have truly settled for Shinsou.

He won't abandon either ward, he will live for them, to be there for them in the future. But the way he will be hasn't changed. Shinsou still needs a clean slate, he needs to find a greater degree of separation from this pain he's endured in his wardship. He can't possibly find that in the guardianship of a man that he thought owned him for almost a month.

“Good. You’re a good dad,” Shinsou says, a weaker pat on the futon as he shifts his head a bit higher on Aizawa’s chest. “N’ m’ Eri. N’ you’re 50. N’ you’re gonna keep me safe, ‘cause I’m Eri. Kay.”

Aizawa doesn’t answer in time, staring at the ceiling too long as he tries to find a way to explain to Hitoshi that he doesn’t need to be Eri to deserve to be safe. A soft, barely audible snore answers him before he can.

Aizawa’s hand still rests on Hitoshi’s shoulder, his chest still serving as a pillow for Hitoshi’s head. He wishes it were easy enough to run a hand through his purple hair, to soothe him like that even in sleep. When Aizawa isn’t sure that he’ll have nightmares and wake up into another one with the darkness of the room steadily growing as Aizawa hears his grandfather shut the door to the furnace. He knows the old man might have overheard all of that.

But between those quiet snores, Aizawa still finds himself answering to Hitoshi, just as quietly. “You don’t have to be anyone else. We can be ourselves, like this.”

Aizawa doesn’t know if Hitoshi will ever trust Aizawa, or anyone, as much as a dead woman who has at least never harmed him and never can. If he will ever allow anyone as close as he did, before he experienced that loss for what Aizawa imagines was the first time.

But Aizawa hopes that he could be that person, and that these drunken urges can become sober actions one day, and that Hitoshi won’t hide his pain any longer. That Aizawa can stop it completely one day, so that Hitoshi can live a life finally free of pain, fear, and suffering.

Hitoshi only needs to live long enough to see it.

A Bird of Prey, A Kitten, and The Loch Ness Monster

Chapter Summary

On the last day of their time at Shoga's shack, Aizawa and Shinsou come face-to-face with the mysterious 'kid' that Shoga has been visited by. Shinsou is reluctant to leave, but they must return to UA, to Yamada and Eri. And to an important revelation that's been waiting on the path downhill.

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warnings: Casual mentions of death or suicide, Casual threat of suicide

Previously on Wards of UA: Shinsou got blackout drunk last night with Shoga and is now hungover. Shinsou's favorite hoodie has been bloodstained ever since Todoroki's cat attacked him. Aizawa built a treehouse and a small cave when he lived with his grandfather as a child, though the treehouse has fallen down. Aizawa was often sent to live with his grandfather by his mother, who suspected that Aizawa used his quirk on her. Shinsou's knife fell out when he was trapped in the leg snare, and Shoga tried to take it to kill a deer, but Aizawa recovered the knife. Shinsou was panicking after his quirk was ineffective with Eri through the radio, at which point Shoga offered Shinsou 'one drink to take the edge off,' but they both kept drinking after that point. Shinsou and Mirio would likely be uncomfortable around each other after the attack by 127, where Mirio was brainwashed by Shinsou into leaving the situation instead of being able to protect him. Shoga and Aizawa stopped talking to each other after Shoga chased Aizawa and Yamada down the mountain after learning they were engaged, and Aizawa assumed it was because Shoga didn't approve of them getting married while both were male. Shiori was on campus the night that 127 attacked, confronted by Hound Dog who was found unconscious after being tased. Aizawa explained the legend of kitsunes while on the hike to the shack, after Shinsou seemingly called him a fox-faced bastard because he didn't understand why it was insulting. When Shinsou was struggling to fall asleep the first night out of his fear of the dark, Aizawa talked to him, and before Shinsou fell asleep he mentioned wanting to see the Loch Ness Monster while they were exploring nature, though he immediately stated he didn't believe in it and it was meant sarcastically. Aizawa withheld the fact that foxes are omnivores when Shinsou first spotted them, trying not to make an argument when Shinsou was offended that Aizawa explained what herbivores were. Nezu said he was going to arrange a confidential quirk specialist visit for Shinsou before Aizawa and Shinsou left for Shoga's shack.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Hitoshi wakes up, too warm, with his head riddled with pain and a dry mouth that tastes like ass.

He blinks a few times, wondering if he really should try to struggle to wake up right now, when his head hurts enough to possibly promise that he'll die soon enough, before he realizes why he's too warm.

He was sleeping right on top of Aizawa.

He doesn't remember anything that happened last night, and the more he tries to remember, the more his throbbing head wants to punish him for it. But he slowly pulls his arm away, wondering why he doesn't have his shirt on, before he moves the rest of himself away, rolling off the futon as his body sings with agony that would rather lull him back to sleep than try to endure it. Even the cold floor on his back, the cold air hitting him, can't remedy this throbbing sting, so he pulls himself to his knees and checks again that Aizawa is still asleep.

He'd rather Aizawa sleep forever than have to face whatever happened last night.

Aizawa's dirty clothes are scattered on the floor, and it seems like the bucket he was using has gone missing. There's a mug full of water close to Hitoshi's backpack, which he shuffles on his knees towards and drinks eagerly, finding that it numbs the pain just a bit, but the pills he almost didn't notice promise better relief. He wavers before he decides that Aizawa sleeping like the dead means he can change his clothes, when Aizawa had left the room for that express purpose the night before.

Wearing his galaxy cat hoodie that he probably should have washed, given that the inside and sleeves were still crusted with blood after Soba attacked him, Hitoshi carefully pulls himself to his feet, testing his weight on his broken and make-shift splinted ankle. And finds he's able to stand on it much better than he should, even if it still hurts and feels unsteady.

With that done, Hitoshi is faced with a choice he'd rather not make. He can leave and try to force himself to eat one of those MREs and risk seeing the old man, or he can stay in this room until Aizawa wakes up, and probably wants to talk about whatever happened last night. With his ankle so weak, he should probably take the time to rest and elevate it, and staying in this room is the best option for that.

So Hitoshi ducks and moves the ripped blue curtain so it makes less noise, and limps into the living room to see the old man isn't bundled up in his blankets. Or anywhere in sight. He might be checking the traps, and Hitoshi is glad enough to be excluded from that.

He remembers talking to the old man about something, and while he waits for one of those MREs to finish cooking after he snaps the heating element, he finally remembers it. The old man told him about how he left the mafia lifestyle behind, how he lost his two fingers. How Hitoshi practically forced him to do that.

Hitoshi must have gotten shitfaced after that, and now he's probably dying because the sake was poisoned slightly. He's not dead, but this can't be the 'hangover' that Rikiya and the others would complain about. This is so much worse, he can't imagine fighting anyone in this state. He can barely manage to eat half of this tasteless food, even with the water fighting his dry mouth, because everything hurts when he moves.

But he might feel better if he tries freezing himself to death, so after Hitoshi relaces his shoes around his splint and visits that weird shack they call an 'outhouse,' he decides to limp around in the snow a bit. Nowhere in particular, just pulling his hood up to block out that offensive sunlight, even if the cold air around his neck and ears seems to help with his headache.

He just finds himself going back to Aizawa's treehouse and cave, by accident. It's not intentional. It just happens, because he's a little curious what Aizawa wrote on that boulder, or why he was trying to hide it.

Hitoshi crouches down in front of the cave before he decides to sit, and starts pulling snow up and around his ankle, packing the snow around his splint because freezing his entire foot off is starting to feel tempting. There's a throb that makes him grit his teeth, and he should be better with pain, after all he's gone through. He's just gotten spoiled recently, 127 trying to dice him up notwithstanding.

Hitoshi turns his head, a bit surprised by what he sees carved chalky white on the inside of the right boulder that supports this little cave. 'No moms allowed,' a much younger Aizawa must have wrote, the strokes jagged and characters different sizes. Hitoshi huffs, before he decides to pull himself a bit deeper inside.

If this is the 'No Moms Club,' then this is definitely where he belongs. He can stay out here, instead of bothering the old man. Instead of going back to UA, like Aizawa seems to think Hitoshi will. He won't. Staying out here, without anyone around for miles, is definitely where Hitoshi is going to stay. It's a 'safe house' after all, and if Hitoshi is supposed to stay safe, why leave it?

"Might want to be careful, plenty of animals could already be holed up in there," a foreign voice calls out, and 27 nearly breaks his head open on the rock balanced above him, unable to see this person who shouldn't be anywhere close to him until he looks up, to the tree where Aizawa's treehouse used to be.

When he sees him, sees his obvious quirk and his smug face, he knows he won't be able to put up much of a fight. Not with an injured ankle, and he still hasn't recovered his knife from where he dropped it yesterday, after the old man tried to steal it.

And with this man grinning down at him, his smirk sharp and teasing, he wants that knife far more than the quirk he knows this man has no chance of standing a chance against. "Looks like a poor kitten got lost up here."

Looks like a bird with red wings needs to fall out of a tree.

*

Aizawa is finding that he truly doesn't like waking up alone. And it's not because his husband isn't clinging to his side.

It's because, yet again, he wakes up and finds the teenager that he's sworn to protect many times who is in critical danger that he knows about and fears, is not in the room Aizawa wakes up in.

Aizawa takes note of that quickly after he wakes to the creak of the wood furnace door opening, and pulls himself off the futon with just the barest hope that it was Hitoshi tending to the fire. And while he's disappointed to find that's not the case, he rubs his eyes and barely holds himself from groaning because he'd really rather not deal with his grandfather right now. "Where is Hitoshi?"

"Dunno," Shoga grunts, sweeping the ashes and burnt out wood from the furnace and into a bucket that seems to have been cleaned out. Or at least, it hopefully was. "Looks like he ate. Should've taken some aspirin too. Left it out for him."

A shiver runs through the old man, and Aizawa feels the chill of it himself. This shack is barely more warm than the outside, but Aizawa would much prefer that his ward were in it. It would make it easier for him to ignore the warring pulls to help the old man with this chore, and to ignore him out of spite. "Let me do that."

Aizawa will steal the excuse to be too busy to talk from the old man, finishing the sweeping after he crouches down, then starts building a new firestack. He spots a book of matches tucked under the furnace, something else that's new, and luckily replaced the well-worn pair of flint and steel. "He had that look after the radio shut off, and now I know why. Just supposed to be a little, take the edge off--"

"I don't need your 'help' with Hitoshi. Not like that," Aizawa interrupts, even if it's pointless. Today will be the last time that Hitoshi ever sees the old man, and last night was certainly the last time he'll ever drink with him. "The last thing I need is a teenage alcoholic."

The very last thing he needs. "Didn't see him, but I'm sure you're itching to get him and your ass out of here."

Aizawa spares a glance at the table, spotting a half-eaten MRE, and two very important things he set there last night missing. "Where's Mo-the stuffed cat? It was on the table."

"Packed it for ya," the old man says, holding his hands up to the barely lit fire, his threadbare blankets wrapped around his shoulders. "Kid can call me anytime he wants, don't bother with all that goodbye crap because I know you want out of here--"

"After noon," Aizawa says, as the van wouldn't come to pick them up until midafternoon, and the less time Hitoshi spent around Mirio for the next few days, the better, for both of their sakes. But he raises an eyebrow as he stands and takes in the sour frown on his grandfather's face. "Is there a problem with that?"

"Didn't tell me that, like you never do," the old man grouses, but cagily. His grandfather is up to something, or hiding something, and Aizawa wonders if it has something to do with 'the kid.' This surprising visitor who's been sneaking things like floor mats, electric blankets, and better food into his grandfather's shack, and who his grandfather is uncomfortably secretive about.

The old man can keep his secrets, but to a point. "You checked the traps?" Aizawa asks, getting a grunt and nod, and that's more suspicious. "Narrows it down then. We'll stay out of your way until we need to leave--"

"Don't bother with that, ain't got nothing to hide," his grandfather complains, exactly like someone who does have something to hide. Aizawa ignores it with only the barest smirk as he puts on his shoes, thinking about petty vengeance that was certainly earned after his grandfather welcomed his ward to his sake.

Sake isn't an anxiety reducer that Hitoshi needed to be aware of, especially if he became aware of how much alcohol was sitting just next door in Nemuri's dorm. He's not even sure if Hitoshi would have to use his quirk to sample some, knowing how Nemuri hardly keeps track and Hitoshi has exceptionally light fingers.

Aizawa knows that if his grandfather checked the traps, then most of the perimeter has already been searched, and knowing that Hitoshi shouldn't have gotten far and wouldn't have gone somewhere unfamiliar to him, he starts walking in the direction of his childhood 'base.' Even when he does, he's sure Hitoshi isn't going there for any curiosity or sentimental value there, but he probably knows that he shouldn't wander far, and stick to the places that he's more familiar with.

Hitoshi also knows he shouldn't wander, but Aizawa is becoming uncomfortably unsurprised by his ward's poor decision making skills.

Aizawa is just barely in sight of the treehouse when he sees a flash of red, and stops in his tracks as he takes in the sight. Hitoshi standing there in the snow, his face a determined frown and his eyes locked on the man kneeling on a tree branch above him.

Hawks, the number two hero in Japan, tilts his head to examine his ward with a bemused smile and equally focused eyes. At first, it seems more like the prelude in a nature documentary before an act of animalistic cruelty takes its natural course, and knowing Hitoshi's current circumstances in regards to his quirk, Aizawa still finds that unnervingly likely.

But Hawks seems to detect his presence, turning his head to face Aizawa with a warm and almost dopey grin falling over his face, a hand raised up to wave in accompaniment with it. "Ho, fancy seeing you two out here! You're Eraserhead, right?"

Aizawa is unnerved that such a young pro hero, who had climbed the ranks too fast to get acquainted with Aizawa's work as an underground hero, would know him on sight and in civilian clothes. "You're 'the kid' the old man talks about?"

Hawks draws an exaggerated hiss, rubbing the back of his neck. "Jeez, what a cold way to talk about your grandpa! He brags about you all the time, y'know."

While that's a more logical explanation for how Hawks knows so much about him, Aizawa still doubts it.

Especially when Hawks glances again at Hitoshi, his eyes slightly narrowed in a way that makes his black markings around his eyes seem far more raptorial. "This is your lost little kitten, right? Wandering around in the snow?"

Hitoshi narrows his eyes with a huff, his hands tucked into his pockets and his stance widening just slightly, but enough that both Aizawa and Hawks would spot it for what it is. The kid better not have the knife, or any plans to use it.

"What a nice family reunion!" Hawks says, crashing that tense moment with another too-wide, too-honest smile. "Grandson, great-grandson, three generations under one roof! And it sure is nice to take these kids out of the city, let them experience nature for a while! Fresh air!"

Hawks jumps down from his perch, wings flaring slightly to temper his fall, and if he doesn't catch the utter confusion written on Hitoshi's face, bordering insult, that's all the better. Aizawa will use it. "The old man is getting older, and they've never met before."

Hitoshi turns to look at him, at first with insult, then softening to quietly beg him not to do this. But Aizawa rolls his shoulders, almost a shrug, with a look back that he hopes impresses upon Hitoshi that this will be their story for now. For Hawks, who is working far too close to Endeavor for Aizawa's comfort. And far too close to The Commission because of that.

Hitoshi directs his petulant glare over his shoulder with a flash of bare teeth, but when he turns back with his usual sullen blankness, it's a believable act. "Aizawa thought Grampa was mad at him for being gay, but it turns out he's not, so they're making up for lost time. It's been... very fun out here."

Aizawa isn't sure if Hitoshi is just bad at making a script on the fly like this, or if this is a bit of pettiness coming out to play. But Hawks whistles a disappointed down-swing tune at it. "Jeez, 'Grampa' comes before 'Dad.' Or maybe it's just the lack of cell reception up here. I've got a hot spot if you want to unwind with some 'Clickster' or whatever's hot these days!"

Aizawa might be older than Hawks, but he knows Hawks is barely older than his students, and should definitely know there's no such thing as 'Clickster' if Aizawa knows that. "This is a nice break from technology."

Hitoshi looks even more sullen with the reminder of the phone he had to leave behind, which is honestly very convincing. And Hawks seems to notice that. "Ah, shucks. Well, I still brought some nice yakitori for Gramps, plenty to share, but it's only getting colder the more we stand around here. Need a hand with that ankle?"

Hitoshi turns his head again to Hawks, outright glaring at him for the observation he clearly wanted to hide. "It's fine-hey!"

Aizawa expected a lot of things on this trip. Pleasant nature sightings mostly.

The sight of his ward being carried aloft with the number two hero's arms wrapped around his chest and under his arms while he hisses and Hawks laughs was not one of them.

But it honestly does feel like watching a hawk carry a stray kitten in its talons with the intention of devouring it at a secondary location, which is why Aizawa doesn't spare a thought to pride or not wanting to seem rattled when he runs after them.

*

This is cannibalism.

This guy, with the big red wings, who the old man likes too much and seems embarrassed about showing it more than he usually is with Aizawa, is eating chicken. It was his idea to eat chicken. He's cooking the chicken, and the old man talks like he does this a lot.

It's almost as creepy as he is, and he's fucking creepy.

It's worse because he pretends he's not, and he's good at that. He smiles like he's got nothing to hide, like he's an absolute idiot who is soaking up every single fucked up lie Aizawa is spoonfeeding him about how Hitoshi was recently adopted by Aizawa and-

It really wouldn't have been a bad thing if he brained himself on that rock before this Bird Guy said another word to him.

But, Bird Guy's chicken must have the antidote to that poison that was in the sake, because after eating some of it, Hitoshi starts to feel closer to alive rather than death warmed over. He keeps picking and eating small bites of it, slow as he can, because he doesn't want to be part of this conversation. Even when it drifts over to the old man for a bit because Bird Guy brought him some slippers and handwarmers along with what seems like his usual delivery of food, sake, and supplies, Hitoshi keeps catching glances from him.

The Bird Guy has a good act, to a point. Despite that dopey grin and hands that just keep fluttering with too honest emotions, too much like Yamada, his eyes go too cold too easily. Hitoshi has seen that look often enough to know what that means.

Bird Guy has it out for him over something, and Hitoshi just has to hope Aizawa knows how to handle it. He doesn't have his knife, he doesn't want to use his quirk, but he will if Aizawa fails him here.

He doesn't know why he wants to wait, his arms folded and his nerves itching to get away from this place even if he risks running into a bear trap. But Aizawa seems to have a plan.

A stupid one.

“So, Shohei,” Bird Guy says, bracing his arm against the table as he serves the last of the yakitori he’s reheated on the stove. “It’s pretty neat that you’re carrying on the tradition of male Aizawa’s having ‘Sho’ in their given name. It’s almost like Eraserhead must have picked you for that.”

“No one said he didn’t,” Hitoshi says, because that would make sense. If Aizawa wants to carry on that tradition, and for whatever reason he had a bunch of children to choose from, looking for the right name would make sense. Because it already doesn’t make sense that Aizawa would look for a child in the first place, not someone like him and definitely not when he had Eri to look after.

Bird Guy chokes on a laugh, but Aizawa seems insulted for some reason. “It was just coincidence. I don’t put stake in things like ‘traditions.’”

